argument of Mr. Bhabha that cl. (33) is specific and there is no ambiguity about it. Turning to cl. (33), it, inter alia, authorises the Central Government to make rules "controlling the use... of bullion", and according to Mr. Bhabha, bullion includes gold ornaments. I asked Mr. Bhabha that if a rule is made by the Central Government that no person shall put on ornaments in his possession on any day including a festival day, would it be a valid rule? I did not receive a satisfactory answer. Obviously, if cl. (33) is interpreted as Mr. Bhabha wants me to interpret, the assumed rule would fall under that clause. It is obvious that such a rule can have no connection whatsoever with the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3. I, therefore, find it difficult to accept Mr. Bhabha's contention so broadly stated. It appears to me that the Legislature having generally stated in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 the power conferred on the Central Government, have projected its mind into future envisaging certain subjects relating to which the Central Government may have to frame rules for securing the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3, if it appears to the Central Government necessary or expedient to do so. In other words, the Legislature in enacting sub-s. (2) has given a guidance to the Central Government in the matter of what it can do for securing the aforesaid purposes in exercise of the power conferred on it by sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. Sub-section (2) does not in any manner restrict the power conferred by sub-s. (1), because sub-s. (2) in terms states that it is without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-s. (1); nor does it confer any additional power on the Central Government in the matter of framing rules. It would, therefore, follow that when it is shown that the rules framed fall in any one or more of the clauses of sub-s. (2), the Court will presume that the rules would have a bearing on any one or more of the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3. The burden of proving the contrary would lie, and would lie heavily, on the party which challenges this position. I find it difficult to take the matter any further than this. Apart from the construction of the section, there is also guidance in this respect from the decided cases relating to the provisions similar to the one with which I am concerned here.

The first is a decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in King-Emperor v. Sibnath Banerji.² Sibnath Banerji and others were detained pursuant to orders made under r. 26 of the Defence of India Rules, 1940. These orders were signed by the order of the Governor. The said r. 26 was purported to have been made under s. 2(2)(x) of the Defence of India Act, 1939. It was held by the Courts in India, following the decision of the Federal Court in *Keshav Talpade v. King Emperor*³ that the rule was ultra vires of the rule-making power of the Government of India under s. 2(2)(x), and the detention, therefore, was bad. An appeal was taken on behalf of the King Emperor. To appreciate the decision of their Lordships, it would be convenient to reproduce the relevant provisions of the said s. 2 of the Defence of India Act, 1939:—

"2. (1) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, make such rules as appear to it to be necessary or expedient for securing the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order or the efficient prosecution of war, or for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community.

(2) Without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1) the rules may provide for, or may empower any authority to make orders providing for, all or any of the following matters, namely:—"

If the aforesaid provisions of s. 2 of the Defence of India Act, 1939, are placed in juxtaposition with the provisions of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, it would be seen that the provisions are identical except that certain more purposes have been added in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. The preamble of sub-s. (2) of s. 2 of the Defence of India Act, 1939, is identical with the preamble of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the present Act. The Federal Court in Talpada's case in construing r. 26 which had been framed under s. 2(2)(x), observed (p. 68):—

“...The Legislature having set out in plain and unambiguous language in paragraph (x) the scope of the rules which may be made providing for apprehension and detention in custody, it is not permissible to pray in aid the more general words in s. 2(1), in order to justify a rule which so plainly goes beyond the limits of paragraph (x); though if paragraph (x) were not in the Act at all,..... We are compelled therefore to hold that rule 26 in its present form goes beyond the rule-making powers which the Legislature has thought fit to confer upon the Central Government and is for that reason invalid.”

The line of reasoning adopted by the Federal Court was not accepted by their Lordships. Dealing with the aforesaid view, their Lordships observed at page 258 of the report:

“Their Lordships are unable to agree with the learned Chief Justice of the Federal Court on his statements of the relative positions of sub-ss. 1 and 2 of s. 2 of the Defence of India Act, and Counsel for the respondents in the present appeal was unable to support that statement, or to maintain that r. 26 was invalid. In the opinion of their Lordships, the function of sub-s. 2 is merely an illustrative one; the rule-making power is conferred by sub-s. 1, and ‘the rules’ which are referred to in the opening sentence of sub-s. 2 are the rules which are authorised by, and made under, sub-s. 1; the provisions of sub-s. 2 are not restrictive of sub-s. 1, as, indeed, is expressly stated by the words ‘without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-s. 1’.”

From the aforesaid observations of their Lordships, it is clear that their Lordships were considering the relative positions of sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (2) of s. 2 of the Defence of India Act, 1939, and the relative positions are that the rule making power is contained in sub-s. (1), and the clauses of sub-s. (2) are merely illustrative of that power. The illustrations given are not exhaustive and do not restrict the scope of sub-s. (1), but the position of the clauses is not anything more than mere illustrations of the power contained in sub-s. (1).

The next decision is Santosh Kumar Jain v. The State.⁴ The provisions that were construed by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in this case are the orders made under sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946. Sub-section (1) of s. 3 empowered the Central Government, so far as it appears to it to be necessary or expedient for maintaining or increasing supplies of an essential commodity, or for securing their equitable distribution and availability at fair prices, by notified order, to provide for regulating or prohibiting the production, supply and distribution thereof, and trade and commerce therein. Sub-section (2) provided that “without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1) an order made thereunder may provide...”. It would be seen that sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act is not in identical terms with sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. There is a variation. The expression used in the Defence of India Act is “the rules”, while the expression used in the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act is “an order made thereunder”. Construing these provisions, Mr. Justice Patanjali Sastri, delivering the judgment of the Court, at page 310 of the report, observed:

“It is manifest that sub-section (2) of section 3 confers no further or other powers on the Central Government than what are conferred under sub-section (1), for it is ‘an order made thereunder’ that may provide for one or the other of the matters specifically enumerated in sub-section (2), which are only illustrative, as such enumeration is ‘without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1)’. Seizure of an article being thus shown to fall within the purview of sub-section (1), it must be competent for the Central Government or its delegate, the Provincial Government, to make an order for seizure under that sub-section apart from and irrespective of the anticipated contravention of any other order as contemplated in clause (j) of sub-section (2)...

The view we have expressed above receives support from the decision of the Privy Council in Sibnath Banerjee's case."

It would be seen that though there is a slight variation in the language used in s. 2(2) of the Defence of India Act, 1939, and s. 3(2) of the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, the principle governing both the decisions is the same, namely the relative position of the two sub-sections. On this aspect of the case, it is also necessary to refer to the decision of the Privy Council in *Attorney-General for Canada v. Hallot & Carey Ltd.*⁵, a decision on which very strong reliance has been placed by Mr. Bhabha not only on this aspect, but from other aspects of the case with which I am concerned. It would, therefore, be convenient to deal with this case in detail at this stage and then refer to the passages on which Mr. Bhabha has placed reliance in support of his argument on different aspects of this case. Facts giving rise to this decision in brief were: This case went to the Privy Council from Canada. During the last War, the Canadian Legislature enacted "War Measures Act". On the termination of the war, and emergency, it was found that it was necessary to continue certain provisions of the Emergency Act as well as to make certain other provisions for certain other purposes. The National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945 was, therefore, enacted. Section 2(1) of the Act provided:

"The Governor-in-Council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may, by reason of the continued existence of the national emergency arising out of the war against Germany and Japan, deem necessary or advisable for the purposes of... maintaining, controlling and regulating supplies and services, prices, transportation, use and occupation of property, rentals, employment, salaries and wages to ensure economic stability and an orderly transition to conditions of peace."

In exercise of the aforesaid powers conferred by sub-s. (1) of s. 2, an Order-in-Council was made on April 3, 1947, which by cl. 22 provided that

"all oats and barley in commercial positions in Canada with certain specified exceptions are hereby vested in the Canadian Wheat Board."

The respondent, who held a large stock of barley, about 40,000 bushels, was affected by the order. The validity of this Order-in-Council was challenged by the respondent. One of the arguments was that Government was not empowered to expropriate wheat or barley under s. 2(1) of the Act. As against that the claim of Government was that expropriation was allowed under sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the Act. The argument on behalf of the respondent was that expropriation was in terms allowed by a clause of sub-s. (2) of the War Measures Act. In express terms such power was not conferred by s. 2(1) on the Governor in Council by the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. It had, therefore, been argued that the Governor had no such power. On the other hand, the argument advanced on behalf of the Government was that there was no curtailment of the Governor's powers under the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. The powers were identical with the powers under the War Measures Act though the power exercisable under sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the Transitional Powers Act was limited to certain other purposes only. It may be noticed that between sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the War Measures Act and sub-s. (1) of s. 2, there was not much material difference except as to the purposes. The contentions raised on behalf of the respondent, which were based on the aforesaid difference in the two Acts—the War Measures Act and the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act—were not accepted by the Privy Council. Dealing with the relative position of sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the War Measures Act, their Lordships observed (pp. 448-449):

"...So to hold would threaten the very basis of the Act. Their Lordships think that there is not by now any room for doubt as to the function performed by the list of permitted subjects in section 3 of the War Measures Act. The form adopted is plainly borrowed from section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867. They do not extend the purposes already defined, for they are directed to explaining what can be done, not the object for which things may be done: they do not extend any more than they limit its powers, for all that they permit is already permitted by the general words that precede them.... What they do is to state explicitly certain things that are to be treated as falling within the range of the general powers already conferred. In that sense alone they extend, because they amplify, those powers."

Mr. Bhabha has laid emphasis on the clauses "what can be done", "are to be treated as falling within the range", "they extend, because they amplify those powers", and it is his argument that this decision is an authority for the proposition that sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act confers independent and additional power on the Central Government. In my opinion, the argument is not well founded. It is true that the clauses on which emphasis has been laid by Mr. Bhabha, if read in isolation of its context, may give an impression that sub-s. (2) confers power to make rules on the subjects mentioned in its clauses in addition to and independently of the provisions of sub-s. (1). But reading those clauses in isolation would not be a permissible way. All the connected observations have to be read as a whole and when so read, it is abundantly clear that sub-s. (2) does not confer any independent rule-making power, but only amplifies or illustrates what is contained in sub-s. (1). In these observations, their Lordships have pointed out that the function performed by the list of permitted subjects is not to extend the purpose already defined sub-s. (1). They are only directed to explaining what can be done in exercise of power under sub-s. (1). The rule making power on the subjects mentioned in sub-s. (2) has to be exercised only when it is required for securing the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1). Their Lordships pointed out:

"They do not extend the purposes already defined, for they are directed to explaining what can be done, and not the object for which things may be done: they do not extend any more than they limit its powers."

It is in the context of this statement of law that the other observations of their Lordships have to be understood.

Mr. Bhabha also has referred us to a passage from the judgment of the Supreme Court in Makhan Singh v. State of Punjab.⁶ The observations on which he placed reliance are contained in para. 38 of their Lordships' judgment (p. 401):—

"...In the present cases, one has merely to read section 3(1) and the detailed provisions contained in the several clauses of section 3(2) to be satisfied that the attack against the validity of the said section on the ground of excessive delegation is patently unsustainable. Not only is the legislative policy broadly indicated in the preamble to the Act, but the relevant provisions of the impugned section itself give such detailed and specific guidance to the rule-making authority that it would be idle to contend that the Act has delegated essentially legislative function to the rule-making authority."

Now these observations have been made in repelling the contention that s. 3 of the Act, with which I am here concerned, suffered from the vice of excessive delegation of legislative powers. These observations, in my opinion, do not assist the contention of Mr. Bhabha that an additional or independent rule making power has been conferred by sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act. These are all the authorities to which counsel for the parties have drawn our attention. In my opinion, therefore, no additional or independent rule making authority or power has been conferred on the Central Government in any of the clauses of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act. It, therefore, follows that the limitation imposed in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 would equally be applicable to and govern the rule making power of the Central Government relating to the subjects mentioned in cls. 1 to 57 of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act. In other words, the power of the Central Government to make rules on any of those subjects is exercisable only for securing the purposes authorised by sub-s. (1) of s. 3, in the event the Central Government forms an opinion that it was necessary or expedient for it to do so. A challenge to the validity of the rules made under any of the clauses of sub-s. (2) or under sub-s. (1) on either or both these grounds would, in my opinion, therefore, be a justiciable issue.

I would, however, assume that sub-s. (2) confers an independent and additional rule making power on the Central Government and proceed to examine whether the Gold Control Rules fall either under cl. (23) or (33) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act. I have already reproduced these clauses. The argument of Mr. Bhabha relating to cl. (23) is that this clause authorises the Central Government to control trade or industry in respect of the articles or things of any description. The expression "articles or things of any description" is wide enough to include gold; Gold Control Rules have been made for the control of trade in gold; these rules, therefore, fairly fall under cl. (23) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act. It is indeed true that cl. (23) permits the Central Government to make rules to control trade or industry in respect of articles or things of any description but on that power, the clause itself has placed certain limitations. The limitation is that the rules could be made only for the purposes of regulating or increasing the supply of such articles which may be used in connection with the conduct of military operations or civil defence or for maintaining the supplies or services essential to the life of the community. The rule making power conferred under this clause is to enable the Government to obtain an adequate supply of articles required for securing the aforesaid purposes. I have already stated that the effect of the rule is that for all practical purposes dealings in gold of a purity in excess of 14 carats have been brought to a stand still. New ornaments of gold of purity in excess of 14 carats is prohibited save and except converting old ornaments into new ones. In the circumstances, I fail to see how these rules could be said to be made for the purposes of "regulating or increasing supply of gold." In fact, it is the case of the respondents in their return that the object of the rules is to stop smuggling of gold. If that be so, I again fail to see how it could be said that gold is an article which is required in connection with the conduct of military operations or civil defence or for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community. I may also further state that in the return, it is nowhere stated that the rules made either fall under cl. (23) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act, or that the rules have been framed in exercise of the powers conferred by the said clause. In my opinion, therefore, the rules do not fall under the said cl. (23).

Turning to cl. (33), which confers power on the Central Government to make rules for controlling the possession, use or disposal of, or dealing in, certain articles including bullion, it is the contention of Mr. Bhabha that the word "bullion" is wide enough to cover gold ornaments and articles of gold, which is the subject-matter of Gold Control Rules. On the other hand, Mr. Mehta contends that the word "bullion" is not wide enough to include ornaments or articles of gold. The word only means mass of gold. The first question, therefore, that arises is what meaning is attributable to the word "bullion". Counsel for both the sides have referred us to the ordinary meaning of the expression "bullion" as contained in various dictionaries. Mr. Bhabha referred us to the meaning of "bullion" as given by Jowitt in the Dictionary of English Law, Webster's Dictionary, and in the new Encyclopaedia Britannica, Vol. 4. Mr. Mehta, on the other hand, referred us to the meaning of the expression in Murray's Dictionary. Jowitt defines "bullion" as

"uncoined gold and silver in the mass. These metals are called so, either when smelted from the native ore and not perfectly refined, or when they are perfectly refined, but melted down into bars or ingots, or into any unwrought body, of any degree of fineness."

Webster defines bullion as

"gold or silver considered merely as so much metal without regard to any value imparted to it by its form... uncoined gold or silver in the shape of bars, ingots, or comparable masses; an ornamental metal boss used on harness, jewellery, or other objects."

In the Encyclopaedia, the meaning given is:

"the name given to gold and silver considered solely as merchandise. When coin and specie are treated as bullion it is their weight and fineness which are reckoned, not their face value. Bullion thus means the gold and silver of the mines brought to a standard of purity."

Murray gives the meaning as

"Precious metal in the mass. Gold or silver in the lump, as distinguished from coin or manufactured articles; also applied to coined or manufactured gold or silver when considered simply with reference to its value as raw material."

It would be seen that in these books, "bullion" has been described as mass of gold, not converted into any articles or ornaments. It would be clear that the rules which regulate the preparation of ornaments and also regulate the borrowing of money on the hypothecation of gold or gold ornaments, can hardly be said to be falling under cl. (33) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act. It is, however, the argument of Mr. Bhabha that cl. (33) empowers the Central Government to make rules controlling possession, use or disposal or dealing in bullion. It would necessarily follow that the Central Government would also have implied powers to make rules in order to enable it to exercise power which is conferred on it. According to Mr. Bhabha, rules relating to controlling possession, use or disposal or dealing in ornaments as well as dealings in ornaments and gold by hypothecation would fall within the exercise of this implied power. Now, the principle of implied power is well-settled and the principle is that they are such powers without the exercise of which the power expressly conferred cannot be exercised. The power expressly conferred is of "controlling the possession, use or disposal of or dealing in... bullion." It has to be shown that for the exercise of this power it was absolutely essential or necessary to control the possession, use or disposal of or dealing in ornaments. We do not find anything stated in the affidavit of the respondents showing how the exercise of the claimed implied power was necessary for the exercise of the power expressly granted under cl. (33) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Act. In absence of any material placed before us, it is difficult to accept this contention of Mr. Bhabha. In Bidi Leaves etc. Assoc. v. The State,⁷ their Lordships of the Supreme Court after considering certain authorities, and after citing the observations of Pollock relating to the doctrine of implied power, observed (p. 384):—

"...In other words, the doctrine of implied power can be legitimately invoked when it is found that a duty has been imposed or a power conferred on an authority by a statute and it is further found that the duty cannot be discharged or the power cannot be exercised at all unless some auxiliary or incidental power is assumed to exist. In such a case, in the absence of an implied power the statute itself would become impossible of compliance. The impossibility in question must be of a general nature so that the performance of duty or the exercise of power is rendered impossible in all cases. It really means that the statutory provision would become a dead letter and cannot be enforced unless subsidiary power is implied."

It has not been made out either in the affidavit filed by the respondents or in the course of the arguments that such a position exists, nor has it been shown that it was impossible for the Central Government to exercise the power under the said cl. (33) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 without making rules relating to preparation of ornaments or hypothecation of ornaments. I, therefore, find it difficult to accept this aspect of the argument of Mr. Bhabha. Mr. Bhabha has also referred us to the definitions of "bullion" and "gold" given in the different Acts, viz., the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, the Reserve Bank of India Act, Public Debts Act. I do not consider it necessary to deal in detail with these definitions as, in my opinion, these definitions can hardly be of any useful assistance in construing the meaning of the word "bullion" in cl. (33). I may also state that in the notification bringing in force the Gold Control Rules, it has not been mentioned that the rules have been made in exercise of the power conferred on the Central Government under s. 3(2)(33). On the other hand, it has been stated that the rules have been framed in exercise of the powers under s. 3. It is true that the omission to mention that the rules have been made under s. 3(2)(33) would not be fatal to the argument advanced by Mr. Bhabha, if it could have been shown that the rules made were referable to the said clause. I have already stated that, in my opinion, the rules framed do not squarely fall under the said cl. (33).

This brings me to the consideration of the question whether the rules framed fall within sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. It is, therefore, necessary to see whether the rules have been made for securing any one or more of the authorised purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1), and it has also to be ascertained whether opinion has been formed by the Government that it was necessary or expedient for securing the authorised purposes. As regards the first aspect, there has been considerable arguments at the bar. On the question as to what should be the nature of the connection between the object sought to be achieved by the rules and the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act, the contention of Mr. Mehta had been that the connection must be real and proximate and not hypothetical and remote. On the other hand, the contention of Mr. Bhabha had been that if it is shown that the objects sought to be achieved by the rules are capable of being related to the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3, that is sufficient for the purposes of sustaining the rules. A number of authorities have been cited by counsel on both the sides. It has been the argument of Mr. Mehta that the connection between the objects sought to be achieved by these rules and the purposes is too remote. Rules have been made with the object of changing the habits of the people of India of making gold ornaments or hoarding gold. It is expected that if these habits are changed, then the demand for gold would be reduced. If the demand for gold is reduced, prices of gold would fall, and if prices of gold fall, smuggling will be reduced. If smuggling is reduced, more foreign exchange would be available to the Central Government. According to Mr. Mehta, the connection between the object of the rules and the securing of the purposes is very remote and problematic. It has also been the argument of Mr. Mehta that by these rules smuggling will never stop; people will never cease to buy or prepare gold ornaments. Counsel for parties have cited considerable number of authorities in support of their respective contentions, and it would be convenient at this stage, in my view, to refer to these authorities.

Mr. Mehta has referred me to the decisions reported in Rex v. Basudeva,⁸ The Superintendent, Central Prison, Fatehgarh v. Ram Manohar Lohia,⁹ Azim Khan v. Emperor,¹⁰ Lahore E. S. Co. v. Punjab Province,¹¹ Chester v. Bateson,¹² and Attorney-General v. De Keyser's Royal Hotel.¹³

Mr. Bhabha has referred me to certain observations in the decision in Attorney General for Canada v. Hallet & Carey Ltd., and Ross-Chunis v. Papadopoulos.¹⁴

Rex v. Basudeva: Respondent, Basudeva, was a dealer in kerosene oil, which was an essential commodity as defined in the U.P. Prevention of Black-Marketing (Temporary Powers) Act. On the allegation that the Provincial Government was satisfied that the respondent habitually indulged in black marketing, he was arrested and ordered to be detained in exercise of the power.

conferred by s. 3(1)(i) of the Act. The contention raised on behalf of Basudeva was that his detention was unlawful as the provisions were void and inoperative as being ultra vires of the Provincial Legislature. The claim made on behalf of the Provincial Government was that the Legislature was competent to enact an Act in exercise of its legislative power conferred on it by Entry I, List II, Schedule VII of the Government of India Act, 1935, read together with s. 100 of the Act. The entry read: "Preventive detention for reasons connected with the maintenance of public order". The question that arose before their Lordships was whether the preventive detention provided in s. 3(1)(i) was the preventive detention for reasons connected with maintenance of public order. In other words, the question was whether the preventive detention on the ground of habitual indulgence in black-marketing was a preventive detention connected with the maintenance of public order. The contention raised on behalf of the Government had not been accepted by the Courts below. The matter was, therefore, taken to the Federal Court at the instance of the Government. The Advocate General appearing for the Government contended before the Federal Court that habitual black marketing in essential commodity was bound sooner or later to cause dislocation of the machinery of control and distribution, which in turn might lead to breach of peace, and that, therefore, detention with a view to prevent such black marketing was covered by the entry. This argument was repelled by their Lordships. Mr. Justice Patanjali Sastri, as he then was, delivering the judgment of the Court, observed (p. 68):

"...It is true that black-marketing in essential commodities may at times lead to a disturbance of public order, but so may, for example, the rash driving of an automobile or the sale of adulterated food stuffs. Activities such as these are so remote in the chain of relation to the maintenance of public order that preventive detention on account of them cannot, in our opinion, fall within the purview of Entry 1 of List II... The connection contemplated must, in our view, be real and proximate, not far-fetched or problematical."

The Superintendent, Central Prison, Fatehgarh v. Ram Manohar Lohia: The decision in Basudeva's case has been approved by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Lohia's case. The question that arose there related to the validity of s. 3 of the U.P. Special Powers Act, 1932. That section provided:

"Whoever, by word, either spoken or written, or by signs or by visible representations, or otherwise, instigates, expressly or by implication, any person or class of persons not to pay or to defer payment of any liability, and whoever does any act, with intent or knowing it to be likely that any words, signs or visible representations containing such instigation shall thereby be communicated directly or indirectly to any person or class of persons, in any manner whatsoever, shall be punishable with imprisonment which may extend to six months, or with fine, extending to Rs. 250, or with both."

R. M. Lohia was prosecuted under this section for delivering certain speeches instigating cultivators not to pay enhanced irrigation rates to the Government. He applied to the High Court for a writ of habeas corpus, inter alia, on the ground that the said section was inconsistent with art. 19(1)(a) of the Constitution, which conferred on the citizen a fundamental right of freedom of speech. The claim made on behalf of the State was that the restriction imposed fell within the permissible limits stated in cl. (2) of art. 19 of the Constitution. Clause (2) of art. 19 empowered the Legislature to impose reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the fundamental right of freedom of speech in the interest of security of the State, friendly relations with foreign States, public order, decency, morality, or in relation to contempt of Court, defamation or incitement to an offence. The claim made on behalf of the State was that the restrictions imposed were in the interest of public order. The contention was negatived by the High Court and the matter went to the Supreme Court at the instance of the State Government. Their Lordships dismissed the appeal of the State, and it was held that in order to sustain the Act claiming to impose restrictions, under cl. (2) of art. 19, it is necessary to establish that the connection between the Act and the public order sought to be maintained by the Act, is intimate. Their Lordships apart from the aforesaid conclusion further considered another limitation contained in the clause itself, viz. that the restriction must be reasonable. At page 835 of the report, their Lordships observed:

"...The restriction made 'in the interests of public order' must also have reasonable relation to the object to be achieved, i.e., the public order. If the restriction has no proximate relationship to the achievement of public order, it cannot be said that the restriction is a reasonable restriction within the meaning of the said clause."

Their Lordships also cited with approval the aforesaid decision in Basudeva's case, and observed that the decision contained some observations which gave considerable assistance in construction of the words.

The decision in Azim Khan v. Emperor does not relate to the consideration of the question of validity of the legislation in relation to its legislative powers, but, on the other hand, only deals with the question as to whether a particular act fell within the provisions of the Act. In other words, the question considered was whether the particular conduct on the part of the person constituted an offence within the meaning of the Act. It is, therefore, not necessary to consider this case.

Similar also is the case in Lahore E. S. Co. v. Punjab Province, which relates to the validity of an administrative act done in exercise of the power conferred on the Government under the statute.

The question that arose in Chester v. Bateson, related to the validity of Regulation No. 2A(2) of the Defence of the Realm Regulations. That regulation provided that "No person shall, without the consent of the Minister of Munitions take... any proceedings for the purpose of obtaining an order or decree for the recovery of possession of, or for the ejectment of a tenant of, any dwelling-house in which a munition worker is living, and which is situate in an area declared by order of the Minister of Munitions to be a 'special area'."

The said regulation was framed in exercise of the power conferred on the Government by sub-s. (1) of s. 1 of the Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act, 1914, and on behalf of the executive Government it was claimed that the regulation was valid because it had been framed for securing public safety and defence of the Realm, and sub-s. (1) of s. 1 of the Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act, 1914, empowered His Majesty in Council to issue regulations for securing this purpose. It was held that the regulation was ultra vires of the regulation making power conferred on His Majesty in Council by sub-s. (1) of s. 1 of the Act. The question posed by Darling J. has been expressed in following terms (p. 833):

"...and I ask myself whether it is a necessary, or even reasonable, way to aid in securing the public safety and the defence of the realm to give power to a Minister to forbid any person to institute any proceedings to recover possession of a house so long as a war worker is living in it."

And it was held that it cannot be said to be a reasonable way of aiding in securing the public safety and the defence of the realm. Similar view also has been taken by the other Judges.

The question considered in Attorney-General v. De Keyser's Royal Hotel related to the validity of the regulation 2 of the Defence of the Realm Regulations, issued under the Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act, 1914. Certain piece of land was sought to be acquired without paying any compensation in the manner provided by an earlier Act. The question arose related to the validity of the power claimed under the regulation. As already stated, the regulation was issued in exercise of the power conferred on His Majesty in Council under the Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act, which enabled His Majesty in Council to make regulations inter alia for the safety of the realm.

It was held that the claim made for acquisition of property without payment of compensation under the regulation was invalid inasmuch as though taking of the property may be necessary for the defence of the realm, non-payment of compensation was not. These are all the cases which have been referred to by Mr. Mehta.

Turning to the decisions on which reliance has been placed by Mr. Bhabha, I have already referred to the facts in the Attorney-General v. Hallet & Carey Ltd. The observations on which reliance has been placed by Mr. Bhabha are at page 450. They are:

"...That does not allow him (Governor in Council) to do whatever he may feel inclined, for what he does must be capable of being related to one of the prescribed purposes, and the court is entitled to read the Act in this way."

I may as well reproduce the sentence immediately following the observations on which Mr. Bhabha has placed reliance:

"But then, expropriation is altogether capable of being so related."

These observations were made in considering the arguments advanced on the basis of the general principle that the statutes which encroached upon the right of the subject, whether as regards person or property, are subject to the strict construction. Their Lordships explained that the general principle means no more than that where the import of some enactment is inclusive or ambiguous, the Court may properly lean in favour of the interpretation that leaves private rights undisturbed. But this principle would have no application when a statute in express terms permits interference with those rights. It appears that an argument was advanced that Parliament had chosen to say explicitly that the Governor-in-Council shall do "whatever things he may deem necessary or advisable". The expropriation, therefore, was within the powers of the Governor. The claim so broadly made was not accepted by their Lordships, and it was pointed out that that does not mean that the statute allowed the Governor-in-Council to do whatever he may be inclined, but, on the other hand, what he does must be capable of being related to one of the prescribed purposes. Their Lordships then examined the provisions relating to expropriation and came to the conclusion that expropriation was altogether capable of being related to the prescribed purposes. It would thus be seen that even on this authority, on which reliance has been placed by Mr. Bhabha, it is open to the Court to see whether there is a connection between the impugned rules and the prescribed purposes for securing which the rule making power has been conferred on the Central Government. The argument of Mr. Bhabha, however, is that the nature of connection which need be established is not "proximate" or "real" one, but it is sufficient to show that the rules made are "capable of being related" in some manner with the prescribed purposes.

The other decision, on which reliance has been placed, Ross-Clunis v. Papadopoulos, related to the validity of Regulation No. 3 made under sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Emergency Powers Order in Council, 1939, which empowered the Governor to make regulations as appeared to him to be necessary or expedient for securing public safety, maintenance of public order, etc. Regulation No. 3 empowered the Commissioner with the approval of the Governor to order that a fine be levied collectively on the assessable inhabitants of the area in circumstances mentioned in the said regulation No. 3. The circumstances mentioned were:

"where the Commissioner has reason to believe that all or any of the inhabitants of the certain area have... failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the commission of the offence; or to render all the assistance in their power to discover the offender or offenders."

Offence had been defined in the Regulation as "an offence, commission of which were prejudicial to the internal security of the colony or maintenance of public order in the colony".

The Commissioner with the previous approval of the Governor had imposed a collective fine on the inhabitants in certain area on being satisfied that in his opinion offences were committed by the inhabitants of a particular area commission of which was prejudicial to the internal security of the colony. The question arose about the validity of this order. It may be noticed that the power conferred to make those orders was for securing the public safety or maintenance of the public order. Their Lordships held the regulation authorising imposing of collective fine to be a valid regulation. Their Lordships after quoting the observations in Attorney General for Canada v. Hallet & Carey Ltd. (which we have also reproduced) have held:

"In Their Lordships' opinion, Regulation 3 is clearly related to the purposes prescribed in s. 6(1) of the Order-in-Council. There can be no doubt as to the purpose of imposing a collective fine in a case where crimes have been committed in a particular area, and some or all of the inhabitants of the area have failed to take reasonable steps to prevent the commission of the offence."

It would again be seen that here also the Privy Council has considered whether the regulation made by the Commissioner in exercise of the power conferred by s. 6 was related to the purposes prescribed in s. 6, and they came to the conclusion that the regulation clearly related to the purposes mentioned in s. 6.

Considering all these authorities together, one thing is clear that when validity of an act, rule, regulation or order made by an executive authority, to which the power has been delegated by the legislation, is challenged, then, it is open to the Court to see whether the act done by the delegated authority has any connection with securing or realization of the purposes for which the power has been conferred on the delegated authority. The question next arises is as to what is the degree or nature of connection that is required to be established in the instant case. Basudeva's case has expressed the connection to be "real and proximate and not far-fetched or problematical". The Supreme Court in Lohia's case has recorded its approval of the view taken in Basudeva's case. The test is laid down at page 836 of the report:

"...The decision (in Basudeva's case), in our view, lays down the correct test. The limitation imposed in the interests of public order to be a reasonable restriction, should be one which has a proximate connection or nexus with public order, but not one far-fetched, hypothetical or problematical or too remote in the chain of its relation with the public order."

Their Lordships of the Privy Council in the two appeals—one from Canada and the other from Cyprus—have, in the context of the provisions it was considering, characterised the connection as "capable of being related to the authorised purposes".

The question to be considered is which of these two tests would be the appropriate one. And that, in its turn, raises a question whether there is any difference in principle in the tests laid down by the Federal Court and the Supreme Court on the one hand and the Privy Council on the other. The other question that arises is whether the tests laid down in these different decisions are tests of general application. In my opinion, there is some difference in one of the positive tests laid down by the Federal Court and approved by the Supreme Court on one hand, and that by the Privy Council on the other. For a thing to be capable of being related to another, the relation need not necessarily be proximate. A reasonable nexus or connection between the two would be sufficient to show that one is capable of being related to another. That which serves to promote a particular purpose can be said to be capable of being related to that purpose; and that is the test laid down by the Privy Council. Mr. Mehta, however, contends that there may be some difference in the tests laid down by the Supreme Court and the Federal Court on one hand and the Privy Council on the other, but the test which ought to govern the decision of this case is the test laid down by the Federal Court and the Supreme Court. That would indeed have been the position had I come to the conclusion that the tests laid down in those cases were of general application. But I find it difficult to take such a view. In my view, the tests laid down are in the context of the contents of the relevant legislative power which their Lordships were considering in each case. The legislative power in the context of which the Federal Court has laid down the test is one contained in Entry No. I, of List II of Schedule VII, read with s. 100 of the Government of India Act, 1935, and that entry among other things related to "preventive detention for reasons connected with maintenance of public order". Their Lordships were considering the connection that is required to be established between the preventive detention and the maintenance of public order. It would be noticed that there was no latitude in the matter left to the Legislature, and it is in this context that the test has been laid down. Similarly, the test laid down by the Supreme Court in Lohia's case was in the context of the legislative power conferred by cl. (2) of art. 19 to restrict exercise of certain fundamental rights conferred on the citizen under that article. The clause considered by their Lordships was "reasonable restriction on the exercise of right in the interest of... public order", and it is in this context that the test has been laid down. It would be seen that there is also no latitude left to the Legislature for exercise of this power. In the context of the legislative power it is not sufficient to show that legislative authority has thought it necessary to impose those restrictions in the interest of public order, but it has to be established that it is necessary to impose those restrictions in the interest of public order. The test laid down by the Privy Council is in the context of the legislative power contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945. The power conferred is in following terms:

"The Governor in Council may do and authorise such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may by reason of the continued existence of the national emergency arising out of the war with Germany and Japan, deem necessary or advisable for the purpose of..."

It is in the context of exercise of this power that the test has been laid down by the Privy Council in both these cases. It would be seen that the ambit of the power conferred is wider leaving considerable latitude to the Governor-in-Council. The context in which we have to consider the scope and ambit of the legislative power in this case is contained in s. 3(1) of the Act. The power is similar to the one contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the aforesaid National Emergency Transitional Powers Act. It in express terms authorises the Central Government to make such rules as appear to it necessary or expedient for securing the aforesaid six authorised purposes. That being the position, in my opinion, the aforesaid test laid down by the Privy Council would be the apposite test, and not the test laid down by the Federal Court and the Supreme Court. The other positive test which has been laid down by the Federal Court and approved by the Supreme Court is that the connection must be real. There is hardly any difference in respect of this aspect of the test. A connection which is not a real connection can hardly be said to be one which is capable of being related. Similar also would be the position in relation to the negative test, which has been laid down by the Federal Court and the Supreme Court. A connection which is far-fetched, problematical or hypothetical or too remote also can hardly be said to be one capable of being related. Thus, the connection that is required to be established between the rules framed and the purposes prescribed under s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, must be one which is real and not far-fetched, problematical, hypothetical or too remote. It need not necessarily be proximate. In my opinion, therefore, Rules which would, if observed, serve to promote one or more of the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act would be within the rule making power conferred on the Central Government thereunder.

The question which next arises is whether any such connection has been established between the object sought to be achieved by the rules framed and the purposes authorised in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. I have already stated that it has been the respondents' case in the return that the rules were framed with a view to put restrictions on smuggling and on the use of gold already smuggled into India. According to the respondents, smuggling of gold was causing a drain on the foreign exchange, and preventing smuggling would result in increasing the foreign exchange reserves of the Central Government, which was very necessary for the purposes of defence of India as well as maintenance of supplies and civil services essential to the life of the community. According to the respondents, the rules serve the purpose of conservation of foreign exchange. It is the argument of Mr. Mehta that the rules ex facie nowhere say that they have been framed to secure the aforesaid purposes. There is no preamble to the rules stating that it has appeared to the Central Government necessary or expedient to frame these rules for the aforesaid purposes. According to Mr. Mehta, the case now put forward is not the correct position, and the real purpose for which these rules have been framed is to effect a socio-economic reform. The rules have been framed for the purpose of curing the alleged habits of the people of India of using gold ornaments and hoarding gold. Mr. Mehta in support of his contention has invited my attention to the speeches of the then Finance Minister in the Lok Sabha made on March 6, 1963, when the Gold Control Rules were being discussed in the Parliament. He also invited our attention to the statement made by the Finance Minister in Parliament on September 21, 1963, on Gold Control. He also invited our attention to the speech made by Mr. Bhagat, Minister for Planning, in the Parliament on June 4, 1964, at the time of introduction of the Gold Control Bill, and the statement of objects and reasons. He also invited our attention to cl. (2) of Rule 126-J. Mr. Bhabha, on the other hand, referred us to Finance Minister's broadcast made on the eve of promulgating these rules on January 9, 1963. A copy of the broadcast has been annexed to the return as exh. 4 filed by the respondents in Special Civil Application No. 830 of 1963, in which also challenge to the Gold Control Rules has been raised. In the return filed in this case, in para. 14, the respondents have placed reliance on this broadcast in support of their case. Mr. Bhabha argued that the only relevant material to which I can refer is the aforesaid broadcast and the other pieces of evidence or the documents to which Mr. Mehta referred are not relevant and, therefore, inadmissible.

It is indeed true that there is no preamble to these rules indicating that the Central Government has framed these rules because it was of the opinion that it was necessary or expedient to frame them for securing the aforesaid purposes. It is also true that reading the rules by themselves, it does not become clear that the rules are directed for the purposes of arresting or restricting smuggling of gold. It would, therefore, be necessary to refer to certain other material in order to appreciate the case put forward by the respondents. I would state the case put forward by the respondents in brief: The import of gold into India has been stopped from the year 1939. There is very little production of gold in India. Gold available in the internal markets in India is gold which has been brought from countries other than India. People of India have the habit of preparing ornaments and articles of gold as well as of hoarding gold. The prices of gold in India are, therefore, necessarily very high and lucrative as compared with prices of gold in other countries, and that is an incentive and inducement to people to smuggle gold. If gold is to be made available to people in sufficient quantity at prices prevailing in other countries to meet the demands, the Central Government would have to expend about 50 to 60 crores of rupees per year. That would result in expending foreign exchange to that extent for the purchase of gold. The various legislations made have not been sufficiently effective to check smuggling of gold. Smuggling of gold is adversely affecting to a great extent India's foreign exchange reserves. For arresting these mischiefs, it was necessary to control the internal market and business in gold for the purpose of conservation of foreign exchange which was very essential in the times of emergency, for the defence of India as well for maintenance of essential commodities and services, and it is for this reason and to achieve these objects that the Gold Control Rules have been promulgated. In other words, the said rules which, inter alia, drastically restrict dealings in gold have been framed to arrest the root cause that has made gold smuggling such a lucrative business and thereby conserve foreign exchange which is so essential for the defence of India. It has been well settled that the circumstances in which an enactment has been passed is a revelant circumstance from which assistance could be sought by Court. At page 119 (Fifth ed.) Craies on Statute Law, four circumstances, from which a Court can legitimately seek assistance, have been stated:

- (1) What was the Common Law before the making of the Act?
- (2) What was the mischief and defect for which the Common Law did not provide?
- (3) What remedy the Parliament hath resolved and appointed to cure the disease of the Common Law; and
- (4) The true reason of the remedy."

It is clear that it is permissible for the Court to ascertain the conditions prevailing which caused the mischief to cure which the enactment was directed. The conditions prevailing relating to smuggling of gold have been noticed by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in considering the vires of s. 178-A of the Sea Customs Act. Their Lordships referred to the factual position prevailing at the time of the amendment of that section, and for that purpose, reproduced the following passage from the Taxation Enquiry Commission's Report 1953-54, which pointed out the factual position relating to existence of wide-spread smuggling in certain commodities including gold. The position has been so stated (Collector of Customs v. Sampathu Chetty)¹⁵:—

"Smuggling now constitutes not only a loophole for escaping duties but also a threat to the effective fulfilment of the objectives of foreign trade control. The existence of foreign pockets in the country accentuates the danger. The extent of the leakage of revenue that takes place through this process cannot be estimated even roughly, but, we understand, it is not unlikely that it is substantial. Apart from its deleterious effect on legitimate trade, it also entails the outlay of an appreciable amount of public funds on patrol vessels along the sea coast and permanent works along the land border, and watch and ward staff on a generous scale. It is, therefore, necessary, in our opinion, that stringent measures, both legal and administrative, should be adopted with a view to minimising the scope of this evil."

After reproducing the aforesaid passage, their Lordships concurring with the opinion expressed by the Enquiry Commission, observed: "The deleterious effects of smuggling as pointed out in the extract from the Report, are real..." The position prevailing has also been similarly described in detail by Mr. Justice K. T. Desai in M. G. Abrol v. Amichand.¹⁶ Now, gold is such a commodity that it is easy to smuggle and pass it on in the internal market in the country. The original identity of the smuggled gold can easily be effaced; when it comes into the internal market, it passes on as genuine gold; it is not possible for bona fide honest customers to ascertain or find out that it is smuggled gold. This facility and the high prices prevailing in India is a great inducement to people to smuggle gold into India. It can hardly be disputed that the problem is a vast and real one. As pointed out by the Supreme Court, it has a deleterious effect on the national economy, adversely affecting India's position relating to foreign exchange. It is not in dispute that these circumstances were prevailing at the time of declaration of emergency. The question is, is it to remedy this mischief that these rules have been framed?

And this brings me to the admissibility of the different pieces of material on which reliance has been placed by counsel. A Division Bench of this Court in Pukhraj v. D. R. Kohli,¹⁷ has held that "speech made in Parliament by the sponsor of a Bill may be referred to by the

Court for the limited purpose of ascertaining the conditions prevailing at the time which actuated the sponsor of the Bill to introduce it and the extent and urgency of the evil which he sought to remedy."

The speech of the Minister of Industry was also referred to by Mr. Justice Fazl Ali in Chiranjitlal Chowdhuri v. The Union of India.¹⁸ From the observations of Bhagwati J. at page 1237 in A. Thangal Kunju Musaliar v. M. Venkatachalam Potti,¹⁹ it is clear that such a course is permissible for the limited purpose of ascertaining the condition prevailing at the time which necessitated the making of the law. I am here concerned with the rules promulgated by the Central Government. Necessarily, therefore, there is no speech by the sponsor in the Parliament at the time of introduction as such, but the broadcast of the Finance Minister on the eve of the promulgation of these rules can as well be equated with the speech of the sponsor at the introduction of the Bill, explaining the position prevailing which necessitated the Bill. Similar would also be the case of the speech made by the Finance Minister on March 6, 1963. Section 41 of the Defence of India Act requires rules made by the Central Government under the Act to be laid on the table of the Parliament. These rules have been so laid before the Parliament on February 20 1963, and were discussed in Parliament on March 5 and 6, 1963. The Finance Minister made a speech in the debate on March 6, 1963, giving his reasons for this measure. This speech, in my opinion, would also have relevance to the explaining of the prevailing situation and the reasons that actuated the promulgation of these rules. As regards the other materials, to which our attention was drawn by Mr. Mehta, the material is not relevant and it would not be permissible to refer to it. The statement made by the Finance Minister on September 21, 1963, is not for the purpose of giving reasons for framing rules, but is a statement on the working of the scheme of gold control. That hardly, in my opinion, has any relevance for the purpose of understanding the situation at the time of the bringing these rules into force. Similar also is the position of the objects and reasons of the Gold Control Bill and the speech of Mr. Bhagat. In my opinion, the only material on which reliance could be placed is the broadcast of the Finance Minister made on January 9, 1963, and the speech of March 6, 1963. The very opening sentence in the broadcast indicates that the reason for promulgation of these rules is to arrest smuggling which is costing large sums for foreign exchange to India which are so urgently needed for the defence and development of India. This is what the Finance Minister stated in the opening paragraph:

"Early in November, I spoke to you at some length on the subject of gold. On that occasion I tried to explain how the habit of buying gold in our country has led to extensive smuggling of gold from abroad in recent years. This smuggling has cost us large sums in foreign exchange which we need so urgently for our defence and development.

It was in this context that I announced that the Government proposed to take measures in the near future to reduce smuggling and to bring about a progressive reduction in the demand for gold. These measures have now been finalised and will be brought into force tomorrow in the form of Gold Control Rules under the Defence of India Act; and it is about these measures that I wish to speak to you tonight."

The Finance Minister has then in his broadcast explained the position which had brought into existence this evil, and had shown how it has affected the economy of India and having deleterious effect on the economy of India. He also appealed that people should give up their attachment to gold. In his appeal he says:

"It is my earnest hope that every teacher in the country, every social worker and leader of public opinion would make it his or her business to explain to the young and the old, the rich and the poor what the attachment to gold and gold ornaments means in terms of the strain it puts on the resources we need for defence and development.

Let all young boys and girls growing up in the country be made to realise that they can help build a safe and prosperous India by insisting that no gold be bought at the time of their marriages."

In his broadcast, the Finance Minister has also brought to the notice of the nation the magnitude on the drain of the country's resources which smuggling has caused. The broadcast hardly leaves any doubt that the rules have been brought into force with a view to arrest smuggling, and thereby saving foreign exchange which was so essential for the purposes of defence as well as development. In his speech made on March 6, 1963, for the purpose of expressing his views and the reasons for bringing into force these Gold Control Rules, the Finance Minister has again pointed out why he has brought into force these rules. This is what he says:

"Let us examine why this has been done. That is a question which has been asked of me. It is primarily brought in to remove smuggling of gold which is hitting this country economically in a very bad way and for several years past, and it is growing. As prosperity grows, the lure for gold increases, and more and more gold goes and it is being smuggled and more and more foreign exchange is getting lost."

The Finance Minister then has in his speech explained the problems in detail, and has observed:

"Therefore this measure has been brought to remove this foreign exchange drain and that can be done only if the lure of gold disappears. If the lure of gold remains, it can go on happening."

Reading the broadcast and the speech as a whole, I have little doubt that the primary reason why these rules which control the internal market have been framed is for the purpose of arresting smuggling which has been costing a heavy drain on the foreign exchange, which at this particular time of emergency was required for the purpose of defence of India. Laying emphasis on certain paragraphs of the speech, Mr. Mehta argued that that is not the real reason, but the real reason is to bring about a social reform. He referred to the following passage from the speech at column 2636:

"We are at a very critical stage in our country when we have to defend our freedom, when we have to defend our integrity. I do not say that if I get all the gold, I will defend my country better than without that. Even if I do not get any gold, I will certainly defend my country and with success. That is not the stake at issue. What is at issue is to prevent the drain on the economic life of this country through the drain of foreign exchange and the senseless sinking of all surpluses and saving into gold which remains locked up in their houses."

Laying emphasis on this part of the speech, Mr. Mehta argues that the Finance Minister has clearly admitted that he does not require gold for defence. It is purely an economical measure. In my opinion, reading this passage in isolation would not be a permissible procedure for understanding what really actuated the Central Government to bring into force these rules. I have already pointed out the passages which clearly indicate that the reason for bringing into force these rules was to arrest smuggling with a view to secure foreign exchange for the purpose of defence as well as development. It is indeed true that in this passage the Finance Minister says that he does not want gold for the defence of India. But it must be understood that this speech was in reply to the debate, and one of the responsibilities of the Finance Minister was to keep the morale of the country high in times of emergency. The speech has to be read as a whole for the purpose of understanding the real reason for the promulgation of these rules. Mr. Mehta also referred us to certain other passages which refer to the habit of people purchasing gold and sinking their moneys in purchase of gold affecting production. He also referred us to certain paragraphs of the Finance Minister's speech where he has referred to the abolition of Sati, abolition of the evil custom of debarring daughters from inheriting their father's property, introduction of the law of monogamy and divorce, and has argued that by introducing these rules, the Finance Minister has also aimed at a similar social reform of breaking the people of their gold habits. Again, in my opinion, for reasons already stated, it will not be a permissible procedure for understanding the real reason which has actuated the Finance Minister in introduction of this Bill. Mr. Mehta also referred us to the observations of the Finance Minister about his thinking of introducing similar measure for about 8 months prior to its promulgation. It is his contention that at that time there was no emergency. The Finance Minister must have realised that if such a measure was passed, it would not stand the test of constitutional validity. The Finance Minister has only taken advantage of the emergency and suspension of the exercise of certain fundamental rights, and has introduced these rules. It is true that the Finance Minister has stated that he had come to the conclusion about eight months prior to the date of introduction of these rules that a measure similar to the rules would be required to be introduced in Parliament. But it is also to be noticed that he has made it clear that since then he has been thinking and considering the problem in its various aspects in framing the rules. It can hardly be doubted that by reason of the emergency the problem became more acute. Conservation of foreign exchange, which in peace time, was essential for the purpose of development of the national economy, also became necessary for the purpose of defence of India, and it is these reasons which the Finance Minister says have actuated him in bringing into force these rules. There is hardly any reason to doubt this statement of the Finance Minister, and to hold that the real reason for bringing into force these rules was to bring about only a socio-economic reform, and that the rules have no concern whatsoever with the defence of India or maintenance of supplies and civil services essential to the life of the community. I have already discussed that the object sought to be achieved was to arrest smuggling by controlling dealings in gold so as not to make it possible for people in India to legitimately buy or freely deal in gold in open market. It can hardly be said that the aforesaid objective of arresting smuggling is not capable of being related to the purpose, namely, the defence of India. It also cannot be said that the rules if observed would not go to achieve the objective. I have already stated that the arresting of smuggling according to the view taken by the Central Government would result in conservation of foreign exchange which is so essential for the purpose of the defence of India. The object sought to be achieved by these rules clearly serves to promote the purpose of defence. In my opinion, therefore, the connection between the rules and the prescribed purposes is a real one. Considering the two speeches of the Finance Minister, it is also equally clear that the Central Government had brought into force these rules because it was in its opinion necessary or expedient to bring them into force. These two requisite conditions having been established, challenge to the validity of these rules cannot be sustained on the ground that the rules framed are in excess of the rule making power of the Central Government or that the rules are a colourable piece of legislation in the sense that the rules have been framed for some purpose other than the prescribed purposes in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act.

Mr. Mehta in support of his aforesaid argument also has drawn our attention in this connection to the provisions of cl. (2) of rule 126-J, which imposes a duty that "It shall be the duty of the Administrator by such measures as he may think fit,

- (a) to discourage the use and consumption of gold;
- (b) to bring about conditions tending to reduce the demand for gold; and
- (c) to advise the Central Government on all matters relating to gold."

Relying on these provisions Mr. Mehta argues that the real object of the Central Government in framing these rules was to bring about this effect. The discussion above will show that the duty imposed on the Administrator is aimed at removal of the root cause that has been making smuggling a lucrative business. The root cause as would be seen is the habit of the people using gold ornaments and hoarding gold which has induced the smugglers to smuggle gold in large quantities. It has also been argued that the object sought could easily have been achieved by suitably amending the Customs Act and the Foreign Exchange Act. He brought to our notice that a Bill introducing the new Customs Act was introduced in the Parliament on June 8, 1962, introducing certain stringent measures. It was passed into an Act in December 1962 and was brought into force on February 1, 1963. He has also brought to our notice certain portions therein which has conferred on the officials concerned very extensive powers of arrest, powers of search, provisions relating to raising of presumptions, enhanced punishments, etc. According to Mr. Mehta, these stringent provisions would have effectively controlled smuggling. Now, in my opinion, it will hardly be permissible for this Court to embark on such an inquiry whether the objective sought to be achieved by these rules could have been achieved by some other way, inasmuch as in sub-s. (1) of s. 3, the Legislature has left it to the exclusive discretion of the Central Government. By enacting that sub-section, the Legislature has authorised the Central Government to make such rules as appear to it necessary or expedient for securing the authorised purposes. That being the position, it is clear that it would not be open to inquire whether the Central Government could have achieved the same object by some other measures. Similar argument was advanced before the Supreme Court when a challenge to the validity of rules made under cl. (15) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, was made. It was argued that since the Preventive Detention Act, IV of 1950, was already on the statute book, it was hardly necessary for the Legislature to have passed this part of the impugned Act. Repelling this argument, their Lordships observed in Makhan Singh Tarsikka v. The State of Punjab (p. 401):—

“...It is hardly necessary to emphasise that a plea that an Act passed by a Legislature competent to pass it is a colourable piece of legislation, cannot succeed on such flimsy grounds. Whether or not it was wise that this part of the Act should have been passed, is a matter which is wholly irrelevant in dealing with plea that the Act is a colourable piece of legislation.”

Another argument was also advanced that if really the object was to arrest smuggling which affects foreign exchange, the rules would have also provided for controlling the market and commodities other than gold which affect the foreign exchange of India. He brought to our notice the provisions of s. 123, sub-s. (2) of the Sea Customs Act, 1962. It is not possible for me to accept this argument of Mr. Mehta also. It is true that sub-s. (2) of s. 123 of the Sea Customs Act enacts that apart from gold, the rule of evidence has been made applicable to diamonds and watches etc., but from that it does not follow that smuggling of these articles affects adversely India's foreign exchange to the same extent as smuggling of gold does. The matter has been left to the discretion of the Central Government, and it is for the Central Government to decide what measures it would bring into force in exercise of its powers under sub-s. (1) of s. 3. Therefore, it is difficult to infer that omission of controlling business in diamonds and watches necessarily leads to the inference that the true object of the Central Government in framing these rules was not to control smuggling of gold.

It is next to be seen whether the rules contravene the provisions of s. 44 of the Act. Section 44 reads:

“Any authority or person acting in pursuance of this Act shall interfere with the ordinary avocation of life and the enjoyment of property as little as may be consonant with the purpose of ensuring the public safety and interest and the defence of India and civil defence.”

It is the argument of Mr. Mehta that these rules interfere with the ordinary avocation of life and enjoyment of property of the people beyond measure. They can hardly be said to be for securing the purposes mentioned in the section. Mr. Mehta also has argued that the provisions of this section are mandatory and in support of his contention has referred us to the decision of this Court in Tan Bug Taim v. Collector of Bombay.²⁰ Mr. Bhabha, on the other hand, contends that this section has no application or is not a fetter on the rule making power of the Central Government. In the alternative, he argues that even assuming that it is a fetter on the rule making power of the Central Government, the provisions of this section are not mandatory but directory. He referred to the Full Bench decision of the Lahore High Court reported in Lahore E. S. Co. v. Punjab Province. The first question to be considered, therefore, is whether s. 44 is a fetter on the rule making power of the Central Government conferred on it by s. 3(1) of the Act. Now, on a plain reading of the section, the restrictions imposed by this section are on an authority or a person. It is not in dispute that the Central Government is not a person. Now, the question is whether the expression "any authority" could be said to include the Central Government. In my opinion, the expression "any authority" in s. 44 does not include the Central Government. Section 44 appears in Chapter VII of the Act, which relates to supplemental provisions. The provisions of s. 44 have to be read in the context to understand the true import of the expression "any authority". Section 40 deals with the powers of the Central Government to delegate its powers or its duty of making certain orders to any officer or authority subordinate to the Central Government, and it is in this context that the directions have been given to the authority or person under s. 44 of the Act. The Act itself has used the expressions "Central Government", "authority" in contra-distinction with one another. In my opinion, therefore, the expression "authority" does not include the Central Government, nor has s. 44 imposed any fetter on the rule making power of the Central Government, but is directive relating to administrative or executive acts performed by any person or authority in execution of the powers delegated to them by the Central Government. In this view of the matter, it is not necessary to consider whether the directions contained in s. 44 are mandatory or directory. Suffice it to say that the view taken by the Lahore High Court in respect of the provisions of s. 15 of the earlier Defence of India Act, 1939, is contrary to the view taken by Bhagwati J. in Tan Bug Taim v. Collector of Bombay, of the same section. Mr. Justice Bhagwati has held that s. 15 is mandatory. The view taken by the Full Bench of the Lahore High Court is not the same. The provisions of s. 15 of the earlier Act are similar to s. 44 of the present Act. But it is worth noticing that in both these cases, what was challenged was an administrative act of the officers in exercise of the power and duty conferred on them by the orders of the Central Government. For the reasons stated above, the first contention as regards the vires of these rules should fail. Before proceeding to the next point, I may state that in dealing with the first point, I have not discussed such decisions which were cited before me which, in my opinion, were in respect of well established principles of law and which were only repetitive of the principles laid down by their Lordships of the Supreme Court, Federal Court and the Privy Council.

And this brings me to the second contention. As already stated, the second contention is that the rules violate exercise of the fundamental rights of the petitioners granted to them under arts. 25 and 26 of the Constitution. Material part of art. 25 is to the following effect:—

"25.(1) Subject to public order, morality and health and to the other provisions of this Part, all persons are equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right freely to profess, practise and propagate religion."

It is not necessary to reproduce the provisions of cl. (2) or the explanations to this article. It is the case of the petitioners that they profess and practise the Jain religion and observe customs, tenets and practices of the Jain religion. According to them there is an ancient and well accepted religious belief, custom and/or practice of the Jain community that persons belonging to the Jain community have to perform certain religious ceremonies like pūja. Such puja ceremonies are performed inter alia on occasions like births, marriages and deaths. In the course of such puja ceremonies performed as aforesaid, varakh, badla ornaments and articles of pure gold such as “mugut” (head gear for the idol), kundale (ear ornaments for the idol), necklace, armlets, etc. are offered to the deity. The petitioners further pleaded that they have been performing the aforesaid ceremonies and have been offering the varakh (pure gold leaf), badla (silver offerings gilded with pure gold) and other ornaments and articles of pure gold to the deity as an essential part of their religious belief, custom and/or practice. The petitioners have further pleaded that according to the religious belief, custom and/or practice of the petitioners, it is derogatory to the deity to be offered impure gold or ornaments and articles of impure gold in the performance of the aforesaid ceremonies and it is enjoined that offerings to the deity should be in the purest form. According to the petitioners, offering of gold ornaments varakh or badla in the purest form, has been their practice from time immemorial, and they have been granted this freedom to continue religious practice uninterrupted under art. 25 of the Constitution. It can hardly be said that this right freely to profess and practise religion is in any way not in conformity with the maintenance of public order, morality and health. Gold Control Rules prohibit purchase or preparation of ornaments or articles of a purity in excess of 14 carats; and therefore, they are violative of the provisions of art. 25 of the Constitution and, therefore, unconstitutional. The respondents in para. 10 of the affidavit, have denied the existence of the alleged custom. The argument of Mr. Mehta has been founded on the form of denial, and it is therefore necessary to reproduce the averments made by the respondents in para. 10 of their affidavit in reply. The Collector, Central Excise, Bombay, respondent No. 5 hereto, has made this affidavit. In para. 10 he says:—

“I do not know and am not in a position to admit whether the petitioners profess and practise Jain Religion and observe the customs, tenets and practices of that Religion and put the petitioners to strict proof thereof. As regards the religious ceremonies and the performance thereof as alleged and referred to in the said paragraph, I do not admit the same and put the petitioners to the strict proof thereof. I however deny that for the performance of such religious ceremonies as are referred to therein, ornaments and articles only of pure gold are necessarily offered to the deity or are required to be offered to the deity. Assuming without admitting that either the petitioners or other members of the said community have been in the past offering to the deity articles of pure gold or other articles gilded with pure gold and ornaments as alleged, I deny that there is any religious sanction or custom for offering articles only of pure gold and nothing else. I deny that according to the religious belief, custom and practice of the said community, it is derogatory to the deity to offer impure gold or ornaments or articles of impure gold in the performance of the said ceremonies, and I deny that it is enjoined that the offerings to the deity should be in the purest form. In any event, and without prejudice to the said contentions, I submit that it may be at the most a practice or custom amongst the said community to offer articles of pure gold, but I submit that such practice or custom is not part of the Jain religion as such. I say that this involves disputed questions of fact not appropriate to be tried in these proceedings and should not be tried as such in these proceedings.”

It is the argument of Mr. Mehta that in the first instance, it is not a denial at all, because respondent No. 5 has stated that he does not know and, therefore, is not in a position to admit, and in the second instance, there is no denial that there is a custom of offering ornaments and articles of gold to the deity. The denial only is in respect of the alleged custom of offering ornaments and articles of pure gold. It is the argument of Mr. Mehta that if the custom of offering ornaments and articles of gold to the deity is admitted, it necessarily follows that the ornaments or articles offered to the deity according to the custom must be of pure gold. I am unable to agree with the submission of Mr. Mehta relating to the averments contained in para. 10 of the respondents’ affidavit. It is indeed true that respondent No. 5 has stated that he has no knowledge and he is not in a position to admit. That position is only limited to the allegation of the petitioners that they practise Jain religion and observe customs, tenets and practices of the Jain religion. As regards the alleged custom, the denial is not in any manner qualified. It is true that the denial is of the alleged custom of making offerings of ornaments and articles of pure gold to the deity. But these denials have to be read in the context of the pleas raised by the petitioners in para. 4 of the petition. The denial is in respect of these pleas. The denial is in the form in which the plea has been raised. I am unable to read in the averments of the respondents any admission as such of a custom of offering gold ornaments to the deity. In view of these averments contained in para. 10 of the affidavit in reply clearly issues on these disputed questions of fact arise. A decision in respect of this controversy on questions of fact also cannot be easily arrived at by merely referring to affidavits. The dispute relates to the existence of custom. By its very nature, it involves a detailed investigation of facts. It cannot appropriately and satisfactorily be done in these proceedings. There is also another difficulty in the way of the petitioners in this matter. The plea raised by the petitioners is that the custom is to make these offerings to a deity. But then there is a judicial pronouncement of their Lordships of the Supreme Court that in Jain religion there is no deity. In The Commissioner, Hindu Religious Endowments, Madras v. Sri Lakshmindra Thirtha Swamiar of Sri Shirur Mutt,²¹ their Lordships observed (p. 1023) :

"...Religion is certainly a matter of faith with individuals or communities and it is not necessarily theistic. There are well known religions in India like Buddhism and Jainism which do not believe in God or in any Intelligent First Cause. A religion undoubtedly has its basis in a system of beliefs or doctrines which are regarded by those who profess that religion as conducive to their spiritual well being, but it would not be correct to say that religion is nothing else but a doctrine or belief."

From these observations, it is clear that Jain religion does not believe in God. If that be the position, there can hardly be a custom of making offerings to a deity as such. The issue that arises is a fundamental one. It is true that the issue in this form has not been raised by the respondents in their affidavit. But, I think, it would be permissible for me to take notice of this judicial pronouncement of their Lordships of the Supreme Court. These observations of their Lordships were brought to the notice of Mr. Mehta, and Mr. Mehta stated that what was meant was only an idol and not a deity. The question again arises that if the alleged custom be in respect of making offerings to an idol, then whose idol. The matter remains vague on the pleadings raised. In these circumstances, I do not think it is possible for me to proceed to consider this ground of challenge to the validity of the rules. The matter will have to be left to be decided in a regular suit if the petitioners desire to agitate this question there. I do not, therefore, proceed to decide this question. On account of the aforesaid view taken by me, Mr. Mehta has advanced no argument on behalf of the petitioners in respect of their contention that the rules are violative of art. 26 of the Constitution. The petitioners would be free to agitate the matter in a suit if so advised.

For the reasons stated above, in my opinion, the petition is liable to be dismissed, and I would, therefore, discharge the rule.

NAIK J. I agree with the conclusion reached by my learned brother. Since, however, I am approaching some of the questions raised in this case from a slightly different angle of vision, it would be meet and proper to indicate the line of my thinking. The Gold Control Rules, whose validity has been impugned in this petition, have been framed by the Central Government in exercise of the powers delegated to it under s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. These Rules are a species of the genus which is known, in accepted legal parlance, as delegated legislation. The grounds of attack against a delegated legislation have a tendency to get themselves mixed up and, as a matter of fact, in this petition some of them have mixed up, and even in the course of the arguments the line of demarcation has sometimes been blurred. It would not, therefore, be out of place to indicate, in a general way, the broad categories under which delegated legislation is liable to be challenged. These categories are, (1) The Rules suffer from the vice of excessive delegation. This attack is more directed against the statute under which the powers are delegated than the Rules themselves. If the instrument under which the powers have been delegated does not lay down the legislative policy in clear terms, or it does not afford a proper guidance for the framing of the Rules, then it is open to challenge on the ground of excessive delegation. (2) That the delegated legislation is in excess of the powers of delegation. Side by side with the attack of exceeding the powers delegated, the legislation may also be impugned on the ground of mala fide exercise of those powers, for no authority can be regarded as having been authorised to act in bad faith, and (3) What is known as colourable exercise of the powers of legislation. In substance, this charge is analogous to the charge of excess of powers, the only difference being that here, the excess of powers masquerades under some guise so as to make it appear that it is a legitimate exercise of powers. By way of comparison and contrast, I may also indicate, again in a general way, the ground on which an ordinary legislation, as distinguished from delegated legislation, is liable to be challenged. The first ground that may be raised for impugning an ordinary legislation is that it is in violation of the fundamental rights enshrined in Part III of the Constitution of India. The second is that the Legislature has transgressed the limits of the legislative powers assigned to it under the Constitution and the third is that the legislation is colourable.

In this background, I will now proceed to analyse the grounds that have been urged in the present petition, and thereafter I will indicate the grounds which are pressed into service in the course of the arguments. The grounds have been summarised in para. 10 of the petition. Clause (a) of the said paragraph relates to the main charge viz., excessive exercise of the powers conferred by the Parliament under s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act. Clause (b) refers in particular to s. 3(2)(33) and says that cl. (33) would not empower the Central Government to enact the Rules which have prohibited and have also imposed other restrictions upon the use, disposal of or dealing in gold. At best, it would empower the Central Government to frame rules for the purpose of controlling the possession, use or disposal of, or dealing in, 'bullion'. Clause (c) relates to the operation of art. 358 of the Constitution and its effect upon the fundamental rights enshrined under art. 19. This point has been given up in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in Makhan Singh v. State of Punjab.¹ Clause (d) asserts that although the avowed and oft-publicized object of the Government in framing the Rules was to check smuggling and to discourage the use and consumption of gold and to bring about conditions tending to reduce the demand for gold, its real object was to discourage people from making uneconomic investment in gold. Reference is then made to the Sea Customs Act of 1878 and also to the new Customs Bill of 1962, which was then on the anvil of the Parliament, and it is pointed out that the object of both these legislations was to prevent smuggling. It is, therefore, suggested that if the object of the Government was to prevent smuggling, then that object could have been achieved either by the old Sea Customs Act or by enacting the Bill, which was on the anvil of the Parliament at the time when the Rules were framed. It is then alleged that the Government has enacted the Gold Control Rules deliberately under the Defence of India Act and with a view to circumvent the constitutional prohibition imposed by arts. 14 and 19(1) (f) and (g) of the Constitution. It is finally asserted that the entire object, motive and intention of the Government in framing the said Rules was to take undue and improper advantage of the proclamation of emergency and under its guise and cover frame the said Rules and deprive the petitioners and other citizens of India of their fundamental rights under arts. 14 and 19(1) (f) and (g) of the Constitution. It is on this ground that it was suggested that these Rules amount to colourable and fraudulent exercise of the delegated powers. Clause (e) of the same paragraph again refers to the restrictions and curtailment of the fundamental rights under art. 19(1) (f) and (g) of the Constitution and in that connection explains the detailed provisions of the Rules. Clause (l) relates to the so-called fundamental rights of the petitioners of offering and gifting pure gold and ornaments and articles of pure gold to their deity under arts. 25 and 26 of the Constitution which, according to them, have been seriously brought into jeopardy.

It will be at once clear that the charge of excessive delegation has not been levelled, nor is it suggested that there has been any abuse of powers or mala fide exercise of powers. All that is suggested is that the exercise of the powers must be regarded as colourable in view of the fact that, firstly, the petitioners and the other citizens have been deprived of the fundamental rights and further in view of the fact that under the guise of promoting the purpose of defence, the Rules are really meant for promoting a socio-economic goal.

Before proceeding further, it may be pointed out that in view of the proclamation of emergency made by the President of India and in view of the provisions of art. 250 of the Constitution, one of the fetters imposed upon the Parliament not to legislate any law in regard to the subjects falling within List II of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution, has been removed. The ground of attack, therefore, viz., that the Parliament has transgressed the limits of its legislative powers, is no longer open for consideration. In the same way, art. 358 of the Constitution suspends the operation of art. 19 thereof during the period of emergency. Again, the President has issued notifications under art. 339 by which he has suspended the operation of arts. 14, 21 and 22 of the Constitution. The result of the suspension of arts. 14, 19, 21 and 22 is that the Defence of India Act as also the Rules framed thereunder have become immune from challenge in so far as that challenge is based under arts. 14, 19, 21 and 22 of the Constitution, during the period the proclamation of emergency is in operation.

It will thus be clear that the ground of attack to the validity of the Gold Control Rules narrows down to a very small compass viz., whether these Rules are in excess of the powers delegated to the Central Government under s. 3 of the Defence of India Act and whether they amount to colourable exercise of the powers vested in it.

In support of his argument that the Rules are in excess of the powers conferred upon the Central Government, by s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, Mr. Mehta contended that the provisions, which conferred powers on the Central Government, are contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. According to him, the clauses which range from (1) to (57) under sub-s. (2) of s. 3 do not and are not intended to confer any power as such upon the Central Government to frame the Rules. According to his argument, everyone of these clauses under sub-s. (2) must be examined and on examination it must be found to have relation to one of the five purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. On the other hand, Mr. Bhabha contended that the Gold Control Rules fairly and squarely fall under cl. (33) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, and once that position is accepted, it is not necessary for the Court to consider as to whether these Rules again have a relation to any of the five purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3. I may hasten to add that Mr. Bhabha also contended that if the Rules do not fall within the purview of cl. (33), they would, of course, be justified under the general purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. The question raised by Mr. Mehta involves consideration of the relative positions of sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 3 inter se. If the argument advanced by Mr. Mehta is correct, then it must follow that the various clauses mentioned in sub-s. (2) are mere surplusages and appendages and that for justifying the Rules framed by the Central Government each time we must fall back upon the general purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. It must be remembered that sub-s. (2) also forms part of s. 3 and prima facie, it will be somewhat surprising if the validity of one sub-section is required to be tested on the touch-stone of another sub-section of the same section. Mr. Mehta's argument appears to have been based on certain observations made by the Privy Council in *King-Emperor v. Sibnath Banerji*² as also those made by the Supreme Court in Santosh Kumar Jain v. The State.³ I do not propose to deal with the facts of those cases nor for that matter of some of the other cases to which I would have occasion to refer in the course of the judgment, because the facts of most of these cases have been set out by my learned brother in his judgment. In *Keshav Talpade v. King Emperor*⁴ the order detaining Talpade was made under clause (x) of sub-s. (2) of s. 2 of the Defence of India Act of 1939. Sub-section (1) of s. 2 of that Act sets out the general purposes for which rules may be framed, and the purposes are more or less the same as the purposes set out in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act of 1962. Sub-section (2) of s. 2 of the Act of 1939 sets out the various matters in respect of which the Central Government was authorised to make rules. Clause (x) in substance provides that a person who is reasonably suspected of having committed or likely to commit a prejudicial act could be kept detained. Rule 26, which was purported to have been framed under cl. (x), however, stated that the Government could pass an order of detention against a person indulging in prejudicial activities provided it was satisfied in that respect. The Federal Court held that the order of detention was bad, because it went beyond the powers conferred by cl. (x) of sub-s. (2) of s. 2 of the Defence of India Act of 1939, and inasmuch as r. 26 purported to have been framed under a definite item viz., cl. (x), it was not open to the Government to fall back upon the general purposes enumerated in sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the Act of 1939. In effect, the Federal Court held that the rule, if it could not be sustained under which it was purported to be framed, would not be sustained at all under any of the other clauses or even under the general purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1). An identical question came up before the Privy Council in Sibnath Banerji's case. The interpretation of the relative position of sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 2 of the Defence of India Act of 1939 came up for consideration and the Privy Council disapproving of the view taken by the Federal Court came to the conclusion that r. 26 could be justified on the general purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of that Act. It pointed out that the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (2) are illustrative and could not be restrictive of sub-s. (1). At page 258, the Privy Council observed:

"Their Lordships are unable to agree with the learned Chief Justice of the Federal Court on his statement of the relative positions of sub-ss. 1 and 2 of s. 2 of the Defence of India Act, and counsel for the respondents in the present appeal was unable to support that statement, or to maintain that r. 26 was invalid. In the opinion of their Lordships, the function of sub-s. 2 is merely an illustrative one; the rule-making power is conferred by sub-s. 1, and 'the rules' which are referred to in the opening sentence of sub-s. 2 are the rules which are authorized by, and made under, sub-s. 1; the provisions of sub-s. 2 are not restrictive of sub-s. 1, as, indeed, is expressly stated by the words 'without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-s. 1'".

It would at once be evident that these observations were made to repel the argument that the powers conferred by sub-s. (2) are restrictive of the powers conferred by sub-s. (1) and that if the rules purported to have been made under any of the powers specified in sub-s. (2) could not be sustained under those powers, the rules were automatically invalid. The observations made by the Privy Council have been approved by the Supreme Court in Santosh Kumar Jain's case. In that case, the validity of an order of seizure of the stock of five thousand maunds of sugar which purported to have been made under cl. (j) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, was called in question. Sub-section (1) of s. 3 of that Act mentioned the general purposes for which the Central Government is authorised to make rules, and in effect stated:

"The Central Government, so far as it appears to it to be necessary or expedient for maintaining or increasing supplies of an essential commodity, or for securing their equitable distribution and availability at fair prices, may by notified order, provide for regulating or prohibiting the production, supply and distribution thereof, and trade and commerce therein".

Sub-section (2) opens with the words "without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1) an order made thereunder may provide...". Clause (j) was one of the clauses, which provided:

"for any incidental and supplementary matters,...the seizure by a person authorised to make such search of any articles in respect of which such person has reason to believe that a contravention of the order has been, is being, or is about to be committed,...".

It was in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-s. (2)(j) of s. 3 of that Act that the order of seizure was made. Patanjali Sastri J. (as he then was) examined the relative positions of sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 3 and observed (p. 310):—

"It is manifest that sub-section (2) of section 3 confers no further or other powers on the Central Government than what are conferred under sub-section (1), for it is 'an order made thereunder' that may provide for one or the other of the matters specifically enumerated in sub-section (2) which are only illustrative, as such enumeration is 'without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1)'".

At page 311, his Lordship referred to the decision of the Privy Council in Sibnath Banerjee's case and stated:

"The view we have expressed above receives support from the decision of the Privy Council in Sibnath Banerjee's case: Section 2(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1939, as amended by section 2 of the Defence of India (Amendment) Act, 1940, empowered the Central Government to make rules for securing the defence of British India, the public safety, the maintenance of public order, etc., and sub-section (2) enacted 'without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-s. (1), the rules may provide for all or any of the following matters...' Among such matters was the detention of any person 'reasonably suspected' of having acted etc. in a manner prejudicial to the public safety etc. [Clause (x)]. Rule 26 of the Rules made under the section, however, authorised the Government to detain a person 'if it is satisfied' that it was necessary to detain him with a view to prevent him from acting prejudicially.... The Federal Court held that this rule was ultra vires as it went beyond the scope of clause (x) in that it left it to the satisfaction of the Government to decide whether or not it was necessary to detain a person. The decision was reversed and Lord Thankerton, delivering the judgment of the Board, observed:

'In the opinion of their Lordships, the function of sub-section (2) is merely an illustrative one; the rule making power is conferred by sub-section (1), and 'the rules' which are referred to in the opening sentence of sub-section (2) are the rules which are authorised by, and made under, sub-section (1); the provisions of sub-section (2) are not restrictive of sub-section (1), as, indeed is expressly stated by the words 'without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1)'. There can be no doubt—as the learned Judge himself appears to have thought—that the general language of sub-section (1) amply justifies the terms of rule 26, and avoids any of the criticisms which the learned Judge expressed in relation to sub-section (2)'.

This accords with our view of the effect of sub-sections (1) and (2) of section 3 of the Act".

It is necessary to note that his Lordship laid emphasis upon the expression 'an order made thereunder', which clearly subordinated the matters enumerated in sub-s. (2) to the general purposes stated in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of that Act.

In *Attorney-General for Canada v. Hallet & Carey Ltd.*⁵ a question of similar nature arose in the following circumstances: The National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945, of Canada, provided by section 2(1): 'The Governor in Council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, as he may, by reason of the continued existence of the national emergency arising out of the war... for the purpose of... (c) maintaining, controlling and regulating supplies and services, prices, transportation, use and occupation of property, rentals, employment, salaries and wages to ensure economic stability and an orderly transition to conditions of peace;...'

In ostensible exercise of the powers conferred by s. 2(1) of the Act of 1945, an Order in Council... was made on April 3, 1947, which provided by s. 22 that 'all oats and barley in commercial positions in Canada' with certain specified exceptions, 'are hereby vested in the Canadian Wheat Board'. The respondent, who held barley stored in various Canadian elevators, challenged the validity of the compulsory acquisition provision of the Order in Council.

It may be noted that the order of expropriation was passed in virtue of the general powers conferred by s. 2(1) of the said Act. It was pointed out that in the War Measures Act, 1914, there was a specific power conferred upon the Governor General for passing an order for confiscation in certain circumstances, in the list of subjects, enumerated in sub-s. (2) of s. 3. Sub-section (1) mentioned the general purposes which are similar to those mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. It was contended that since there was no similar power conferred upon the Governor General under s. 2(1) of the Act of 1945, it must be held that there was a curtailment of the powers of the Governor General and it was not open to him to pass the order of confiscation under his authority of the general powers vested by sub-s. (1). It was with reference to this argument that their Lordships instituted a comparison between the provisions of sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 3 of the War Measures Act. At pages 448 and 449 their Lordships observed:

"...Their Lordships think that there is not by now any room for doubt as to the function performed by the list of permitted subjects in section 3 of the War Measures Act. The form adopted is plainly borrowed from section 91 of the British North America Act, 1867. They do not extend the purposes already defined, for they are directed to explaining what can be done, not the object for which things may be done; they do not extend any more than they limit its powers, for all that they permit is already permitted by the general words that precede them...What they do is to state explicitly certain things that are to be treated as falling within the range of the general powers already conferred. In that sense alone they extend, because they amplify, those powers. But the Act of 1945 makes no such declaration and offers no such list. It leaves the general powers that it confers unexplained by statutory definition. It is not as if it made some new declaration and offered some new list, the form of which might appropriately be compared with the form adopted by its predecessor. In such a case changes might indeed be significant. But where, as here, one term of the comparison is lacking altogether there is no firm ground for the inferences that have been drawn as to the intention of the later Act.

In their Lordships' view there is no better way of approaching the interpretation of this Act than to endeavour to appreciate the general object that it serves and to give its words their natural meaning in the light of that object..."

In effect, their Lordships decided that although there was no specific item in the list under which the action of confiscation could be justified, still that action was referable to the general powers mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act of 1945. The specific question of the comparison of the powers under sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 3 of the War Measures Act, 1914, had not arisen before the Privy Council. It arose by way of comparison of the provisions of the War Measures Act and those of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act and it was in that context that their Lordships pointed out that after all, the object of enumeration in sub-s. (2) was to elaborate what was contained in sub-s. (1) and that sub-s. (2) did not extend the powers mentioned in sub-s. (1) nor could it restrict those powers.

The case which we are considering is somewhat different from all the three cases referred to above. In the present case, the Rules do not purport to have been framed under any of the items mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962. The Rules purport to have been framed generally in exercise of the powers under s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. The specific problem, therefore, which arose for consideration in the above cases, does not arise in the present case. At the same time, it is noteworthy that the Privy Council, in the Canada case, has characterised the entries listed in sub-s. (2) as 'so many statutory definitions'. In my view, in the present case, there is no, and there cannot be any, conflict between sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. According to the Parliament, the clauses listed in sub-s. (2) are mere elaboration of what is stated in a general way in sub-s. (1). These clauses make explicit what is implicit in sub-s. (1). If the clauses in sub-s. (2) are 'statutory definitions', evidently, the clauses would stand by themselves, unless there is any ambiguity about any of them. It is not correct to contend that none of these clauses though explicitly and unambiguously worded can stand on their own and must always relate to the general purposes. Mr. Mehta's argument pushed to its logical corollary amounts to this that, in each case it must be demonstrably established that the clauses, which are pressed in service, are related to or referable to one or more of the general purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3. It is clear that the Parliament while enacting those clauses had no doubt in its mind that these clauses fall within the ambit of the general powers. The expression of the parliamentary intent if clear cannot be called into question by inviting the Courts to embark upon an inquiry for seeing as to whether there is a clear connection between the clauses mentioned in sub-s. (2) and one of the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1). Of course, it is open to the petitioners to contend that the Gold Control Rules must be referable to one of the items, if not to the general purposes. I do not think that it is open to the petitioners to contend that the clauses in sub-s. (2) should themselves be put to the test laid down in sub-s. (1). The rule of harmonious construction must be adopted, and if that is adopted, there can hardly be any occasion for envisaging any conflict between sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act of 1962. The argument advanced by Mr. Mehta was mainly based on cl. (6) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 which runs thus:

"requiring the publication of news and information".

Mr. Mehta contended that the clause is very widely worded and, therefore, unless the publication of news and information is shown to be connected with any of the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1), an order requiring the publication of news and information would be invalid. The argument is correct, because the clause to which reference is made is vague and ambiguous. When the wording of a clause is vague and ambiguous, it is open to the Court, nay it would be necessary for the Court, to make an inquiry as to whether an order purporting to have been passed thereunder could be justifiable on the basis of the existence of any of the general powers mentioned in sub-s. (1). But to argue that even when there is no ambiguity about the wording of a clause the connection between the clause with any of the general purposes must still be established to the satisfaction of the Court would, in my opinion, be to pit one part of the section against the other—a procedure which is not permissible on any canons of construction.

It may be pointed out that the clauses enumerated in sub-s. (2) serve and are intended to serve yet another useful purpose and it is this that, in the absence of such an enumeration the delegating legislation may become liable to be charged with the vice of excessive delegation. Enumeration of the various purposes, which, according to the Parliament, form part of the general purposes or follow from the general purposes, gives guidance to the delegate to frame rules and once that is done, the rules cannot be attacked on the ground of excessive delegation. The observations made by the Supreme Court in Makhan Singh's case at page 400 may be usefully cited in this connection. In discussing the argument on behalf of the detenu that the Rule (30A) authorising detention which was framed under s. 3(2)(15)(i) of the Defence of India Act of 1962, suffered from the vice of excessive delegation, Gajendra-gadkar J. (as he then was) referred to sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act and the specific clause viz., (15)(i) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 thereof, and observed (p. 400):

“...Section 3(2) provides that without prejudice to the generality of the powers conferred by sub-section (1) the rules may provide for, and may empower any authority to make orders providing for, all or any of the following matters; then follow clauses (1) to (57), including several sub-clauses which provide for the matters that may be covered by the Rules. Amongst them is clause (15)(i)...”

His Lordship then sets out the clause and proceeds to observe:

“The argument is that in conferring power on the Central Government to make rules, the legislature has abdicated its essentially legislative function in favour of the Central Government. In our opinion, this argument is wholly untenable...In the present cases, one has merely to read section 3(1) and the detailed provisions contained in several clauses of section 3(2) to be satisfied that the attack against the validity of the said section on the ground of excessive delegation is patently unsustainable. Not only is the legislative policy broadly indicated in the preamble to the Act, but the relevant provisions of the impugned section itself give such detailed and specific guidance to the rule-making authority that it would be idle to contend that the Act has delegated essentially legislative function to the rule-making authority.” (pp. 400-401).

In *Hamdard Dawakhana v. Union of India*⁶ their Lordships were considering the effect of s. 3 of the Drugs and Magic Remedies (Objectionable Advertisement) Act, 1954. Section 3 provided (page 567):—

“Subject to the provisions of this Act, no person shall take any part in the publication of any advertisement referring to any drug in terms which suggest or are calculated to lead to the use of that drug for...

(d) the diagnosis, cure, mitigation, treatment or prevention of any venereal disease or any other diseases or condition which may be specified in rules made under this Act. Power to make rules is laid down in S. 16 which is as follows:—

S. 16(1). The Central Government may by notification in the official gazette make rules for carrying out the purposes of this Act.”

The opening words of sub-s. (2) are:

“In particular and without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing power, such rules may—

(a) specify any disease or condition to which the provisions of section 3 shall apply.” The first part of s. 16 of the Act authorised the making of the rules to carry out the purposes of the Act and cl. (a) of sub-s. (2) provided that the rules may specify any disease or condition to which the provisions of s. 3 shall apply. Their Lordships observed (p. 567):—

i.e., it delegates to the administrative authority the power to frame rules and regulations to subserve the objective and purpose of the Act. Clause (a) of the second sub-section is merely illustrative of the power given under the first sub-section; Emperor v. Sibnath Banerjee... Therefore sub-section 2(a) also has the same object as sub-section (1) i.e., to carry out the purposes of the Act. Consequently when the rule making authority specifies conditions and diseases in the schedule it exercises the same delegated authority as it does when it exercises powers under sub-section (1) and makes other rules and therefore it is delegated legislation. The question for decision then is, is the delegation constitutional in that the administrative authority has been supplied with proper guidance. In our view the words impugned are vague. Parliament has established no criteria, no standards and has not prescribed any principle on which a particular disease or condition is to be specified in the Schedule. It is not stated what facts or circumstances are to be taken into consideration to include a particular condition or disease. The power of specifying diseases and conditions as given in S. 3(d) must therefore be held to be going beyond permissible boundaries of valid delegation..."

My object in referring to the above decision is to point out that the enumeration contained in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, is not just an act of super-arrogation but serves a necessary and useful purpose. In my view, if the Gold Control Rules could be justified by cl. (33) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, since the wording of that clause is unambiguous, it is not necessary still to seek to establish connection between the Gold Control Rules and one of the general purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) thereof, for to do so would be to question the 'statutory definition' made by the Parliament itself.

That takes me to the consideration of the principal argument advanced by Mr. Mehta viz., that the Rules would become ultra vires unless a direct, proximate or intimate connection is established between the Rules framed and the general purposes stated in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962. It was also pointed out that the Gold Control Rules contain no preamble and no recital to the effect that it appeared to the Central Government necessary or expedient for securing the purposes set out in s. 3 of the Act of 1962. It was contended by Mr. Mehta that the effect of the absence of the recital as above would be to leave the question about the connection between the Rules and the general purposes at large. I will consider this aspect of the matter at a subsequent stage of the discussion. For the time being, I will concentrate my attention upon the principal argument viz., whether it is necessary to establish a direct, proximate or intimate connection between the Rules framed and the general purposes set out in s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1962. The edifice of Mr. Mehta's argument in this respect is reared on the basis of the two decisions, one in *Rex v. Basudeva*⁷ and the other in The Superintendent, Central Prison, Fatehgarh v. Ram Manohar Lohia.⁸

In Rex v. Basudeva the respondent (Basudeva) was a dealer in kerosene oil and the charge was that he habitually indulged in black-marketing. He was arrested by an order of detention passed in exercise of the powers conferred by s. 3(1)(i) of the U.P. Prevention of Black-Marketing (Temporary Powers) Act, 1947. That Act was passed by the U.P. Legislature by virtue of s. 100 read with Entry 1 of List II, Schedule VII of the Government of India Act, 1935. Section 100 of the Government of India Act, 1935, in effect provided that the Dominion Legislature had power to make laws in respect of various matters enumerated in List I of the Seventh Schedule and the Provincial Legislature had power to legislate in respect of any of the matters enumerated in List II of the Seventh Schedule. Entry 1 of List II of the Seventh Schedule read (relevant portion quoted) :—

"...preventive detention for reasons connected with the maintenance of public order". The question for consideration before the Federal Court was whether the legislation, viz., the U.P. Prevention of Black-Marketing (Temporary Powers)

Act, 1947, could be validly passed by the U.P. Legislature in exercise of the legislative powers conferred upon it under entry 1 of List II of Schedule VII. It was contended for the detenu that the detention was unlawful as the provision aforesaid was void and inoperative as being ultra vires the Provincial Legislature. Patanjali Sastri J. (as he then was), who delivered the judgment of the Court, posed the question, whether the impugned provision falls within the ambit of the legislative power conferred upon the Provincial Legislature by s. 100 read with Entry 1 of List II, Schedule VII of the Government of India Act, 1935. It was contended by the learned Advocate General in that case that habitual black-marketing in essential commodities was bound sooner or later to cause a dislocation of the machinery of controlled distribution, which, in turn, might lead to breaches of the peace and that, therefore, detention with a view to prevent such black-marketing was covered by the entry. His Lordship in repelling this argument referred to the possibility of the rash driving of an automobile or the sale of adulterated foodstuffs leading to the disturbance of public order. At the same time, the consequence was so remote that it could not be 'connected with the maintenance of public order'. At page 69, his Lordship observed:

"...Preventive detention is a serious invasion of personal liberty, and the power to make laws with respect to it is, in the case of Provincial Legislatures, strictly limited by the condition that such detention must be for reasons connected with the maintenance of public order. The connection contemplated must, in our view, be real and proximate, not far-fetched or problematical".

In appreciating the decision of the Federal Court, it is necessary to note that in a federal constitution, there is a meticulous division of powers between the federal union and the federal States. The line of demarcation between the fields of legislation must be fairly clear so that one legislative body could not transgress or trespass upon the field allocated to the other. It is also necessary to note that it is for the judiciary to decide as to whether the Legislature has exceeded the limits of its legislative competence. Judiciary is the sole judge in that respect and it is for the judiciary to jealously safeguard the delicate balance of the distribution of powers between the two legislative organs. The principle enunciated in Basudeva's case was followed by the Supreme Court in The Superintendent, Central Prison, Fatehgarh v. Ram Manohar Lohia. In that case, s. 3 of the U.P. Special Powers Act, 1932, made instigation not to pay or defer payment of any liability an offence punishable with imprisonment which may extend to six months, or with fine, extending to Rs. 250, or with both. Ram Manohar Lohia was prosecuted under the said section for delivering speeches instigating cultivators not to pay enhanced irrigation rates to the Government. He applied to the High Court for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground, amongst others, that the said section was inconsistent with art. 19(1)(a) of the Constitution and as such void. The High Court decided in favour of the appellant (Lohia) and he was released. The State appealed to the Supreme Court and the question for determination was whether the impugned section embodied reasonable restrictions in the interests of public order and was thus protected by art. 19(2) of the Constitution. Subbarao J., who delivered the judgment of the Court, put the issue neatly by saying "We shall now proceed to consider the constitutional validity of this section" (page 828). His Lordship pointed out that to sustain any law made by the State under cl. (2) of art. 19 of the Constitution, two conditions must be complied with, viz., (1) the restrictions imposed must be reasonable; and (2) they should be in the interests of public order. His Lordship observed (p. 835):—

"...The restriction made 'in the interests of public order' must also have reasonable relation to the object to be achieved...If the restriction has no proximate relationship to achievement of public order, it cannot be said that the restriction is a reasonable restriction within the meaning of the said clause..."

Reference was then made to the decision of the Federal Court in Basudeva's case and the relevant passage at p. 69 of that judgment was cited with approval. His Lordship then proceeded to add (p. 836):

"...The decision, in our view, lays down the correct test. The limitation imposed in the interests of public order to be a reasonable restriction, should be one which has a proximate connection or nexus with public order, but not one far-fetched, hypothetical or problematical or too remote in the chain of its relation with the public order".

Just as in the case of Rex v. Basudeva the point involved was whether the Provincial Legislature had transgressed the limits of its power, in Ram Manohar Lohia's case the question was, whether the Legislature had passed a legislation in violation of the fundamental rights. Subbarao J. emphasised that the fundamental rights cannot be restricted on hypothetical or problematical considerations.

The question for consideration is whether the principle of proximate or intimate connection can be extended in determining the validity of a delegated legislation framed under the Defence of India Act where large powers have been conferred by the Parliament on the delegate coupled with wide discretion for selecting the topics for legislation. I have already pointed out that the Gold Control Rules have not been challenged on the ground of excessive delegation. I have also pointed out that there is no challenge and there could not be any to the powers of the Parliament to frame laws for the purposes mentioned in s. 3 of the Defence of India Act either on the ground of violation of the fundamental rights under art. 19, which has been suspended under art. 358 or of the fundamental rights under arts. 21 and 22, which have been suspended by a Presidential proclamation. Nor could there be a challenge to the powers of the Parliament on the ground that the Parliament has transgressed the limits of its legislative functions, because the relevant fetters in that regard have been removed by art. 250 of the Constitution. In other words, there is no inherent want of jurisdiction in the Parliament in making laws mentioned in s. 3(1), at any rate, during the period of emergency. There is such an inherent want of jurisdiction in a Legislature with limited powers because of the meticulous division of powers and also because of the existence of fundamental rights. The only question, therefore, that remains to be considered is whether the Parliament, which has plenary powers in making a legislation, has in fact delegated these powers which would sustain the Gold Control Rules. In other words, the question is only of the extent of delegation. Evidently, the delegation is of an extensive character, not merely because of the general purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act but also because discretion has been given to the Central Government to choose the topics. The words "The Central Government may make such rules as appear to it necessary or expedient for securing... etc." in s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act are extremely important. In this connection, it may be pointed out that when we are considering the question as to whether the Legislature has transgressed the limits of its legislative powers, the choice made by the Legislature is neither here nor there. It is clear that when the Legislature proceeds to legislate on a topic, it proceeds on the footing that the topic falls within the purview of its jurisdiction. In this connection, I may refer to a very significant sentence in the judgment of Basudeva's case at p. 69. It was urged before the Federal Court that if the Legislature thought that prevention of a particular activity was expedient in the interest of maintenance of public order, it was not for the Court to canvass the degree of connection between the two, as that was a matter of policy and not of vires. In repelling this argument, their Lordships observed:

"...We cannot accept this wide proposition. Whilst a statement in the preamble of a statute as to its ultimate objective may be useful as throwing light on the nature of the matter legislated upon and must undoubtedly be taken into consideration, it cannot be conclusive on a question of vires, where the Legislature concerned has powers to legislate on certain specified matters only. The Court must still see, in such cases, whether the subject-matter of the impugned legislation is really within those powers”.

The effect of the observations of the Supreme Court at page 836 in Ram Manohar Lohia's case is identical:

“...We can only say that fundamental rights cannot be controlled on such hypothetical and imaginary considerations...”.

As pointed out above, under s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, it is the Central Government, which has been constituted the authority to decide upon the topics on which it could legislate in its capacity as a delegate of the Parliament. I may usefully refer to a passage in the judgment of the High Court of Australia in *Reid v. Sinderberry: Reid v. McGrath*⁹ for reinforcing the argument advanced above. I will be referring to this case and also some of the other Australian cases cited before us in the course of the arguments on both sides at a later stage of this judgment. At this stage, it is sufficient to note that the question for consideration in Reid's case was, whether in making a regulation providing for conscription, the Governor General was over-stepping the limits of the legislative powers of the Commonwealth Parliament conferred under s. 15(vi) of the Commonwealth Constitution to make laws with respect to naval and military defence. Latham C.J. observed (p. 511):

“...When the powers of a legislative authority are limited by law the opinion of the authority that a particular exercise of its powers is within the law cannot be decisive of the question of the validity of a provision enacted by the authority, unless, indeed, the power was conferred by the law creating the power (in this case the Constitution of the Commonwealth) in terms which provided that the opinion of the authority should be so decisive. But there is no such provision relating to defence in the Constitution. The power of the Commonwealth Parliament is a power to make laws with respect to naval and military defence—see Constitution, s. 51(vi)—not a power to make laws with respect to any matter which, in the opinion of the Parliament, or of an authority to which Parliament may confide a power of subordinate legislation, is naval or military defence.”

On these general considerations, therefore, I am inclined to the view that the test laid down in the two cases relied upon by Mr. Mehta viz., that the connection between the legislation and the powers of the Legislature must be proximate, direct and intimate, cannot possibly be extended to the case of delegated legislation, which is framed by virtue of the wide powers conferred by s. 3 of the Defence of India Act. The test in judging the validity of the Gold Control Rules in a case like this would have to be more flexible than the rigid test of real, proximate and intimate connection. Such a test has been laid down by the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Canada's case. In that case, their Lordships were discussing the effect of an order of confiscation, which was made by virtue of the general powers invested in the Governor in Council by s. 2 of the National Emergency Transitional Powers Act, 1945. After referring to the general arguments relating to the real purpose of the powers, their Lordships observed (p. 445):

“If, then, the expropriation which the Order in Council prescribes is to be held invalid in law it must be attacked by showing that the Act of 1945, truly interpreted, did not give the Governor the power to carry out what he has purported to achieve. No other line of attack is open...”

A little later, their Lordships observed (p. 446):

“...Plainly, within the scope of its wide range of purposes, the Act is conceived in the most fluid and general terms, conferring deliberately the most extensive discretion. To import into such a measure a precise limitation (if so vague a phrase can itself be said to be precise) that no action can be taken that ‘extends’ a particular control of a particular commodity is, in their Lordships’ view, a radical misunderstanding of the true nature of such legislation”.

Again, at page 449 their Lordships remarked:

"In their Lordships' view there is no better way of approaching the interpretation of this Act than to endeavour to appreciate the general object that it serves and to give its words their natural meaning in the light of that object. There are many so-called rules of construction that courts of law have resorted to in their interpretation of statutes, but the paramount rule remains that every statute is to be expounded according to its manifest or expressed intention. If the Act of 1945 is approached in this way, it is very difficult to see what warrant there is for introducing into it by way of interpretation an implied exclusion of any power in any circumstances to acquire compulsorily any piece of property. For, unless compulsory acquisition is absolutely excluded from the range of things that the Governor may do, any particular exercise of the power is a matter for his discretion and cannot come within the control of the Court".

Again, the observations at page 450 have an important bearing on the question under discussion:

"...And the power of the Executive to pursue these purposes, while the national emergency continues, is conferred by Parliament without express reservation and in the amplest terms that statutory language can employ... Most statutes can be shown to achieve such an encroachment (upon the rights of the subject) in some form or another and the general principle means no more than that, where the import of some enactment is inconclusive or ambiguous, the court may properly lean in favour of an interpretation that leaves private rights undisturbed. But in a case such as the present the weight of that principle is too slight to counterbalance the considerations that have already been noticed. For here the words that invest the Governor with power are neither vague nor ambiguous: Parliament has chosen to say explicitly that he shall do whatever things he may deem necessary or advisable. That does not allow him to do whatever he may feel inclined, for what he does must be capable of being related to one of the prescribed purposes, and the Court is entitled to read the Act in this way. But then, expropriation is altogether capable of being so related".

In my opinion, the principle that should be applied in testing the validity of the Rules framed on the authority of a section which is as widely worded as s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, is the principle enunciated by the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Canada's case. When wide powers have been conferred upon the Central Government and when the Central Government has been given the right to choose the topic in respect of which legislation is to be framed, the principle that would hold good would be the principle whether the Rules framed are capable of being connected with the purposes for which they are intended. In other words, it is not the direct, proximate and intimate connection that should be insisted upon, but some connection which would correlate the Rules with the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) or with the matters enumerated in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962. It may also be pointed out that the principle laid down by the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Canada's case has been followed by the same authority in a subsequent case in Ross-Clunis v. Papadopoulos.¹⁰ In that case, s. 6 of the Emergency Powers Order in Council, 1939, empowered the Governor to make such regulations as appeared to him to be necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the maintenance of public order etc. By virtue of this power the Governor issued the Cyprus Emergency Powers (Collective Punishment) Regulations, 1955. The Commissioner passed an order under the said Regulations levying a collective fine of £35,000 after holding an inquiry into the matter as stipulated by the Regulations. In upholding the order, their Lordships referred to the Attorney-General for Canada's case and stated that the test laid down there was the correct one to apply. Mr. Mehta tried to distinguish this case by pointing out that the Regulations defined the word 'offence' to mean an offence the commission of which is, in the opinion of the Commissioner, prejudicial to the internal security of the Colony or to the maintenance of public order in the Colony. He contended that in view of this definition, the Court had no other alternative but to hold that the act of levying collective fine was justified. This argument ignores the circumstance that it was the Regulations which defined the word 'offence' and not the original Emergency Powers Order in Council, 1939. Mr. Mehta tried to distinguish this case also by suggesting that, as a matter of fact, the Privy Council in Ross-Clunis's case did come to the conclusion that the Regulations were clearly related to the purposes described in s. 6 of the Order of 1939. It is necessary to note that this observation was made after citing with approval the passage in Attorney-General for Canada's case. That means that, according to their Lordships, the Regulations were clearly related to the purposes described in s. 6 of the Order of 1939, because they stood the test laid down in the aforesaid case.

According to me, there are two rival tests, one for testing the validity of a legislation passed by a Legislature whose powers have been defined and limited under the Constitution as also a legislation which makes an encroachment or an invasion upon the fundamental rights of the citizens. In judging the validity of a legislation which encroaches upon the legislative functions of another legislative body or which invades upon the fundamental rights of the citizens, the test which must be followed is the test of direct, proximate and intimate nexus between the exercise of the powers and the authority conferred upon the Legislature. In a matter of this nature, the Court is the sole judge to decide as to whether the powers have been exceeded. Another, in the case of a delegated legislation where there is no inherent lack of jurisdiction in the parent body which delegates the power and where the delegate has been given wide discretion in choosing the topic. In the latter case, the test that will have to be invoked is whether the exercise of the legislative authority is wholly unrelated to the purposes or is not capable of being connected to the purposes for which it is meant to be exercised.

Mr. Mehta contended that the decision given in the case of Attorney-General for Canada is of no avail to the Central Government in the present case, because there is no recital in the Rules to show that it appeared to the Central Government either necessary or expedient to proclaim these Rules for securing the various purposes mentioned in cl. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1962. He emphasized that some of the passages in the judgment of the Privy Council in Attorney-General for Canada's case indicate that the decision proceeded on the basis of the presence of the recital to the effect that the Governor in Council deemed it necessary or expedient or both to pass the order in question. It is, therefore, necessary to consider the effect of the absence of the recital to the effect that the Central Government deemed it necessary or expedient to frame the Gold Control Rules for any of the purposes mentioned in s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1962. In this connection, reference may be made to a passage at page 74 of the Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd edn., Vol. 39, which runs thus:

"It is not open to the court to investigate the necessity or expediency of any defence regulation, and it is bound to assume that an order made under a defence regulation was necessary..."

One of the cases cited in support of the above proposition is Rex v. Comptroller General of Patents: Bayer Products Ltd., Ex parte.¹¹ In that case, certain orders were passed by the Comptroller General of Patents regulating the rights of using an enemy-owned patent. Regulation 60E of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, was framed under sub-s (1) of s. 1 of the Emergency Powers (Defence) Act, 1939, which set out the purposes for which His Majesty may make regulations. The purposes were:

"...securing the public safety, the defence of the realm, the maintenance of public order and the efficient prosecution of any war in which His Majesty may be engaged, and for maintaining supplies and services essential to the life of the community".

The validity of Regulation 60E was impugned on the ground that it had no relation whatsoever with the object of prosecuting the war. After observing, "...we might have been entitled to say that the purposes stated in the sub-section were wide enough to include the framing of this regulation", Scott L.J. proceeded to say (p. 311):

"Be that as it may, in my opinion, the effect of the words 'as appear to him to be necessary or expedient' is to give to His Majesty in Council a complete discretion to decide what regulations are necessary for the purposes named in the sub-section. That being so, it is not open to His Majesty's courts to investigate the question whether or not the making of any particular regulation was in fact necessary or expedient for the specified purposes. The principle on which delegated legislation must rest under our constitution is that legislative discretion which is left in plain language by Parliament is to be final and not subject to control by the courts. In my view, the sub-section clearly conferred on His Majesty in Council that ultimate discretion..."

In repelling the argument based on the absence of express recital, his Lordship observed on the same page (p. 312) as follows:

"...The Order in Council introducing reg. 60 E of necessity records by implication the fact that His Majesty in Council thought it either necessary or expedient, or both, to extend the powers of the Comptroller under the Patents (Emergency) Act, 1939, s. 3, in the manner stated in the regulation..."

Clauson L.J. has dealt with this question in some detail at page 314:

"...The Order in Council does not contain an express recital that it appears to His Majesty to be necessary or expedient for the purposes mentioned to make this particular regulation, but, as a matter of construction of the order, I am clear (and I do not think that anyone in the course of these proceedings has thrown any doubt on the proposition) that it shows plainly that it did appear to His Majesty to be necessary or expedient to make this regulation".

Again, at p. 315 his Lordship observed:

"...this application for prohibition can succeed only if it is within the power of this court to investigate the action of His Majesty when he stated, as I conceive that His Majesty did in making the Order in Council, that 'this regulation appeared to him to be necessary or expedient for the named purpose. In my view, this court has no jurisdiction to investigate the reasons or the advice which moved His Majesty to reach the conclusion that it was necessary or expedient to make the regulation. The legislature has left the matter to His Majesty and this court has no control over it. I know of no authority which would justify the court in questioning the decision which His Majesty must be taken to have stated that he has come to, namely, that this regulation is necessary or expedient for the specified purposes. If His Majesty once reaches that conclusion with regard to a regulation, that regulation, when made, is the law of the land, subject to the provision in the Act that, if either House of Parliament takes a view differing from that on which His Majesty has acted, the order can be annulled".

Again, a little later his Lordship stated:

"...His Majesty formed the view that it was necessary or expedient, for the purposes mentioned, to make the regulation, and, so far as this Court is concerned, there is an end of the matter..."

It would thus be clear that no importance can be attached to the absence of a specific recital as a preamble to the Rules framed.

I should not be supposed to hold that in no case it is open to the Court to hold a judicial scrutiny in the matters on which the Rules have been framed. The Privy Council in Attorney-General for Canada's case at p. 450 has indicated that when the instrument impugned is ambiguous it will make room for judicial inquiry. Their Lordships have observed at page 450 as follows:

"It is fair to say that there is a well-known general principle that statutes which encroach upon the rights of the subject, whether as regards person or property, are subject to a 'strict' construction. Most statutes can be shown to achieve such an encroachment in some form or another, and the general principle means no more than that, where the import of some enactment is inconclusive or ambiguous, the court may properly lean in favour of an interpretation that leaves private rights undisturbed. But in a case such as the present the weight of that principle is too slight to counterbalance the considerations that have already been noticed. For here the words that invest the Governor with power are neither vague nor ambiguous: Parliament has chosen to say explicitly that he shall do whatever things he may deem necessary or advisable. That does not allow him to do whatever he may feel inclined, for what he does must be capable of being related to one of the prescribed purposes, and the Court is entitled to read the Act in this way".

It is, however, necessary to consider the scope of the judicial scrutiny in a matter like this, because this will also throw light upon the question of the proper test to be applied in judging the validity of delegated piece of legislation. It has been repeatedly stressed that a wide discretion has been conferred on the Central Government to make a choice of the topics in respect of which it considered it necessary or expedient to make the Rules for the stated purposes. I have also laid emphasis upon the wide range of the purposes mentioned in s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1962. I have also pointed out that when such a discretion has been given to the Central Government and when such wide powers have been conferred upon it, the test for judging the validity of the Rules framed would be of a flexible character viz., to consider whether the Rules are wholly unrelated or are not capable of being related to the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962. If the Court comes to the conclusion that the measure is wholly unrelated or was not capable of being connected with any of the purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3, the Court has jurisdiction to strike it down as invalid. But, the Court cannot strike it down merely because it thinks that the measure is not directly connected with the purposes as interpreted by it. It would, therefore, be interesting to review some of the cases that were cited by Mr. Mehta as also by Mr. Bhabha, which will give us a fairly clear idea about the limits of the scope of the inquiry and also incidentally throw light upon the question of the proper test to be applied. In *Chester v. Bateson*¹² Regulation 2A(2) of the Defence of the Realm Regulations, which was framed under s. 2(1) of the Defence of Realm Consolidation Act, 1914, in effect provided that no proceedings for the recovery of possession of a dwelling house in which a munition worker is living and which is situate in a declared area, could be taken without the consent of the Minister of Munitions. The case came up before the King's Bench Division as a case stated by Justices for Lancashire. It was held that the action taken could not possibly have any connection for securing the public safety. It was also pointed out that shutting out all access of approach to the Court was a grave invasion and so grave an invasion could not have been intended to be accomplished by a delegated legislation. Darling J. raised the question at page 833:

"...and I ask myself whether it is a necessary, or even reasonable, way to aid in securing the public safety and the defence of the realm to give power to a Minister to forbid any person to institute any proceedings to recover possession of a house so long as a war worker is living in it".

At page 835, Avory J. observed:

"...This depends upon whether it can be said, on any reasonable construction of the statute, to be a regulation for securing the public safety and the defence of the realm, and, particularly under s. 1, sub-s. 1(e), whether it can be said to be a regulation to prevent the successful prosecution of the war being endangered;..."

He further indicated that a regulation providing that no order for ejection should be made except under the conditions prescribed would probably be held intra vires the statute; but the objection which was made to the regulation was that it deprived the King's subjects of their right of access to the Courts of justice. In *Attorney-General v. De Keyser's Royal Hotel*¹³ the Crown took possession of a hotel for the purpose of housing the headquarters personnel of the Royal Flying Corps, and denied the legal right of the owners to compensation. It was not disputed that the Act of taking was legal. The only question was whether the denial of the right to compensation could be said to be conducive to any of the purposes mentioned in s. 1(2) of the Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act, 1914. Lord Dunedin at page 523 posed the question in the following way:

"...The question in the case is therefore narrowed to one point and one point only: the Crown having legally taken, is it bound to pay compensation ex lege, or is the offer to pay compensation ex gratia, as that compensation may be fixed by the Losses Commission, a sufficient offer and an answer to all demands?"

Lord Dunedin held (p. 529):

"...It is clear that under these sub-sections the taking possession of De Keyser's Hotel was warranted, but there was no necessity for the public safety or the defence of the realm that payment should not be made, such payment being, on the hypothesis that the views above expressed as to the Act of 1842 were sound, a necessary concomitant to taking."

It was on that short ground that the action of eviction was held to be ultra vires. Both these decisions were relied upon by Mr. Mehta. But, in my opinion, instead of supporting the point of view which he was advancing, these cases show that it is only in cases where the Court feels that the action taken had no connection whatsoever to the purposes of the defence or the safety of the realm, that the action can be declared as ultra vires. Mr. Mehta also referred to a decision in The King v. Commonwealth Court of Conciliation and Arbitration; Ex parte Victoria: Victoria v. The Commonwealth.¹⁴ In that case, sub-regulations 8, 9 and 10 of regulation 29 of the National Security (Supplementary) Regulations, purported to control the holidays and remuneration of members of the public service of the State of Victoria, although they were not engaged in work associated with the prosecution of the war. It was held that the sub-regulations were not within the ambit of the defence power of the Commonwealth. In the leading case Farey v. Burvett,¹⁵ to which reference will be made hereafter, the High Court of Australia had held that s. 51(vi) of the Constitution, which related to naval and military defence of the Commonwealth, must be more liberal in times of war than during times of peace. The question that arose in The King v. Commonwealth Court of Conciliation and Arbitration was, whether the sub-regulations were justified on the basis of the extended definition of defence. At page 506, Latham C.J. observed:

"...But the most complete recognition of the power and responsibility of Parliament and of the Government in relation to defence does not involve the conclusion that the defence power is without any limits whatever. The existence of the defence power in the Commonwealth Parliament and the exercise of that power do not mean that all governmental power in Australia may, by the action of the Commonwealth Parliament, be concentrated in Commonwealth authorities. The Constitution cannot be made to disappear because a particular power conferred by the Constitution upon the Commonwealth Parliament is exercised by that Parliament."

The learned Chief Justice then proceeded to observe (p. 507):

"But such a result cannot follow if the defence power is regarded as enabling the Commonwealth Parliament to make such laws only as have a real connection with defence."

After citing the passage from the judgment of Isaacs J. in Farey's case where the learned Judge used words as 'conceivably' and 'incidentally', Latham C.J. observed (p. 507):

"...In spite of the use of the word 'conceivably', I do not regard the statement of Isaacs J. which I have quoted as meaning more than this, except that, recognizing the great scope and profound national importance of the defence power, it emphasizes the necessity for care and caution before deciding that a particular measure, put forward as appertaining to defence, in truth and in substance has nothing to do with defence..." At page 509, the learned Chief Justice observed:

"...the defence power should not, in my opinion, be construed as an unlimited legislative power. It should be interpreted upon the same principle as that which is applied to other constitutional powers. If the alleged connection between a particular power of legislation and the subject of defence is either non-existent or so attenuated as to be practically non-existent, the legislation cannot be supported under that power..."

Although Mr. Mehta relied upon this case, the observations set out above do not support the proposition he was trying to establish before us, viz., that the connection must be proximate and direct. In Victorian Chamber of Manufacturers v. The Commonwealth (Industrial Lighting Regulations),¹⁶ regulations known as the National Security (Industrial Lighting) Regulations were passed by virtue of the powers conferred by the National Security Act, 1939-40, under which the Minister was given complete control of the interior artificial lighting standards in the industrial premises. It was argued that good lighting was conducive to industrial efficiency and industrial efficiency was important for the effective prosecution of the war and, therefore, the regulations were valid. In repelling this argument, Latham C.J. observed (p. 417):

"...But the same thing might be said of any prescription of standards in factory conditions, or in almost any other conditions affecting human life and well-being. For example, the provision of food, clothing, housing and recreation for workers is required for full industrial efficiency. But, in my opinion, the existence of war does not result in handing over to the Commonwealth general control of these subjects. The existence of war enables the Commonwealth, in my opinion, to deal with war problems and with war-created problems, but it does not produce the result that the Commonwealth Parliament is empowered to legislate upon all subjects whatever."

"...The question does not depend upon the vividness of our imaginations or conceptions, but upon the law or the regulation being in substance a law or regulation with respect to the public safety and the defence of the Commonwealth."

At page 422 the learned Judge remarked:

"In the present case the Regulations are wholly unrelated to and unconnected with the public safety and the defence of the Commonwealth... The Regulations in terms go far beyond any purpose of defence and necessarily operate as a general regulation of industrial lighting conditions beyond the power of the Commonwealth."

Williams J. at page 428 stated:

"...I am unable to conceive that the Regulations are required even incidentally for the defence of the Commonwealth. Their whole substance and purpose is to legislate upon a social subject which does not present any features in time of war not present in normal times."

In Reid v. Sinderberry's case the respondents were convicted of an offence under the National Security Act, 1939-1943, in that they failed to comply with a direction given under regulation 15 of the National Security (Man Power) Regulations—Statutory Rules 1942 No. 34 as amended. The validity of the Regulation was challenged. I have already cited a passage at page 511 in another connection. At page 514, Rich J. referred to his own observation made in an earlier case to the effect that the powers conferred by the regulation are capable of being used for necessary purposes incidental to the defence of the Commonwealth. At page 515, Starke J. stated:

"...It must have some real connection with defence, afford some reasonable and substantial basis for the conclusion that the law is one with respect to defence..."

In *Wertheim v. The Commonwealth*¹⁷ the Fly and Insect Sprays Order, which was purported to be made under regulation 59 of the National Security (General)

Regulations, declared that the objects of the Order were

"by regulating the manufacture and putting up of fly and insect sprays, to ensure that essential materials, in particular kerosene and thanite, are not wasted through being used in the production of ineffective fly and insect sprays"; it provided that "a person shall not manufacture or put up any fly spray except under the authority of and in accordance with a licence granted" pursuant to the Order, and it prohibited the disposal or acquisition of "any fly spray manufactured or put up in contravention of this Order".

It was held that the Order was not authorised by regulation 59 of the National Security (General) Regulations and was invalid. Williams J. at page 611 stated:

"...That is not a purpose which, on its face, appears to me to have any connection with the defence of the Commonwealth or the effectual prosecution of the war or the maintenance of supplies and services essential to the life of the community..."

Again, at a later stage on the same page, the learned Judge observed:

"...Legislation upon a social subject which does not present any features in time of war not present in normal times is legislation that lies within the legislative province of the States and cannot be enacted by the Commonwealth under the defence power or any delegation of that power".

It may again be pointed out that these cases were relied upon by Mr. Mehta, but none of them assists him in the theory of proximate and direct connection between the delegated legislation and the purposes for which the powers have been conferred on the delegate. Before concluding the review of the Australian cases, reference may be made to a decision in *Miller v. The Commonwealth*¹⁸ which was relied upon by Mr. Bhabha, in support of his proposition that the nexus need not be direct or proximate but that it is sufficient if the legislation is capable of being related to the general purposes. In Miller's case, Regulation 7(7) of the National Security (Economic Organisation) Regulations provided that "the Treasurer may, after consultation with the Committee of the Associated Stock Exchanges of Australia, by order, determine the maximum and minimum prices at which any shares, stock or debentures of a company may be sold".

It was held:

"...that this sub-regulation, when made, was within the defence power (s. 51(vi) of the Constitution) as having a direct relation to the organization of the community for the prosecution of a modern war, and that it was still within that power even after the termination of hostilities".

It was argued that the purposes for which the Regulation was passed could never have had any sufficient bearing on the prosecution of the war or the defence of the Commonwealth. In repelling these contentions, Dixon J. observed (p. 202):

"I am unable to accept these contentions. In my opinion, at the time when these regulations were adopted, a rigid control of dealings in marketable securities might reasonably have been considered essential to the financial and economic organization of the country to sustain its part in the war. It is not for us to pronounce upon matters of finance and economics. When the connection between a challenged provision and the defence power is financial or economic in character, our province is to say whether the Executive Government in which the responsibility is reposed of adopting by regulation measures required for the prosecution of the war, might reasonably consider that the conduct of the war would be likely to suffer if the challenged provisions were not made.

I do not see how we can say that it might not reasonably be considered that, in the financial or economic exigencies of the war, it was necessary to avoid the inflation or deflation of marketable securities and to control transactions, dealings, or operations which might lead to booms and slumps, or which might form a factor in absorbing funds otherwise available for government loans or other purposes...

On a question of ultra vires, when the end is found to be relevant to the power and the means not inappropriate to achieve it, the inquiry stops. Whether less than was done might have been enough, whether more drastic provisions were made than the occasion demanded, whether the financial and economic conceptions inspiring the measure were theoretically sound, these are questions that are not in point. They are matters going to the manner of the exercise of the power, not to its ambit or extent. The principles deducible from a review of the cases referred to above are that the scope of judicial inquiry is limited and that the Court can set aside the Rules if on the face of them, the Rules appear to be wholly unrelated or if it is found on examination that they are not capable of being related to any of the purposes mentioned in s. 3(1) of the Defence of India Act, 1962.

That takes me to the question as to whether the Gold Control Rules would fall either firstly under cl. (33) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, or secondly, under the general purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the said Act. The first purpose in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act is "securing the defence of India and civil defence". Entry No. 1 of List I, Seventh Schedule, of the Constitution of India, is in the following terms:

"Defence of India and every part thereof including preparation for defence and all such acts as may be conducive in times of war to its prosecution and after its termination to effective demobilisation".

It may be interesting to refer to sub-s. (vi) of s. 51 of the Australian Constitution which relates to the power of the Commonwealth Parliament to legislate on matters of defence:

"(vi) The naval and military defence of the Commonwealth and of the several States, and the control of the forces to execute and maintain the laws of the Commonwealth".

The scope and ambit of this sub-section came up for consideration in Farey v. Burvett wherein the validity of the War Precautions Act No. 10 of 1914 as amended by Act III of 1916 was impeached. The Act No. III of 1916 purported to authorise the Governor General to make such regulations as he thinks desirable for the more effectual prosecution of the war, or the more effectual defence of the Commonwealth etc. In dealing with the question as to whether the expression "defence power" has the same meaning at all times whether in peace or in war, Barton J. observed as follows (p. 449):

"...Subjects which before that battle seemed only indirectly or remotely connected with defence as the means of winning the war may after the battle be seen quite clearly to be within it. It may be, as Sir William Irvine urged, that the power does not change. If that is so it is because of the perspective of affairs: because the power looks narrower in peace, when it is not in the foreground of our view than it does as a means of present war when war brings us into close contact with it—when its exercise becomes the most vital of our activities. It may be that the power does not become enlarged in war, but that when seen closely we know how large it is in relation to existing war. Then at least we are able to envisage the reach of its long arm. If the thing be capable, during war, of aiding our arms by land or sea, here or elsewhere, we are to say so, but we say no more. It may be wholly beside the mark in peace, and, if it be so, we are to say so upon due occasion. But the necessity is not for us, when facts of which we take judicial notice establish that the thing is capable of aiding directly the execution of the power. If it is thus capable, then the question of the necessity, or the wisdom or expediency, of invoking such aid, is for Parliament or its duly delegated authority". It is significant to note that the action fixing the highest price for bread within the limits of a certain locality was held to be intra vires the powers of the Commonwealth Parliament conferred by s. 51(vi) of the Australian Constitution as interpreted by the learned Judges. Now, entry No. 1 in List I of the Seventh Schedule of our Constitution is more widely worded. Not only it relates to the defence of India but also includes

"preparation for defence and all such acts as may be conducive in times of war to its prosecution and after its termination to effective demobilization".

We have to examine the Gold Control Rules in the light of the wider language of the entry relating to the defence of India. The observations of the High Court of Australia in Farey v. Burvett will apply with greater force in interpreting the words "the defence of India" in view of the wider definition of that expression in entry No. 1 of List I of the Seventh Schedule.

In my view, the Gold Control Rules are clearly referable to cl. (33) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the Defence of India Act, 1962. Clause (33) runs thus:

"controlling the possession, use or disposal of, or dealing in, coin, bullion, bank notes, currency notes, securities or foreign exchange".

Reference was made to the dictionary meaning of the word 'bullion' as that word has not been defined in the Defence of India Act, 1962. In general, by bullion is meant 'gold or silver in mass or in lump'. Mr. Mehta's argument was that, since the clause speaks of 'bullion' it would not be logical to hold that the Gold Control Rules, which are meant for imposing prohibitions and restrictions upon the making of ornaments and also on the sale and exchange of ornaments, would fall within the ambit of cl. (33). In the first place, it is necessary to remember that several matters have been brought together under cl. (33). These are coin, bullion, bank notes, currency notes, securities and foreign exchange. The object appears to be that the Central Government should have powers to make rules relating to all matters which affect the economic and financial stability of the country during the period of emergency. Clause (32) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3 of the said Act prohibits the import or export of goods or articles of any description including coin, bullion, bank notes, currency notes, securities and foreign exchange. It is thus clear that the object of the matters mentioned in cl. (33) was to regulate the possession, use or disposal of coin, bullion etc. in the internal market of the country. Although the expression 'gold bullion', by itself, may not include gold ornaments, still it is necessary to note that the word 'bullion' is preceded by such words as 'controlling the possession, use or disposal of, or dealing in'. It is not merely the possession of the bullion, not merely the disposal of or dealing in the bullion in respect of which rules may be framed, but it is also in respect of the use of the bullion. Mr. Mehta suggested that the object underlying cl. (33) was to control dealings in bullion or the transfer or possession of bullion from one hand to other. If that were the only object of cl. (33), it was wholly unnecessary to add the word 'use' in that clause. To my mind, the use of gold bullion would include the turning of gold in mass or in lump into ornaments. In the absence of power to control the use of bullion by placing restrictions in respect of turning the bullion into gold ornaments, the power conferred by cl. (33) would have been wholly inconsequential and would not have served any useful purpose. In my view, therefore, full meaning must be given to the expression 'controlling the possession, use or disposal of, or dealing in, coin, bullion' etc., so that all these activities can be controlled by framing adequate rules in respect thereof. Financial or economic stability is one of the important considerations so far as defence of the country is concerned and without adequate control on the use of the bullion, it would be difficult to maintain such stability, because gold is a commodity of international exchange and importance.

Assuming that the Gold Control Rules do not fall within the purview of cl. (33) of sub-s. (2) of s. 3, then they can fall within the general purposes mentioned in sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the said Act, and I am entirely in agreement with the view expressed by my learned brother in that respect. There is no substance in the argument advanced by Mr. Mehta to the effect that under the guise of advancing the purpose of the defence of the country, what is attempted is to introduce a socio-economic measure. It is undisputed that smuggling of gold involves a heavy drain on the foreign exchange resources of India. Smuggling, therefore, has to be checked. The measures undertaken under the Sea

Customs Act and the Foreign Exchange Regulations have not achieved the purpose of checking smuggling. Once gold is successfully smuggled into this country, it is very easy for the same to find a place in the internal market. It can be easily turned into ornaments and once transformed in the shape of ornaments, it is impossible to recognise that the ornaments have been prepared out of the smuggled gold. The ornaments thus prepared can easily pass off as having been made out of the existing stock or out of indigenous gold. This capacity for quick transformation into ornaments is the principal difficulty in the way of preventing smuggling. Smuggling will continue notwithstanding the enactment of stringent measures so long as it is profitable to smuggle. The trade of smuggling will continue to be profitable so long as people have a hankering or a lure for gold. The best method of preventing smuggling, therefore, is to bring about a shrinkage in the demand for gold. It is for that purpose that the control and restriction on the manufacture and sale of gold ornaments appears to have been devised. It is true that the fondness for gold, or to use the words often used by Morarji Desai, the then Finance Minister, the lure for gold is deep-seated in the habits of the Indian people and would not be removed overnight or within a short period. In that sense, it is undoubtedly a long term measure i.e., making people to change their age-old habits. In the same sense, it can be styled as a measure of social reform. But the mere fact that it is also a measure of social reform and the further fact that it is a long term measure do not by themselves turn what is essentially a measure for bringing about economic and financial stability, into a social measure. Mr. Mehta contended that in trying to correlate the Gold Control Rules to one of the purposes viz., defence of India, we have to take recourse to a chain of long and circuitous causation. He argued that if one link in the chain snaps, then the entire chain breaks down. According to him, the success of the measure is also problematical. He went so far as to say that the measure has failed to achieve the desired effect. He then went on to suggest alternative measures if the object was to promote the defence of the country. According to him, instead of imposing restrictions upon the manufacture and sale of gold ornaments, it would be more worthwhile if gold had been expropriated by the Government and utilised for war purposes. I do not think that the chain of causations is in any way circuitous or tortious as suggested by Mr. Mehta. There is a direct link between the objective viz., to prevent smuggling and thus reducing the drain on foreign exchange, and imposing the restrictions that have been imposed under the Gold Control Rules. Nor are we concerned with the question of alternative ways of achieving the desired effect. We are not concerned with the effects of the gold control policy, nor with the soundness of that policy, because that is a matter for the Parliament to decide. Incidentally, I may refer to the provisions of s. 41 of the Defence of India Act, 1962, which requires that the rules made by the Central Government must be placed on the table of each House of Parliament. Section 41 empowers the Parliament either to cancel or modify the rules. As a matter of fact, the Gold Control Rules were placed before the Parliament and they have neither been cancelled nor in any way been modified by the Parliament. That means that the policy underlying these Rules has not been rejected by the Parliament. Mr. Mehta's argument viz., that the framing of the Gold Control Rules amounts to a colourable exercise of the powers because there were already other measures which could have been pressed into service for preventing smuggling or because the new Customs Bill was on the anvil of the Parliament, is without substance. It was contended before the Supreme Court in Makhan Singh's case that in view of the existence of the Preventive Detention Act under which orders for detention could be made, Rule 30 made by virtue of the powers conferred upon the Central Government under s. 3 of the Defence of India Act amounts to a colourable piece of legislation. The argument relating to a colourable piece of legislation is essentially an argument about the competency of the Legislature. The Supreme Court in rejecting the argument observed (p. 401):—

"...If the legislature thought that having regard to the grave threat to the security of India posed by the Chinese aggression, it was necessary to pass the impugned Act notwithstanding the fact that another Act had already been passed in that behalf, it would be difficult to hold that the legislature had acted mala fide and that the Act must, therefore, be struck down as a colourable exercise of legislative power. It is hardly necessary to emphasise that a plea that an Act passed by a Legislature competent to pass it is a colourable piece of legislation, cannot succeed on such flimsy grounds..." I agree with my learned brother in the ruling that he has given viz., that the two speeches of Morarji Desai, the then Finance Minister, one on the All-India Radio on the eve of the proclamation of the Gold Control Rules and the other made in the Parliament when the Gold Control Rules were placed on the Table under s. 41 of the Defence of India Act, are relevant. I also agree with the view taken by him that neither the speech made by the Deputy Minister on the floor of the Parliament while introducing the new Customs Bill nor the speech made by T. T. Krishnamachari, the present Finance Minister while discussing the working of the Gold Control Rules, has any relevance to the question under consideration. I also agree with the view taken by my learned brother viz., that the petitioners cannot impugn the Gold Control Rules as violative of the fundamental rights under arts. 25 and 26 of the Constitution on the state of the averments contained in the petition.

P. C. The rule is, therefore, discharged. Having regard to the fact that a large number of dealers, small and big, have been affected by the Gold Control Rules and having regard to the importance of the matter, there will be no order as to costs.

Rule discharged.

THE BHUSAWAL BOROUGH MUNICIPALITY.*

Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act (Bom. XVIII of 1925), Sec. 73—Constitution of India, Arts. 246(3), 276, 14; Seventh Schedule. List II. Entries 60, 5—Municipality whether can levy tax on service—"Employments" in entry 60, List II, Sch. VII whether includes service—Delegation of power to municipalities to impose tax on professions, trades, callings and employments whether constitutional.

A municipality which is governed by the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, is competent to levy a tax on service in which a person is employed to work for another under s. 73 of the Act.

The word "employments" in entry 60 in List II, in Schedule VII to the Constitution of India includes service or occupation in which a person works for another and in which there is a relationship of employer and employee.

Walati Ram v. Rupar Municipality,¹ referred to.

The delegation of the power to the municipalities governed by the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925, to impose a tax on professions, trades, callings and employments, is not unconstitutional.

M. S. Ramamurthy and T. Godiwala, for the petitioner.

S. B. Bhasme, for opponent No. 1.

T. R. Andhyarujina, instructed by Little & Co., for opponent No. 2.

CHAINANI C. J. The petitioner is employed in the Carriage and Wagon Depot of the Central Railway at Bhusawal. This Railway Depot is situated within the limits of the Bhusawal Borough Municipality. This Municipality is governed by the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act, 1925. Section 73 of this Act specifies the taxes, which a municipality may impose. Sub-section (1) of this section states that subject to any general or special order, which the State Government may make in this behalf, and to the provisions of ss. 75 and 76, a municipality may impose for the purposes of this Act any of the following taxes, namely:—...

(xiv) any other tax which under the Constitution the State Legislature has power to impose in the State.

Section 75 lays down the procedure which a municipality has to follow before imposing a tax. One of the taxes which the State Legislature has power to impose is a tax on professions, trades, callings and employments under entry No. 60 in List II in the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution. In 1959 the Bhusawal Municipality decided to impose this tax. It framed rules and by-laws for levying this tax. These rules and by-laws were sanctioned by the State Government on June 22, 1960. Clause (c) in r. 3 of the Bhusawal Trade, Professions, Callings and Employments Taxes Rules, states that "every person who holds any office of profit under any Government or any body or authority either private or public or under any individual within the local area for not less than four months in any year shall pay the tax every year on employment at the rate specified in Schedule A; provided that the total amount payable in respect of any company or person to the Municipality by way of the tax shall not exceed Rs. 250 per annum." The rates of tax are specified in Schedule A to the Rules. Except in the case of owners of cotton ginning and pressing factories, in whose case the maximum tax payable is Rs. 100, the maximum tax which any other person is liable to pay under these rules is Rs. 10 per year. On October 17, 1962, the petitioner was called upon by the Chief Officer of the Municipality to pay Rs. 6, being the amount of the tax for the year 1962-63 due from him. The petitioner did not pay this tax. A Union of the railway employees made representations against this tax to the Municipality, but it did not succeed. The petitioner then filed the present special civil application, in which he has challenged the validity of the tax as well as of the notice issued to him by the Chief Officer calling upon him to pay the tax.

Mr. Ramamurthy on behalf of the petitioner has first urged that the Municipality was not competent to levy a tax on any employment in the nature of service, in which a person is employed to work for another. He has contended that the word "employments" should be construed ejusdem generis with the other words mentioned in entry 60 in List II in Schedule VII to the Constitution, professions, trades and callings and that it means "such employments which are akin to or in the nature of professions, trades and callings." We have carefully considered this argument, but we do not think that there is much merit in it. If entry 60 was intended to include every occupation other than service, it is difficult to see why the word "employments" was used at all. The words are used in an entry in the Constitution. Every word must, therefore, be deemed to have been used with some object and no word can be held to be redundant. The words "profession, trade and calling" are also general words, which according to the dictionary have wide meanings. "Profession" as defined in the Oxford English Dictionary means

"a business or profession that one publicly avows; the occupation which one professes to be skilled in and to follow; a vocation in which a professed knowledge of some department of learning or science is used in its application to the affairs of others or in the practice of art founded upon it; in a wider sense: any calling or occupation by which a person habitually earns his living."

"Trade" according to the same dictionary means

"the practice of some occupation, business, or profession habitually carried on, especially when practised as a means of livelihood or gain; a calling; now usually applied to mercantile occupation and to a skilled handicraft, as distinct from a profession, and especially restricted to a skilled handicraft as distinguished from a professional or mercantile occupation on the one hand, and from unskilled labour on the other."

"Calling" is defined in the same dictionary as meaning

"position, estate, or station in life; rank; ordinary occupation, means by which livelihood is earned; business, trade."

Any occupation by which livelihood is earned would, therefore, fall within the words "professions, trades and callings." Consequently, even if we were to accept the argument that the word "employments" must be construed ejusdem generis and that it draws its meaning from these words, it will be difficult to hold that service, in which a person is employed to work for another, would not be employment within the meaning of entry 60 in List II in Schedule VII to the Constitution.

In this connection I may refer to the decision of the Punjab High Court in Waliat Ram v. Rupal Municipality.¹ Section 61 of the Punjab Municipal Act empowered a municipal committee to levy a tax on persons practising any profession or art or carrying on any trade or calling in the municipal area. The section in terms did not empower a municipal committee to impose a tax on employments. The question which arose for consideration by the Punjab High Court was whether a person employed in private employment of a Bus Syndicate could be said to be carrying on a profession or calling and whether he was consequently liable to the tax imposed under s. 61 of the Act. It was argued that "employment" was not covered by the other three expressions used in the section, profession, trade or calling. This argument was negatived and it was held that as the words were used in an entry in the Constitution, they must be construed in their widest amplitude and that consequently the person employed by the Bus Syndicate must be held to have been carrying on a profession or calling. At page 672 it was observed:

"...It is very difficult to hold that the framers of the Constitution while using these words were using them as terms of art. The object of the entry is to enable the State Legislature to tax persons, who are carrying on any 'professions', 'trades', 'callings' and 'employments'... These four words do not seem to be used in a mutually exclusive sense. These words overlap one another and appear to have been used by way of abundant caution in order to make these provisions broadbased and comprehensive... the object of putting them all together is to ensure that no particular category of persons is being eliminated."

"Employment", according to the same Oxford English Dictionary means

"the service (of a person); a person's regular occupation or business; a trade or profession."

Another meaning of this word given in the Dictionary is "an official position in the public service."

In Webster's dictionary some of the meanings of the word "employment" given are:

"Activity in which one engages and employs his time and energies; work (as customary trade, craft, service or vocation) in which one's labour or services are paid for by an employer; the state of being employed."

Employment therefore is also a word of wide import and the object of including this word also in the relevant entry in the Constitution evidently was to bring within the scope of this entry every activity or occupation, in which a person engages in order to earn a livelihood, whether it be trade, business, profession or service. In any case the word "employments" would include service or occupation, in which a person works for another and in which there is a relationship of employer and employee. A tax on service, in which the petitioner is employed, could, therefore, be imposed under entry 60 referred to above.

The next ground of attack is that there has been excessive delegation by the State Legislature, inasmuch as while authorising the municipalities to levy this tax, the Legislature has not laid down any policy or rules of guidance which a municipality should follow in levying the tax. It has been argued that the power conferred on municipalities is not regulated or controlled in any manner, that it has been left to the municipalities to levy the tax at any rate they deem proper and that, consequently, s. 73 of the Act, in so far as it empowers a municipality to levy this tax, is unconstitutional. Entry 5 in List II of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution, in so far as it is relevant, reads:

"Local Government, that is to say, the constitution and powers of municipal corporations... for the purposes of local self-government..."

This entry is very wide in its terms and art. 246(3) of the Constitution read with this entry empowers a State Legislature to make laws in regard to any subject of local government, including the constitution and powers of municipalities. The powers which a State Legislature may confer on municipalities can only be those powers which it possesses. A law made by a State Legislature may, therefore, empower municipalities to levy one or more of the taxes specified in List II in the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution. Article 276 of the Constitution also contemplates that a tax on professions, trades, callings and employments may be levied by a municipality.

The rate at which this tax may be levied under s. 73 of the Municipal Boroughs Act has been left to each municipality to decide. Mr. Ramamurthy has, therefore, contended that cl. (xiv) in s. 73 of the Act is invalid. He has relied on Shanmugha Oil Mill v. Market Committee,² in which it has been held that the rate of tax is an essential part of a taxing provision and where power is vested in the executive to fix such rate as it pleases, the taxing provision would be invalid. Since, however, the power to levy taxes is conferred on a Municipality for carrying on the local government, it seems to us doubtful whether merely because the Legislature has left to each municipality to determine the rate at which it should levy the tax, it can be said that the Legislature has made excessive delegation of the powers vested in it. Moreover the power given to the Municipality to levy a tax on professions, trades callings and employments is not absolute or uncontrolled, as has been argued. The maximum rate at which the tax can be levied is determined by art. 276 of the Constitution and it cannot exceed Rs. 250 per annum. The tax can be levied only for purposes of the Act, that is, in order to enable the Municipality to discharge the obligations imposed upon it by the Act. It must, therefore, have some relation to the needs and requirements of the Municipality. The circumstances and conditions of municipalities vary. In fixing the rate of tax the capacity of those on whom the liability will fall to bear the burden has to be taken into consideration. A rate of tax which residents of a large and prosperous city may be able to bear may be too heavy for people residing in a small town. Every town and city is also growing and as the duties and responsibilities of a municipality increase the need for additional taxation will arise. It is probably on account of these and other similar considerations that it has been left to each municipality to decide the rate at which it should levy the tax. Since, however, the rate of tax is to be determined having regard to the resources required by a municipality for performing its statutory duties, it cannot be said that the power given to a municipality to fix the rate is entirely unfettered or uncontrolled.

In Hirabhai Ashabhai v. State of Bombay,³ the challenge was to s. 169 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, which empowers the Municipal Commissioner to charge for water according to measurement at such rate as shall from time to time be prescribed by the Standing Committee in this behalf. Whereas in the case of some other taxes such as the general tax and the halalkhor tax, the Act has specified the maximum rate at which the tax can be levied, no limit has been prescribed in regard to the water rate. It was, therefore, contended that s. 169 was invalid as "the Legislature had given no indication of its policy as to the ceiling of the rate which can be charged for the supply of water" and as "it was left entirely to the absolute and unfettered discretion" of the Corporation. This argument was not accepted, as it was held that the Legislature intended that there should be relationship between the rate charged and the cost of providing a water supply.

It may also be pointed out that before a municipality imposes any tax, it has to follow the procedure laid down in s. 75. It has to invite objections from the inhabitants of the Municipal Borough to the levy of the tax. It is required to take into consideration any objection which any inhabitant of the Municipal Borough may raise to the imposition of the tax or to the amount or rate proposed or to the classes of persons or property to be made liable there-to or to any exemptions proposed and unless it decides to abandon the proposed tax, it has to submit such objections with its opinion thereof and any modifications proposed in accordance therewith to the State Government. No tax can also be imposed without the sanction of the State Government. Limitations have, therefore, been placed on the powers of a municipality and it does not enjoy absolute powers in this behalf.

Mr. Ramamurthy has relied on the decision of a single Judge of the Calcutta High Court in Sarat Chandra v. Calcutta Corpn.,⁴ that s. 229 of the Calcutta Municipal Act, which empowers the Municipal Corporation to levy a license fee on certain classes of advertisements "at such rate and in such manner and subject to such exemptions as the Corporation may prescribe by rules with the approval of the State Government," was invalid. There was an appeal against this decision. The appeal was heard by a Division Bench of the High Court, see Calcutta Corporation v. Sarat Chandra.⁵ The two learned Judges who heard the appeal differed on the question whether the delegation made by s. 229 of the Calcutta Municipal Act was constitutionally permissible. Das Gupta C.J. held that the legislation in so far as it left the determination of the rate of the tax to the Corporation with the approval of the State Government was beyond the limits of permissible delegation and was invalid. Bachawat J. took a different view and held that the legislation was valid. At p. 714 Bachawat J. observed:

"The Calcutta Municipal Act...is a law with regard to Local Self Government. It provides for the municipal affairs of Calcutta including levy and collection of taxes by the Corporation of Calcutta...It empowers the Corporation of Calcutta to prescribe the rate of taxation by rules with the approval of the State Government. Subject to such approval the Corporation may fix such rate as it thinks fit. The object of the section is to increase the resources of the Corporation. The Legislature intended that the rate would be so fixed as would best serve that purpose. The Corporation is expected to impose such taxation as may be necessary or expedient for the fulfilment of the several duties imposed on it by the Act. The power of taxation is given for purposes of Local Self Government. Such a delegation is permissible in law."

With respect, we agree with these observations.

Any doubt on the question of the tax being ultra vires on the ground of excessive delegation by the State Legislature of its powers is removed by the decision of the Supreme Court in Western India Theatres v. M'pal Corp., Poona.⁶ In that case the Supreme Court had to consider the validity of cl. (xi) in sub-s. (1) of s. 59 of the Bombay District Municipal Act. This clause empowered a Municipality to levy any other tax, to the nature and object of which the approval of the Governor in Council shall have been obtained prior to the selection contemplated in sub-cl. (i) of cl. (a) of s. 60. The Supreme Court held that the delegation of power to impose the tax could not be struck down as being in excess of the permissible limits of delegation of legislative functions. The Supreme Court has given three reasons for arriving at this conclusion. The first is that the municipality could not impose any tax which the Provincial Legislature could not itself impose. Secondly, s. 59 authorised the Municipality to impose the taxes therein mentioned for the purposes of the Act and the Municipality could therefore levy taxes only for implementing those purposes and for no other purpose. The tax to be imposed must, therefore, have some reasonable relation to the duties cast on the Municipality by the Act. Thirdly, the taxing power of the Municipality was subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

For similar reasons, we must hold that the delegation of the power to the municipalities governed by the Bombay Municipal Boroughs Act to impose a tax on professions, trades, callings and employments, is not unconstitutional.

The last argument which has been advanced by Mr. Ramamurthy is that as the other municipalities in which railway employees work have not imposed a similar tax, there is unreasonable discrimination against the railway employees working at Bhusawal. This argument is without any substance. The tax is levied by the Bhusawal Municipality not only on persons employed in the railway, but also on all employed persons including persons employed in private service. Consequently, it cannot be said that the railway employees alone have been selected for the purpose of imposing the burden of tax upon them. Section 73 of the Municipal Boroughs Act specifies several taxes which every municipality is competent to impose. Each municipality has, therefore, to decide, having regard to the conditions prevailing in its municipal area and other circumstances, what taxes and at what rates it should impose. The mere fact that some other municipalities have not levied a similar tax will not, therefore, be a sufficient ground for holding that art. 14 of the Constitution has been contravened.

These are all the grounds on which the validity of the tax has been questioned. For the reasons which I have given, we see no substance in them. The application, therefore, fails. Rule discharged. No order as to costs.

Rule discharged.

AMBABAI JANHAVIBAI v. STATE OF MAHARASHTRA.*

Bombay Personal Inams Abolition Act (Bom. XLII of 1953), Secs. 5, 7, 10—Inamdar in possession of uncultivated lands on appointed date—Whether such lands will vest in State Government under s. 7.

Section 7 of the Bombay Personal Inams Abolition Act, 1952, does not apply to lands which on the appointed date were in actual possession of the inamdar even if they were uncultivated lands. Therefore, where it is shown that the lands, cultivated or uncultivated, were in possession of the inamdar on the appointed date, the inamdar would become the occupant of such lands under s. 5 of the Act and such lands will not vest in the State Government under s. 7 of the Act.

Section 7 of the Act deals with lands and other properties, which were not in the possession of any person on the appointed date, while s. 5 of the Act makes provision for lands, which on that date were in possession of the inamdar or some other person.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

Application No. 1267 of 1963 (with Special

G. N. Vaidya, for the petitioner.

M. A. Rane, Assistant Government Pleader, for opponent No. 1.

CHAINANI C. J. The petitioners were the Inamdars of two Inam villages Vinchur and Sayakhede in Niphad Taluka. The Inams were abolished by the Bombay Personal Inams Abolition Act, 1952. In each of the two villages the Inamdars were in actual possession of some Kuran lands. These lands were not sown or cultivated, but grass grew naturally in these lands. The Inamdars used to graze their cattle on these lands and they also used to sell the grass and realised income from it. As the lands were in possession of the petitioners, they were shown as the occupants of the lands. The Collector subsequently felt that they had wrongly been shown as occupants, as in his opinion the lands vested in Government under s. 7 of the Act. A mutation entry was, therefore, made deleting the names of the petitioners. This was objected to by the petitioners. An inquiry was then held under s. 37(2) of the Land Revenue Code in order to decide whether the lands vested in the Government under s. 7 of the Act. The Mamlatdar held that as the lands were uncultivated lands, they vested in Government. This order has been confirmed in appeal by the Deputy Collector and subsequently by the Additional Collector and also by the Revenue Tribunal.

Sub-section (2) of s. 5 of the Act is in the following terms:

(a) An inamdar in respect of the inam land in his actual possession or in possession of a person holding from him other than an inferior holder, referred to in clause (b) below, or

(b) an inferior holder holding inam land on payment of annual assessment only, shall primarily be liable to the State Government for the payment of land revenue due in respect of such land held by him and shall be entitled to all the rights and shall be liable to all obligations in respect of such land as an occupant under the Code or the rules made thereunder or any other law for the time being in force."

This sub-section applies to lands, which on the appointed date, that is, the date on which the Act came into force, were in the possession of the Inamdar or of a person holding from him other than an inferior holder or of an inferior holder. Such lands do not vest in the State Government, but are to be held by the Inamdar or the inferior holders as occupants under the Land Revenue Code. The sub-section does not make any exception in the case of uncultivated lands.

Section 7 of the Act provides:

"All public roads, lanes and paths, the bridges, ditches, dikes and fences, on or beside, the same, the bed of the sea and of harbours, creeks below high water mark and of rivers, streams, nallas, lakes, wells and tanks, and all canals, and water courses, and all standing and flowing water, all unbuilt village site lands, all waste lands and all uncultivated lands (excluding lands used for building or other non-agricultural purposes), which are situate within the limits of any inam village or inam land, shall, except in so far as any rights of any person, other than the inamdar may be established in or over the same and except as may otherwise be provided by any law for the time being in force, vest in and shall be deemed to be, with all rights in or over the same or appertaining thereto, the property of the State Government and all rights held by an inamdar in such property shall be deemed to have been extinguished..."

The explanation to this section states that for the purposes of this section, land shall be deemed to be uncultivated if it has not been cultivated for a continuous period of three years immediately before the appointed date. Under this section, all waste lands and all uncultivated lands, excluding lands used for building or other non-agricultural purposes and excluding rights which persons other than the inamdar had in such lands, vest in the State Government.

The question, which arises for determination, is whether the lands in dispute, in which grass grows naturally but which were in the possession of the petitioners on the appointed date, vest in the State Government as uncultivated lands under s. 7. Mr. Vaidya, the learned advocate for the petitioners, has contended that as the petitioners were making use of these lands and were realising income by selling the grass which grew thereon, the lands cannot be said to have been uncultivated. We would have found it difficult to accept this argument, since it is admitted that no agricultural operations were carried out on the lands for the purpose of raising or growing grass on the lands. It is, however, not necessary for us to decide this point in these applications, because even assuming that the lands were uncultivated lands, it seems to us that they would not vest in the State Government by reason of the provisions of s. 5.

Section 5 provides for all lands, which on the appointed date were in possession of the Inamdar or of some other person. The section does not make any exception in regard to uncultivated lands in the possession of the Inamdar. Under this section, the Inamdar would become the occupant of all the lands, cultivated and uncultivated, which were in his actual possession, on the appointed date. Section 7 is also in general terms and states that all uncultivated lands, except the rights of any person other than the Inamdar, shall vest in the State Government. There, therefore, appears to be a conflict between the two provisions. It is a well-settled rule of construction that different provisions of the Act must be read together, so as to bring about harmony between them. This can be done by holding that s. 7 applies to lands, which were not in the possession of any person on the appointed date. This is also suggested by the scheme of the Act. Apart from waste and uncultivated lands, the other properties mentioned in s. 7 are public roads, paths, lanes, rivers, canals, etc., which ordinarily are not in the possession of any particular person, but the use and benefit of which are taken by the public in general. Section 7, therefore, appears to deal with lands and other properties, which were not in the possession of any person on the appointed date, while s. 5 makes provision for lands which on that date were in possession of the Inamdar or some other person. It has been urged by Mr. Rane that s. 7 carves out an exception to what is provided in s. 5. This argument does not seem to be correct, because s. 7 refers to many other properties such as public roads, rivers and canals, to which s. 5 does not apply and which ordinarily are not in the possession of any particular person. It has been contended that the intention of the Legislature that such lands should vest in Government is also shown by the fact that in s. 10 it has made provisions for compensation for the abolition or extinguishment of rights in uncultivated lands. This circumstance is not of much assistance, because in many villages there are uncultivated lands, such as lands used for grazing of village cattle, which are not in the possession of any person, but which are set apart or reserved for the use of all the villagers. The Legislature may have considered it desirable to provide for compensation for the loss of the Inamdar's rights, if any, in such lands.

It seems to us that the question whether the Inamdar loses his rights to the lands, which were in his actual possession, but which were not cultivated, should be decided by reading together ss. 5 and 7 and so construing them as to bring about harmony between them, and if this is done, s. 7 will, in our opinion, not apply to lands, which on the appointed date were in actual possession of the Inamdar, even if they were uncultivated lands.

The evidence in these cases shows that the lands in dispute were in possession of the petitioners on the appointed date. Under s. 5 the petitioners, therefore, became the occupants of these lands and these lands do not vest in the State Government under s. 7.

We, therefore, set aside the orders made by the Mamlatdar, the Deputy Collector, the Additional Collector and the Revenue Tribunal.

The petitioners should get their costs from the respondents.

Orders set aside.

Bansilal were purchased out of the funds belonging to the joint family. According to the Court Receiver who was appointed Receiver in High Court Suit No. 224 of 1961 and who presented the petition for winding up, a large number of other shares of the Company were also purchased out of the funds belonging to the joint family and were taken in the names of Kishanlal Murlidhar Jayakrishna, Gangadas Gajanan and Sevaram Ranchhoddas as the 'Benamidars' for the joint family.

It appears that prior to March 8, 1956, the joint family of Narayanlal Bansilal owned a sugar farm at Harinagar in the State of Bihar. On March 8, 1956, by a registered conveyance made between Narayanlal Bansilal and his sons Balkrishna Narayanlal, Madhusudanlal Narayanlal and Madhavlal Narayanlal on the one hand and the Company on the other, the said sugarcane farm with all the crops, buildings, agricultural equipments, bridges, tools, pumping sets, live-stock, carts etc. was sold to the Company for rupees forty lakhs. Out of this price of rupees forty lakhs, it appears the Company had paid to the vendors (Narayanlal and his three sons) a sum of rupees ten lakhs on January 31, 1956, and it was agreed that the balance of rupees thirty lakhs should be paid by quarterly instalments of Rs. 2,50,000 each, the first of such quarterly instalment being payable on or before April 30, 1956, and subsequent instalments at the end of each subsequent quarter. The registered conveyance dated March 8, 1956, further provided that if the Company failed to pay the vendors any of the said instalments of Rs. 2,50,000 on the due date, the Company should pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum to the vendors on the amount of the unpaid instalment. It further appears that after the execution of the conveyance the Company paid to the vendors only two instalments of Rs. 2,50,000 each but failed to pay the remaining instalments aggregating to rupees twenty-five lakhs, and this is the debt which was claimed by the petitioner (the Court Receiver) under a statutory notice and upon neglect to pay the same a winding up petition was presented by the petitioner under following circumstances.

In or about July 1961 Madhusudanlal, one of the sons of Narayanlal, filed a partition suit on the Original Side of this Court being Suit No. 224 of 1961 against Narayanlal and others claiming certain share in the joint family properties and after filing the suit Madhusudanlal took out a Notice of Motion for appointment of Court Receiver as the Receiver of joint family properties. On October 20, 1961, the Court appointed the Court Receiver as the Receiver of all the joint family properties with all powers under O. XL, r. 1, cl. (d), of the Civil Procedure Code. After the Court Receiver thus came on the scene the Court Receiver issued the statutory notice on June 28, 1962, under s. 434 of the Indian Companies Act to the Company requiring the Company to make payment of rupees twenty-five lakhs with interest to the Additional Collector of Bombay and by that notice the Court Receiver further stated that if the said payment was not made within 21 days of the receipt of the notice, proceedings for winding up of the Company will be adopted without any further intimation. On July 17, 1962, the Company sent a reply to the Court Receiver raising several contentions. It was contended that a sum of rupees twenty-five lakhs and odd was not due to the joint family of Narayanlal Bansilal but as per the Company's balance-sheet the said amount was due and payable to Narayanlal Bansilal and his three sons who were the vendors under the conveyance dated March 8, 1956. It was further contended that the instalments due under the registered conveyance could not be paid by the Company on account of a notice of attachment dated July 24, 1956, that had been issued and served upon the Company by the Additional Income-tax Officer, Section V, Central Bombay under s. 46(5A) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922. The Company further contended that in any event the claim for rupees twenty-five lakhs had become barred by the law of limitation. In view of these contentions the Company pointed out that there was no question of payment of the said amount of rupees twenty-five lakhs to the Additional Collector of Bombay as required by the Court Receiver and the Company further informed the Court Receiver that in spite of these facts being brought to his notice if any steps for winding up of the Company were taken, the Company would hold the Court Receiver personally responsible for any loss or damage that may be suffered by the Company on account of such steps being taken. Since the statutory notice that was issued by the Court Receiver on June 28, 1962, was not complied with by the Company, the Court Receiver presented a winding up petition, being Company Petition No. 4 of 1964, on January 10, 1964. After the petition was accepted, notice was issued to the Company and the Company put in affidavit in reply showing cause against the petition. After hearing the parties, the learned Judge by his order dated September 22, 1964, admitted the petition and directed that advertisements be given in newspapers mentioned in his order and in the Gazette. It is against this judgment and order that has been passed by the learned Judge that the present appeal has been preferred by the Company before us.

In this appeal Mr. Banaji on behalf of the appellant-Company has urged two or three technical contentions. In the first place he contended that the Court Receiver who had presented the petition for winding up had no power to present the same under O. XL, r. 1, of the Civil Procedure Code under which he was appointed by this Court in the partition Suit No. 224 of 1961; secondly, he urged that the Court Receiver was not a creditor of the Company within the meaning of s. 434 of the Indian Companies Act and, therefore, was not entitled to file the petition. He further contended that the statutory notice which had been issued by the Court Receiver on June 28, 1962, was invalid and not in accordance with the provisions of s. 434 of the Companies Act. Lastly, he contended that because of the prohibitory order and the notice of attachment that had been issued by the Additional Income-tax Officer under the provisions of s. 46(5A) of the Indian Income-tax Act, the Company could not pay the amount and could not comply with the requisitions contained in the Court Receiver's notice dated June 28, 1962, and therefore it could not be said that there was any neglect on the part of the Company to make payment. Apart from these technical contentions, Mr. Banaji also urged two points on merits. According to him, on the facts and circumstances of the case the petition had been preferred by the Court Receiver at the instance of the sons of Narayanlal out of ulterior motives and it had been filed mala fide. Mr. Banaji further urged that the Company was perfectly solvent and therefore the petition ought not to have been admitted and the directions with regard to the advertisements etc. ought not to have been given by the learned Judge. We shall deal with all these points one after the other presently.

In support of his contention that the Court Receiver had no power to present a winding up petition in this case, Mr. Banaji relied upon the provisions of O. XL, r. 1, cl(d) of the Civil Procedure Code and also on the order that had been made by this Court while appointing Court Receiver as the Receiver of the joint family properties. The relevant provisions of O. XL, r. 1, run as follows:

"1. (1) Where it appears to the Court to be just and convenient, the Court may by order—

(a) appoint a receiver of any property, whether before or after decree;

(c) ...; and

(d) confer upon the receiver all such powers as to bringing and defending suits and for the realization, management, protection, preservation and improvement of the property, the collection of the rents and profits thereof, the application and disposal of such rents and profits, and the execution of documents as the owner himself has, or such of those powers as the Court thinks fit."

In this case the order appointing Court Receiver as ad interim Receiver of the property was passed on August 28, 1961, in the partition suit filed by Madhu-sudanlal against Narayanlal and others being Suit No. 224 of 1961 and the said appointment was confirmed by an order dated October 20, 1961. The operative part of the order dated October 20, 1961, runs as follows:

"And it is further ordered that the Court Receiver be and he is hereby appointed Receiver of the properties belonging to the joint family in suit and all the books of accounts papers and vouchers with all necessary powers under Order XL Rule 1 of the Code of Civil Procedure including power to vote and/or exercise all the property rights in respect of the shares belonging to the joint family in the several joint stock companies mentioned in the plaint including power to file suit..."

Relying upon the aforesaid provisions Mr. Banaji in the first place urged before us that the Court Receiver in this case had been specifically clothed with the power to file a suit but in terms he had not been clothed with the power to present a winding up petition. However, it must be observed that apart from the power to file a suit which has been specifically referred to in the order dated October 20, 1961, the said order in terms confers upon the Court Receiver "all powers under O. XL r. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure". In other words it is clear that all powers under O. XL, r. 1, cl. (d), of the Code of Civil Procedure have been conferred upon the Court Receiver in this case and it is clear that under cl. (d) of sub-r. (1) such powers include not only a power to bring and defend suits but powers "for the realisation, management, protection, preservation and improvement of the property". An attempt was made by Mr. Banaji to suggest that when a specific power to file a suit was conferred upon a Court Receiver, that power merely empowered the Court Receiver to commence all proceedings by filing of a plaint and since a winding up petition was not a proceeding which is commenced by filing of a plaint, the Court Receiver could not present a winding-up petition. In this behalf he relied upon some observations of this Court in the case of Indrajitsinghji v. Rajendrasinghji.¹ In our view, it is really unnecessary to consider this argument of Mr. Banaji for the simple reason that cl. (d) of sub-r. (1) of O. XL, r. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure not only deals with powers which could be conferred upon the Court Receiver for the purpose of filing a suit but with all powers for the purposes of realisation, management, protection, preservation and improvement of the property. In this case under the order dated October 20, 1961, the Court Receiver was clothed not only with a power to file a suit but with all necessary powers for realisation, management, protection and preservation of the property under cl. (d) mentioned above. The only question that need, therefore, be considered is as to whether a proceeding which is initiated by filing a winding-up petition is a proceeding "for the realisation, management, protection and preservation of the property" or not. Mr. Banaji urged that ordinarily a winding-up petition is not the normal mode of realising a debt due to a creditor and that a suit would be the proper remedy for realisation of such a debt by a creditor. According to Mr. Banaji, a winding-up petition is a process by which the Court achieves the object of equitable distribution of debtor's property. In support of his contention Mr. Banaji referred us to the case of *Bukhtiarpur Bihar Light Rly. Co. Ltd v. Union of India*² and the relevant observations on which reliance was placed by him appear at p. 517 which run as follows:

"A winding up order may be a form of equitable execution, but there is no equity in making such an order when" the debt of the creditor is not in peril, although the substratum of the company may be gone, and when matters remain outstanding which can be best attended to in the interests of the shareholders by the company functioning as a company through its directors. A winding up order is not a normal alternative in the case of a company to the ordinary procedure for the realisation of the debts due from it."

Relying upon the above observations Mr. Banaji urged before us that the main object of a winding up proceeding is to ensure the equitable distribution of the debtor's property. On the other hand Mr. Parpia on behalf of the petitioner relied upon the following passage which occurs in Palmer's Company Precedents, Part II, 1960 edn., at p. 25. The passage runs as follows:

"A winding-up petition is a perfectly proper remedy for enforcing payment of a just debt. It is the mode of execution which the court gives to a creditor against a company unable to pay its debts."

It appears clear that this passage is based upon three decided cases in Bowes v. The Hope &c. Society,³ *In re General Company for the Promotion of Land Credit*⁴ and In re National Permanent Benefit Building Society: Ex parte Williamson.⁵

In our view, in this case we are not called upon to decide the question as to whether a proceeding which is commenced by filing a winding-up petition is a normal or proper mode of realization of a debt or not. What we are really concerned with is as to whether such a proceeding is a proceeding "for realization of the property". It is true as has been pointed out by Mr. Banaji that the main or dominant object of a winding-up petition is to ensure the equitable distribution of the property of the debtor; but it cannot be forgotten that before there could be any equitable distribution of the property of the debtor amongst his creditors, his property must be first got in i.e. realised and it cannot be disputed that the property of the debtor is realised by filing a winding-up petition. It is no doubt true that the dominant object of a suit is to realise a particular debt, while that of a winding-up petition is the equitable distribution of the debtor's property amongst his creditors but, as we have said above, such equitable distribution must of necessity be preceded by the getting in of all such debtor's property and realisation of all such property. It cannot be disputed that a necessary consequence of filing a winding-up petition is the realisation of all the property of a debtor and thereafter the process of equitable distribution thereof commences. In this view of the matter it is clear that a proceeding which is commenced by filing a winding-up petition is a proceeding for realization of the property and therefore when the Court Receiver was clothed with all the powers under O. XL, r. 1(1)(d) of the Code of Civil Procedure, it must be held that he was clothed with the power to file a winding-up petition for the purpose of realizing the property the benefit of which would enure to all the creditors of the Company. We are, therefore, unable to accept Mr. Banaji's contention that the Court Receiver in the present case had no power to present a winding-up petition.

The next contention of Mr. Banaji is that the Court Receiver cannot be regarded as a creditor of the Company within the meaning of ss. 434 and 439 of the Indian Companies Act, and as such the Court Receiver who was after all an officer appointed by the Court in the partition suit could not by serving a statutory notice on the Company demanding payment of the debt file the winding-up petition. In this behalf Mr. Banaji relied upon a decision of an English Court in *In re Sacker: Ex parte Sacker*⁶ where it was held by the Court of Appeal that a receiver was not a 'creditor' entitled to present a bankruptcy petition against the debtor within the meaning of s. 6 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. In that case, in an action in Chancery Division, a receiver was appointed to collect, get in, and receive the goods comprised in its charge given to the plaintiffs by one of the defendants, including therein any balance of the proceeds of the goods so charged in the hands of the other defendants. An order was subsequently made for the payment by the last mentioned defendant to the receiver of a specific sum being the money received by him in respect of the proceeds of the goods and comprised in the charge. It appears that the receiver was not paid that amount, and the receiver presented a bankruptcy petition against the defendant who was ordered to pay. It was held that the receiver was not a creditor entitled to present a bankruptcy petition. Lord Esher M.R. after pointing out that the position of a receiver was not that of a trustee and that there was no debt due to him from the particular defendant went on to observe as follows (p. 183):

"...The petitioner is a receiver. He is not a trustee. There is no debt due to him from the appellant. He could not sue for this sum of money in his own name either at law or in equity. Even if he could by the authority of the Court sue for it in his own name, is the money due to him personally either at law or in equity? At law it is certainly not. The debt was due to another person for whom he is not a trustee. The money will not be his when he has got it. Would it be his in equity? I apprehend that he would hold it subject to the authority of the Court, who would deal with it according to the circumstances of the case, but certainly not for his benefit."

"...As a general rule, a receiver cannot maintain an action to compel obedience to an order for the delivery of goods or the payment of money to him by a party to the action. There may, no doubt, be exceptional cases in which a receiver can bring an action in his own name—when, for instance, he is the holder of a bill of exchange. In that case he can maintain an action, not because he is a receiver, but because he is the holder of the bill."

It would thus appear that according to the above decision under English law a receiver cannot maintain an action in his own name except in special cases. We may point out that the decision in Re Sacker came to be considered by the English Court in a later decision and the general observations made by Lord Esher have been dissented from and have been regarded as being obiter and that later decision is Macoun, In re.⁷ In this later case the Court of Appeal held that the Receiver who had obtained an assignment of the judgment debt over the creditor could present a bankruptcy petition and it was further held that the decision in Re Sacker only decided that the receiver who cannot sue in his own name cannot be a good petitioning creditor. The relevant observations of Vaughan Williams L.J. appear at p. 702 and they run as follows:

"I think those words (referring to the observations of Lord Esher in In Re Sacker) go very far to cover the proposition for which Mr. Hansell contended; but it was not really necessary for the case which was before the Court of Appeal that this question should have been determined—that is, the question whether a receiver having a title to sue at law could be a good petitioning creditor. It is plain from the judgments, I think, of each of the Lords Justices that in that case the position of things was such that it was perfectly impossible for the receiver to bring an action to recover the debt either at law or in equity; and therefore I think we must treat these observations of Lord Esher as obiter, and one can only look at the case as having decided that a receiver who could not sue could not be by himself a good petitioning creditor. Looking at the judgment of Fry L.J., I observe that he begins by saying that in that case the receiver could not have maintained an action either at law or in equity, and later on he deals with exceptional cases in which a receiver could maintain such an action. One of the cases which he gives is where the receiver is the holder of a bill of exchange, and the other is where he is in possession of chattels, and the chattels are wrongfully detained from him. In these circumstances it seems to me that we ought not to hold the case of In re Sacker to be an authority for the proposition that a receiver cannot be a good petitioning creditor even though the state of things is such that he could maintain an action at law... In the present case the receiver happens to be the assignee of a judgment, and I think that being the assignee of a judgment he can be a good petitioning creditor even though when the money is recovered it is recovered for the purpose of enabling the Court of Chancery to deal with it."

The position that emerges from a consideration of the above two cases is that under English law if a receiver could maintain an action at law in his own name, he could be a good petitioning creditor and could present a bankruptcy petition.

In our view, the position in India is more clear and unambiguous. Order XI of the Civil Procedure Code deals with appointment of receivers and under

r. 1 a receiver could be empowered to bring and defend actions and for the realization, management, protection, preservation and improvement of the property. It is well settled that once a receiver is appointed by a Court under O. XL, r. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure with all the powers mentioned in cl. (d) of sub-r. (1), the property in respect whereof such a receiver is appointed is in the custodia legis and no party to the litigation except the receiver is entitled to deal with the property of which he is appointed a receiver. It is also well-settled that such a receiver appointed by the Court is entitled to file a suit in his own name. If necessary we may refer to the decision of the Supreme Court reported in K. V. Mallayya v. T. Ramaswami & Co.,⁸ where their Lordships of the Supreme Court have pointed out that "a receiver authorised to collect the debts" is empowered to institute suit therefor and a suit instituted by the Receiver in his own name is perfectly competent. A decision of our Court reported in *Achut v. Shivajirao*⁹ has also taken the same view. Though it is true that the property in respect whereof a receiver is appointed does not vest in the receiver, at the same time it is clear that the receiver so appointed is entitled to maintain action in his own name. In this view of the matter it is clear that though the debt in respect whereof a statutory notice was issued by the Court Receiver was really due to the members of the joint family, the Court Receiver who had been appointed in a partition suit and had assumed management and administration of the entire joint family properties for the benefit of such parties who may ultimately be found entitled thereto, would be a good petitioning creditor for the purpose of filing a winding-up petition since in our view it is clear on authorities that such a receiver is entitled to maintain an action in his own name. Reading the provisions of ss. 434 and 439 of the Companies Act along with the provisions of O. XL, r. 1 of the Civil Procedure Code we are of the opinion that the Court Receiver would be a creditor of the Company and as such was entitled to present the winding-up petition.

The next contention of Mr. Banaji is with regard to the statutory notice that was issued by the Court Receiver under s. 434 of the Indian Companies Act. In this behalf a two-fold contention was urged by Mr. Banaji before us. In the first place he contended that the statutory notice, which was a formal document, as well as the provisions of s. 434 should be strictly construed and so construed the notice in question would appear to be not in conformity with the said provisions. It may be stated that by his said notice dated June 28, 1962, addressed to the Company the Court Receiver pointed out that in the Company's balance sheet for the year ending September 30, 1961, a sum of Rupees twenty-five lakhs and odd was shown as due and payable by the Company to the joint family of Narayanlal Bansilal being the balance of the purchase price of the sugar farm belonging to the joint family purchased by the Company under the registered conveyance dated March 8, 1956, and that since he was appointed a Receiver of the joint family properties in High Court Suit No. 224 of 1961 he was issuing that notice to the Company. By that notice the Court Receiver called upon the Company "to make immediate payment of the said sum of Rs. 25,00,000/- and interest payable thereon at 5% per annum in the manner above mentioned and to give you notice as I hereby do, that if you will fail to pay the amount to the Additional Collector of Bombay, by whom the debt is attached within 21 days from the receipt of this letter by you. I will, without any further intimation to you, take proceedings for the winding up of the Company."

Incidentally it may be stated that a large amount by way of income-tax arrears and penalty to the tune of rupees thirty-five lakhs and odd was due and payable by Narayanlal Bansilal to income-tax authorities and in respect of the said dues the Additional Income-tax Officer, Section V, Central Bombay, had served a notice dated July 24, 1956, on the Company under s. 46(5A) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, whereby the Additional Income-tax Officer had called upon the Company to pay to him whatever amount was due from the Company to him or was held by the Company on account of Narayanlal Bansilal in liquidation of the said income-tax dues. The Additional Income-tax Officer had pointed out to the Company that any payment that would be made by the Company to him in pursuance of his notice would in law amount to a good and sufficient discharge of the Company's liability to Narayanlal Bansilal and the officer had further pointed out to the Company that if after service of his notice the Company made any payment to Narayanlal Bansilal, the Company would be held personally liable to the income-tax authorities to the extent to which such payment would be made by the Company to Narayanlal Bansilal. In other words, under the relevant provisions of the Income-tax Act the Income-tax authorities had served a prohibitory order and had in effect attached the debt of rupees twenty-five lakhs and odd in the hands of the Company. It was in these circumstances that the Court Receiver in his statutory notice under s. 434 of the Companies Act had called upon the Company to make payment of rupees twenty-five lakhs and odd to the Additional Collector of Bombay, by whom the debt had been attached, within the prescribed period of 21 days.

With regard to the above notice which was issued by the Court Receiver under s. 434 of the Indian Companies Act, Mr. Banaji's first contention was that the Court Receiver had not called upon the Company to make payment of the debt to himself and that was not in compliance with the provisions of s. 434 of the Companies Act. Mr. Banaji drew our attention to the provisions of s. 434(1)(a) of the Companies Act whereunder a creditor to whom a Company is indebted in a sum exceeding Rs. 500 can serve on the Company a notice calling upon the Company either to make payment of the sum so due or to secure or compound for it to the reasonable satisfaction of the creditor. What was urged by Mr. Banaji was that by the present notice the Court Receiver left no scope to the Company to secure or compound the debt to the reasonable satisfaction of himself by calling upon the Company to make payment of the amount due directly to the Additional Collector of Bombay. Mr. Banaji, therefore, urged that the notice that was issued by the Court Receiver was invalid and not in accordance with the provisions of s. 434 of the Act. We are unable to accept this contention of Mr. Banaji for the simple reason that the section nowhere requires that by such notice the creditor should make a demand upon the debtor to make payment of the debt to himself. It is perfectly competent for the creditor to direct his debtor to make payment to a third party under such notice. Further, we fail to appreciate as to how by issuing a notice in question the Court Receiver put it beyond the reach of the Company to secure or compound for the debt to the satisfaction of the Court Receiver. On receipt of such notice from the Court Receiver, it would have been perfectly open to the Company to secure or compound for the debt to the reasonable satisfaction of the Court Receiver if the Company were so minded to do so. On the other hand, what we find is that the Company by its reply dated July 17, 1962, raised various disputes with regard to their liability of the said debt by contending that debt was not due to the joint family of Narayanlal and others but that it was due and payable to the four individuals from whom the Company had purchased a sugarcane farm. Significantly enough, we may point out that this difficulty which is now being put before us by Mr. Banaji has not even been referred to by the Company in its reply dated July 17, 1962. It has nowhere been stated by the Company in its reply that because of the manner in which the notice has been given, the Company had been deprived of its right to secure or compound for the debt to the reasonable satisfaction of the Court Receiver. It is clear on the facts of the case that under the conveyance a sum of rupees twenty-five lakhs and odd was payable by the Company to Narayanlal Bansilal and his sons. There is no dispute that the income-tax dues amounting to more than thirty-five lakhs of rupees were due and payable by Narayanlal Bansilal to the Income-tax authorities and in that behalf the debt in the hand of the Company had been attached by the Additional Income-tax Officer. This fact is even referred to by the Court Receiver in his statutory notice. After referring to these facts the Company has been called upon by the Court Receiver to make payment of the debt due to the Additional Collector of Bombay obviously for the purpose of liquidating the income-tax dues. In these circumstances it is difficult to accept Mr. Banaji's contention that the notice that has been issued by the Court Receiver is defective or is not in accordance with the provisions of s. 434 of the Indian Companies Act.

Mr. Banaji then contended that there was a bona fide dispute regarding this liability of rupees twenty-five lakhs and odd, for according to the Company the amount of rupees twenty-five lakhs which was payable by the Company under the registered conveyance dated March 8, 1956, was not a debt due and payable to the joint family of Narayanlal Bansilal and his sons but it was a debt due to the four individuals mentioned in the conveyance and, therefore, the Court Receiver was not entitled to serve a statutory notice upon the Company and make a demand for payment of that debt on behalf of the joint family. In this behalf it would be pertinent to note that in the partition suit it was admitted by Narayanlal Bansilal in para. 14 of his affidavit filed to show cause against a Notice of Motion for the appointment of Receiver that the balance of purchase price was payable under the conveyance dated March 8, 1956, to the joint family in respect of Harinagar Sugarcane farm. In the said paragraph Narayanlal Bansilal inter alia stated as follows:

"Referring to para. 10(c) of the affidavit I deny there is any manipulation in the Balance Sheet of Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd. as falsely sought to be suggested by the 3rd defendant. No loan of Rs. 25,00,000/- has been given by me to the said company. The said amount is the balance of the purchase price payable by the said company to the joint family in respect of Harinagar Cane Farm."

It is true, as has been pointed out by Mr. Banaji, that this admission which has been made by Narayanlal Bansilal would not be binding on the Company since a Company is a different entity from Narayanlal Bansilal. But when we are considering the question on merits as to whom the amount was really due it does appear to us that the affidavit filed by Narayanlal Bansilal and the statements made by him in that affidavit would be relevant and could be taken into consideration by us. It cannot be forgotten that Narayanlal Bansilal was a Chairman of the Board of Directors of Harinagar Sugar Mills Ltd., and was also the Karta and manager of joint Hindu family consisting of himself, his sons and daughters. In view of this dual position which Narayanlal Bansilal occupied at the material time, the admission made by Narayanlal Bansilal in his affidavit which we have quoted above would clearly go to show that the amount of Rs. 25,00,000 being the balance of purchase price was payable by the Company to the joint family of Narayanlal Bansilal and his sons and this admission of Narayanlal would go a long way to indicate that the dispute raised by the Company in its reply in that behalf was not bona fide. On the other hand the contention raised by the Company to say the least was frivolous.

Mr. Banaji then urged that because of the prohibitory order and the attachment that had been levied by the Additional Income-tax Officer on the debt claimed by the Court Receiver in his statutory notice, the Company was unable to comply with the Court Receiver's notice and, therefore, it could not be said that mere non-payment on the part of the Company would amount to a neglect to make payment. In this behalf ss. 439, 433 and 434 of the Indian Companies Act would be material. Section 439 categorises persons who can make an application for winding up of a Company and under that section inter alia an application for winding-up of a Company can be presented by any creditor or creditors including any contingent or prospective creditor or creditors. Section 433 provides for circumstances in which a Company may be wound up and under cl. (e) it could be wound up if it is unable to pay its debts. Section 434 provides that under certain circumstances a Company shall be deemed unable to pay its debts. Court Receiver in this case claiming to be a creditor of the Company presented this petition to the Court for winding-up of the Company and before he presented the petition the Court Receiver had issued and served a statutory notice upon the Company under s. 434 of the Companies Act whereunder a presumption has been raised as regards the Company's inability to pay its debt under certain circumstances. Under s. 434(1) (a) it has been provided that a Company shall be deemed to be unable to pay its debts if a creditor, by assignment or otherwise, to whom the company is indebted in a sum exceeding five hundred rupees then due, has served on the company, by causing it to be delivered at its registered office, by registered post or otherwise, a demand under his hand requiring the company to pay the sum so due and the company has for three weeks thereafter neglected to pay the sum, or to secure or compound for it to the reasonable satisfaction of the creditor. In other words if the conditions which have been laid down in cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) of s. 434 are complied with, the presumption arises that a Company is unable to pay its debt. In order that such a presumption should arise, it is necessary that there must be a creditor to whom the Company is owing a sum exceeding Rs. 500; secondly such a creditor must serve a notice upon the Company by delivering the same at its registered office making a demand for the sum so due and lastly if the Company has neglected to pay the said sum within three weeks of such service of the notice upon it, then the Company would be deemed to be unable to pay its debt. What was urged by Mr. Banaji was that in the present case because the debt had been attached by the Income-tax authorities and a prohibitory order had been issued on the Company, the Company did not make any payment and therefore the presumption with regard to the inability on the part of the Company to pay its debt would not arise because there was no neglect on the part of the Company to make payment of the sum due.

In this behalf Mr. Banaji referred us to a decision of the English Court in In re European Banking Co.: Ex parte Baylis.¹⁰ In that case several petitions had been presented for winding-up of a Company and when all the other petitions had been dismissed the question was as to whether the petition which had been presented by a creditor who had only to recover £ 65 from the Banking Company should have been accepted and winding-up order be made on the petition. The petitioning creditor was a creditor of a banking company for only £ 65 and the debt had been attached in Lord Mayor's Court and the question arose as to whether the petition on behalf of such a creditor whose debt had been attached in Lord Mayor's Court should be accepted or dismissed and the Court dismissed the same. Mr. Banaji relied upon the observations of Sir R. T. Kindersley, V. C., which run as follows (p. 522):

"...The question then is, whether, if there were no other Petition than this of Mr. Baylis, an order for winding-up the company ought to be made thereon. Though Mr. Baylis appears as a creditor in the books of the company for £65 (a very inconsiderable sum), the fact is, that before the Petition was presented, an action had been brought against him by one of his creditors in the Lord Mayor's Court, under which this debt, which was assumed to be due to him from the European Bank, was attached. It is true that does not absolutely do away with the debt, and he still remains legally a creditor of the bank. But the attachment is more efficacious than a mere stop order, for it seizes the debt into the hands of the Lord Mayor's Court. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that if this had been the only Petition, the Court would not have made an order upon it to wind up the company, on the ground that the interest of the Petitioner as a creditor is so uncertain in its character, that the Court ought not, upon the ground of that interest, to impose upon the shareholders of the company so great a burden as a winding-up order. Dealing with the Petition as if it had been the only one presented, I shall dismiss it with costs."

facts which obtained in the case decided in In re European Banking Co. In the first place, from the facts which have been recited in the report it appears that the Court considered the amount due by the banking company to the creditor as a very inconsiderable amount; secondly, the fact that the petitioner's debt had been attached in Lord Mayor's Court was undoubtedly taken in consideration as a result of which it was stated that the attachment had the effect of seizing debt into the hands of Lord Mayor's Court. In those circumstances it was held that the interest of the petitioner as a creditor was very uncertain in its character and, therefore, the petition for winding-up should have been dismissed. In the present case the facts are entirely different. The amount claimed by the Court Receiver on behalf of the joint family is not an insignificant amount. Incidentally it may be stated that the petitioner in his petition had referred to several other debts which the Company owed to other creditors apart from this debt of Rs. 25,00,000 which was payable to the joint family of Narayanlal Bansilal and his sons. Further the most important distinguishing feature, in our view, is that in this case by the statutory notice issued under s. 434 the Court Receiver had in fact called upon the Company to make payment to the Income-tax authorities for the purpose of liquidating the income-tax dues for non-payment of which the debt had been attached. If by the statutory notice the Court Receiver had called upon the Company to make payment of the dues to himself in spite of the attachment that had been levied by the income-tax authorities on that debt, the Company would in that case have been unable to comply with such a requisition because of the attachment levied on that debt. But here the Court Receiver expressly asked the Company to make payment of the debt due to the Additional Collector of Bombay for the purpose of liquidating the income-tax dues for the non-payment of which the attachment had been levied. In these circumstances it is difficult to accept Mr. Banaji's contention that because of the subsisting attachment on the debt at the instance of the income-tax authorities, the Company was unable to comply with the requisitions contained in the statutory notice issued by the Court Receiver. On the other hand, a direct compliance of the statutory notice would have resulted in the payment of the income-tax dues and the attachment obviously would have fallen to the ground. As we have pointed out earlier, without putting forth any such difficulty the Company in its reply raised all sorts of contentions against the liability to pay the amount. In these circumstances it is not possible for us to accept Mr. Banaji's contention that there was no neglect on the part of the Company to make payment as is contemplated by the provisions of s. 434 of the Indian Companies Act.

In our view, the learned trial Judge was right in coming to the conclusion that none of the technical points that had been urged before him on behalf of the Company had any substance.

On merits Mr. Banaji contended before us that the petitioner had not been presented by the Court Receiver bona fide but the proceedings were instituted at the instance of Madhusudanlal and other sons of Narayanlal with ulterior motives of causing harm to the Company and the shareholders. In this behalf Mr. Banaji drew our attention to the several passages in the affidavits that had been filed before the learned trial Judge to show that there were disputes between Narayanlal Bansilal on the one hand and his sons on the other and that the sons were trying to get elected as Directors of the Company and because the sons failed in their attempt to get power, they had instructed the Court Receiver to apply and obtain directions from the Court to wind-up the Company and thereafter the present petition was filed by the Court Receiver. In other words, according to Mr. Banaji the main object with which the petition had been filed was to cause harm to the interest of the Company and its shareholders because the sons had failed to secure a controlling interest or power in the management of the Company. On the facts of the case we do find that there were disputes between the father on the one hand and the sons on the other and the other nominees of the father, but it is also clear that the father apart from preventing the sons from getting any hand in the management of the Company is also trying to fight his personal disputes with his sons and is taking shelter under both his dual capacity, one as a Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Company and the other as a karta and manager of the joint Hindu family as and when the occasion arises. In this behalf it is an admitted position that several litigations are pending between the father on the one hand and the sons on the other and several suits have also been filed by the Court Receiver against the so called benamidars of the father in respect of shareholdings in the Company. But quite apart from this position, there could be no dispute that the Company has failed and neglected to pay the debt that was claimed by the Receiver under a statutory notice during the prescribed period of 21 days and, therefore, a right undoubtedly accrued to the Court Receiver as a creditor to file a winding-up petition against the Company. Even apart from this debt, in the winding-up petition the Court Receiver has referred to several other debts which are due and payable by the Company to the third parties. For instance, there is a reference to a debt to the tune of Rs. 8,00,000 owed by the Company to the Bank of India in respect whereof the Bank of India had obtained a decree against the Company and amongst several grounds that have been put forward by the Court Receiver in his winding-up petition there are principally two on which the petition was pressed, first that the Company was unable to pay its debts and, secondly, it was just and equitable that the Company should be wound up. In this regard it would be useful to refer to the observations of Chief Justice Chagla in Bachharaj Factories Ltd. v. Hirjee Mills Ltd.,¹¹ where the learned Chief Justice has pointed out that once a party had put proper materials before the Court making out a prima facie case for winding-up, considerations about the motive with which the petition was presented would be irrelevant. The relevant observations appear at p. 392 of the report which run as follows:

"...We have not permitted Mr. Mathalone to go into the merits of these allegations about the mala fides of the petitioners because in our opinion these allegations are entirely irrelevant. If the petitioners have made out a case for the winding up of the company, if they have placed materials before the Court which satisfy the Court that the company is insolvent, if they have placed materials before the Court which satisfy the Court that the substratum of the company is gone, it is difficult to understand what the motive of the petitioners has got to do with the question whether an order of winding up should be made or not."

It is true that in that case the petitioners had placed sufficient materials before the Court to show that the substratum of the company had gone and it was not possible for the company to carry on its business without difficulty. In the present case we may point out that apart from the several debts that are owed by the Company to several creditors which have not yet been satisfied by the Company, a suggestion was made by us to Mr. Banaji that if the Company were able to pay Rs. 25,00,000 in cash or secure the same by way of any guarantee through any Bank or Insurance Company, the winding-up petition may not be proceeded further, and Mr. Banaji had taken time to consider that suggestion and even after adjourning the matter once or twice, nothing has been done by the Company in that behalf to secure the amount of Rs. 25 lakhs and odd to the Income-tax authorities to the satisfaction of those authorities. In these circumstances we do not feel that there is any substance in the contention urged by Mr. Banaji that the petition is actuated by mala fides and, therefore the same ought not have been admitted by the learned trial Judge.

In the result, the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Having regard to the fact that the Inspector to look into the affairs of the Company was appointed somewhere about 1955 and all attempts of investigation had been defeated by one method or the other, we do not think that the advertisements can be stayed any longer. We direct that the advertisements shall be published on Wednesday December 16 and the petition to be heard on January 11, 1965. The Court Receiver to be at liberty to withdraw the amount of Rs. 500 deposited by the Company towards his costs.

Appeal dismissed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Gokhale.

I. R. HINGORANI v. PRAVINCHANDRA KANTILAL SHAH.*

Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act (Mah. XXIV of 1961), Secs. 91, 93, 2(16)—Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Rules, 1961. Rule 75—Bombay Co-operative Societies Act (Bom. VIII of 1925), Sec. 54—Friendly Societies Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 25), Sec. 68—Practice—Dispute when referred to Registrar under s. 91—"Claiming through a member", meaning of words—Dispute relating to accommodation provided by society between member and person to whom member has given such accommodation—Whether such dispute touching business of society—Dispute between such parties relating to rent or compensation or for mesne profits and jurisdiction of Registrar or nominee.

The correct practice when a dispute is referred to the Registrar under s. 91 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, is for the Registrar to issue notices to both the parties and give them an opportunity of being heard on the question whether a dispute exists. It is only after the Registrar has heard the parties or given them an opportunity of being heard that he can decide or satisfy himself whether a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 of the Act exists. It is his decision so arrived at which will be final under s. 91(2) of the Act.

The question whether a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 of the Act exists so as to enable the Registrar or his Nominee to entertain a reference in respect of such dispute must be decided by reference to the averments made in the application for reference made under rule 75 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Rules, 1961.

The words "claiming through a member" in s. 91(1)(b) of the Act mean deriving such title or rights through a member as the member possessed or had acquired by reason of his being a member or in his capacity as a member.

Shyam Co-operative Society v. Ramibai,¹ Malvan Co-op. Bank v. Kamalakar,² Krishna Ayyar v. Urban Bank Ltd., Calicut,³ Narayana Ayyar v. Co-op. Urban Bank Ltd.,⁴ and Vegetols Ltd. v. Wholesale Co-op. Stores, Chittoor,⁵ referred to.

A dispute in regard to the occupation of accommodation provided by a Co-operative housing society between a member of the society and the person to whom he has given such accommodation is a dispute touching the business of the society within the meaning of s. 91 of the Act.

Tarkhundali v. Potdar,⁶ and Madhava Rao v. Surya Rao,⁷ referred to.

A dispute in regard to rent or compensation payable to a member of a co-operative housing society by a person to whom he has given his tenement for occupation will not ordinarily touch the business of the society. But a claim for mesne profits is consequential or incidental to a claim for possession and if the Registrar or Nominee is competent to entertain the application for possession made against such a person, he will also have jurisdiction to decide the claim for past as well as future mesne profits made against him until possession is given.

CHAIYANI C. J. These three applications have been heard together, because they raise a common question in regard to the interpretation of s. 91 of the Maharashtra Cooperative Societies Act (hereinafter referred to as the Act). The facts in application No. 2048 of 1963 are as under. Respondent No. 1 in this application is a member of Shalimar Co-operative Housing Society. As such member he is the holder of a flat on the fifth floor of Shalimar building, which belongs to the society. On April 24, 1959, there was a leave and license agreement between the petitioner and respondent No. 1, by which respondent No. 1 allowed the petitioner to occupy his flat on payment of monthly compensation of Rs. 250 for a period of eleven months. Respondent No. 1 subsequently revoked the leave granted to the petitioner to occupy the flat and on March 8, 1963, called upon the petitioner to hand over possession of the premises and also to pay arrears of compensation due from him. As the petitioner did not vacate the flat, respondent No. 1 made an application to the Registrar that the dispute should be decided under the provisions of the Act. In this application he asked for possession of the flat, Rs. 3,250 as arrears of compensation and also future compensation until possession had been delivered. The Assistant Registrar, after going through the application made by respondent No. 1, passed an order that a dispute within the meaning of s. 91(1) of the Act existed and, therefore, referred this dispute for decision to the nominee mentioned in his order. Notice was then issued to the petitioner. He appeared before the nominee and filed a written statement, in which he contended that the nominee had no jurisdiction to decide the dispute. It appears that the petitioner thereafter addressed a letter to the Assistant Registrar in the matter. On November 12, 1963, he was informed by the Assistant Registrar that the question whether the matter fell within the purview of s. 91 of the Act had been already considered before referring the same to the Registrar's nominee and that consequently the petitioner's application had been filed. Thereafter the petitioner filed the present special civil application in this Court, in which he has prayed that the order of reference made by the Assistant Registrar as well as the proceedings pending before the nominee should be quashed.

In the other application No. 1249 of 1964, respondent No. 3 is a member of the Nirmal Co-operative Housing Society, respondent No. 4. As a member of the Society respondent No. 4, he had been allotted a flat on the second floor of the society's building. On August 23, 1960, respondent No. 3 gave the flat on leave and license basis to the petitioner. On the same day the petitioner addressed a letter to respondent No. 3, in which the terms of agreement are mentioned. In this letter he has stated that permission had been given to him to occupy the flat from August 23, 1960, on leave and license basis on payment of Rs. 125 per month for the use of the premises. On November 27, 1963, the Society respondent No. 4 gave a notice to respondent No. 3 calling upon respondent No. 3 to quit, vacate and deliver peaceful possession of the flat to the society, as he had not been residing in the flat allotted to him and had parted with its possession in contravention of by-law 78. On February 3, 1964, respondent No. 3 gave a notice to the petitioner cancelling and revoking the leave and license granted to him to occupy the flat and called upon him to quit, vacate and deliver peaceful possession of the flat to respondent No. 3. In July 1964, he made an application to the Registrar requesting that the dispute may be referred for decision under ss. 91 to 96 of the Act. He asked for an order directing the petitioner to quit, vacate and deliver vacant and peaceful possession of the flat. He also prayed for arrears of compensation as well as future compensation. On August 4, 1964, the Assistant Registrar passed an order stating that he was satisfied that a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 of the Act existed and referred the same for decision to his nominee respondent No. 2. Thereafter the petitioner approached this Court. In his application he has prayed that the order made by the Assistant Registrar respondent No. 1 referring the dispute for decision to his nominee should be set aside.

The dispute in Misc. Application No. 312 of 1963 is about the ground floor of a building, which originally belonged to respondent No. 4. On June 29, 1961, respondent No. 4 executed an agreement, by which he leased the entire ground floor of his building to the petitioners for a monthly rent of Rs. 250. Clause 6 of this agreement mentions that the property had been mortgaged to the Deccan Merchants Co-operative Bank, respondent No. 3. On October 26, 1961, in proceedings under s. 91 of the Act between respondents Nos. 3 and 4, the Registrar's nominee passed a consent award for Rs. 4 lakhs against respondent No. 4. As respondent No. 4 committed default in paying the amount under the award, on January 3, 1963, an order was made under s. 98 of the Act for the sale of the building. As there were no bidders, on May 13, 1963, the Collector issued a certificate of transfer under s. 100 of the Act in favour of the Bank, respondent No. 3. Under this certificate the right, title and interest of respondent No. 4 in the building was to vest in respondent No. 3. On June 5, 1963, respondent No. 3 gave a notice to the petitioners that their possession of the premises was unauthorised and illegal and the petitioners were called upon to quit, vacate and deliver vacant possession of the premises. On June 11, 1963, respondent No. 3 made an application to the Registrar for a reference under s. 93 of the Act. In para. 5 of the application it is stated that respondent No. 4 had deliberately with a view to frustrating a part of the claim of the Bank made an attempt to create tenancies in respect of the said premises or otherwise part with possession of the premises and that the petitioners and other opponents mentioned in the application had no right, title or interest in the premises. Respondent No. 3, therefore, prayed that the dispute should be decided by the Registrar or his nominee under ss. 91 to 96 of the Act and that the petitioners should be asked to quit, vacate and deliver the premises in their possession. A prayer for compensation was also made. On June 19, 1963, the Assistant Registrar passed an order stating that he was satisfied that a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 of the Act existed and referred it for decision to his nominee. The petitioners then filed a petition on the Original Side of this High Court, in which they have prayed that the order made by the Assistant Registrar referring the dispute for decision under the provisions of the Act should be quashed.

"91. (1) Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force, any dispute touching the constitution, elections of the office bearers, conduct of general meetings, management or business of a society shall be referred by any of the parties to the dispute, or by a federal society to which the society is affiliated, or by a creditor of the society, to the Registrar, if both the parties thereto are one or other of the followings:—

(a) a society, its committee, any past committee, any past or present officer, any past or present agent, any past or present servant or nominee, heir or legal representative of any deceased officer, deceased agent or deceased servant of the society, or the Liquidator of the society;

(b) a member, past member or a person claiming through a member, past member or a deceased member of a society, or a society which is a member of the society;

(c) a person, other than a member of the society, who has been granted a loan by the society, or with whom the society has or had transactions under the provisions of section 45, and any person claiming through such a person;

(d) a surety of a member, past member or a deceased member, or a person other than a member who has been granted a loan by the society under section 45, whether such a surety is or is not a member of the society;

(e) any other society, or the Liquidator of such a society.

(2) When any question arises whether for the purposes of the foregoing sub-section, a matter referred to for decision is a dispute or not, the question shall be considered by the Registrar, whose decision shall be final.

(3) Save as otherwise provided under sub-section (3) of section 93, no Court shall have any jurisdiction to entertain any suit or other proceedings in respect of any dispute referred to in sub-section (1).

Explanation 1.—A dispute between the Liquidator of a society and the members of the same society shall not be referred to the Registrar under the provisions of sub-section (1).

Explanation 2.—For the purposes of this sub-section, a dispute shall include—

(i) a claim by or against a society for any debt or demand due to it from a member or due from it to a member, past member or the nominee, heir or legal representative of a deceased member, or servant or employee whether such a debt or demand be admitted or not;

(ii) a claim by a surety for any sum or demand due to him from the principal borrower in respect of a loan by a society and recovered from the surety owing to the default of the principal borrower, whether such a sum or demand be admitted or not;

(iii) a claim by a society for any loss caused to it by a member, past member or deceased member, by any officer, past officer or deceased officer, by any agent, past agent or deceased agent, or by any servant, past servant or deceased servant, or by its committee, past or present, whether such loss be admitted or not;

(iv) a refusal or failure by a member, past member or a nominee, heir or legal representative of a deceased member, to deliver possession to a society of land or any other asset resumed by it for breach of conditions of the assignment."

Rule 75 of the rules made under the Act states that a reference of a dispute under s. 91 shall be made in writing to the Registrar in Form P. Sub-section (1) of s. 93 states that if the Registrar is satisfied that any matter referred to him or brought to his notice is a dispute within the meaning of s. 91, the Registrar shall subject to the rules decide the dispute himself or refer it for disposal to a nominee or Board of Nominees appointed by the Registrar. Section 96 states that when a dispute is referred to arbitration, the Registrar or his Nominee or Board of Nominees may, after giving a reasonable opportunity to the parties to the dispute to be heard, make an award on the dispute.

The first question, which has been raised in all the three applications, is that the Registrar or the Assistant Registrar was bound to hear the petitioners before making the orders referring the disputes to his Nominees. We have been told that the practice at present generally followed by the Registrar is that after an application for reference has been scrutinised in his office, he refers the matter to a nominee. If a contention is then raised before the nominee that he has no jurisdiction, because no dispute exists within the meaning of s. 91, the nominee refers back the matter to the Assistant Registrar, who then decides whether a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 exists. This practice has been generally found to be convenient. It also saves time because we were told that only in about 5 to 10 per cent. of cases the nominees' jurisdiction to entertain and decide a reference is challenged. The practice is also supported by several decisions of the Maharashtra Co-operative Tribunal, to which our attention has been drawn. The question which we have to consider is whether this practice is in accordance with law. Sub-section (1) of s. 93 refers to the satisfaction of the Registrar, while sub-s. (2) of s. 91 gives finality to the decision of the Registrar. It has been urged that as sub-s. (2) of s. 91 refers to a decision by the Registrar and not to the satisfaction of the Registrar, what sub-s. (1) of s. 93 contemplates is provisional satisfaction of the Registrar arrived at after perusal of the application for reference made to him, but without hearing the parties. The difficulty in accepting this argument is that it is only after the Registrar is satisfied that a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 exists that the Registrar can proceed to decide the dispute himself or refer it for disposal to his Nominee. The jurisdiction of the Registrar or his Nominee to decide a dispute is, therefore, dependent on the Registrar being satisfied that such a dispute exists. The Registrar cannot, however, come to the conclusion that a dispute exists unless he first applies his mind to the matter. The words used in sub-s. (2) of s. 91 are: "When any question arises" and not "when any question is raised". The question whether a dispute exists will arise as soon as the Registrar applies his mind to the matter in order to satisfy himself about the existence of a dispute within the meaning of s. 91. His satisfaction on this point will, therefore, be equivalent to his decision within the meaning of sub-s. (2) of s. 91. If he decides that a dispute exists, then he will take further action under sub-s. (1) of s. 93 to decide the dispute himself or refer it for disposal to his Nominee. It has been conceded before us that the question about the existence of a dispute has to be decided by the Registrar judicially and that the proceeding before him is a quasi-judicial proceeding. This necessarily implies that the Registrar must hear the parties before he decides or satisfies himself about the existence of the dispute. The present practice, therefore, does not appear to us to be in accordance with law. The correct practice would be for the Registrar to issue notices to both the parties and give them an opportunity of being heard on the question whether a dispute exists. It is only after the Registrar has heard the parties or given them an opportunity of being heard that he can decide or satisfy himself whether a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 exists. It is his decision so arrived at which will be final under sub-s. (2) of s. 91 of the Act.

None of the petitioners was heard by the Assistant Registrar before the order of reference was made. We would, therefore, have remanded the matters to the Assistant Registrar for deciding the question about the existence of a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 after hearing the parties, but we have decided not to do so, since the questions raised are general questions, which arise in many cases and also because the parties desire that we should decide them, so that the position in law may be clarified.

Following the decisions of the Supreme Court in *Raizada Topandas v. Gorakhram*¹ and Vasudev v. Board of Liquidators,² a Full Bench of this Court has held in Dattatraya Krishna v. Jairam Ganesh,³ that in order to determine which Court has jurisdiction to try a suit, the Court should read the plaint as a whole and ascertain the real nature of the suit and what in substance the plaintiff has asked for. The jurisdiction of the Court should, therefore, be determined at the time of the institution of the suit when the plaint was filed and the plea of the defendant would not determine or change the forum. The same principle must apply in a proceeding under the provisions of the Co-operative Societies Act and the question whether a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 exists so as to enable the Registrar or his Nominee to entertain a reference in respect of such dispute will have to be decided by reference to the averments made in the application for reference made under r. 75.

Under s. 91 it is not every dispute in respect of which a reference can be made for its determination under the provisions of the Act. Two conditions must be satisfied before a reference can be entertained and these are:

(1) That the dispute must touch the constitution, elections of the office bearers, conduct of general meetings, management or business of a society; and

(2) that both the parties to the dispute must be one or other of the persons mentioned in cls. (a) to (e) of sub-s. (1) of s. 91.

In the three cases before us, it has been contended on behalf of the respondents that the disputes touch the business of the societies concerned. The question as to what the words "touching the business of a society" signify has been considered by a Full Bench of this Court in Farkhundali v. Potdar.⁴ At pages 986-987 it was observed:

"...The nature of business, which a society does, is to be ascertained from the objects of the society. But whatever the society does or is necessarily required to do for the purpose of carrying out its objects can be said to be part of its business. The word 'touching' is also very wide and would include any matter which relates to, concerns or affects the business of the society."

The Full Bench has cited with approval the decision of the Full Bench of the Madras High Court in *Madhava Rao v. Surya Rao*⁵ that the words "touching the business of the society" must be given their full import and that the dispute need not directly arise out of the business of the society, but it is enough if it has reference or relation to or concern with its business.

The petitioners in the first two applications are in occupation of flats, which belong to Co-operative Housing Societies. Clause (16) in s. 2 of the Act defines a housing society as meaning a society, the object of which is providing its members with dwelling houses. It has been urged by Mr. Vaidya and Mr. Samant that the dispute in each of these two applications is essentially between a member of the society and the person to whom he had given his flat for occupation, that no relief has been claimed against the society, that the society is, therefore, not concerned with the dispute and that consequently the dispute cannot be said to touch the business of the society. There is not much force in these arguments. Regulation 4 in Form A in the Model By-laws is as under:

"No tenant shall assign, underlet, vacate or part with the possession of a tenement or any part thereof without the previous consent in writing of the society."

The Regulations of both the societies, to which the buildings in question belong, contain a similar Regulation. Consequently the flats now in occupation of the petitioners could not have been given to them for occupation without the permission of the societies. The object of a co-operative housing society being to provide housing accommodation to its members, it is the business of the society to see that such accommodation is occupied by its members or by persons approved by it and not by unauthorised persons. Every member is bound by the rules, by-laws and regulations of the society. In respect of the common amenities provided by the society he has to pay certain charges and expenses to the society. A housing society is, therefore, vitally concerned with the question as to who occupies the accommodation provided by it. A dispute in regard to the occupation of such accommodation is, therefore, a dispute connected with the business of such a society. In any case there can be no doubt that such a dispute will touch the business of the society.

Clause (iv) in Explanation 2 in s. 91 brings within the ambit of this section a dispute arising out of a refusal or failure by a member, past member or a nominee, heir or legal representative of a deceased member, to deliver possession to a society of land resumed by it for breach of conditions of the assignment. This clause does not refer to a person claiming through a member. It has, therefore, been argued that a dispute, in which possession is claimed from a person claiming title through a member is outside s. 91. The clause provides for a case in which a society seeks possession from a member on account of breach of the conditions on which the land had been assigned to him. In such a case the award, if any, made against the member would be binding on every person claiming through such member. The society can also make such person a party to the application made by it against the member. This position had been made clear by the Supreme Court in *Importers v. Phiroze*⁵ where it has been observed:

"...under the ordinary law a decree for possession passed against a tenant in a suit for ejectment is binding on a person claiming title under or through that tenant and is executable against such person whether or not he was or was not a party to the suit. The non-joinder of such a person does not render the decree any the less binding on him. It is in this sense, therefore, that he is not a necessary party to an ejectment suit against the tenant. It is, however, recognised that such a person is, nevertheless, a proper party to the suit in order that the question whether the lease has been properly determined and the landlord plaintiff is entitled to recover possession of the premises may be decided in his presence so that he may have the opportunity to see that there is no collusion between the landlord and the tenant under or through whom he claims and to seek protection under the Act (Rent Act), if he is entitled to any. Such a person may be joined as a party to the suit from the beginning of the suit or at any later stage of the suit if the Court thinks fit to do so."

This may be the reason why a person claiming through a member is not mentioned in cl. (iv) of the Explanation. This omission would not, therefore, indicate that a dispute in regard to possession of premises between a member and the person who has obtained the premises from the member is not a dispute within the meaning of s. 91 of the Act.

It was contended that the claim for compensation made against each of the petitioners cannot be said to touch the business of the society of which the particular respondent is a member and that such a claim cannot, therefore, be entertained by the Registrar. A society is ordinarily not concerned with how much amount a member charges to or recovers from the person to whom he has given his tenement for occupation. Even if he gives it free or remits the whole amount payable, it will not affect the society. Consequently, a dispute in regard to rent or compensation payable to a member will not ordinarily touch the business of the society. A claim for mesne profits is, however, consequential or incidental to a claim for possession. The Court which has jurisdiction to decide a suit for recovery of possession of property has also jurisdiction to award mesne profits until possession has been delivered. This has been so held by the Supreme Court in Importers v. Phiroze, in which at p. 277 it has been observed:

"...The appellant points out that on the face of the plaint the plaintiffs declined to recognise it as a lawful occupant as sub-tenant or otherwise and treated it as a mere trespasser having no lawful claim to the demised flat and, therefore,... the suit in so far as it claimed compensation from him cannot be said to be a suit for recovery of rent. The last part of the contention need not detain us long, for the suit was undoubtedly one for possession of the flat and the claim for compensation was only incidental and ancillary to the claim for possession. Jurisdiction to entertain a suit for possession will empower the Court not only to pass a decree for possession but also to give directions for payment of mesne profits until delivery of possession. Such direction for payment of mesne profits is usually an integral part of the decree for possession." Consequently if the Registrar or his Nominee is competent to entertain the applications for possession made against the petitioners, he will also have jurisdiction to decide the claims for past as well as future mesne profits made against them until possession had been given.

In application No. 2048 of 1963 the society has not been made a party to the application for reference made to the Registrar. Mr. Vaidya has, therefore, argued that the dispute cannot be said to touch the business of the society. This argument is without any merit. The nature of the dispute will not change merely because the society has not been made a party to the proceeding. Section 91 itself contemplates that a dispute touching the business of a society may arise between a member and a member or between a member and a person claiming through a member.

In the third application, Miscellaneous Application No. 312 of 1963, the property was transferred to the Bank in part satisfaction of the amount due to it under the award obtained by it against respondent No. 4. The property was, therefore, acquired by the Bank in the ordinary course of its business. Thereafter it was necessary for the Bank to do all things necessary to look after and manage the property. In the course of its management, it evidently considered it necessary or desirable to recover possession from the petitioners. Consequently the dispute in regard to possession of the premises occupied by the petitioners can also be said to touch the business of the Bank.

Mr. Nariman has referred to Dinkar Wasudeo v. Registrar, Cooperative Societies,⁶ in which it was held that the word "dispute" in s. 54 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act, 1925, implies some kind of disagreement between the parties concerned, some reference to a legal claim or liability and that the word "dispute" cannot be said to be the same thing as a cause of action or the mere incurring of a liability. Mr. Nariman has contended that the tenancy of the petitioners has not been determined by giving them a proper notice and that consequently the Bank has no legal claim to the possession of the premises. The question whether a person has made a legal claim is quite different from the question whether he will be able to establish or prove that claim. At the preliminary stage when the Registrar has to decide the question of jurisdiction, he has only to consider whether the claim as made in the application for reference is a legal claim. In the present case the Bank's claim for possession cannot be said to be not a legal claim. Whether the Bank will be able to prove this claim is a different matter.

The next question, which arises for consideration, is whether the petitioners can be said to belong to one or the other of the categories of persons specified in cls. (a) to (e) of sub-s. (1) of s. 91. None of the petitioners is a member of the particular co-operative society. Every petitioner has acquired his rights from a member of the society. The only clause which would, therefore, be applicable to him is cl. (b), provided he can be said to be a person claiming through a member. There has been a great deal of argument before us as to what these words exactly signify. Mr. Nariman has contended that these words refer to a person who though not a member claims as a member, that is, membership rights, by virtue of some transaction or relationship with a member. Section 22 of the Act mentions the persons who may be admitted as members of a society. Under cl. (b) a firm, company or any other body corporate constituted under any law for the time being in force, or a society registered under the Societies Registration Act, can be a member of the society. Under cl. (f) a registered public trust can also be a member of the society. Section 29 states that a transfer of or charge on the share or interest of a member in the share capital of a society shall be subject to such conditions as may be prescribed. Sub-rule (1) of r. 24 provides that no transfer of shares can be effective unless it is made as provided in this sub-rule. Sub-section (1) of s. 30 states that on the death of a member of a society, the society shall transfer the share or interest of the deceased member to a person or persons nominated in accordance with the rules, or, if no person has been so nominated, to such person as may appear to the committee to be the heir or legal representative of the deceased member. Sub-rule (1) of r. 25 provides that for the purpose of transfer of his share or interest under sub-s. (1) of s. 30, a member of a society may, by a document signed by him or by making a statement in any book kept for the purpose by the society, nominate any person or persons. Sub-rule (2) of r. 20 states that a society may admit minors and persons of unsound mind inheriting share or interest of deceased members as its members through their legal representatives or guardians respectively. These provisions deal with transfer of shares and acquisition of rights of membership by inheritance or otherwise.

Mr. Nariman has urged that a person can be said to claim through a member only when he claims qua a member, that is, when he claims the rights of membership, under these and other similar provisions, on account of transfer of shares to him or as a partner of a firm of which he is a member or as the heir or legal representative of a member or other similar reason.

In Shyam Co-operative Society v. Ramibai,⁷ a charitable trust was a member of the appellant co-operative society. The trust had advanced Rs. 4 lakhs to the society. Subsequently the trustees filed a suit to recover the amount. A notice of motion was taken out by the appellant society to stay the suit on the ground that under s. 54 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act the dispute could only be adjudicated upon by arbitration as provided in that section. This notice of motion was dismissed and the order was confirmed in appeal. The relevant part of s. 54 was as follows:—

"54. (1) (a) If any dispute touching the... business of the society arises... between the society... and any... member... of the society..., it shall be referred to the Registrar for decision by himself or his nominee...

The dispute shall include claims by a society for debts or demands due to it from a member or a past member or the heirs or assets of a past member, whether such debts or demands be admitted or not."

It was held that under this section the dispute must be between the society and a member as a member, that it must relate to a transaction in which the member was interested as a member and that s. 54 would have no application in a case where a member had advanced a loan to a society, which he was under no obligation to advance. At p. 518 the learned Chief Justice observed:

"...Now, before a case can fall under s. 54, it is not sufficient that there should be a dispute touching the business of the society. What is further required is that the dispute must be between the society and its member, and proper emphasis has got to be laid upon the expression 'member' used in this section. The dispute must be between the society and the member as a member or qua a member. It must be a dispute in which the member must be interested as a member. It must relate to a transaction in which the member must be interested as a member."

Thereafter s. 54 was amended and the following words were inserted into the second paragraph in cl. (a) of sub-s. (1) before the words "whether such debtor..."

"as well as claims by a member or past member or the heirs of a past member for any debts or demands due to him from the society."

The section as amended came up for consideration in Malvan Co-op. Bank v. Kamalakar.⁸ It was held having regard probably to the words "any debts or demands", that the section as amended applied to a dispute in regard to a loan advanced to a member otherwise than in his capacity as a member. At p. 631 the learned Chief Justice observed:

"...Therefore, the Legislature by enacting this second paragraph was extending the scope of a dispute which had been defined in s. 54(1). ...Therefore, for the purpose of this enlarged definition of a 'dispute', all that is necessary is that there should be a debt or demand due to a society by a member and a claim to be made by a society in respect of that debt or demand. It is unnecessary for the purpose of this enlarged definition that the debt must be due from a member in his capacity as a member or qua a member. It is sufficient if there is a debt or a demand due by the member howsoever the debt or demand might arise, provided the debt or demand is due to the society and a claim is made by the society in respect of that debt or demand."

Provisions similar to s. 54 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act, 1925, are contained in s. 68 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896. Clause (a) in sub-s. (1) of this section is as under:

"Every dispute between—

(a) a member or person claiming through a member or under the rules of a registered society or branch, and the society or branch or an officer thereof... shall be decided in manner directed by the rules of the society or branch..."

It has been held that disputes to be decided under this section must have relation to the membership of the member, such as the repayment of money deposited by a member and that dispute between a society and a member not in his capacity as a member, for example, a claim by a society against one of its officers for misappropriation of funds or a dispute with a member as mortgagor or mortgagee, are not disputes within this clause, see para. 123 at page 65 in Halsbury's Laws of England, Vol. 18, Third edn.

Section 51 of the Madras Co-operative Societies Act, 1932, contains similar provisions about the settlement of disputes between a co-operative society and its members. In Krishna Ayyar v. Urban Bank Ltd., Calicut,⁹ the Madras High Court has held that in order that a dispute can be dealt with by the Registrar under s. 51 of the Madras Co-operative Societies Act, it must be a dispute between the society and a member in his capacity as a member. In that case it was decided that a dispute between the appellant and the Co-operative Bank, of which the appellant was a member, arising out of the matters relating to the appellant's acts as the Bank's Vakil, was not a dispute to which the Act applied and that the Registrar had, therefore, no jurisdiction to deal with the matter. The same view has been taken in Narayana Ayyar v. Co-op. Urban Bank, Ltd.,¹⁰ and Vegetols Ltd. v. Wholesale Co-op. Stores, Chittoor.¹¹ In the last case it was observed that for a claim to fall within s. 51 of the Act, it should be a claim by the society against a member as a member touching the business of the society and that a liability of a member to the society which is not incurred by the member as a member is outside the scope of s. 51.

In these cases, therefore, it has been held that the domestic tribunal set up by the Act has jurisdiction to decide only those cases in which a claim is made by or against a member as a member. These decisions do not, however, support Mr. Nariman's contention that a person can be said to claim through a member only when he claims membership rights.

Mr. Nariman has laid stress on the fact that whereas in the case of a deceased member cl. (b) of sub-s. (I) of s. 91 refers to a person claiming through a deceased member, in cls. (i) and (iv) of Explanation 2 the words used are: "Nominee, heir or legal representative of a deceased member." Mr. Nariman has argued that the Legislature has thereby indicated in what sense the word "member" has been used. We are not impressed by this argument. The only persons, from whom a society can recover a debt due to it from a deceased member, are his nominee, and heir or legal representative. These are also the persons who can claim a debt due to a deceased member from the society. Similarly, the persons against whom a society can proceed for obtaining possession of premises allotted to a deceased member are his nominee, or heir and legal representative. An award passed against such persons will also bind the person claiming through the deceased member. Consequently reference to nominee, heir or legal representative in these clauses in the Explanation does not support Mr. Nariman's argument that only a person claiming membership rights can be said to be a person claiming through a member.

In our opinion, there is nothing in the Act or in the rules to justify our giving such a narrow meaning to the expression "claiming through a member" as has been suggested by Mr. Nariman.

Mr. Setalvad has, on the other hand, argued, and his arguments have been adopted by Mr. Naik, that the word "member" in s. 91 should not be interpreted to mean a member acting in his capacity as a member, because otherwise an anomalous position might arise, viz., that while s. 91 will apply when a society has advanced a loan to a person other than a member by reason of cl. (c) in sub-s. (I) of s. 91, it will not apply when the loan is given to a member otherwise than in his capacity as a member. There would have been force in this argument but for the decision in Malvan Co-operative Bank v. Kamalakkar. The first clause in Explanation 2 is substantially in the same terms as the second para. of s. 54 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act, 1925, as amended which was construed in Malvan Co-operative Bank v. Kamalakkar. In view of this decision a dispute arising out of a loan advanced to a member by a society will also be a dispute within the meaning of s. 91.

Section 91 is very much wider in terms than the corresponding s. 54 of the Act of 1925. Clauses (c) and (d) bring within the ambit of this section several persons other than members, who enter into transactions with a Co-operative society. Mr. Setalvad has contended that in view of the fact that the special provisions of the Act relating to settlement of disputes have been made applicable to a large number of persons, who have dealings with a co-operative society, the word "member" should no longer be given a limited meaning. Mr. Nariman has, on the other hand, urged that as the Legislature has in cls. (c) and (d) specified categories of non-members who are covered by s. 91, it cannot be said that the Legislature intended to alter the previous position in regard to the meaning which has been given by judicial decisions to the word "member".

It seems to us that the words "claiming through a member" must be given their ordinary meaning, that is, deriving title or rights through a member. At the same time weight must be attached to the word "member" and having regard to the decision referred to above, the title or rights claimed must be those to which a member was entitled or which he could claim by virtue of his being a member. The words "claiming through a member" therefore mean deriving such title or rights through a member as the member possessed or had acquired by reason of his being a member or in his capacity as a member.

In the first two applications, the petitioners have acquired their rights of occupation of the flats in their possession respectively from respondent No. 1 and respondent No. 3 in these applications. These respondents were allotted these flats by the housing societies, of which they were members. As members they were entitled to the allotment of these flats. Consequently, the petitioners in these applications are persons claiming through members within the meaning of cl. (b) in sub-s. (1) of s. 91. The dispute in each application also touches the business of the particular society. Consequently these disputes are disputes within the meaning of s. 91. The order passed in each case by the Assistant Registrar, Co-operative Societies, referring the dispute for decision to his Nominee, is therefore correct.

The rule issued in each application will, therefore, be discharged. No orders as to costs.

The position is different in Miscellaneous Application No. 312 of 1963. The building, a part of which is in occupation of the petitioners, belonged to respondent No. 4. It did not belong to, nor had it been acquired from the Co-operative Bank respondent No. 3, of which respondent No. 4 was a member. The petitioners cannot, therefore, be said to be claiming through a member of the Bank as a member. Consequently cl. (b) will not apply and the disputes between them and the Bank cannot be the subject of a reference under sub-s. (1) of s. 91.

In this view, it is not necessary to consider the other points raised by Mr. Nariman that after the transfer of the property to the Bank under s. 100 of the Act, the petitioners became direct tenants of the Bank. We have also not heard Mr. Nariman on his other contention that s. 91 is not applicable, as the petitioners are the tenants of the premises.

In this application we, therefore, set aside the order made by the Assistant Registrar referring the dispute between the petitioners and respondent No. 3 to his Nominee for decision. The petitioners should get their costs of this application from respondent No. 3.

We have been told that our interpretation of sub-s. (2) of s. 91 and sub-s. (1) of s. 93 may lead to considerable increase in the work in the office of the Registrar, with the result that proceedings may be considerably delayed. This is, however, a matter for Government to consider. If Government decides to amend the Act, Government may also consider whether the power to decide whether a dispute exists within the meaning of s. 91 should not be vested in the authority to whom the matter is referred for disposal. The words "with whom the society has or had transactions under the provisions of section 45" in cl. (c) s. 91(I) do not seem to be appropriate to bring out the intention of the Legislature. Section 45 provides

"Save as provided in the Act, the transactions of a society with persons other than members, shall be subject to such restrictions, if any, as may be prescribed."

It is, therefore, not clear which persons are intended to be covered by the above words in cl. (c) in sub-s. (I) of s. 91. For instance, if no restrictions have been prescribed under s. 45, the question would arise whether all the persons with whom the society has transactions will be within the ambit of cl. (c). Clause (d) refers to a person other than member, who has been granted a loan by the society under s. 45. The section which provides for loans to persons other than members is s. 44. These questions may also be considered in case Government decides to amend the Act.

LAXMAN PADMA BIJAGAT v. THE STATE.*

Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), Secs. 25, 24, 114, 133—Sea Customs Act (VIII of 1878), Secs. 171A, 6, 187A, 167(81)—Central Excise and Salt Act (I of 1944), Sec. 21—Land Customs Act (XIX of 1924), Sec. 3—Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 164, 154-176—Indian Penal Code (XLV of 1860), Sec. 191—Constitution of India. Art. 20—Excise officer discharging duties under Sea Customs Act whether police officer within s. 25, Evidence Act—Whether Central Government can appoint officers of customs by issuing notification—Person in authority merely explaining provisions of s. 171A of Sea Customs Act to accused before recording his confession—Such confession whether hit by s. 24, Evidence Act—Whether service of summons a condition precedent to recording of statement under s. 171A—Evidence of accomplice whether can be taken as corroboration to evidence of another accomplice—Confession of co-accused whether can be relied on in considering evidence of accomplice—Whether statements made by person under s. 171A affected by art. 20(3) of Constitution—Customs Officers whether bound to maintain diary.

An officer of the Central Excise Department is not a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, for all purposes, though he may be such a police officer so far as he conducts an investigation in respect of offences under the Central Excise and Salt Act, 1944. Therefore, an Excise officer while discharging his duties under the Sea Customs Act, 1878, is not a police officer within s. 25 of the Indian Evidence Act.

Confession recorded by an officer of the Central Excise Department while enquiring into a case falling under the Sea Customs Act, 1878, under which latter Act he is also appointed an officer, cannot be said to be made to a police officer and is, therefore, not hit by the provisions of s. 25 of the Indian Evidence Act.

Under s. 6 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, it is open to the Central Government to adopt any mode of appointment of officers of customs. It may make a general order of appointment by issuing a notification, or it may make appointment by issuing an order individually appointing any individual person named in the order to be an officer.

Section 24 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, contemplates that the threat referred to therein must emanate from the person in authority. Therefore, where a person in authority before recording the confession of an accused merely explains to him the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, the confession is not hit by the provisions of s. 24 of the Indian Evidence Act as it cannot be said to have been obtained by a threat within the meaning of s. 24. Further, in merely explaining the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act to the accused making the confession there is no threat given by the person in authority recording the confession which could have raised any hope in the mind of the accused or led him to suppose that he was to gain any advantage in reference to the proceeding against him relating to the offence of smuggling.

Section 171A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, does not contemplate the service of a summons as a condition precedent enabling the Customs Officer to record the statement under s. 171A of the Act.

It is not safe to accept the evidence of an accomplice as corroboration to the evidence of another accomplice and the confession of a co-accused as a piece of evidence lending assurance to the mind of the Court in considering the evidence of the accomplice. There may, however, be exceptional cases where evidence of an accomplice could be taken as corroboration to the evidence of another accomplice and the confession of a co-accused could be relied on for lending assurance to the mind of the Court. In considering the question as to whether a conviction could be founded on a testimony of the accomplice without corroboration, the latter part of s. 114, III. (b) of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, is relevant.

TAMBE J. Criminal Appeal No. 1759 of 1963 is preferred by original accused No. 5—Laxman Padma Bhagat; Criminal Appeal No. 53 of 1964 is by Haroon Haji Abdulla, original accused No. 8; and Criminal Appeal No. 1 of 1964 is by Ayub Kassim Kika, original accused No. 9. These three appeals can be disposed of by one judgment. They arise out of the judgment of the learned Presidency Magistrate, 19th Court, Esplanade, Bombay, where the aforesaid three appellants along with 15 others were put up for trial. Out of these 18 accused, accused No. 17 was discharged; accused Nos. 14, 15 and 18—Haji Mohamed Barkati, Haji Sattar and Yusuf Nabib—had been absconding, and, therefore, their cases were separated. Original accused No. 4, Noor Mohamed Alu Bhati was jointly tried along with the remaining accused, but on the date of the judgment, it was found that he had absconded, and therefore, his case was separated. Accused No. 1, Govind Narayan Bengali, who was also jointly tried, died after the close of the case but before the pronouncement of the judgment. Accused Nos. 11, 12, 13 and 16—Shankar Aitwar Koli, Usman Saleh, Adam Budda and Gulam Nabi have been acquitted.

In short, as a result of the judgment only 8 of the accused, namely, accused Nos. 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 have been convicted of offences under s. 120-B, Indian Penal Code, for having conspired to smuggle gold into India without a valid permit and thereby evading duty payable thereon, and to evade the prohibition enacted in this matter by notifications made under certain various enactments. Only accused Nos. 5, 8 and 9 have appealed.

The following facts are no more in dispute, and there is ample evidence establishing them. In April or May 1961, Police Inspector Mr. Bhesadia (P.W. 30) attached to the Anti-Corruption and Prohibition Intelligence Bureau, Bombay, received certain information about smuggling operations, and he took certain measures to pursue the information and to arrange for watch. On August 13, 1961, he received certain information at his residence in Dhobi Talao that the smuggled gold was likely to be landed at Versova beach the same night. He, therefore, went to Madh Island at about 4 p.m. in a police car driven by one Rajaram Sawant, the police driver. At about 8-40 p.m., he received information that the smuggled gold was to be landed at Versova beach. He, therefore, proceeded in his car from Madh Island to Versova beach reaching there at about 9-30 p.m. On reaching the beach, he received further information as a result of which he went to the house of Govind Narayan Bengali, accused No. 1 in this case. The house of this Govind is situate in a locality at Versova known as Tare Gally which is close to the Versova beach. The house consists only of one room and a verandah. As Mr. Bhesadia and his driver Rajaram approached the house, the door of the house was slammed in their face. Bhesadia latched the door of the house from outside, kept Rajaram on guard at the door, and rushed to the window, the only other opening of the room. At the time, one Ismail Tharu was trying to escape through the window. Bhesadia pushed him in, called Rajaram and put him on guard at the window, and then opening the door, entered the room, where he found Govind, accused No. 1, his brother Dharma Narayan accused No. 2, his cousin Bhaskar Bhavan Pedhe accused No. 3, Ismail Tharu, a foreigner, and Kashinath, the first witness in this case, P.W. 1. Accused Nos. 1 to 3 and Kashinath are fishermen residing in the village Versova. Ismail is a foreigner. Bhesadia also noticed that there was a heap of small gunny bags in a corner of the room. He further found that the gunny bundles were wet and were heavy, and he surmised that the gunny bags would contain smuggled gold. He, therefore, sent Rajaram to fetch panchas. Rajaram brought three panchas including Panch Minoo Fitter (P.W. 12). One of these persons was sent back to Bombay to inform at the houses of the two panchas remaining behind that they had been detained. Bhesadia questioned the inmates of the room. He offered his own search and the search of the panchas but that was declined by these persons. Then Bhesadia took the search of the persons of all the five persons in the presence of the panchas. Nothing was found on the four fishermen, but on the person of the foreigner, that is, Ismail, he found a plastic purse containing Rs. 75 in red currency, Rs. 293 in Indian currency notes, one envelope and a letter in Gujarati (exh. 3). This letter is written in code words containing also some figures. The articles were returned. Bhesadia also in the presence of the panchas searched the room as well as the cupboard in the room, but it contained only certain personal papers of accused No. 1. Bhesadia then sent Rajaram out to search whether any car was waiting to take away the smuggled gold in view of the answers he received from the suspects. Rajaram returned after about an hour and half, by about 11-30 p.m., and reported that he was not able to find any car. Bhesadia again sent Rajaram to phone to his (Bhesadia's) office and later also asked Rajaram to ring up the customs people, as well as his superior officer, one Police Superintendent Shete. In response to the telephone messages, Sub-Inspector Lagli, Sub-Inspector Soman and Sub-Inspector Kulkarni arrived a little before 2 a.m. Kulkarni was kept on guard, and the other two Sub-Inspectors were sent for making confidential inquiries. At about 2 a.m., Assistant Collector of Customs, Mr. Jokhi, an officer of the Central Excise, Randive, Deputy Superintendent of Central Excise (P.W. 22), and some other officers of the Central Excise Department arrived. Bhesadia appraised them of the detection of the contraband and the suspects found in the room. Thereafter, Jokhi and Randive interrogated these five persons, each one separately, by taking them out of the room. It is the prosecution case that each one was taken by Jokhi and Randive to an adjoining hut at some distance from this house. The questioning continued till about 5-30 a.m. Mr. Warty (P.W. 28), Superintendent of the Central Excise by that time also arrived along with some other excise officers. It is under the supervision of Mr. Warty that further inquiries in the case have been made. Mr. Warty also interrogated these persons in the hut till about six or 6-30 a.m. of August 14, 1961. Thereafter, the seventeen bundles inside the room were brought on the verandah adjoining the room, and Mr. Warty proceeded to prepare the panchnama of the property contained in these seventeen bundles. The bundles were opened in the presence of the panchas one after another, and it was found that each bundle contained two jackets, each one having small packets stitched inside, in each of which was concealed one gold slab weighing about ten tolas. The slab was of the shape of a biscuit. The gold slabs had marks of foreign refineries thereon. When the total gold found in the seventeen bundles was counted, it was found not to tally with the total number of figures contained in the letter (exh. 8) found on the person of Ismail. Mr. Bhesadia surmised the figures on the letter represented the weight of the gold. He, therefore, further interrogated in this respect and thereafter Kashinath pointed out the eighteenth bundle of gold lying in the sand behind the house of Govind, accused No. 1. The bundle was half buried in the sand. The bundle was brought and the gold found in it was similarly concealed in the jacket which was counted. The total number of tolas tallied with the total of the various figures in the letter. The foreign gold smuggled weighed 35,730 tolas valued at Rs. 50,02,200. The smuggled gold is exh. "Z-31" in this case. The gold was sent under armed guard to the Central Excise office in six trunks brought there by Mohandas, another Deputy Superintendent of Central Excise (P.W. 29). On inspection of this gold in the Mint, it was found of the purity of 999. The preparation of the panchnama continued from 6-30 in the morning till 5 p.m. The panchnama (exh. N) prepared in the presence of the panchas is dictated by Warty and was taken down by Mr. Gupte, another Excise Officer. Exhibit N is signed by Mr. Warty and by Bhesadia. It is also signed by accused No. 1 Govind from whose house the property had been seized, as well as by Kashinath, the first prosecution witness in this case.

Now, these five persons in the house of Govind were also taken to the Central Excise Office situate somewhere nearabout Churchgate. It appears that Mr. Warty had gathered from the interrogation that the gold was brought in a mechanized boat "Al-Sabri" formerly named "Sufilla Mohmadi". Mr. Warty, therefore, put a trunk call to the custom officer at Veraval for intercepting the mechanized boat "Al-Sabri". However, "Al-Sabri" could not be intercepted.

These five persons were detained at the Excise Office for the night and next morning (15th) the statements of all the five persons have been recorded by different officers. The statement of accused No. 1 Govind at exh. Z-27 was recorded by Mr. Rane (P.W. 26), Deputy Superintendent of Excise. The statement of Dharma, accused No. 2 at exh. Z-28 was recorded by Rane. Statement of accused No. 3 Bhaskar was recorded by Mohandas (P.W. 29), Deputy Superintendent of Excise. The statement of Kashinath was recorded by Karnik, another Deputy Superintendent of Excise (P.W. 24), and the statement of Ismail was recorded by Mr. Warty, Superintendent of Excise. The statements of all these persons were recorded by these different officers from morning till noon. They are elaborate and detailed statements.

Before recording these statements, all these five persons were explained the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, hereinafter referred to as the Act, and it has been noted in these statements that these persons have made these statements realising their responsibility under the provisions of s. 171A. All these five persons according to prosecution were allowed to go that same evening, and the record discloses that the five summonses were further issued to accused No. 1 Govind under the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 171A of the Act. They are exhs. Z-35 to Z-39. Exhibit Z-35 is a summons issued on August 15, 1961, requiring attendance of Govind on 16th. Exhibit Z-36 is the summons issued on August 16, 1961, requiring his attendance on 17th. Exhibit Z-37 is the summons issued on August 19, requiring his attendance on August 21, 1961. Exhibit Z-38 is the summons issued on 21st requiring his attendance on August 22. And exh. Z-39 is the summons issued on August 22, requiring his presence on August 23.

Govind was arrested on August 23, 1961, and produced before the Presidency Magistrate on the same day. He was offered bail but he could not avail of it on the same day. Later, he was released on bail and had been on bail throughout the trial. Accused Nos. 2 and 3 were arrested on August 21 and were produced before the Presidency Magistrate on the same day. They were offered bail, and they availed of it on a later date. Neither Ismail, nor Kashinath were arrested. Later, both were cited as witnesses. Kashinath has been examined but Ismail absconded before he was examined in Court. As a result of the information received from these statements, the inquiries further proceeded.

It is the prosecution case that accused No. 5 Laxman Padma Bhagat, accused No. 6 Kashinath Laxman Kapatil, also known as Istucha Kasha, accused No. 7 Mahadev Pandu Ragabhagat and one Devchand Motiram (P.W. 2) voluntarily surrendered on September 8, 1961, and on the same day their statements have been recorded by Mr. Ranadive (P.W. 22). Accused Nos. 5, 6 and 7 were arrested on September 11, 1961, and produced before the Presidency Magistrate. They were on bail during the trial. Devchand has been examined as prosecution witness No. 2. Similarly, it is the prosecution case that accused No. 9 Ayub Kassim Kika voluntarily surrendered on November 26, 1961, and gave his written statement in his own hand in Gujarati on November 26, 1961. On the same day he was arrested and produced before the Magistrate. He was also on bail during the trial. The other accused were found and their statements also have been recorded on various different dates. Except the statement of accused Nos. 14, 15 and 18, the statement of all the remaining accused have been recorded on different dates as and when they were found. It is not necessary for the purpose of this appeal to go in detail as to the date on which the statements of the remaining accused were recorded. It may be, however, stated that the finding of the accused and the recording of the statements continued till about March 29, 1962.

Certain other investigations were also made, and as a result, a complaint has been filed under s. 187A of the Act by Mr. Jokhi, the Assistant Collector of Customs against the aforesaid 18 accused, for having committed offences under s. 120(B) of the Indian Penal Code read with s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, and s. 8(1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act and s. 120(B) of the Indian Penal Code read with s. 8(1) and s. 23 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act of 1947: and offences under s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act and offences under s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act read with s. 109 and s. 114 of the Indian Penal Code and offences under s. 8(1) read with s. 23 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, or offences under s. 8(1) and s. 23 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act of 1947 read with s. 109 and s. 114 of the Indian Penal Code.

The prosecution case as disclosed at the trial, in brief, may be stated: The brains behind the conspiracy were the absconding accused No. 14, Haji Mohamed Barkati, and his brother accused No. 15, Haji Sattar. They are Memons speaking Gujarati language. They with the help of accused No. 9, Ayub Kassim Kika, who has been referred as their nephew, and accused No. 1, Govind, a fisherman of Versova, acted as agents for receiving gold sent from Dubai, a place in the Persian Gulf. The modus operandi of the operations was that gold was despatched in mechanised vessels from Dubai and was met in the stream near Bombay by a small mechanized launch arranged therefor. Gold brought from Dubai in the mechanised vessel was transhipped in mid-stream in the mechanised launch arranged by Govind. A man from the foreign ship used to come down the small launch to accompany the gold. The gold was then brought to the Versova beach and then with the help of some fishermen from Versova was removed to the house of Govind. Therefrom gold was arranged to be shifted by accused Nos. 14 and 15 with the help of accused No. 9 as well as accused No. 8, Haroon Haji Abdulla, who is a resident of Jamsalai, a place in Saurashtra, to different places in Bombay, to the details of which we will presently advert. Both Haji Mohamed as well as Haji Sattar lived in a furnished flat in Duru Mahal, taken by them on leave and license basis, on the Marine Drive but not on the sea face, in May 1960. The telephone No. of this place is 242935. Accused Nos. 14 and 15 also took another flat on leave and licence basis from November 1, 1960, in a building known as "Avillion" situate at Little Gibbs Road, Malabar Hill, Bombay. Accused No. 9 with the help of one Issak Mohamed had taken a room in a flat of Mohiddinkhan near the J. J. Hospital. The room was taken on leave and license basis from August 1, 1960, for 11 months, and, according to the prosecution, these three places were the operation centres of accused Nos. 14 and 15. Now, in pursuance of the aforesaid conspiracy to smuggle gold, it is the prosecution case that the accused have in fact smuggled gold on four occasions in four trips, to which we will presently advert. It is also the prosecution case that some of the accused i.e. accused Nos. 14, 15, 1 and 9 have participated in smuggling gold in all the four trips, while others have participated in smuggling gold in one or more trips. We would in brief state the part played by these different accused in these four trips as well as a trip referred to as Reconnaissance trip in the judgment of the learned Magistrate arranged for the purpose of fixing the place for transshipment of gold from the foreign mechanised vessel to the small mechanised launch arranged by Govind for mid-stream.

The Reconnaissance Trip: In or about December 1960 or January 1961, one Dosa Malik introduced Haji Sattar, accused No. 15, to accused No. 1, Govind, and accused No. 1 agreed to help them to land gold by arranging local boats to tranship the contraband gold to the shore. Thereafter accused No. 1 arranged to get the boat of one Ganpat Koli, a fisherman residing in Madh Island, and in that boat, Govind, Kashinath, accused No. 9, Ayub, and accused No. 15 Haji Sattar, as well as Ganpat went in the night previous to the day on which gold was landed for the first time, towards the Colaba-Dandi. There, Ayub pointed out a place where Govind should meet the foreign vessel the next day for the transshipment of gold. They then came back.

First Trip: The next night, Govind arranged the boat of Shankar, accused

No. 11 a fisherman of Versova. In that boat, Kashinath, P.W.1, Govind accused No. 1, Ayub, accused No. 9, Hira, accused No. 10, and Haji Sattar, accused No. 15, went to the appointed spot. The foreign vessel came to the rendezvous at about 8-30 p.m. Haji Sattar flashed a signal by torch. The foreign vessel responded to the signal. Thereafter both the boats were brought together. A rope was thrown from the foreign vessel to Govind's launch. Both Ayub and Haji Sattar then went up the foreign vessel. The foreign vessel then towed Govind's launch towards Bandra side as Govind's launch had developed some trouble. After the repairs were completed, two gunny bags containing 4000 tolas of gold were transhipped from the foreign vessel to Govind's launch. According to the prosecution, the value of gold was about Rs. 1,19,903-20 nP. Along with gold also came one Ismail. They then returned to Versova beach and there removed the gold from the launch to Govind's house, and as it was late at night, they slept there. Early morning, next day, the two bundles were opened and the jackets were taken out. Kashinath and Hira, accused No. 10, were asked to put on these jackets under their clothes. Thereafter, Haji Sattar, Ayub, Kashinath, Hira, and Ismail left the house of Govind. They travelled by a bus upto the Andheri Railway Station, and at Andheri they boarded a local train and got down at Matunga. At Matunga the party separated. Kashinath and Hira were taken by Ayub in a taxi to his room near the J. J. Hospital. There, Kashinath and Hira removed the jackets and handed them over to accused No. 9, Ayub. Ayub paid Rs. 5 each to these two persons. Then Kashinath and Hira returned to Govind's house at Versova. At that time, at the house of Govind were sitting, Devchand, P.W.2, and Laxman Padma, accused No. 5. On that evening, Ismail returned to Dubai. Kashinath reached him in a country boat to the foreign vessel which was standing in the mid-stream waiting for him. Three or four days thereafter, Govind paid Rs. 100 to Kashinath. Thus, according to the prosecution, in the first trip, accused Nos. 1, 9, 10, 15, Kashinath and Ismail participated. It may be stated that accused No. 11, Shankar, whose boat was used in this trip, had also gone in the boat, and therefore, it is the prosecution case that he also had participated in this trip.

Second Trip: This trip took place sometime in April or May 1961. Govind had arranged the boat of one Dharma Pandu, P.W.3. In this boat travelled Kashinath, Dharma Pandu and his two or three servants. The boat was taken at night to another place in the mid-stream called Utran near Marva. The foreign vessel described by the witness as "white mechanised launch" came there. After the identity had been established by torched signals, some persons from the foreign vessel asked as to who were in the small launch. Kashinath replied that he was Govind's man. A rope was then flung down and the two boats were brought together. Eight packets of gold were then transhipped from the foreign vessel to the local boat. These 8 packets contained 15,000 tolas of gold valued at Rs. 18 lacs. Ismail also came down to the local boat from the foreign vessel. They all then returned to the Versova beach. On the shore were present Govind, accused No. 1, Devchand, P.W.2, Laxman Padma, accused No. 5, and Haji Sattar, accused No. 15. Gold was then carried to the house of Govind. There, a big blue car with a white top was waiting. Ayub, accused No. 9, was sitting in the car. The 8 packets containing gold were put in the luggage boot of this car, and in this car went Ayub accused No. 9, Haji Sattar, accused No. 15, and Ismail. This time, gold was carried in this car to the flat of one Kantilal at Vile Parle. For this trip Kashinath received Rs. 500 from Govind. Thus, according to the prosecution, in this second trip, accused No. 1, accused No. 5, accused No. 9, accused No. 15, Kashinath, P.W. 1, Devchand, P.W.2, and Dharma Pandu, P.W.3, and Ismail participated.

Third Trip: About 9 or 10 days after the second trip, Govind again engaged the boat of Dharma Pandu. In this trip, at about 7 or 7.30 p.m. Kashinath, Dharma Pandu and his two or three servants went to another place known as Aksa Light House. The foreign vessel "Safina Mahmedi" was there. The same procedure was followed and this time, 14 bags containing gold were transhipped to the local boat of Dharma Pandu. This time, however, Ismail did not come to the local boat, but instead, Noor Mahmed, accused No. 4, came in the local boat. They then returned to the Versova beach. On the beach were waiting accused No. 1, Govind, accused No. 5, Laxman, accused No. 8, Haroon, accused No. 9 Ayub, accused No. 15, Haji Sattar. Gold was then carried by them behind the house of Govind and there put in another car, a black car, and in that car went Haroon, accused No. 8, Ayub, accused No. 9, Noor Mahomed, accused No. 4, Haji Sattar, accused No. 15. The car was driven by Ayub. Thus, according to the prosecution, in the smuggling of gold in this trip participated accused Nos. 1, 4, 5, 8, 9 and 15, and prosecution witnesses Kashinath and Dharma Pandu. The gold brought in this trip was 28,000 tolas valued at Rs. 39,20,000.

Fourth Trip: And this brings us to the fourth trip, when Inspector Bhesadia discovered the smuggling. In this trip, Govind engaged the boat of Hira, and in this boat on August 13, 1961, travelled Kashinath, accused No. 6, accused No. 7 and Devchand. The local boat this time went to another place called "Tera" very near the Versova beach. After the usual procedure of signals, both the boats were brought together and 18 packets tied in gunny bags were transhipped from the foreign vessel to the local boat. Ismail came in the local boat. On the shore were present accused No. 1 Govind, accused No. 5 Laxman, accused No. 10 Hira, and accused Nos. 4, 8 and 9 were waiting on the sand with a car nearby. Govind and Kashinath took Ismail to Govind's house. Then both of them returned and the 18 packets of gold were then carried by Kashinath, Govind, Dharma, accused No. 2, Bhaskar-accused No. 3, accused No. 5-Laxman, Hira-accused No. 10 and one Kishan, and brought to the rear of the house of Govind; and while the packets were being taken inside the house of Govind, Inspector Bhesadia raided the place. By the time Bhesadia had come, 17 bags were taken inside the house of Govind, and only one was lying outside. On realising that Bhesadia had come, others ran away and only accused Nos 1, 2, 3 and Kashinath and Ismail were found there. Thus, in the smuggling of gold in this trip, according to the prosecution, accused Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 participated. So also prosecution witnesses Kashinath and Devchand and Ismail participated. These are the overt acts on which the prosecution relies in support of its case.

Now, the defence of the accused in general was one of denial. According to accused Nos. 1 to 3, gold was lying in the beach and it was Bhesadia who brought it into his (Govind's) house. The other accused denied their presence or participation in any of these trips. According to them, their statements were taken by coercion and by administering threat to them. It is not necessary to go into details of the defence raised by these various accused. We will refer to the defence of these three appellants when we deal with the evidence against each of the three appellants.

Now, the evidence tendered by the prosecution in support of its case may be briefly stated: As already stated, Kashinath, who had participated in all the five trips, i.e. the reconnaissance trip and the four trips in which gold was brought; Devchand, who had participated in the second and the fourth trips, and Dharma, who had participated in the second and the third trips, have been examined as prosecution witnesses. Dharma, however, has turned hostile to the prosecution. He no doubt in his evidence admitted that his boat was taken by Govind on these two occasions i.e. 2nd and the 3rd trips, but he denies having gone in the boat himself. The evidence of Kashinath fully supports and corroborates the prosecution case stated above. Similarly, Devchand's evidence also fully corroborates the prosecution case relating to the 2nd and the 4th trips. The prosecution also has filed the statements of Kashinath and Devchand recorded under s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, by way of corroboration to the evidence of these two witnesses. The prosecution has also filed the statements of the various accused recorded under s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act. We have already stated that these statements are detailed ones and fully support and corroborate the prosecution case but only in respect of the trips in which each one of them has participated.

Besides the statements of these various accused, recorded under s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, the other documentary evidence tendered by the prosecution consists of Ex. S, a chit found on the person of Ismail in the search made on the night of August 13, 1961, i.e. when Bhesadia raided the place. We have already stated that this chit is in code words, and we would presently show that some of the code words in the chit are also found in some of the foreign telegrams received at the address where Ayub was residing near the J.J. Hospital. The prosecution has also tendered in evidence through its witness Mohiddinkhan, P.W. 5, the leave and license agreement for 11 months of date August 1, 1960, executed by accused No. 9 in favour of his landlord Mohiddinkhan, P.W. 5, which is Ex. E in the case. Accused No. 9 has admitted the execution of this document and has also admitted that he was living in the room from August 1, 1960 to June 1961. Mohiddinkhan has deposed that Issak Mohamed, P.W. 4, who is a relation of accused No. 9, had approached him for securing a room for accused No. 9's residence, as accused No. 9 had recently got married. He has further stated that the accused lived with his wife in the room for about a couple of months after taking the room. Thereafter his wife went to her native place. He further found that there were a number of persons visiting accused No. 9 at night time, and one night at about 2 a.m. one person disclosing himself as Haji Sattar was shouting from the streets for Ayub. As Ayub was occupying one of the rooms in his flat, he was disturbed by the nocturnal activities of Ayub and he, therefore, refused to renew the leave and license agreement. According to him, the agreement was not renewed and, therefore, accused No. 9 ceased residing there from June 1961. Mohiddinkhan has also further deposed that at the time of the termination of the leave and license, he had returned the deposit of Rs. 3,000 to accused No. 9 for which he had executed a receipt. That receipt has, however, not been produced in this case. The explanation given by him was that when his house was white-washed, the receipt has been lost. Mohiddinkhan has also further deposed that telegrams on the address of Ayub used to come from foreign countries. In absence of Ayub, at times he or his wife had received them on behalf of accused No. 9. Letters also were received from foreign countries, and some of them had the postage mark of Kuwait. Copies of 13 foreign telegrams—Z-51 to Z-63—addressed to one Salim C/o Accused No. 9 at his address in the flat of Mohiddinkhan have been produced by the prosecution. P.W. 35, Sumant Mastakar, an employee of Foreign Telegraph branch, has been examined as a witness, and he has deposed that the copies produced by him are flimsy copies of the foreign telegrams received. According to him, when the foreign telegrams are received, the teleprinter prints two copies; one copy is delivered to the addressee and the second copy remains in the office and that is called the flimsy copy. The flimsy copies of these 13 telegrams, as already stated, have been filed in this case. Along with these copies the delivery memos in respect of these telegrams have also been filed. However, no evidence has been tendered in proof of the fact that the delivery memos are signed by accused No. 9 or for him by witness Mohiddinkhan. The delivery memos are purported to have been signed by Ayub. Some signatures are in English, one in Urdu and one in Gujarati. These documents Z-51 to Z-63 when compared with Ex. S, the chit found on the person of Ismail, disclose that there are certain common code words e.g. Sajid, Paman, Abhal, Dubez etc. frequently appearing in these telegrams. These telegrams are of the period between April 11, 1961 to August 8, 1961. All these telegrams are from Dubai, and the 2nd, 3rd and the 4th trips, to which we have referred, are between this period. The panchnama made on the night of August 13 further discloses that on 11 out of the 18 gunny bags, there were written words "Dubai" and the words on the remaining bags were very faint, and therefore, not decipherable.

The prosecution also has examined Issak Lakhi, P.W. 4. Issak corroborates the evidence of the landlord Mohiddinkhan. It is through his intervention that Mohiddinkhan had given the room in his flat near the J. J. Hospital to accused No. 9, Ayub, in August 1960 for a period of 11 months. Issak is a relation of accused No. 9, being his mother's sister's son. He has deposed that the business of accused No. 9 is plying a truck. He has a truck of his own. He came to Bombay sometime in 1956 and was staying with him (witness). Later, he got married and then took the room in the flat of Mohiddinkhan. His truck as well as the truck of accused No. 9 was plied in the business concern known as Kapadia Transport. He has further deposed that one Ahmed Gorabhai, a Pakistani national, came to India in December 1960. Gorabhai is a brother-in-law of accused No. 9, their wives being sisters. Both accused No. 9 and Gorabhai came to his place with a request that he should find a driver for the car of Gorabhai. He showed two drivers, out of which Salim P.W. 10, was selected by him as his driver. According to him, he had visited Gorabhai 4 or 5 times. Gorabhai was residing at the time with his family in a flat in Duru Mahal, and on the occasions he visited Gorabhai in this flat, he used to see besides his family members, Haji Sattar, accused No. 15, and Haji Bhai, accused 14. He has given description of Haji Sattar as of sallow complexion having one golden tooth. Haji Bhai has been described as a person having a Namaj mark on his forehead and was wearing glasses. Similar descriptions of these two accused has also been given by accused No. 1, Govind, in his confession, Kashinath in his evidence, and Dave, the estate agent, Salim, driver of accused Nos. 14 and 15, Yusuf, their cook, and Maladwalla, the landlord of the "Avillion" in which accused Nos. 14 and 15 had taken a flat. In fact, there is no dispute in this case as to the identity of accused Nos. 14 and 15, and that they were residing at Duru Mahal and had taken another flat in "Avillion". The witness has stated that accused No. 9 was in Bombay till the end of August 1961 when he took away his truck. He left Bombay and went to his native place Panoli, a place near Ankleshwar in Gujarat.

Salim, P.W. 10, has deposed that he was working as a motor driver for persons residing in Duru Mahal from May 9, 1960 to May 1961. The name of his master was Mr. Haji, accused No. 14. Both Haji Mohamed and Haji Sattar were brothers. Both Haji Sattar and Haji Mohamed spoke Gujarati or Memon language. They had two cars. One was a Plymouth car, bearing No. BYZ 4280. The colour of the Plymouth car was blue, but the top was painted white. It may be noticed that the gold carried in the second trip was in a car of blue colour with a white top. The other car was an Ambassador, bearing No. BMC 1400 of cement colour and blue strips in the middle. It may be noticed that the gold carried in the third trip was in a small car of blueish colour. Salim was driving both these cars as ordered by his master. The masters were also driving the cars at times. Similarly, accused No. 9 Ayub was also driving these cars. He has identified accused No. 9 as the person who was also driving these two cars. Further he has identified accused No. 9 as the person staying near the J. J. Hospital. According to this witness, accused No. 9 used to come to Duru Mahal to his masters accused Nos. 14 and 15, every day at about 9 or 10 a.m. and was also having his lunch there. Sometimes, he used to stay late at night and at times he had to reach accused No. 9 to his room near the J. J. Hospital in the car. He further states that as his masters, accused Nos. 14 and 15, had another residence at Malabar Hill, he used to drive them there along with accused No. 9. They used to visit this flat at times, once in four days or ten days or fifteen days. One Gorabhai was staying there. Out of the two cars, one used to remain at Duru Mahal and the other at the flat at Malabar Hill. The visits of his masters to this flat were of very short duration of few hours. About four months after joining his services, Haji Mohamed's family left for Pakistan. The Plymouth car which was seized during the inquiry from the compound of a place, "Kotak Kunj" at Babulnath Road, was identified by him as the car belonging to his master. It would be noticed that though accused No. 9's relation Issak has deposed that Ahmed Gorabhai was living in the same flat with accused Nos. 14 and 15, and that he had given Salim as driver to Gorabhai, the evidence of Salim is quite contrary that Gorabhai was living at "Avillion" and Salim was engaged as a driver not by Gorabhai but by accused Nos. 14 and 15.

P.W. 6, John D'souza, a motor repairer, and P.W. 7, Asrani, working at the All Cars Services, have deposed that the aforesaid two cars, namely, the Plymouth and the Ambassador cars, belonged to the two muslim persons, accused Nos. 14 and 15, residing at Duru Mahal and were repaired and serviced by them.

Yusuf Bhora, P.W. 11, has deposed that he worked as a cook in Duru Mahal for accused Nos. 14 and 15, from October 1960, and left the services on June 4, 1961. He was attending to his duty at about 9 or 9.30 a.m. in the morning and used to be in the flat till about 9.30 p.m. In the flat were staying—Haji Mohamed, accused No. 14, Haji Sattar, accused No. 15, and their son-in-law Haji Suleman. Their family stayed in the flat for about a month and a half. The pay was paid to him by accused No. 14. He knew Gorabhai, who had at times visited the flat of his master, and on some occasions stayed there for the whole day. He, however, did not know where Gorabhai was staying. He corroborates the evidence of driver Salim, that his masters had two cars—the Plymouth and the Ambassador. He also identifies the seized Plymouth car as the car belonging to his master. A fortnight before June 4, 1961, accused Nos. 14 and 15 left the flat, and gave him notice for the termination of his services. The furniture in the flat was removed by accused No. 9, 3 or 4 days after accused Nos. 14 and 15 had left the place. He was present when the furniture was removed. He was asked by his master to attend the flat when the furniture was to be removed by accused No. 9 and, therefore, he had attended. He removed the furniture with the help of 3 or 4 coolies and carried it away in a truck. The key of the flat was handed over by accused No. 9 to the owner of the flat. It is not in dispute that the owner of the flat is one Mrs. Athaide. After that, he saw neither, accused No. 9, nor accused No. 14, nor accused No. 15. He admits that there was a telephone in the flat. This witness also corroborates that accused No. 9 was in the flat at Duru Mahal during the day, was taking his lunch there and moved in the cars of his master.

P.W. 16, Dave, is an estate agent. He deposes that Dr. Athaide, the owner of the flat had asked him to get a licensee for the flat. The flat was in the name of his wife. At the material time the flat was vacant. About three months prior to the occupation of this flat by accused Nos. 14 and 15, the flat had fallen vacant. He, however, kept the flat with himself and paid the rent thereof. He had advertised the flat in the "Times of India", and in response, one Mistry introduced him to accused No. 14. He wanted a furnished flat with a telephone. Ultimately, the aforesaid flat in Duru Mahal was given on leave and license basis in May 1960 to accused No. 14. It had a telephone and the number was 242935. The description given by him of accused No. 14 is the same as that given by Salim, the driver and Yusuf, the cook. At times he used to visit the flat in connection with the flat amenities. Five or six months after accused No. 14 occupied the flat in Duru Mahal, he wanted another flat, and also wanted a garage for their car near it. He along with accused No. 14 and another named Ayub Kassam Kika had gone in their car to find a place and a garage. He had shown them a flat in "Avillion" at Malabar Hill. It was approved by accused No. 14 and Ayub Kassam. In one of the visits to this flat, accused No. 9 also had accompanied accused No. 14. After approving the flat, Hajibhai, accused No. 14, told him that he would like to have the tenancy agreement in respect of this flat in "Avillion" in the name of two persons Ayub Kassim Kika and Ayub Mohamed. He accordingly conveyed the desire of accused No. 14 to the landlord of "Avillion", one Maladwalla. The agreement was drafted. The man who called himself as Ayub Kassim Kika signed it. Ayub Mohamed did not sign in his presence. Accused No. 14 told him that he would get the agreement signed by Ayub Mohamed and then give him back the agreement. Later on, the agreement was given to him and it bore the signatures of both Ayub Kassim Kika and Ayub Mohamed. It is necessary to note that the witness has not identified accused No. 9, Ayub as the person who has signed as Ayub Kassim Kika. The aforesaid agreement purporting to have been signed by Ayub Kassim Kika and Ayub Mohamed is Ex. "I". About a week thereafter, a garage nearby was also hired by them. He identified the Plymouth car in the Court as the car of accused No. 14. The possession of flat in Duru Mahal which was in occupation of accused No. 14 was surrendered by accused No. 9 to the landlord. On the document of surrender accused No. 9 had signed as Ayub Mohamed and it is at that time that he learnt that the name of accused No. 9 was Ayub Mohamed. He also at times found in his visit to the flat in Duru Mahal Ayub Kassam Kika besides accused No. 9. The aforesaid evidence of Dave shows that though the real name of accused No. 9 was Ayub Kassim Kika, he was posing as Ayub Mohamed; while another person was posing as Ayub Kassim Kika. The evidence also discloses that at the time of his visits to the flat in Duru Mahal, he used to find accused No. 9 there and accused No. 9 had also accompanied accused No. 14 in one of the visits for the approval of the flat in "Avillion," and it is accused No. 9 who had delivered possession of the flat to the landlord. Accused No. 9, though he has admitted visits to accused Nos. 14 and 15 in the flat at Duru Mahal, as well as to the flat in "Avillion", has denied that he had anything to do either with the fixation of the tenancy of the flat in "Avillion" or the surrender of flat in Duru Mahal or the removal of the furniture therefrom. To this we would advert when we deal with the case against accused No. 9.

Maladwalla, P.W. 8, is the landlord of the "Avillion". He has deposed that he also stays in another flat in the same building since about February 1961. Flat No. 9 on the third floor was given to Ayub Kassim Kika and Ayub Mohamed in November 1960. Both Ayub Kassim Kika and Ayub Mohamed had signed the tenancy agreement in his presence. According to him, his tenants spoke in Gujarati and were Memons. The description given by this witness of his tenants Ayub Kassim Kika and Ayub Mohamed tallies with the description of accused Nos. 14 and 15 given by the other witnesses. It can reasonably be inferred that in taking this flat, accused Nos. 14 and 15 were posing themselves as Ayub Kassim Kika and Ayub Mohamed, hiding their real identity. He has further deposed that none of these persons was present in Court. These persons had two cars, the big one had blue and white colour and the other was an Ambassador. The flat taken on lease was not occupied regularly or continuously by any person, but on occasions it was visited. His tenants had given him a telephone number in case he (Maladwalla) wanted to contact them. The telephone number was noted by him in his diary, and referring to the diary he has deposed that the number was 242935. It is to be noticed that this telephone number was of the telephone in the flat in occupation of accused Nos. 14 and 15 in Duru Mahal. The reason given by him for giving this telephone number was that as the tenants were not continuously occupying the flat, he should be in a position to contact them in case the rent of the flat was not regularly received by him. On this telephone number he had contacted them on 2 or 3 occasions, and that was in connection with the delay in the matter of payment of rent. He has further deposed that Ayub Kassim Kika and Ayub Mohamed are the names given to him by these two Gujarati speaking Memons at the time of the execution of the document. At the time of taking the flat, they had told him that they were taking this flat for their mother. Later they told him that as she was not coming, they were leaving the flat. The possession of this flat was handed over to him in May 1961. According to him, his tenants were introduced to him by estate agent Dave.

Lallubhai, P.W. 9, is the person who had occupied the flat in Duru Mahal on its possession being handed back to the landlord by accused No. 9. According to him, he occupied the flat from June 15, 1961, and stayed there for 7 months. Ex. M filed in the case is a leave and license agreement executed by him in favour of Dr. Athaide. Five or six days before the execution of this agreement, he had visited the flat. At that time he saw two men and one woman in the flat. They looked like Memons and spoke Gujarati language. One of them showed him the flat. He was a young man of fair complexion of height 5'6". He had parted hair in the middle. He had no opportunity to see the other man. The man who showed him the flat told him that the real tenant of the flat had gone away and possession of the flat would be given on June 11. Sometime after he occupied the flat, he started receiving bills for the telephone, the number of which was 242935, for the arrears of the telephone bills relating to the period in occupation of the previous tenants. He wrote to the landlord Mrs. Athaide at Poona and also paid the bills to Dave as the line was threatened to be cut. These telephone bills were produced at the time the evidence of this witness was recorded, which were handed over back to the Customs Officer, and seized from him under a panchnama. We have already stated that this flat was searched on September 16, 1961, by Dy. Supdt. of Excise, Mr. Chipkar, P.W. 23. Dave in his evidence has also stated that after the flat in Duru Mahal had been vacated, it was given to Lallubhai. As regards the arrears of telephone bills paid by Lallubhai, Dave has deposed that he had in this connection seen accused No. 14 in the Sea Face Hotel in July 1961 and accused No. 14 paid him Rs. 200.

Devchand, P.W. 2, who, according to the prosecution, had taken part in the second and the fourth trips, has deposed that he waited for 4 or 5 days after gold had been brought in the second trip, and thereafter he went to accused No. 1's place, as no payment was made to him; and demanded money for assisting him in the second trip. Govind told him that he had no money, but asked him to wait. He then called his wife and asked her to give him the chit. She took out a chit from the purse and gave it to Govind. A telephone number was noted on the chit in Marathi. Accused No. 1 told him:

"Dial that number and say 'halo', 'halo' and ask for Kanti, and on being asked as to who was phoning, say that 'I was Pant'. If the person answering says that he is Kanti, tell him to meet him (Govind) at 10 a.m. at Mahim."

The witness then rang up the number written on the chit. The number written was 242935. It may be noticed that this telephone number was of the flat in Duru Mahal in occupation of accused Nos. 14 and 15. After the connection was established, the person at the other end asked him who he was. He replied that he was Pant. Then the person on the other end replied that he was Kanti. He then gave him the message to meet Govind at Mahim the next day at 10 a.m. The man at the other end said that he will. He then returned back to Govind and gave him the message. The next day, Govind asked him to accompany him to Mahim. He, therefore, went to Mahim with accused No. 1. They went near a Christian Church at the bus stop at Mahim. They saw a car standing there. He stood at a distance and Govind went near the car. There were two persons in the car. One of them got down and talked to Govind for about 10 to 15 minutes. Then the man entered the car and the car went away. Govind told him that that man was their Seth. They then returned to Versova and next day Govind paid him Rs. 500. The chit on which the telephone number was written remained with him for 2 or 3 days and thereafter he returned the same to Govind. The description given by this witness of the man who came out of the car and talked to Govind tallies with the description of accused No. 14. The aforesaid evidence of Devchand establishes close connection between accused Nos. 1 and 14 and 15. In the cross-examination of Devchand, it has been brought out that he has not received much education, he was illiterate. He could read Marathi figures only 1 to 100. He cannot read English figures. It had been put to him that he was deposing falsely when he stated that he rang No. 242935, but he denied the same. In view of the aforesaid admissions, we were in the beginning hesitant in accepting this part of the evidence of this witness, which has been accepted by the learned Judge of the trial Court, but we find the other circumstances in the case which indicate that this part of the evidence of this witness is true. It would be noticed that on August 13, 1961, the smuggling operations were detected. On August 15, the statements of five persons, i.e. accused Nos. 1 to 3, Kashinath and Ismail were recorded. Though in the statement of Govind, mention was made of the flat in "Avillion," there was no mention of the flat in Duru Mahal in occupation of accused Nos. 14 and 15, nor was the telephone number of the flat in Duru Mahal disclosed by any of them. The flat in "Avillion" was searched on August 16, 1961, but the flat in Duru Mahal had not been searched till a month thereafter. Now, it is in the evidence of Devchand that noticing that the police had come on August 13, 1961, he along with some other accused ran from the spot and next morning, accused No. 5, accused No. 6, he himself, and Dharma Pandu left Versova and went to Uttan a place near Bassein. They stayed in Uttan for four or five days, where they met accused No. 7, who told them that the police were visiting their house. Therefore, he and accused Nos. 5, 6 and 7 left Uttan and went to another place called Kalan. There they stayed for 20-25 days. His maternal uncle then came, took him to Bombay and produced him before Mr. Ranadive. His statement has been recorded by Ranadive on September 8, 1961. It is thereafter on September 16, 1961, that the flat in Duru Mahal has been searched. This shows that the fact that the flat in Duru Mahal was in occupation of accused Nos. 14 and 15 was for the first time became known to the Inquiring Officers after the statement of Devchand had been recorded. On the record the statements of accused Nos. 1 to 3 and Kashinath have been placed. Ismail also was another person who was found at the spot. His statement also has been recorded on August 15, 1961, but it has not been placed on record, possibly because Ismail could not be examined, he having absconded. However, Mr. Gandhi, learned counsel for the prosecution, has stated before us that he has ascertained that Ismail's statement does not disclose either the telephone number of the flat in Duru Mahal or that accused Nos. 14 and 15 were living in Duru Mahal. His statement discloses that Ismail was taken only to the flat in "Avillion". There is also another circumstance which indicates that the fact that the flat in Duru Mahal was in occupation of accused Nos. 14 and 15 was known to the Inquiry Officers only from the statement of Devchand. Now as already stated, Devchand's statement was recorded on September 8. The flat in Duru Mahal was searched on September 16. At that time the flat was in occupation of Lallubhai, P.W. 9, whose evidence we have already discussed. The telephone bills for arrears for the period of occupation of accused Nos. 14 and 15 were seized at that time. On that day, Lallubhai's statement was recorded. It is only thereafter that statements of persons connected with this flat during the time of its occupation by accused Nos. 14 and 15 have been recorded. The statement of Dave, the estate agent, was recorded on September 23. The statement of Salim, the motor driver, was recorded on September 27. The statement of Yusuf, the cook, was recorded on September 27, and the statement of Issak, who was an occasional visitor to this flat was recorded on September 29. This being the other evidence on record, we see no reason to discard this part of the statement of Devchand. We have, therefore, no hesitation in agreeing with the learned Magistrate that this part of the evidence of Devchand is true, and as already stated, this part of his evidence establishes a very close association between Govind and accused Nos. 14 and 15. It is in Govind's house that the smuggled gold was found and since that time, accused Nos. 14 and 15 could not be traced and have absconded, and it is not in dispute that they have absconded.

There is also another piece of evidence which establishes close association between Govind and accused Nos. 14 and 15, and that is the evidence of Salastekar, P.W. 18. He is a practising advocate of 32 years' standing. He has deposed that he prepared an agreement for the sale of a mechanised launch on March 11, 1961. The draft is put on record at Z-A. The draft shows that for a consideration of Rs. 39,000 one Ibrahim, a resident in Jam Balai in Saurashtra, sold the mechanised launch "Safina Mohamedi" bearing registration No. BP 338 to Bhaskar Bhavnya Peve, who is accused No. 3 in the case, and who is the cousin of Govind. It may be noticed that this Bhaskar was in the house of Govind when the gold was seized. Now, the evidence of Salastekar discloses that on the day he prepared the agreement of sale, five persons had come to his house—two Mahomedans very finely dressed, the vendor of the launch, who appeared to the witness to have hailed from Saurashtra, and two Kolis. One of the Kolis told him that his brother wanted to purchase a motor launch and they wanted him to draft an agreement in respect of the said sale. He then asked the names of the vendor and the vendee, the sale price, the name of the mechanised launch, and then prepared the draft. He also prepared a draft of the receipt to be given by the seller to the purchaser on receipt of consideration. The draft prepared is in his own hand and that has been produced in Court as Z-8. On the basis of the said draft, a final agreement was engrossed on a stamp paper of Rs. 1.50 and was executed. The well-dressed gentleman counted notes one by one and they were paid to the vendor. A net cash of Rs. 39,000 was paid in his presence. These persons went back in a shining big car. The witness has identified accused No. 3 as the purchaser of the launch. In view of the statement of this witness that one of the Kolis had told him that his brother wanted to purchase the boat, it could be reasonably inferred that the other person was Govind though he has not been identified by Salastekar in Court. In any event, the evidence of Salastekar establishes that in the name of accused No. 3, who was undoubtedly in the conspiracy, a mechanised launch "Safina Mohamedi" was purchased in March 1961, but the price was paid by the well dressed Muslim gentleman who came in a big shining car. It could reasonably be inferred that they were accused Nos. 14 and 15. To this conclusion of fact, the confession of accused No. 1 lends complete assurance that the launch was purchased by accused No. 14. Mr. Kalkundre, P.W. 21, was Sub-Inspector in charge of Customs House at the material time. He has deposed that it was part of his duty to keep the record of arrivals and departures of vessels at and from Versova. From the record, he has deposed that "Safina Mohamedi" arrived at Versova on March 9, 1961. It was in Versova port from March, 3, 1961 to March 20, 1961. During the period it was in port, it was sold by the previous owner to accused No. 3. He identified accused No. 3 as the purchaser of the vessel "Safina Mohamedi". An application for transfer of the vessel in the name of accused No. 3 has been exhibited at Z-14. Z-12 is a copy of the register showing that "Safina Mohamedi" was transferred in the name of accused No. 3. It is the prosecution case that this mechanised boat "Safina Mohamedi" was after its purchase used for bringing gold from the Persian Gulf to Indian shore in the second and the third trips, and also in the 4th trip but under a changed name "Ali Sabri". There is however no substantive evidence to support the prosecution case. The confession of accused No. 4 states that gold was brought in the second trip in "Safina Mohamedi" and in the third trip in "Mohamed". The evidence of Kashinath is to the effect that in the second and the third trips the same boat came.

Then there is the evidence of P.W. 35, Mastakar, an official from the Telegraphic Office in the Foreign Telegrams Branch. We have already stated that he had produced the flimsy copies of the foreign telegrams received in the name of Salim c/o accused No. 9 at his address at the room in the flat of Mohiddinkhan P.W. 5, near the J. J. Hospital. We have already dealt with these telegrams. They are 13 in number, Z-51 to Z-63. They are of the period between April 11, 1961 to August 8, 1961, the period relating to the second, third and the fourth trips. The last telegram Z-63 is of date August 8, 1961, and the boat carrying gold arrived in Versova on August 13, 1961. It is in evidence that 5 or 6 days are required for a boat to come from the Persian Gulf to India. The date on the chit found from the person of Ismail Ex. 5, is August 7, 1961. The code words like "Sajid, Paman, Abbal" frequently occurring in the telegrams are also found in Ex. 6 which is seized from the person of Ismail. There is also in Exhs. Z-62 and Z-63 found the word "pante". Then there is the evidence of the Customs Officers: Warti, the Superintendent under whose directions the inquiry has been made, and the Deputy Superintendents, Ranadive, Chipkar, Karnik, Rane, Poplay and Mohan Das. Messrs. Warti, Ranadive, Rane and Mohandas have recorded the statements of these different accused persons as well as other persons. Chipkar has searched the flat at Duru Mahal and the flat in "Avillion" has been searched by Karnik. It is not necessary to deal in detail with the evidence of these witnesses. We would, later, refer to their evidence relevant for the purpose of considering the specific cases against accused Nos. 5, 8 and 9.

Now, it is not in dispute before us that on the aforesaid evidence, clearly a conspiracy to smuggle gold evading the prohibition as well as defrauding the Government of its dues has been clearly established. It is also not in dispute that such a conspiracy did exist between some un-known persons in the Persian Gulf, accused Nos. 14 and 15, and the persons found in the house of Govind at the time when gold was seized on August 13, 1961, i.e. accused Nos. 1 to 3, Kashinath and Ismail. The only question that has been urged before us on behalf of the appellants-accused Nos. 5, 8 and 9 is that the evidence on record does not establish that these accused had in any manner participated in the conspiracy or were in any manner concerned with the smuggling of gold. We would, therefore, in brief state the prosecution case against each of the three accused and the evidence on the basis of which the learned Magistrate has convicted them.

Accused No. 5: Laxman Padma Bhagat is a fisherman of Versova. According to the prosecution, he has participated in the 2nd, 3rd and the 4th trips. He was waiting at the shore when gold was brought in a local boat to the shore of Versova in the second trip. He was also waiting at the shore when the local boat brought gold to the shore of Versova in the third trip. He thereafter carried the packages from the shore to the house of Govind and then put them in the luggage boot of the car. In the 4th trip also he removed gold from the shore to the house of accused No. 1, Govind. But when he discovered that the police party had come, he along with accused Nos. 6 and 7 and witness Devchand ran away. The prosecution also alleges that he had participated in the transfer of the mechanised vessel "Safina Mohamedi" to accused No. 3. The evidence on the basis of which the prosecution has placed reliance to prove these overt acts against accused No. 5, is the evidence of these two witnesses Kashinath and Devchand. The confession of accused No. 5 himself was recorded by Ranadive on September 8, 1961, Ex. Z-18. The prosecution has also placed reliance on the confession of co-accused Nos. 1, 3, 6, 7 and 10 in support of the case. We have already stated that the defence is one of denial, and the accused had stated that he had not made any voluntary confession. The learned Magistrate has based the conviction on the basis of the evidence of Kashinath and Devchand as well as the confession of accused No. 5 and the confessions of co-accused Nos. 1, 2, 3, 6, 7 and 10.

Accused No. 8: The case of the prosecution against accused No. 8 is that he had participated in the third trip as well as the fourth trip. In the third trip he came with accused No. 15. Accused No. 15 had introduced him to accused No. 1 as the man of his confidence. After gold had been placed in the car, he along with accused No. 9, accused No. 15 and accused No. 4 went in that car. In the 4th trip, he was waiting near the house of accused No. 1 with a car, to carry gold. He and Ismail had some talk, but as the police raided Govind's house, he ran away. The evidence on which reliance has been placed by the prosecution is the evidence of Kashinath, the confession of Govind, accused No. 1, and the confession of accused No. 4. The prosecution also relies on the conduct or attitude adopted by accused No. 8 in giving replies to the show cause notice issued to him, as to why the gold found on the night of 13th should not be confiscated. The learned Magistrate has founded the conviction on the evidence of Kashinath, and confessions of co-accused Nos. 1 and 4 only.

Accused No. 9: The prosecution case against accused No. 9 had been that he had participated in all the trips as well as the reconnaissance trip. It is he who had fixed the place of rendezvous between the foreign vessel and the local boat. In the first trip, he along with others went in the local boat to meet the foreign vessel at the place fixed on the previous day. He and accused No. 15 then boarded the foreign vessel and these two persons along with gold and one Ismail returned back to Versova in the local boat. On that night, they slept in the house of Govind, and next morning Kashinath was asked to put on 2 jackets and Hira was asked to put on 2 jackets under their clothes and then Kashinath, Hira, accused No. 15, Ismail and accused No. 9 left Versova by bus and came to Andheri, and from Andheri they went by local train to Matunga. There, accused No. 9, Kashinath and Hira went in a taxi and Ismail and accused No. 15 went in a different way. Accused No. 9 then took Kashinath and Hira to his room, and there Kashinath and Hira gave the two jackets to accused No. 9 which he put in a steel almirah in his room. Accused No. 9 then gave them Rs. 5 each. In the second trip, accused No. 9 along with accused No. 15 were waiting in the car, and he along with accused No. 15 carried gold in that car, after it had been put in the luggage boot. In the third trip also he came in the car and carried gold in the car. At this time, it is accused No. 9 who himself drove the car. In the 4th trip also he had gone to the house of Govind and was waiting near the car to carry gold, along with accused No. 8. But as the police raided the house of Govind, he along with accused No. 8 ran away. The evidence on which reliance has been placed by the prosecution is the evidence of Kashinath, his own confession, Ex. Z-33, and the confession of accused Nos. 1, 4 and 10. Besides this, the prosecution has also referred to the evidence of his landlord Mohiddinkhan, in whose flat he was residing, as well as the evidence of the estate agent, Dave, Salim, the motor driver, and Yusuf the cook, to show his close association with accused Nos. 14 and 15. The learned Magistrate has principally founded the conviction on the evidence of Kashinath, and confessions of accused No. 9 and those of co-accused Nos. 1 and 10 read with the aforesaid evidence.

Before we consider all this evidence on merits, it is necessary to deal with legal arguments advanced as to the admissibility of certain evidence. This case has been elaborately argued by Mr. Kavlekar, learned counsel for accused No. 8, Mr. Jethmalani, learned counsel for accused No. 5 and Mr. Pardiwalla, learned counsel for accused No. 9. We will first deal with the contentions which have been raised and/or adopted by counsel for all the accused.

We would first deal with the admissibility of confessions of accused Nos. 5, 8 and 9 as against themselves as well as the confessions of their co-accused. In the first instance, it is contended that under s. 25 of the Indian Evidence Act, these confessions are inadmissible in evidence. That section provides that no confession made to a police officer shall be proved as against a person accused of any offence. We have already stated that the confessions have been recorded either by Warti, Superintendent in the Central Excise Department, or by Deputy Superintendents, Ranadive, Rane and Mohandas, also of the Central Excise Department. It is the argument of Mr. Jethmalani that on a true construction of the provisions of the Evidence Act and Central Excise Act an officer of the Central Excise Department is a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Act. Reliance in this connection is placed on the decision reported in Raja Ram v. State of Bihar.¹ Mr. Gandhi, learned counsel for the prosecution, on the other hand, contends that on a true construction of the provisions of the Central Excise Act, an officer of the Central Excise is not a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act, and in the alternative, he further argued that at any rate, in dealing with this case, the officers concerned were not acting in their capacity as excise officers but were acting in their capacity as customs officers, and that a customs officer is not a police officer. He has placed reliance in support of his contention on the decision of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in State of Punjab v. Barkat Ram.² It is not in dispute that the aforesaid officers who have recorded the confessions are officers of the Central Excise Department. The first question, therefore, that arises is whether they are also Customs Officers. There can hardly be any dispute that the present case which has been inquired into by them is a case falling under the Customs Act. The prosecution itself is for offences falling under s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act read with s. 120-B Indian Penal Code. Mr. Gandhi in the course of his argument has brought to our notice two notifications on which he places reliance to show that these officers are also officers of Customs Department. The first notification is issued by the Central Board of Revenue, bearing C.B.R. Notification No. 56-Customs, dated July 24, 1951, and No. 33, dated March 1, 1952 and No. 77-Customs, dated September 26, 1953. It is issued by the Central Board of Revenue in exercise of the powers conferred on it by sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Land Customs Act, 1924. Sub-section (1) of s. 3 of that Act provides that the Central Government may, by notification in the official gazette, appoint, for any area adjoining a foreign frontier and specified in the notification, a person to be the Collector of Land Customs and such other persons as it thinks fit to be Land Customs Officers. Sub-section (2) of s. 3 empowers the Central Government to delegate its aforesaid powers of appointment to the Chief Customs authority. It is not in dispute that the Chief Customs authority is the Central Board of Revenue. It is also not in dispute that the Central Government had validly delegated its power under sub-s. (1) of s. 3 to the Central Board of Revenue. Now, by the aforesaid notification No. 56-Customs, dated July 24, 1951, the Central Board of Revenue appointed all Deputy Collectors, Assistant Collectors, Headquarters Assistant Collectors, Superintendents, Deputy Superintendents, Inspectors, Nakedars, Supervisors, Range Officers, Assistant Range Officers, Women Searchers, Jamadars, Petty Officers, Amaldars, Sepoys and Peons, including all the officers of Central Excise employed for the time being in Central Excise Preventive Intelligence work and attached to the Headquarters of the Collectorate of Central Excise, Delhi, Calcutta, Patna, Shillong, Madras, Bombay and Baroda, to be Land Customs Officers within the jurisdiction of the respective Collectors of Land Customs under whom they were working. It is not in dispute that Mr. Wartti, Superintendent and the Deputy Superintendents, who had recorded the confessions, had been working at the material time at the headquarters of the Collectorate of Central Excise, Bombay. It is also not in dispute that they had been doing the Central Excise Preventive Intelligence work at the relevant time. By reason of this notification, therefore, the aforesaid officers are also the Land Customs Officers within the jurisdiction of the Collectorate of Bombay. Then we come to the second notification dated September 29, 1951. This notification is issued under s. 6 of the Sea Customs Act, and it is issued by the Central Government in exercise of its powers under s. 6 of the Sea Customs Act. Section 6 of the Sea Customs Act provides that "The Central Government may appoint such persons as it thinks fit to be officers of Customs, and to exercise the powers conferred, and perform the duties imposed, by this Act on such officers." Now, in exercise of this power, the aforesaid notification has been issued, and the material part of the notification reads:

"the Central Government hereby appoints all the Land Customs Officers who have been appointed or may be appointed from time to time to be such under sub-section (1) of section 3 of the Land Customs Act, 1924 (XIX of 1924), to be officers of Customs for their respective jurisdictions and to exercise the powers conferred and to perform the duties imposed on such officers by the first named Act."

The effect of this notification is that all persons who have been appointed under

s. 3 of the Land Customs Act as Land Customs Officers, are, by virtue of this notification, automatically appointed as Officers under the Sea Customs Act. Mr. Pardiwalla, however, argues that on reading these two notifications, it may appear that the officers who have recorded the confessions were officers under the Land Customs Act, but they have not been in law validly appointed officers under the Sea Customs Act by reason of the notification dated September 29, 1951. According to Mr. Pardiwalla, the Central Government has no power under s. 6 to appoint an officer by a notification. According to him, the appointment must be by name. The argument is founded on the difference in the language between sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Land Customs Act and the language used in s. 6 of the Sea Customs Act. It is his argument that sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Land Customs Act mentions "by a notification", while in s. 6 of the Sea Customs Act such a phraseology has not been used. It is true that the words "by a notification" do not occur in s. 6 of the Sea Customs Act. But then, the section also does not prescribe any particular mode by which an officer of Customs is to be appointed. The section neither says "by a notification" nor "by name". So also it does not mention that the appointment is to be made by making a separate order of appointment for each individual. Thus, there being no mode of appointment prescribed in s. 6 of the Sea Customs Act, it could be reasonably presumed that the Legislature has left it open to the Central Government to adopt any mode of appointment. It may make a general order of appointment by issuing a notification, or if found convenient, it may make appointment by issuing an order individually appointing any individual person named in the order to be an officer. In our opinion; therefore, the argument of Mr. Pardiwalla as to the invalidity of appointment of these officers as Customs Officers under this notification, must fail. In our opinion, these officers were, at the material time, validly appointed officers under the Sea Customs Act, and therefore, they were competent to exercise power conferred on them by the provisions of the Sea Customs Act. It is next argued by Mr. Pardiwalla that it may be that these officers were validly appointed Customs Officers and were competent to exercise the powers conferred on them by the Sea Customs Act, but nonetheless, they did not cease to be Officers of the Central Excise Department; and officers of the Central Excise Department are police officers within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act, and therefore, even though these officers of the Central Excise Department were acting in their capacity as officers under the Sea Customs Act and exercising powers thereunder, they did not cease to be police officers. The argument raises two questions. The first question, therefore, is whether an officer in the Central Excise Department is a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act. If the answer to the first question is in the affirmative, the second question that arises is whether an officer of the Central Excise Department when acting in his capacity of an officer under the Sea Customs Act, still continues to be a police officer. We have already stated that the decision on which reliance has been placed in support of the contention that the officers of the Central Excise are police officers is reported in Raja Ram v. State of Bihar. Before turning to this decision, and the earlier decision of their Lordships in Barkat Ram's case, it would be convenient first to refer to certain provisions of the Central Excise and Salt Act, hereinafter referred to as the Central Excise Act, on the basis of which this contention is founded.

Chapter III of the Central Excise Act deals with the powers and duties of officers and landholders. Section 13 empowers the Central Government to confer power on the Central Excise Officers of arresting any person whom he has reason to believe to be liable to punishment under this Act. Section 14 empowers the Central Excise Officer duly empowered by the Central Government in this behalf, to summon any person whose attendance he considers necessary either to give evidence or to produce a document. Sub-section (2) of s. 14 provides that all persons so summoned shall be bound to attend, either in person or by an authorised agent, and are also bound to state the truth upon any subject respecting which they are examined, and also are bound to produce documents in their possession. Sub-section (3) provides that every such inquiry as aforesaid shall be deemed to be a "judicial proceeding" within the meaning of s. 193 and s. 228 of the Indian Penal Code. Section 15 provides that all officers of police and Customs and all officers of Government engaged in the collection of land revenue and village officers are required to assist the Central Excise officers in the execution of their duties under that Act. Sections 16 and 17 are not material. Section 18 provides that all searches made under this Act or any rules made thereunder, and all arrests made under this Act shall be carried out in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, relating respectively to searches and arrests made under that Code. Section 19 provides that every person arrested under this Act shall be forwarded without delay to the nearest Central Excise Officer empowered to send persons so arrested to a Magistrate, or if there is no such Central Excise Officer within a reasonable distance, to the officer in charge of the nearest police station. Pausing here, the examination of these sections shows that it is not every Central Excise Officer who is empowered to arrest a person or is empowered to issue a summons. It is only those officers of the Central Excise on whom such power is conferred by the Central Government. Further, it is clear that the officer of the Central Excise who is empowered to arrest would not necessarily be an officer empowered to send the arrested person to nearest Magistrate. What s. 19 provides is that when a person has been arrested by a Central Excise Officer, he must be forwarded without delay to the nearest Central Excise Officer who has been empowered to send persons arrested to a Magistrate. It is only if such an officer is not found within a reasonable distance that he is empowered to send him to the nearest police station. Section 20 provides that the police officer in charge of the police station to whom any person is forwarded under s. 19, shall either admit him to bail to appear before the Magistrate having jurisdiction, or in default of bail forward him in custody to such Magistrate. Section 21, on which the principal argument is founded, reads:

"21.(1) When any person is forwarded under section 19 to a Central Excise Officer empowered to send persons so arrested to a Magistrate, the Central Excise Officer shall proceed to inquire into the charges against him.

(2) For this purpose the Central Excise Officer may exercise the same powers and shall be subject to the same provisions as the officer-in-charge of a police station may exercise and is subject to under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, when investigating a cognizable case:

Provided that—

(a) if the Central Excise Officer is of opinion that there is sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion against the accused person, he shall either admit him to bail to appear before a Magistrate having jurisdiction in the case, or forward him in custody to such Magistrate;

(b) if it appears to the Central Excise Officer that there is not sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion against the accused person, he shall release the accused person on his executing a bond, with or without sureties as the Central Excise Officer may direct, to appear, if and when so required before the Magistrate having jurisdiction, and shall make a full report of all the particulars of the case to his official superior." It is the argument of Mr. Jetlmalani that s. 21 confers on certain officers of the Central Excise powers of the officer in charge of a police station. He is empowered to exercise all the powers which an officer of the police station can exercise under the Criminal Procedure Code in investigating a cognizable offence. He is empowered to grant bail to the suspect. There is, in fact, no difference between such officer of the Central Excise and an officer in charge of a police station. The case, therefore, fully falls within the decision of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Raja Ram Jaiswal v. State of Bihar.

The said decision in Jaiswal's case relates to the case arising out of the Bihar and Orissa Excise Act (II of 1915). Facts in brief of that case were: that a car was stopped by Excise Inspector Sinha on the Bayley Road, near the New Secretariat, Patna, at about 10 p.m. at night. The car belonged to the appellants' brother, and from the car, contraband Nepali Ganja was recovered. The material evidence incriminating the appellant was his confessional statement recorded by the Excise Inspector, and the question that arose was whether the confession was inadmissible in evidence by reason of the provisions of s. 25 of the Evidence Act. The contention raised was that the Excise Inspector was a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act. After examining the provisions of the Bihar and Orissa Act, the leading judgment summarised them in the following terms (p. 832):

"...Thus he can exercise all the powers which an officer in charge of a police station can exercise under Ch. XIV of the Code of Criminal Procedure. He can investigate into offences, record statements of the persons questioned by him, make searches, seize any articles connected with an offence under the Excise Act, arrest an accused person, grant him bail, send him up for trial before a Magistrate, file a charge sheet and so on. Thus his position in so far as offences under the Excise Act committed within the area to which his appointment extends are concerned is not different from that of an officer in charge of a police station. As regards these offences not only is he charged with the duty of preventing their commission but also with their detection and is for these purposes empowered to act in all respects as an officer in charge of a police station. No doubt, unlike an officer in charge of a police station he is not charged with the duty of the maintenance of law and order nor can he exercise the power of such officer with respect to offences under the general law or under any other special laws. But all the same, in so far as offences under the Excise Act are concerned, there is no distinction whatsoever in the nature of the powers he exercises and those which a police officer exercises in relation to the offences which it is his duty to prevent and bring to light. It would be logical, therefore, to hold that a confession recorded by him during an investigation into an excise offence cannot reasonably be regarded as anything different from a confession to a police officer. For, in conducting the investigation he exercises the powers of a police officer and the Act itself deems him to be a police officer, even though he does not belong to the police force constituted under the Police Act."

It is clear from the aforesaid observations that the expression "police officer" in s. 25 of the Evidence Act is not confined only to such officers who are appointed under the Indian Police Act, but includes also other officers who exercise the same powers as that of a police officer of a police station in respect of investigation of certain offences. The confessions recorded by them in exercise of that power of investigation into these offences would be inadmissible in evidence under s. 25 of the Evidence Act. The mere fact that they are also enjoined with duties other than investigating certain offences would not be a good reason for holding that they are not police officers provided the powers of investigation exercised by them are the powers of investigation under the Criminal Procedure Code, which are exercisable by a police officer in charge of the police station. The reason, therefore, given by their Lordships is in the following terms (p. 833):

"...The test for determining whether such a person is a 'police officer' for the purpose of S. 25 of the Evidence Act would, in our judgment, be whether the powers of a police officer which are conferred on him or which are exercisable by him because he is deemed to be an officer in charge of police station establish a direct or substantial relationship with the prohibition enacted by S. 25, that is, the recording of a confession. In other words, the test would be whether the powers are such as would tend to facilitate the obtaining by him of a confession from a suspect or a delinquent. If they do, then it is unnecessary to consider the dominant purpose for which he is appointed or the question as to what other powers he enjoys. These questions may perhaps be relevant for consideration where the powers of a police officer conferred upon him are of a very limited character and are not by themselves sufficient to facilitate the obtaining by him of a confession."

Their Lordships proceeded to contra-distinguish the provisions of the Sea Customs Act and the provisions of the Bihar and Orissa Excise Act, and pointed out that the officers under the Sea Customs Act, though they have certain powers of investigation, are not clothed with the powers of a police officer of investigation under the Criminal Procedure Code. They are also not empowered to grant bail, nor can they send a charge-sheet to a Magistrate forwarding a person for trial. It is indeed true that under s. 21 of the Central Excise Act, officers mentioned therein have power to grant bail. It is also true that sub-s. (2) thereof provides that the said officers may exercise the same powers and shall be subject to the same provisions as the officer in charge of a police station may exercise and is subject to under the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, when investigating a cognizable case. But still, there is a difference between the provisions of s. 21 of the Central Excise Act and the provisions of the Bihar Excise Act which was being considered by their Lordships. The Excise Officer in the case which was considered by their Lordships possessed all the powers under the Criminal Procedure Code relating to investigation of offences, including that of sending a charge-sheet to a Magistrate and forwarding a person for trial; whereas, s. 21 has not expressly conferred that power on an officer under the Central Excise Act. He may exercise powers under the Code of Criminal Procedure only in respect of investigation. There is no power in terms conferred on him to make a report or send a charge-sheet to a Magistrate, forwarding a person for trial. It, therefore, cannot be said that the decision on which reliance has been placed fully supports the argument of Mr. Jethmalani that an officer of Central Excise is a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act. It must, however, be conceded that the Central Excise Officer having power to grant bail may enable him to exercise authority over the arrested person and influence his conduct if he so wishes, and in that sense it is possible to argue that that power would tend to facilitate obtaining a confession from the suspect. It is, however, not necessary for us for the purposes of this case to decide the question finally. It is clear on the reading of s. 21 as well as the decision of their Lordships that an officer of the Central Excise is not a police officer for all purposes, though he may be a police officer so far as he conducts an investigation in respect of offences under the Excise Act. Even when under the Bihar Act all the totality of power of investigation under the Criminal Procedure Code including power of making a report to a Magistrate, had been conferred on an Excise Officer under that Act, their Lordships have not held that he is a police officer for all purposes. Their Lordships observed:

"It would be logical, therefore, to hold that a confession recorded by him during an investigation into an excise offence cannot reasonably be regarded as anything different from a confession to a police officer."

It is only a confession recorded by an officer investigating an excise offence that falls under s. 25 of the Evidence Act. We have already pointed out that the officers in recording the confessions were acting in their capacity as Customs Officers. It is not in dispute that the Customs Officers have no power to grant bail, nor have they any power to submit a report on the conclusion of the investigation to a Magistrate, forwarding a person for trial. On the other hand, s. 187A of the Sea Customs Act provides that no Court shall take cognizance of any offence relating to smuggling of goods punishable under item 81 of the Schedule to s. 167, except upon complaint in writing, made by the Chief Customs Officer or any other officer of Customs not lower in rank than an Assistant Collector of Customs. The power to file a complaint is conferred only on high officers of Customs Department, like the Chief Customs Officer or an Officer not lower in rank than an Assistant Collector of Customs. The confessions in this case are recorded by the Superintendent or Deputy Superintendents. It is not in dispute that they are officers lower in rank than the Assistant Collector of Customs. Their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Barkat Ram's case have considered the provisions of the Sea Customs Act, and have held that a Customs Officer is not a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act. Section 21 of the Central Excise Act also does not make an officer of the Central Excise a police officer for all purposes. His powers of arresting or summoning persons for examining them as witnesses or searches are only in respect of offences under the Central Excise Act. After the arrest of the person he is to be forwarded to a Central Excise Officer empowered to send the person to a Magistrate, and it is only this officer who is empowered to inquire into the charge against the person who is reasonably believed to be liable to punishment under the Excise Act, and it is only for this limited purpose that the powers of investigation of a police officer in charge of a police station are conferred on him, and he is empowered to exercise those powers under the Code of Criminal Procedure. The fiction thus enacted in this section cannot be carried further than the purposes for which it is enacted. It is clear that the said Central Excise Officers who are not by appointment police officers are empowered to exercise the same powers as are exercisable by an officer in charge of police station only in respect of investigation of offences under the Central Excise Act. It, therefore, follows that even assuming that an Excise Officer empowered to exercise powers under s. 21 of the Central Excise Act is a police officer within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act, while investigating offences under the Central Excise Act, it cannot be said that he is a police officer while discharging his duties under the Customs Act. We have already stated that the officers who have recorded the statements of the accused persons as well as witnesses in this case were at that time acting in their capacity as Customs Officers and not in their capacity as officers of the Central Excise, nor in discharge of their duties under the Central Excise Act. We have also held that they have been validly appointed Customs Officers under s. 6 of the Sea Customs Act. We have also pointed out that their Lordships in Barkat Ram's case have held that the Customs Officers are not police officers within the meaning of s. 25 of the Evidence Act. The confessions recorded by these officers, therefore, in our judgment, are not hit by the provisions of s. 25 of the Evidence Act.

Before proceeding with the other contention, we would like to state that Mr. Jethmalani has also in this respect referred to the decision reported in *Emperor v. Mallangowda*³. In our opinion, the case has no application to the facts of the present case. In that case, it has been held that a confession made to a regular police officer, whether that police officer was investigating officer or not, while in police custody was inadmissible, both under ss. 25 and 26 of the Evidence Act. We have already held that the Central Excise Officers when discharging their duties under the Sea Customs Act in their capacity as Customs Officers are not under the Central Excise Act.

It is next urged by Mr. Jethmalani that these confessions are also hit by the provisions of s. 24 of the Evidence Act. That section provides:

"24. A confession made by an accused person is irrelevant in a criminal proceeding, if the making of the confession appears to the Court to have been caused by any inducement, threat or promise having reference to the charge against the accused person, proceeding from a person in authority and sufficient, in the opinion of the Court, to give the accused person grounds, which would appear to him reasonable for supposing that by making it he would gain any advantage or avoid any evil of a temporal nature in reference to the proceedings against him."

To attract the provisions of s. 24, the following facts need be established: (a) That the confession has been made by an accused person to a person in authority; (b) that it must appear to the Court that the confession has been caused or obtained by reason of any inducement, threat or promise proceeding from a person in authority; (c) that the inducement, threat or promise must have reference to the charge against the accused person, and (d) and the inducement, threat or promise must in the opinion of the Court be such that it would appear to the Court that the accused in making the confession believed or supposed that he would by making it gain any advantage or avoid any evil of a temporal nature in reference to the proceedings against him. All these conditions must cumulatively exist. Mr. Jethmalani first contends that the confessions have been obtained under a threat within the meaning of s. 24 of the Evidence Act. The threat has been given by the officers who have recorded the statement. They are persons in authority within the meaning of s. 24. The threat which was given by them, according to Mr. Jethmalani, is the threat contained in s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, which had been explained by the officers concerned to each of the persons whose confession has been recorded. It is not in dispute that the officers who have recorded confessions are persons in authority within the meaning of s. 24. But, it has, however, been vehemently contended by Mr. Gandhi that there is no threat contained in s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act. To appreciate the arguments of counsel for parties, it is necessary to read s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act. Section 171A, in so far as it is material, provides:

"171A. (1) Any officer of Customs duly employed in the prevention of smuggling shall have power to summon any person whose attendance he considers necessary either to give evidence...in any inquiry which such officer is making in connection with the smuggling of any goods.

(3) ...and all persons so summoned shall be bound to state the truth upon any subject respecting which they are examined or make statements...

Provided that the exemption under section 132 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, shall be applicable to any requisition for attendance under this section.

(4) Every such inquiry as aforesaid shall be deemed to be a judicial proceeding within the meaning of section 195 and section 228 of the Indian Penal Code."

In short, the section empowers the Customs Officer to summon any person to give evidence in any inquiry in connection with the smuggling of goods save and except a pardanashin woman. The inquiry made under this section is deemed to be a judicial inquiry within the meaning of ss. 193 and 228, Indian Penal Code. A person so summoned is bound to appear and state the truth in giving evidence. If he does not answer, he would render himself liable to be prosecuted under s. 228, Indian Penal Code for causing interruption to a public servant in such a judicial proceeding. If, on the other hand, he answers or gives false evidence, he would be liable to be prosecuted under s. 193, Indian Penal Code for giving false evidence in a judicial proceeding. In short, a person summoned under s. 171A is told under the threat of criminal prosecution that he must state what he knows and he must state that truthfully. It is the argument of Mr. Jethmalani that this compulsion contained in the provisions of s. 171A is threat within the meaning of s. 24 of the Evidence Act. To each of the accused persons the provisions of s. 171A have been explained by the officers who recorded their statements. A threat, therefore, was given by the person in authority who has recorded the statement. The confessions are therefore hit by the provisions of s. 24 and inadmissible in evidence. In support of this argument, Mr. Jethmalani also referred us to the provisions of s. 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code, relating to the recording of confessions by a Magistrate. He argued that when a person accused of an offence is produced before a Magistrate for recording his confession, the Magistrate is bound to tell the accused that he (accused) is not bound to make a confession: If he makes a confession, that would be used against him. According to Mr. Jethmalani, law does not contemplate securing of a confession under compulsion. There can hardly be any dispute that there is a certain degree of compulsion implicit in the provisions of this section. If the person summoned under s. 171A refuses to answer questions he might be prosecuted under s. 228 of the Indian Penal Code for causing interruption to a public servant sitting in a stage of a judicial proceeding. If he makes a false statement, he is liable to be prosecuted under s. 193, Indian Penal Code. The question, however, to be considered is whether this degree of compulsion is a threat within the meaning of s. 24 of the Evidence Act. It is the argument of Mr. Gandhi that s. 171A only embodies the principle under s. 191, Indian Penal Code and bringing the provisions of s. 171A to the notice of the person who is examined, amounts only to bring to his notice the provisions of law for his own benefit, and there is no threat involved therein. He also placed reliance on a decision of this Court in Jinabhai Chhanabhai Patel v. The State of Maharashtra.⁴ Section 191, Indian Penal Code, in our opinion, only defines what amounts to "giving a false evidence". The definition has been enacted for the purposes of the provisions of the Indian Penal Code, and in our opinion, it cannot be said that it contains any general principle of law of universal application as such. That a person should always tell truth is a moral principle, but it cannot be said to be a legal principle as such. Whenever the Legislature requires a person to tell truth, it has so enacted in various enactments. It is only when it has been so enacted and a person fails to tell truth that he comes within the mischief of the provisions of the Indian Penal Code.

Mr. Gandhi also has argued and drawn our attention to the oral evidence of Mr. Ranadive, that sub-s. (4) of s. 171A was not explained. All that was explained to the person whose statement was recorded was that he was under the provisions of the said section bound to tell the truth. It is sub-s. (4) of s. 171A which provides that the inquiry under s. 171A is deemed to be a judicial proceeding within the meaning of ss. 193 and 228 of the Indian Penal Code. Sub-section (4) not having been explained to the persons, it cannot be said that any threat as such was given to the persons whose statements were recorded. Now, the evidence which is given by Ranadive runs counter to the record made by him in recording the statements. We find practically the same endorsement at the commencement of every statement in the following terms:

"The provisions of Section 171A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, have been explained to me. Accordingly I am bound to state the truth in the enquiry you are making."

This endorsement as to what happened at the time various statements were recorded is clear and not ambiguous. It does not say that the officer who recorded the statement had explained only a part of s. 171A i.e. sub-s. (3) of s. 171A and not the other parts. The contemporaneous record made thus is in conflict with the evidence given in Court by Ranadive. In the circumstances, we find it difficult to accept the oral evidence which runs counter to the aforesaid record made. We would, therefore, have to assume that all the provisions of s. 171A had been explained to the persons whose statements had been recorded. The question, however, that arises is whether in explaining the provisions of s. 171A, there was any threat within the meaning of s. 24 of the Evidence Act, given to the persons whose statements were recorded. Now, on the language of s. 24, it is not every threat that falls within its mischief, but it must be a threat "proceeding from a person in authority". Now, what has happened here is that the officers who recorded the statements have only explained the provisions of law contained in s. 171A of the Act. The compulsion therein, even though it may amount to a threat, emanates not from the officer who was recording the statement, but emanates from the provisions of law. What is contemplated in s. 24 is that the threat must emanate from the person in authority. Clearly in the instant case, there was no threat emanating from the person in authority. On the contrary, the officers recording the statements were only doing their duty in bringing to the notice of the persons the provisions of law. There is also another aspect of the case. On the terms of s. 24, it is not every threat or inducement or promise even emanating from the person in authority that is hit by s. 24, but it has to be such an inducement, threat or promise, which should lead the accused to suppose that "by making he would gain any advantage or avoid any evil of temporal nature in reference to the proceedings against him." Now, here what has the person making the statement been told? He has been told that the law requires him to tell the truth.

"If you do not tell the truth, you may be prosecuted under section 193, Indian Penal Code, for giving false evidence. If you do not answer a question or if you persistently ⁴ (1963) Criminal Revision Application 21, 1963 (Unrep.).

No. 899 of 1962, decided by Naik J., on January refuse to answer questions, you may be prosecuted under section 228, Indian Penal Code, for causing interruption in the proceedings."

The consequence or the advantage of telling the truth had no nexus much less a reasonable nexus of raising any hope or leading the persons making the statement to suppose that by making the statement they would be gaining any advantage or avoiding any evil of temporal nature in reference to the proceedings against them. The proceeding against them were in respect of the conspiracy to smuggle gold and the specific instances in which they had participated in smuggling gold. In explaining the provisions, the officer was not holding any hope to them that they would gain any advantage in reference to those proceedings. It does not, therefore, appear to us that in merely explaining the provisions of s. 171A, there was any threat given by the officers recording the statements which could have raised any hope in the minds of the persons making statements or led them to suppose that they were going to gain any advantage in reference to the proceedings against them relating to smuggling of gold. These being the circumstances of the case, in our opinion, the statements recorded by these officers are not hit by the provisions of s. 24 of the Indian Evidence Act.

Mr. Jethmalani has referred to Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd Ed. Vol. 10, p. 473. The passage read by Mr. Jethmalani from Halsbury is founded on the decision in The Queen v. Thompson.⁵ It would be sufficient to refer to that case only. Now, the facts of this case were that a prisoner was tried for embezzling the money of a company. The evidence tendered was a statement made by him to the Chairman of the Company in which the accused stated: "Yes. I took the money." Afterwards, the accused had also given a list of the sums embezzled by him. In the evidence, the Chairman had stated that he had not given threat and no promise also was made by him to the accused in reference to the prosecution of the accused. He, however, admitted that he had stated to the brother of the prisoner: "It will be right for your brother to make a statement." In the circumstances of the case, the Court drew an inference that the aforesaid statement made by the Chairman to the brother of the accused that it would be better for the accused to make a statement was conveyed by the brother to the accused. In the circumstances, it was held that the confession was not admissible inasmuch as it appeared to the Court that the statement of the accused admitting the guilt was not free and voluntary. It would be seen that in the statement made by the Chairman to the brother of the accused that, it would be better for the accused to make a statement, there was an implicit promise. It proceeded from the person in authority, i.e. the Chairman himself, and further that it had reference to the proceedings against the accused, namely the embezzling of the company's money. These elements, as we have shown, are absent in the present case, where only the provisions of law contained in s. 171A were explained to the persons making the statements. The provisions contained in the said section had no reference or gave no advantage, or could not have raised any hopes in the mind of the persons making the statements in respect of or in reference to the proceedings which might have been started against them, namely, relating to smuggling of gold. The decision, therefore, has no application to the facts of the present case. Mr. Jethmalani stated that the decision in The Queen v. Thompson was cited only for the purpose of showing that the ratio of this case was followed by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Hem Raj v. The State of Ajmer.⁶ We have already shown that the decision has no application to the facts of the present case.

It is next argued by Mr. Jethmalani that, at any rate, Ranadive and other officers who had recorded the statements, were not entitled to record the statements under s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act. They have, in fact, recorded the statements thereunder. Therefore, the threat which was conveyed to the persons whose statements were recorded did not emanate or proceed from the provisions of the statute, but from these officers themselves. The argument is two-fold. In the first instance, Mr. Jethmalani argues that the officers who recorded the statements are officers of the Central Excise Department. Section 171A only empowers the officers appointed under the Sea Customs Act to record statements under the provisions of the said section. Ranadive and other officers were, therefore, not justified in recording the statements under that section. It is not necessary to deal in detail with this argument. We have already held that these officers have been duly and validly appointed officers under the Sea Customs Act, by reason of the aforesaid notification issued by the Central Government on September 29, 1951. We have also held that in holding the inquiry in respect of this case, these officers were acting in their capacity as officers appointed under the Sea Customs Act and not officers of the Central Excise. Therefore, in recording the statements under s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, they did not go beyond their powers, nor was their action in any manner unjustified. The other argument advanced by Mr. Jethmalani was that, at any rate, they were not justified in recording the statements because no summons had been issued to the persons requiring them to attend the office to give evidence. The argument is founded on the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 171A, which says that "all persons so summoned shall be bound to state the truth". These persons were not summoned and yet they were told that they were bound to tell the truth. The argument in short is that the issuance of a summons is a condition precedent to the conferral of jurisdiction on the Customs Officers to record statements under s. 171A of the Act. Without issuing a summons, the Customs Officers are not entitled to and are not authorised to record statements under s. 171A. Reading all the sub-sections of s. 171A together, and having regard to the other provisions of the Act, it does not appear that the service of a summons is a condition precedent for conferring jurisdiction on the Customs Officer to record a statement under the said section. Sub-section (1) of s. 171A which confers power on the Customs Officer to summon a person, whose attendance he considers necessary to give evidence, or to produce documents, does not say that "any officer shall have power to issue a summons", but, on the other hand, it says "any officer of Customs shall have power to summon". The power conferred thus is a power to summon and not a power to issue a summons. So far as known to us, there is no provision in the Customs Act prescribing a procedure for issuance of a summons. We asked counsel as to whether there is any rule made prescribing any procedure for issuing a summons, or form of a summons prescribed. We have been informed by counsel appearing in the case that there is no rule framed under the provisions of the Act prescribing any procedure for issuing a service of a summons, nor is there any form prescribed. The ordinary meaning of the word "summon" is to demand presence of; call upon a person to appear. The power that is conferred is to require a person to appear. The person may be required to appear before the Customs Officer by serving a written notice or summons to that effect on him, or may be called by merely sending a message to him; or, if he happens to be in the presence of the Customs Officer, merely by telling him that his presence is required for giving evidence. Having regard to the phraseology used in s. 171A of the Act, and having regard to the fact that there is no procedure prescribed for issuing a service of summons, and no form of summons having been prescribed, in our opinion, the section does not contemplate the service of a summons as a condition precedent enabling the Customs Officer to record the statement under s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act. The Customs Officers were not, therefore, acting without jurisdiction in recording the statements even though in some cases there had been no service of a written summons as such on some of the persons. It is clear that the endorsement at the commencement of each statement to one of which we have already referred to leaves no doubt that before their statements were recorded, the officers concerned had explained the provisions of s. 171A of the Act to those persons. The persons, therefore, had been duly required to make statements, and there is no invalidity in the matter of recording their statements. An argument also has been advanced before us by counsel for the appellants, that these officers apart from explaining the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, had, in fact, given an inducement, threat or promise to these persons, as a result of which these statements have been made. To this argument we would advert, when we proceed to deal with the facts against each of the accused.

The other legal argument, which had been advanced before us by counsel for all the appellants is that the evidence of an accomplice requires corroboration. Corroboration must proceed from independent source. Neither the evidence of another accomplice, nor the confessions of the co-accused can be looked into as corroboration to the evidence of an accomplice. Mr. Kavlekar has referred us to a decision of their Lordships of the Supreme Court in Kashmira Singh v. State of Madhya Pradesh,⁷ *Raju v. State of Mysore*⁸ and Sarwan Singh v. State of Punjab.⁹ Now, the provisions of the Evidence Act relating to the evidence of an accomplice are contained in s. 133 and illustration (b) of s. 114 of the Act. Section 133 provides that a conviction is not illegal merely because it proceeds upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. Section 114 enables the Court to presume the existence of any fact which it thinks likely to have happened, having regard to the common course of natural events, human conduct and public and private business, in their relation to the facts of the particular case. In this section are also included certain maxims by way of illustrations which are founded on the experience gained in the past. These illustrations are in two parts. The first part gives the maxims relating to presumptions, which a Court may draw, but the later part tells the Court that it should also have regard to certain special circumstances of each case in considering whether the maxim would have application to the facts of the case it has to consider. In other words, the first part of illustrations contains maxims and the later part exceptions to their application. Reading the illustrations as a whole it becomes clear that the maxims or rules of prudence though of general application, have no universal application. The first part of illustration (b) provides that the Court may presume that an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars. Thus, the position emerging from these two provisions is that though in law a conviction could be based on an uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, it has been pointed out as a rule of prudence founded on the experience gained in the past that an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars. In other words, exceptions apart, ordinarily a presumption should be raised that the particular accomplice, whose evidence it has to consider is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars. However, when we turn to the later part of illustration (b), it becomes clear that the Legislature itself has envisaged cases where such a presumption may have no application. It inter alia deals with cases falling under this very maxim. It provides: "But the Court shall also have regard to such facts as the following in considering whether such maxims do or do not apply to the particular case before it..." As to illustration (b), a crime is committed by several persons, say, A, B, C and D. All the criminals are captured on the spot and kept apart from each other. Each gives an account of the crime, implicating D, and the accounts corroborate each other in such a manner as to render the previous concert highly improbable. Reading the relevant portion of s. 114 as a whole, together with s. 133, the principle is that the accomplice being a participant in the crime, his testimony at its very threshold suffers from that infirmity, and casts a certain doubt as to its truthfulness. The Court, therefore, should ordinarily presume that his testimony should not be accepted unless there be other circumstances in the case or other evidence in the case proceeding from independent source, that is, source other than the testimony of an accomplice, lending assurance to the mind of the Court that the evidence given by the accomplice is truthful as against a particular accused, and it would be safe to act on the testimony of the accomplice. But in a given case, there may be no necessity of such corroborative evidence because the assurance or guarantee for the truthfulness of the account in the statement may be furnished by statements implicating a particular accused, made by various participants in the crime without they having any opportunity of a previous concert. In other words, the later part of illustrations to s. 114 tells us that the experience of the world is that when a number of participants in the crime, without any previous concert, state that a particular person has joined in the commission of the crime, there might be no necessity for the corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice, because such statements by a number of participants without any previous concert itself affords a guarantee for reliability of the testimony of an accomplice. Of course, that again would depend on the nature of their statements, account of the crime given by them and the extent to which their statements corroborate one another. It appears that the later part of illustration relating to ill. (b) of s. 114 is founded on the observations of Mr. Justice Campbell occurring in the decision reported in Queen v. Chutterdharee Sing.¹⁰ The corroboration required to the testimony of the accomplice was a question being considered. In considering this question, it is observed:

"...It is necessary, then, to watch the evidence of such men with very great care; and I am glad to see that these Bhaugulpore cases are not usually sent up without strong corroborative evidence. There may be cases in which the evidence of different accomplices is given under such circumstances and with such real security against any possible intercommunication that they do, to the most careful mind, in a great degree, corroborate one another."

It would thus be seen that the Court finding the existence of statements of a number of participants in the crime corroborating one another is a relevant circumstance which could be taken into account in considering whether in a particular case corroboration to the evidence of an accomplice is required, and also in considering the nature and extent of the corroboration that is required before the evidence of an accomplice is accepted. It must be emphasised that each case would depend upon its own facts. No hard and fast rule can be laid down in this respect. The usual rule of prudence that has ripened more or less into a rule of law is that the Court will require corroboration to the testimony of an accomplice before it acts on it, and this rule of caution has to be kept in view by a Court in appreciating the evidence of an accomplice, and keeping these principles in view, we would appreciate the evidence of Kashinath and Devchand. Now, the reason underlying the principle that the evidence of an accomplice requires corroboration has been succinctly put by Sir John Beaumont in *Bhuboni Sahu v. The King*¹¹ in the following words:

"...Their Lordships, whilst not doubting that such a conviction is justified in law under s. 133 of the Evidence Act, and whilst appreciating that the coincidence of a number of confessions of co-accused all implicating the particular accused, given independently, and without an opportunity of previous concert, might be entitled to great weight, would nevertheless observe that Courts should be slow to depart from the rule of prudence, based on long experience, which require some independent evidence implicating the particular accused."

These observations of their Lordships also indicate that the confessions of the co-accused are not totally irrelevant in considering the evidence of an accomplice. It undoubtedly is a piece of weak evidence. What weight it has to be given would depend on the circumstances of each case. Sir John Beaumont then proceeds:

"...The danger of acting on accomplice evidence is not merely that the accomplice is on his own admission a man of bad character who took part in the offence and afterwards to save himself betrayed his former associates, and who has placed himself in a position in which he can hardly fail to have a strong bias in favour of the prosecution; the real danger is that he is telling a story which in its general outline is true, and it is easy for him to work into the story matter which is untrue. He may implicate ten people in an offence, and the story may be true in all its details as to eight of them, but untrue as to the other two, whose names have been introduced because they are enemies of the approver."

The nature and extent of corroboration has been described by Sir John Beaumont as "some independent evidence". No hard and fast rule of general application can be laid down or has been laid down in any case as to what that "some independent evidence" has to be. The question has been considered in various decisions of their Lordships of the Supreme Court. The nature and extent of corroboration required has been stated in *Rex v. Baskerville*¹² the leading case on this subject. It has been stated thus (p. 667):

"...It would be in high degree dangerous to attempt to formulate the kind of evidence which would be regarded as corroboration, except to say that the corroborative evidence which shows or tends to show that the story of the accomplice that the accused committed the crime is true, not merely that the crime has been committed, but that it was committed by the accused."

The question has also been recently considered by this Court in *State v. Lakshmi Chand Choralia*¹³ and it has been observed:

"Even in respect of the evidence of an accomplice, all that is required is that there must be some additional evidence rendering it probable that the story of the accomplice is true and that it is reasonably safe to act upon it. Corroboration need not be by direct evidence that the accused committed the crime. It is sufficient even though it is merely circumstantial evidence of his connection with the crime."

In our opinion, therefore, having regard to the decisions to which we have just now referred, it is not possible to fully agree with the contention of Mr. Kavlekar that in considering the evidence of an accomplice, the evidence of another accomplice or the self-inculpatory confession of the co-accused are wholly or totally irrelevant. It is, of course, true that the evidentiary value of the evidence of another accomplice or the confession of the co-accused is not of great weight. In our opinion, the decision in Kashmira Singh v. State of Madhya Pradesh, on which reliance has been placed, is distinguishable on facts. No doubt in the head note it has been observed that "the confession of an accused person against a co-accused is not evidence in the ordinary sense of the term." In that case their Lordships were considering the question as to whether the confession of a co-accused can be held to be a substantive piece of evidence against the accused. "Evidence" has been defined in the Evidence Act, as "all statements which the Court permits or requires to be made before it by witnesses, in relation to matters of fact under inquiry (i.e. oral evidence)", and all documents produced for the inspection of the Court (i.e. documentary evidence). This is evidence in the strict sense of the term in the Evidence Act. An accomplice is a witness examined in the Court like any other witness, and therefore, the evidence of an accomplice given in Court in the strict sense is a substantive piece of evidence. Section 133 provides that an accomplice is a competent witness against an accused person, and even on an uncorroborated testimony of a person, conviction could be founded. The confession of the co-accused, however, stands on a different footing. It is not evidence within the meaning of the definition of "evidence" given in the Evidence Act, it none-the less is a material which could be taken into account. Section 30 of the Evidence Act provides that the confession of the co-accused when jointly tried may be taken into consideration as against the other accused. It is thus evidence but not a substantive piece of evidence. In other words, no conviction could be founded merely on the confession of a co-accused, while a conviction could be founded on the evidence of an accomplice which in the strict sense is evidence. The position has been made clear by their Lordships of the Supreme Court recently in Criminal Appeals Nos. 208 and 209 of 1963.¹⁴ In Kashmira Singh's case, on which Mr. Kavlekar has placed reliance in support of his contention that the confession of the co-accused is not evidence, one of the questions which was being considered was how far and in what way the confession of an accused person can be used against a co-accused. In this case, the confession of another accused Gurudayalsingh had played an important part in implicating the appellant Kashmira Singh. Their Lordships, in view of the definition of "evidence" contained in s. 3 of the Evidence Act, held that the confession of a co-accused is not a substantive piece of evidence on which conviction of an accused could be founded, but it could be used under s. 30 only for lending assurance to the mind of the Court about the truthfulness of other evidence, which, if believed, would establish the guilt of the accused. Considering the question as to whether it could be used as corroboration to the evidence of an accomplice or an approver, Mr. Justice Bose speaking for the Court, at page 530 of the report observed:

"Then, as regards its use in the corroboration of accomplices and approvers. A co-accused who confesses is naturally an accomplice and the danger of using the testimony of one accomplice to corroborate another has repeatedly been pointed out. The danger is in no way lessened when the 'evidence' is not on oath and cannot be tested by cross-examination. Prudence will dictate the same rule of caution in the case of a witness who though not an accomplice is regarded by the Judge as having no greater probative value. But all these are only rules of prudence. So far as the law is concerned, a conviction can be based on the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice provided the judge has the rule of caution, which experience dictates, in mind and gives reasons why he thinks it would be safe in a given case to disregard it. Two of us had occasion to examine this recently in Rameshwar v. The State of Rajasthan.^{14a} It follows that the testimony of an accomplice can in law be used to corroborate another though it ought not to be so used save in exceptional circumstances and for reasons disclosed."

From the aforesaid observations of their Lordships, it is clear that the rule of prudence tells us that it would not be safe to accept the evidence of an accomplice as corroboration to the evidence of another accomplice and the confession of a co-accused as a piece of evidence lending assurance to the mind of the Court in considering the evidence of the accomplice. There may however be some exceptional cases where evidence of an accomplice could be taken as corroboration to the evidence of another accomplice and the confession of a co-accused could be relied on for lending assurance to the mind of the Court. In considering the question as to whether a conviction could be founded on a testimony of the accomplice without corroboration, the later part of s. 114, ill. (b) is relevant. As we have already stated, each case will have to be considered in the light of its own facts. Bearing these principles in mind, we would be approaching the facts of this case.

But before we proceed to deal with the case of each appellant accused, it is necessary to deal with one other legal argument advanced by Mr. Pardiwala on behalf of accused No. 9. Now, the contention of Mr. Pardiwala is that use of the confession of accused No. 9 as against him is violative of the fundamental right conferred on the accused under art. 20(3). Clause (1) of art. 20 provides that save and except for violation of a law in force, no person can be convicted. Clause (2) confers a guarantee against double jeopardy. A person cannot be prosecuted and punished for the same offence more than once and cl. (3) provides: "No person accused of an offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself." To bring into operation the provisions of cl. (3) of art. 20, two conditions have to be fulfilled: (1) that a person must be one who has been accused of an offence, and (2) he must be compelled to be a witness against himself. It is the protection given to a person accused of an offence, and the protection is against he being compelled to be a witness against himself. It is the argument of Mr. Pardiwalla that the statement of accused No. 9 is of date November 26, 1961. Prior to that date statements of various other co-accused were recorded. Similarly, statements of prosecution witnesses Kashinath Devchand and Dharma were also recorded much prior to November 26, 1961. These accused as well as the prosecution witnesses had in their statements stated the part played by accused No. 9 in the conspiracy as well as in the four trips in which gold had been smuggled. Accused No. 9 thus was a person accused of an offence within the meaning of cl. (3) of art. 20 on the date he made the statement. Before accused No. 9 had made the statement, he had been explained the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act, and he was, under the threat of a criminal prosecution contained in sub-s. (4) of s. 171A, told that he was bound to tell the truth. His statement Z-33 has been filed in the case and has been used as evidence against accused No. 9. The accused thus has been compelled to be a witness against himself. It is on the basis of this argument that Mr. Pardiwalla contends that the use of this statement against accused No. 9 is violative of the guarantee of the fundamental right conferred under art. 20(3). It is not in dispute that the statements of number of co-accused as well as statements of these three prosecution witnesses who were also accomplices were recorded prior to the date on which the statement has been made by accused No. 9. It is also not in dispute that Kashinath, accused No. 1-Govind, accused No. 10-Hira, and accused No. 4-Noor Mohamed, in their statements had implicated accused No. 9 in the commission of the crime. The question, therefore, that arises for consideration is whether on the date accused No. 9 made the said statement Z-33, he was a person accused of any offence within the meaning of art. 20(3), and the second question that arises is whether accused No. 9 had been compelled to be a witness against himself by reason of the fact that the provisions of s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act had been explained to him before he made the statement.

Turning to the first question, the expression "person accused of an offence" has been considered by their Lordships in various decisions, and it would be useful at this stage to refer to them to understand the true import of that expression. The question was first considered in M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra, District Magistrate, Delhi.¹⁵ There, after the first information report had been lodged against Mr. Sharma, a search warrant had been issued for searching the premises of Sharma under ss. 94 and 96, Criminal Procedure Code. The question that was being considered was whether the search and seizure of documents under ss. 94 and 96, Criminal Procedure Code, was violative of the provisions of cl. (3) of art. 20 of the Constitution. The provisions of cl. (3) of art. 20 have been elaborately examined by their Lordships in this judgment. Considering the question, Mr. Justice Jagganadha Das, speaking for the Court, at page 1088 of the report, observed:

"...It is available therefore to a person against whom a formal accusation relating to the commission of an offence has been levelled which in the normal course may result in prosecution."

Their Lordships have held that as the first information report had been lodged with the police, the appellant Sharma and others were persons accused of an offence. The question was next considered in Mohd. Dastagir v. State of Madras.¹⁶ Facts in that case were that the appellant had gone to the bungalow of a Deputy Superintendent of Police to offer him bribe in a closed envelope so that he might drop the action registered against him. The police officer threw the envelope at the appellant. The envelope fell down and was picked up by the appellant. Later while the appellant was still in the bungalow, he was asked by the police officer to produce the envelope which he had thrown down. The appellant took out from his pocket some currency notes and placed them on table without the envelope. The notes were seized by the police officer and his office rubber stamp seal was placed on them. In these circumstances, the question considered was whether in requiring the appellant to produce the notes, there was any compulsion within the meaning of cl. (3) of art. 20. Their Lordships held that at the time the notes were produced by the appellant, there was no formal accusation against the appellant relating to the commission of an offence. The question next arose in Narayanlal v. M. P. Mistry.¹⁷ Facts in that case were that the appellant Raja Narayanlal Bansilal was a managing agent of a limited company. The Registrar of Companies had made a report to the Central Government that the affairs of the company were carried in fraud of the contributories and they disclosed an unsatisfactory state of affairs. The Registrar also reported that the managing agent was also utilising the property of the company for his personal gain, and therefore investigation under s. 153 of the Companies Act be instituted. The Central Government then appointed Mr. Mistry, a chartered accountant, as Inspector to investigate the affairs of the company. Pursuant to the powers conferred on him, Mr. Mistry wrote to the appellant a letter intimating to him that he would examine the appellant on oath in relation to the business of the company. The appellant was also called upon to appear on a specified date for being examined on oath relating to the affairs of the company and to produce all books of account, and papers relating to the company. He was further warned that in default of compliance with the requisition, legal steps would be taken without further reference to him. The appellant then moved this Court by a writ application and prayed that this Court should issue a writ of certiorari and quash this notice. The petition was dismissed and the matter went to the Supreme Court in appeal. Considering the question whether at the material time the appellant was a person accused of an offence, their Lordships at page 38 of the report observed:

"Similarly, for invoking the constitutional right against testimonial compulsion guaranteed under Art. 20(3) it must appear that the formal accusation has been made against the party pleading the guarantee and that it relates to the commission of an offence which in the normal course may result in prosecution."

Here again, the nature of accusation and the proper sequel or consequences are regarded as important. Examining the relevant provisions of the Companies Act, their Lordships further observed that the report made by the Registrar of Companies was not formal accusation against the appellant. At page 39, their Lordships observed:

"...In such a case there is no accusation, either formal or otherwise, against any specified individual; there may be a general allegation that the affairs are irregularly, improperly or illegally managed; but who would be responsible for the affairs which are reported to be irregularly managed is a matter which would be determined at the end of the enquiry. At the commencement of the enquiry, and indeed throughout its proceedings there is no accused person, no accuser and no accusation against any one that he has committed an offence. In our opinion a general enquiry and investigation into the affairs of the company thus contemplated cannot be regarded as an investigation which starts with an accusation contemplated in Art. 20(3) of the Constitution."

It appears that the observations in Sharma's case in respect of the clause "to be a witness" led to difference of opinion as to its import. The question was, therefore, again considered by a Bench consisting of eleven Judges, and the conclusions arrived at have been summarised by the learned Chief Justice in his leading judgment in State of Bombay v. Kathi Kalu.^{17a} It is not necessary to reproduce all the seven conclusions for the purposes of this case. The 7th conclusion reads:

"To bring the statement in question within the prohibition of Art. 20(3), the person accused must have stood in the character of an accused person at the time he made the statement. It is not enough that he should become an accused any time after the statement has been made."

The question, therefore, that has to be considered is whether on November 26, 1961, the date on which accused No. 9 made the statement, he stood in the character of an accused person. The test laid down in the aforesaid decision of ascertaining this fact is whether there was a formal accusation on that date against him. An accusation becomes a formal accusation when there is an accuser who makes an accusation against the accused which should in normal course lead to prosecution in a criminal Court. The question to be considered is whether these circumstances existed on November 26, 1961, the date when accused No. 9 made the statement. Now, the argument had been that accused No. 9 was a person accused of an offence because the persons who had been arraigned as co-accused, and the persons who had been examined as witnesses, had, in their statements, stated the part played by accused No. 9 in the conspiracy and the overt acts of smuggling. Now, these statements have been recorded by the Superintendent and the Deputy Superintendents of Central Excise, under s. 171A of the Sea Customs Act. Having regard to the provisions of the Act, the statements recorded were in the course of ascertaining the facts in relation to contraband gold seized in the raid. None of them had made a formal accusation against any person, much less against accused No. 9, with an objective that action against any person be taken. The statements of the co-accused or prosecution witnesses can hardly be equated with a formal accusation made against any person with a view to taking action against him. We have already referred to the provisions of s. 187A of the Sea Customs Act, which prevents a criminal Court from taking cognizance of an offence under s. 167(81) save and except on a complaint in writing made by the Chief Customs Officer or a Customs Officer not below the rank of an Assistant Collector of Customs. Superintendent and Deputy Superintendents of the Central Excise are officers below the rank of an Assistant Collector of Customs. Any statement made to them cannot, in any event, be an accusation made for the purposes of taking action against the accused person. In this context, it would be useful to compare the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code in contradistinction with the provisions of the Customs Act. It may be mentioned that in Sharma's case, their Lordships were dealing with a case where the first information report had been lodged to the police. Chapter XIV in Part V of the Criminal Procedure Code relates to the information to the police and their powers to investigate, and consists of ss. 154 to 176. Section 154 relates to the information in cognizable cases. The section makes it obligatory on the police officer to enter it in the book kept for that purpose. Section 156 relates to the information in non-cognizable cases. Section 196 provides that without the order of the Magistrate, an officer in charge of the police station can investigate a cognizable offence, and in case of a non-cognizable offence, on an order made by the Magistrate. Sections 157 to 168 relate to the powers of the police officers and the procedure to be followed by the police officers in making the investigation. Section 169 provides that if it appears to the investigating officer that there is no sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion to justify forwarding the accused to the Magistrate, he may release him from the custody taking a bond from him for appearance before him. On the other hand, if on the completion of the investigation, the investigating officer finds that there is sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion to justify forwarding an accused to the Magistrate, he would ordinarily forward the accused person for trial in a criminal Court before a Magistrate. The first information lodged with the police officer thus in the ordinary course leads to prosecution in a criminal Court if the investigation discloses a case against the accused. Such, however, is not the case here in view of the provisions of the Sea Customs Act. Persons recording statements are not persons who are empowered to lodge a complaint against an accused under s. 187A of the Act. There is no provision in the Act making it obligatory on Customs Officers to forward persons to a Magistrate to stand their trial, even if the Customs Officers on investigation finds that they have committed an offence under the Act. As we have already stated, the said s. 187A prohibits a criminal Court from taking cognizance of an offence under the Sea Customs Act under s. 167(81) of the Act, save and except when a complaint has been lodged by persons authorised to lodge a complaint under the section. Thus having regard to these provisions, the formal accusation which in the normal course should result in a trial of a person in a criminal Court would be a complaint lodged by a competent officer under s. 187A when the accusation falls under item (81) of the schedule to s. 167. In the instant case, the accusation made against accused No. 9 is for an offence relating to smuggling of gold punishable under item (81) of the schedule to s. 167 of the Sea Customs Act. In our opinion, therefore, there was no formal accusation against accused No. 9 on November 26, 1961, the date on which his statement was recorded. One of the conditions required to be fulfilled thus has not been fulfilled in the instant case. The statement made by accused No. 9 on November 26, 1961, therefore, does not fall within the mischief of cl. (3) of art. 20 of the Constitution. This being our conclusion on the first part, it is not necessary to consider whether accused No. 9 was compelled to be a witness against himself because the provisions of s. 171A were explained to him before he made the statement. Mr. Pardiwalla, in support of his contention had also placed reliance on certain observations in the decision of a Division Bench of the Madras High Court reported in Rainbow Trading Co. v. Asst. Collector of Customs.¹⁸ The observations on which reliance has been placed are at page 441:

"...It is argued that if it were to be recognised that there is no prohibition against compelled testimony in proceedings under the Customs Act, the guarantee under Art. 20(3) itself, would become illusory as the confession can be obtained first under S. 171-A of the Sea Customs Act and then used for a prosecution. We cannot agree that it would be so. If for example a smuggler gives himself away during an examination under Section 171-A, that evidence will nevertheless constitute a compelled testimony and can neither be relied on nor used against him in any criminal prosecution, as Article 20(3) will prevent it from being so used. So much can be taken as settled by 1954 SCJ 423: (AIR 1954 S.C. 300). Therefore any incriminating answers which a person examined under Section 171-A may give, can only be used for the purpose of the departmental punishment and not for a prosecution in a criminal court."

These observations undoubtedly support the contention raised by Mr. Pardiwalla. But, with utmost respect, we find it difficult to take a similar view because, in our opinion, for the reasons stated above, a person examined under s. 171A does not stand in the character of an accused person inasmuch as there is no formal accusation made against him by any person at that time. The fact that subsequent to the making of the statement he becomes an accused person is not sufficient to bring the statement within the mischief of art. 20(3) of the Constitution.

It has also been argued on behalf of the appellants that the Customs Officer had not maintained any diary. It is, therefore, not possible to ascertain and check whether the statements said to have been recorded on a particular date are in fact recorded by the Customs Officer on that date. The Customs Officers could without detection easily anti-date the statements, which they have recorded. The argument principally is aimed at the date of accused No. 1's statement and that of the statement of Kashinath. According to the Customs Officers, their statements were recorded on August 15, 1961. No doubt accused

No. 1 in his statement has stated that his statement was not recorded on 15th but was recorded on August 22 and from 15th to 22nd August he was kept in custody and was subjected to ill-treatment and harassment and ultimately his signature was taken by force on a statement. The argument is, there being no diary, there is no check. The Court, therefore, should be circumspect in accepting that the statement of Govind was recorded on August 15, 1961. It is true that there is no diary maintained by the Customs Officers in this case. There is no provision in the Customs Act to maintain any diary, nor are the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code relating to investigation have been made applicable to inquiries under the Customs Act. In these circumstances, it is not possible to say that the Customs Officers in not maintaining a diary have failed to follow the procedure prescribed by law. The principal object of the Customs Act is not detection of a crime. The Customs Officers are not primarily concerned with the detection and punishment of a crime; but the Customs Officers are mainly interested in the detection and prevention of smuggling of contraband articles and safeguarding recovery of customs dues. They are more concerned with the smuggled goods than the offenders who smuggle goods. A suggestion was made to Kashinath in his cross-examination that his statement was not recorded on August 15, but was recorded later, and Kashinath has denied it. The officers who have recorded the statements are responsible officers. Absence of provision in the Customs Act requiring them to maintain a diary would not by itself be a good ground for rejecting their evidence without there being sufficient reason to discard it and none has been pointed out to us. Govind appears to be a literate person. He has signed each page of his statement and at the end of his signature he has put the date on each page, and the date is August 15, 1961. There is also other evidence on record which clearly indicates that Govind's statement must have been recorded on 15th. It is not in dispute that the flat in "Avillion" was searched on August 16, 1961. It is the statement of Govind that had made mention of a flat on Little Gibbs Road in a newly constructed building. It is only Govind and not Kashinath who had been taken to the flat, and Govind had made mention thereof in his statement. In all probability, the search of the flat in "Avillion" on August 16, 1961 was made in consequence of the statement of Govind on August 15, 1961.

NARAYANLAL BANSILAL v. VENKATRAO ANANT PAI.*

Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947). Secs. 11, 5—Standard rent whether to be fixed only by apportionment of rents—"Premises", meaning of word in s. 11(1)(c).

Standard rent of a part of a building cannot exceed the standard rent of the whole building and the standard rent of the whole building cannot be more than the total of the standard rents of the different parts. Any investments made by the landlord must be considered and a fair return on such investments must be given to the landlord. If the property is wholly changed then apportionment of rent for different portions becomes a difficult problem. If it has not so changed the Court considers such apportioned rent and all such other circumstances as are brought to the notice of the Court. If no other circumstances are proved before the Court then such apportioned rent is the standard rent.

*Decided, October 8/9, 1964. Civil Revision Applications Nos. 53, 672, 1204 and 1732 of Application No. 50 of 1963 (with Civil Revision 1963).

Dhanrajgirji v. Ward,² *Bata Shoe & Co. v. Narayan Das*³ and Capital & Provincial Property Trust Ltd. v. Rex,⁴ referred to.

The word "premises" in s. 11(1)(c) of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, is used in the wider sense meaning the whole building of which part was let then or now. The qualifying word "separately let" in s. 5(8)(b) of the Act does not apply to it.

Manekji Jivraj Bhatena v. Basantilal M. Sharma,⁵ referred to.

Raja Bahadur Motilal Bombay Mills Ltd. (plaintiffs No. 2) owned certain property measuring about 11150 sq. yards which had in it various structures. On April 2, 1947, plaintiffs No. 2 executed a lease in favour of M/s. Venkatrao A. Pai and Sons (defendant) whereby a portion of the property admeasuring 16972 sq. feet consisting of the ground floor of the Mill was given to the defendant at a monthly rent of Rs. 2,037 for the purpose of a mill or for some manufacturing process. The lease was to run from September 26, 1946, for a period of ten years. A second lease was executed in favour of the defendant on April 11, 1947, for the first floor of the Mill and a room or a godown adjoining the building, the total area being 19660 sq. feet at a rent of Rs. 2,140 per month. This portion was to be used for office, laboratory, bleaching, dyeing and such other purposes. The defendant which was a partnership firm was on July 7, 1947, incorporated into a private limited company, the members being the self-same partners and sometime after 1950 this private limited company issued cheques from time to time towards the payment of rent, after the lease was assigned to it.

The entire property of plaintiffs No. 2 was mortgaged to an insurance company for a very large amount. The mortgagee filed a suit on the Original Side of the High Court for recovery of the amount. By consent in April 1949, the Official Receiver was appointed with all the powers under O. XL, r. 1, of the Civil Procedure Code. On March 28, 1956, the present suit was filed by the Receiver for possession and recovery of arrears of rent against the private limited company and the partners of the original firm. One Narayanlal was appointed as Receiver on April 8, 1958, and he was substituted in place of the High Court Receiver.

On April 20, 1958, the Mill building was completely destroyed by fire, the only portion intact being the extra ground floor godown or room which continued to be occupied beneficially by the defendant. After Narayanlal was appointed Receiver he repaired some windows of and removed the debris from the burnt premises and locked up that portion.

In the suit the plaintiffs claimed a sum of Rs. 4,28,392.14 nP. claiming the arrears of rent at the contractual rate and also several other increases alleged to be due under the two agreements of lease. The main defences were that the contractual rent was much more than the standard rent and that if an account were made large sums would be due to the defendants but nothing due to the plaintiffs. The defendants disputed the items of increases claimed by the plaintiffs and they also denied their liability to make the payment regarding the same.

The trial Court decreed the claim of the plaintiff's holding that the contractual rent under the Rent Act became the standard rent and the defendants had not shown that it was excessive. It also held that the plaintiffs were entitled to the extra claim and accordingly decreed the entire claim.

On appeal the Appellate Bench held that the standard rent of the premises under the first lease was Rs. 532 per month and Rs. 594 per month from February 1950 to March 1954 and April 1, 1954, to September 26, 1956, respectively. Similarly, for the premises under the second lease the standard rent was Rs. 511 per month and Rs. 581.91 per month from February 1950 to March 1954 and from April 1954 to February 28, 1958, respectively and added the amount of additional taxes for the later period. The total liability, therefore, the Court determined to be Rs. 97,238.13 nP. It held that the rent paid by the defendants to the Receivers until February, 1952, was not appropriated towards rent. It, therefore, took accounts and made the decree accordingly. In determining the amount due it did not allow the plaintiff's claim regarding the insurance premia and costs of restoration of the premises to their original condition. It finally considered the question whether the statutory tenancy continued and if it did in respect of which lease. In the result the Court set aside the decree of the trial Court and decreed only a claim of Rs. 4,864.94 nP. plus interest at 4 per cent.

The plaintiffs applied in revision to the High Court against the decree of the Appellate Court. This application was heard along with the Civil Revision Applications filed by defendants Nos. 1, 3 to 6 and 8.

Y. S. Chitale and M. K. Shah, for the plaintiffs.

G. A. Thakkar, with D. C. Purohit, for defendant Nos. 2 to 5.

Venkatrao Anant Pai, defendant No. 1, in person.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after stating the facts, proceeded.] Mr. Chitale contends that (1) the Court below had no jurisdiction to fix the standard rent in the manner in which it has done having regard to the provisions of the Rent Act. (2) He contends that even if it had jurisdiction it has erred in exercising it in determining the case. (3) That it made out a new case for the defendant when it held that there was no appropriation of rent and allowed accounts, (4) that it wrongly disallowed insurance premia and restoration charges, and (5) that it was not entitled to determine the question of statutory tenancy.

The first contention is that the Court had no jurisdiction to fix the standard rent as in this case the premises leased to the defendant were not leased prior to that date. It may be mentioned that the whole compound with all the structures was leased from January, 1940, to the National Studio at a rental of Rs. 1,700 per month.

Section 5, sub-s. (8) defines 'premises' to mean (1) land... or (b) any building or part of a building let separately... including... Sub-section (10) defines 'standard' rent in respect of any premises where it is not fixed by the Court or the Controller under the Bombay Rent Restriction Act, 1939, or under the Act of 1944 to mean—(i) the rent at which the premises were let on the first day of September, 1940, or (ii) where they were not let on the first day of September, 1940, the rent at which they were last let before that day, or (iii) where they were first let after the first day of September 1940, the rent at which they were first let, or (iv) in any of the cases specified in s. 11, the rent fixed by the Court. Clause (b) of the sub-section makes the whole of it subject to s. 11. It is, therefore, argued that inasmuch as on September 1, 1940, the premises that were let were the whole compound with all buildings and now the premises let are only a portion of the same there can be no question of cl. (b)(i) of sub-s. (10) of s. 5 applying. Only cl. (b)(iii) applies and, if so, the rent charged for these premises by the leases in question became the standard rent and the Court has no jurisdiction to determine the standard rent unless the tenant proves that the rent charged is excessive. This argument cannot be accepted in view of s. 11 to which the definition is subject. It gives power to the Court by sub-s. (1) to fix the standard rent under any of the eventualities mentioned in cls. (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) and requires the Court to fix such rent as the standard rent as it deems just having regard to the provisions of the Act and the circumstances of the case. Three of the reasons for which the standard rent may be fixed amongst others are:

(a) where any premises are first let after the first day of September 1940, and the rent at which they are so let is in the opinion of the Court excessive; or (c) where at one time the premises were let as a whole or in parts and at another time in parts or as a whole, or for any other reason where the difficulty arises in giving effect to this part and (e) where there is a dispute between the landlord and the tenant regarding the amount of the standard rent.

Considering the question, apart from authorities it would seem that the standard rent which is defined under s. 5 is the presumptive standard rent inasmuch as it is made subject to s. 11, the basic line being the rent as on September 1, 1940, fetched by the premises. We say it is presumptive, for the obvious reason that even though on September 1, 1940, the premises may have been let and were fetching rent there may yet be a dispute between the landlord and the tenant in respect of the standard rent as the rent charged may not be the economical rent of the property, but subject to such cases the rent prevailing in respect of the premises on the basic date is the standard rent. No doubt in cases where it was let for the first time after the basic date the standard rent would be the rent at which it was so let. Mr. Chitale relies on cl. (a) but then cl. (c) enables the Court in a case like the present to determine the standard rent as on September 1, 1940, the entire property was let and later on it was let in parcels. Mr. Chitale emphasized the article 'the' before the word 'premises' in cl. (c) and contends that the use of this article must show that the Legislature intended the identity of premises.

The wording no doubt leaves much to be desired but, in our view, to accept the contention that unless there is identity of premises separately let the Court has no jurisdiction to determine the standard rent cannot be accepted. It is well settled that a Court construing a document as also a statute must give it reasonable and rational meaning and that it ought not to adopt a construction which renders it ineffective or redundant. To accept the construction suggested by Mr. Chitale would render the clause meaningless. Take the case of a large house let in separate parts on the basic date and then let as a whole. The standard rent cannot be determined as there is no identity. Similarly, in the converse case where on the basic date this house is let as a whole and then in parts also the standard rent cannot be determined. Then one must ask why the provisions has been made as it has been. Though the word 'premises' is defined in s. 5 the meaning is subject to its being consistent with the context. The word 'premises' in s. 11 having regard to its context in which it is used is used in the wider sense meaning the whole building of which part was let then or now. In other words the qualifying word 'separately let' was not intended to apply, though the definite article 'the' is used in s. 11.

The question was raised before Chagla C. J. in Manekji Jivraj Bhatena v. Basantilal M. Sharma.¹ The Small Causes Court had taken the above view. The learned Chief Justice was inclined to take the view that cl. (c) should only be requisitioned when there was difficulty in giving effect to that part of the Act as the later words of the clause indicated. The learned Chief Justice himself recognised the difficulty of doing so. Having regard to the above discussion we prefer with respect the view which we have formulated. This contention of Mr. Chitale must, therefore, fail.

The second contention of Mr. Chitale is that in any event the lower Court has erred in the exercise of its jurisdiction while determining the standard rent by following principles alien to the Rent Act. He has referred us to the relevant portions of the judgment which give an impression that in the view of the Appellate Bench apportionment in a case like the present is the only method of determining the standard rent. He relies in support of his argument upon two decisions, one of this Court in *Dhanrajgirji v. Ward*² and the other of the Calcutta High Court in Bata Shoe & Co. v. Narayan Das.³ In the course of his judgment in the first case the learned Judge observed (p. 879) :

2 (1924) 27 Bom. L.R. 877.

3 [1953] A.I.R. Cal. 234.

"...Again, if the head lease instead of being as here the lease of one building consisting of flats had been a lease of a large number of buildings constituting a large estate, it would be almost impossible to make a correct apportionment of the rent. I do not think it was the intention of the Rent Act that landlords and tenants should be driven to do a difficult and expensive process of valuation and calculation before their rent could be ascertained."

In the second case it was held :

"That the basic rent of the premises cannot be determined on the footing of the rent which was payable for the two different portions of the said premises which were in the occupation of different tenants on that date. The Court has got to determine what rent was properly payable for the premises the rent whereof was sought to be standardised, on the material date namely 1-12-1941."

The view of the Appellate Bench cannot, however, be wholly justified. Clauses (a) to (e) of sub-s. (1) of s. 11 require the Court to determine the standard rent if any one of the conditions mentioned therein is satisfied. Once however the question falls to be decided, the Court has to fix the standard rent which appears to it to be just having regard to the provisions of the Act and the circumstances of the case. The Court, therefore, is bound to take into account all the circumstances and fix the standard rent consistent with the provisions of the Rent Act. The theory of fixing the standard rent only by apportionment adopted by the learned Judges apparently seems to have been based on the decision of the House of Lords in Capital & Provincial Property Trust Ltd. v. Rex.⁴ Under the English Law the provisions are contained in several statutes. Section 5 of the Act of 1938, provides that in a case of the type with which we are dealing, the standard rent shall be a standard rent ascertained by apportioning the standard rent of the dwelling house of which the premises in question form a part. In England apportionment is made because of the statutory provision.

This, however, does not mean that the prior rent of a part of the whole of the building cannot or ought not to be taken into account. It is good sense to say that if the standard rent of the whole building was a particular amount, standard rent of the part cannot exceed that amount. It is also good sense to say that standard rent of the whole building cannot be more than the total of the standard rents of the different parts. Of course if in the meantime any investments have been made by the landlord they must be considered and a fair return on such investments should be given to the landlord. It is true that if the property is wholly changed then apportionment of rent for different portions becomes a difficult problem. If it has not so changed the Court considers such apportioned rent and all such other circumstances as are brought to the notice of the Court. If no other circumstances are proved before the Court then such apportioned rent is the standard rent. In Manekji's case referred to above Chagla C. J. has taken this view and we agree, with respect, with the same.

The decision in Bata Shoe & Co. Ltd. negatives apportionment because of the particular provisions of the Act which direct that the standard rent should be fixed at an amount which would have been reasonably payable for the premises if let on December 1, 1941, as basic rent as prescribed by the schedule. It is obvious that under this provision there is no choice for the Court except to fix the rent as provided. For this reason it would seem other considerations were ruled out. Dhanrajgirji's case arose out of the provisions of the Bombay Rent (War Restrictions) Act of 1918 in respect of a flat in a building whole of which was let to one Dr. Billimoria. Dr. Billimoria was paying a total rent of Rs. 4,479 for it on the basic date and he had let out flats to different tenants. The defendant as a tenant of the flat was paying Rs. 75 on the basic date. Section 13(a) of the Act required the standard rent to be fixed by apportionment which the defendant relied upon. His contention was rejected in view of the fact that the flat itself i.e. the identical premises were also let on the basic date and therefore that was the standard rent and apportionment was out of the question. The observations referred to above were made in this context and can have no application to the present case.

Indian Partnership Act (IX of 1932), Sec. 69—Suit for accounts of dissolved firm or realisation of property of such firm whether can be filed against partner under s. 69(3)(a)—Maintainability of suit by partner against another for damages for misconduct.

Under s. 69(3)(a) of the Indian Partnership Act, 1932, a suit for accounts of a dissolved firm or for realisation of the property of a dissolved firm can be filed against a person whether he be a partner or not.

Appaya v Subrao,¹ explained.

A suit by one partner against another for damages for misconduct will fall within the exceptions contained in s. 69(3) of the Act.

*Bihari Lal v. Union of India*⁴ and Daitari Mohapatra v. Brundaban Matia,⁵ referred to.

ONE JETHABHAI (plaintiff), who died during the pendency of this appeal, was a resident of Bombay and did insurance business in Bombay. His son-in-law one Gulabchand Shah was doing contract work since about 1945. Until 1950, he did his own business, but from February 3, 1950, he took Moolchand (defendant) as his partner. The partnership deed was however, executed between the parties on September 4, 1950.

On September 17, 1952, the State Government invited tenders for modernising the Malegaon-Manmad Road in Nasik District, and the estimated cost was Rs. 12,50,000. The firm of Shah and the defendant submitted their tender on October 14, 1952. They also paid the earnest money required to be paid in the sum of Rs. 12,508. In the month of November, as the tender of this firm was found to be the lowest, it was accepted. The Government required Income-tax Clearance Certificates from the partners before finally sanctioning the contract. The defendant submitted his Income-tax Clearance Certificate but Shah could not, as his matter was pending in appeal before the Appellate Authority, and this fact was conveyed to the Superintending Engineer on December 6, 1952. It was also brought to his notice that the Madras High Court had taken the view that it was not within the power of the Government to insist on an Income-tax Clearance Certificate for public works contracts. On December 24, 1952, the firm of Shah and the defendant again informed the Executive Engineer that the Income-tax Clearance Certificate was not necessary and that, in the alternative, the defendant would be taking another partner and requested that the contract be given to the other firm. On February 6, 1953, the Executive Engineer wrote back to the firm asking them to name the person to be taken as a partner in the place of Shah. On February 18, 1953, the defendant forwarded his letter containing the name of the partner proposed by him, the consent of the plaintiff to become a partner and the Income-tax Clearance Certificate of the plaintiff. accepted the tender. The Executive Engineer wrote in this connection to the defendant informing him that the tender was accepted and asked him to deposit Government Promissory Notes for security and to attend the office with the new partner to finalise the tender documents. On March 6, 1953, in Shah's car, the plaintiff, the defendant and Shah went to Nasik from Bombay. On the same day, the Government Promissory Notes were duly deposited and the defendant handed over the letter to the Executive Engineer informing him that they were depositing the Government Promissory Notes and that both the partners had come to finalise the tender documents. After complying with the formalities and depositing the documents, as the Executive Engineer was not at Nasik but at Malegaon, the party proceeded to Malegaon, and on the same day, after scoring out the name of Shah, the plaintiff and the defendant signed the document as partners. The same day, the works order was issued to both the partners, asking them to begin the work as the period was only 8 months. This was then sent to the Chief Engineer for final sanction. From March 6, 1953, preparations were being made for the execution of the work and, with that end in view, a stone crusher was sought to be purchased. The whole of the work in connection with this was substantially done by Shah. On March 20, the defendant, Shah and one Nasiruddin went to the Malegaon-Manmad Road for inspection and some notes were made by Nasiruddin at the dictation of Shah. On March 21, 1953, Shah engaged a stonebreaker for the firm of the plaintiff and the defendant. On March 25, 1953, the Executive Engineer wrote a confidential letter addressed to the defendant at his private address—though the tender contained the address of the firm—asking him to produce the partnership deed and, pending its production, to go and execute the contract in his own name. On April 20, 1953, the defendant went to the office of the Executive Engineer and signed the document of contract in his own name, superseding the earlier contract. When Shah who was all along acting for the plaintiff came to know of this, he and the plaintiff wrote several letters and telegrams to the Executive Engineer and also to the Superintending Engineer, accusing them of partiality and informing them that they would be responsible if the contract was transferred to the defendant. The matter reached the Chief Engineer, and on July 9, 1953, the Chief Engineer informed the plaintiff that necessary instructions were issued to the Executive Engineer. The Chief Engineer also wrote to the defendant on July 22, 1953, that he need not see the Chief Engineer as the decision was already communicated to the Executive Engineer. In spite of this, it was only on September 17, 1953, that the Executive Engineer informed the partnership of the defendant and the plaintiff that the contract belonged to the partnership firm and that the works order of March 6, 1953, stood. Then on September 24, 1953, the Executive Engineer informed the plaintiff of the same, as in the meantime the plaintiff, through Shah, was clamouring for his rights. The matters dragged on, and the defendant refused to co-operate with the plaintiff or Shah. For the first time on September 28, 1953, in answer to the letter of the Deputy Engineer, inquiring as to the programme of the further work, the defendant gave his reply protesting against the Executive Engineer's letter dated September 17, 1953, and telling him that there was no partnership as there was no agreement on several terms of partnership. In the meantime, the plaintiff had called upon the defendant to carry on with the work with the assistance of Shah, and he told him that he was ready to supply capital for the business. On October 4, 1953, the defendant for the first time replied to the letter of the plaintiff alleging that the terms of the partnership were the same as between him and Shah but that an attempt was made by Shah to introduce a new term to the effect that Shah would work in the place of the plaintiff, and to this term he did not agree; and, therefore, there was no partnership deed. He expressed his willingness to take the plaintiff as a partner provided he agreed to work in person. In the meantime, the Executive Engineer went on writing letters by the firm name and the defendant went on writing to the Executive Engineer protesting against the recognition of the firm. On October 19, 1953, the Executive Engineer wrote to both the partners that seven months had already passed and very little progress was made and, therefore, the firm would be liable to penalty under clause 2 of the contract. The defendant received this letter and he accused the Executive Engineer of not co-operating with him by recognising the firm. Again, by letter dated November 14, 1953, which was posted on December 8, 1953, and received by the plaintiff on December 9, 1953, the Executive Engineer informed the plaintiff and the defendant that they would be liable to penalty. Again, by letter dated November 23, 1953, the Executive Engineer informed the firm that the time expired on November 5, 1953, and that they were liable to pay the penalty of Rs. 12,500 per day. The plaintiff sent a copy of this letter to the defendant with a forwarding letter. On December 15, 1953, the Executive Engineer issued exh. 165 imposing the penalty of Rs. 500 per day on the firm. The Executive Engineer enquired of the plaintiff for the first time on December 16, 1963, whether he had authorised Shah to correspond with the department, in reply to which the plaintiff wrote enclosing therewith a copy of the power-of-attorney in favour of Shah. On February 16, 1954, the defendant gave notice to the Government calling upon them to return the Government Promissory Notes of Rs. 25,000 deposited by the firm of the plaintiff and the defendant and to pay the sum of Rs. 75,000 alleged to be the expenses incurred by him and also a sum of Rs. 1,80,000 as damages for loss of the contract to the defendant. On March 12, 1954, he informed the Superintending Engineer that he was prepared to accept the contract in his own name at 5 per cent. less and asked him that the sum of Rs. 25,000 already deposited be returned to him for depositing the same under the new contract and that one year's time be given to complete the contract. On April 6, 1954, the Superintending Engineer wrote to the defendant to the effect that it was decided to take a negotiated tender from him and that he should see the Executive Engineer at Nasik. The plaintiff came to know of the same almost immediately. He, therefore, sent telegrams both to the Executive Engineer and the Chief Engineer on April 9, 1954. In the meantime, on the same day, the Executive Engineer wrote to the defendant asking him to attend the office to complete the tender documents and informing him that the security deposit of Rs. 25,000 would be transferred to the new work of the defendant, and he forwarded a copy to the Superintending Engineer. Another letter was issued by the Executive Engineer to the firm informing them that their contract was rescinded as they failed to complete the work. On April 22, 1954, the defendant executed a fresh contract and on April 28, the works order was issued to the defendant giving time for 12 months from April 30, 1954. The plaintiff after giving notice filed the present suit, and he prayed for the sum of Rs. 70,000 or such other amount as the Court may decide as and by way of damages or compensation, in the alternative, for an account under the directions of the Court in respect of the profits made by the defendant in carrying out the work and the share of profits which would have accrued to him by honest, efficient and diligent conduct of the business which was taken by the partnership of the plaintiff and the defendant, and for the return of the sum of Rs. 7,100 and costs.

The defendant inter alia contended that there was no partnership, that the suit was barred under s. 69 of the Indian Partnership Act and that it was also barred under the provisions of the Limitation Act.

The trial Judge dismissed the plaintiff's suit and held that the suit of the plaintiff was barred by s. 69 of the Partnership Act and also by s. 159 of the Limitation Act.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after setting out the facts and considering points not material to this report, proceeded.] The next question is whether the suit is barred by time. The Court below has applied art. 115 of the Limitation Act which is for compensation for the breach of any contract, express or implied, not in writing registered and not therein specially provided for. If the suit were only for damages for the breach of contract of partnership, this article would indeed apply, though the important question would be that of the starting point of the period. The third column which relates to the starting point provides that the time shall run from the date the contract is broken and in the case of successive breaches when the breach finally ceases. A suit for accounts and share of profits of a dissolved partnership is governed by art. 106 which provides a period of three years from the date of dissolution of the partnership.

The learned Judge in para. 43 of his judgment has observed that the time commenced to run from April 28, 1953, because the plaintiff admitted in his cross-examination—

“Matters went wrong between us since 28th April 1953. Since the said date disputes arose between the parties. Since the end of April 1953 Gulabchand was not allowed to take part in the doings of the firm.”

He also relies on the admission of Shah in his cross-examination in para. 4 that the defendant told him at the end of April 1953 that he did not want to talk to him, and by about April 25, he learnt that attempts were being made to have the tender in the defendant's name only. If in this case there was a contract of partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant, the mere refusal of the defendant to associate the plaintiff's agent with the partnership work would not determine the starting point of limitation. The plaintiff need not, merely because of this dispute, terminate the contract and sue for damages for breach of the contract. Section 39 of the Indian Contract Act enables the plaintiff to terminate the contract or to continue it by his acquiescence. In the present case, in spite of the defendant's refusal to associate the plaintiff's agent with the work of the contract, the plaintiff insisted on the continuance of the contract and this he did by protesting to the officers regarding the transfer of the contract to the name of the defendant, and ultimately he got it transferred in favour of the firm as late as July in the sense that he got it decided that the contract belonged to the firm. In this case, having regard to the fact that the partnership was for a particular venture, as long as the venture did not end, the plaintiff was in a position to continue the contract and sue for its breach if he was otherwise entitled to sue on that basis. We may also point out that the defendant had, in fact, never denied the existence of the partnership except on October 4, 1953, in reply to the plaintiff's notice. If a suit for damages could lie for breach of the contract, then the plaintiff's suit having been filed on October 1, 1956, was within three years from the date of the denial of the plaintiff's right. We asked Mr. Abhyankar to show us any denial on the part of the defendant of the plaintiff's right prior to that date, but he was not able to show any. He referred us to the evidence of the defendant at pages 57 and 58 of the Paper Book, but it shows that he only refused to execute the deed. There is nothing to show that he ever denied the existence of the partnership. Similarly, the plaintiff's admission at page 21 of the Paper Book does not show that any denial of the partnership was made to him prior to that date. Reliance was also placed by Mr. Abhyankar to support his contention on exh. 139 dated September 28, 1953, which his client wrote to the Executive Engineer wherein he alleged that several terms were not settled and, therefore, the partnership deed could not be executed. Even here there is no clear-cut denial of the existence of the partnership. Secondly, a copy of the letter was not sent to the plaintiff, and thirdly even this letter reached the Executive Engineer's office on October 1, 1953, as shown by the Inward No. written in red ink on that letter. The suit having been filed on October 1, 1956—even under the assumption that this letter furnished a cause of action to the plaintiff, of which he knew nothing—it would be within time. We hold that even if the suit were for compensation for breach of the contract of partnership, it would not be barred by time firstly because there was no denial of the partnership till October 4, 1953, even if new denial furnished the only cause of action though, in our view, the period commenced on the date on which the Government terminated the contract.

The question is whether the suit can be regarded as barred under art. 106 of the Limitation Act. Having regard to what we have stated above, it is clear that the partnership would stand dissolved when the contract was rescinded by the Government, since admittedly the partnership was for this particular venture. The defendant himself admits that the partnership was in respect of this venture only. If, therefore, it is a suit for accounts of a dissolved firm, then since the dissolution could be only on April 9, 1954, by reason of exh. 180, the period of limitation will start from that date, and the suit would evidently be in time. Further discussion will show that this is a suit of such nature. We must, therefore, hold that the suit is within time.

The next question is whether the suit is barred by reason of s. 69 of the Indian Partnership Act. It is an admitted position that the partnership between the plaintiff and the defendant was not registered under the Partnership Act, and, therefore, s. 69 of the Act must govern the case. The section is divided into four sub-sections. Sub-section (1) prevents a person from suing as a partner in a firm either the firm or a person who is alleged to be a partner in the firm, in respect of any right arising out of a contract of partnership or any other rights conferred by the Act, unless the firm is registered. Sub-section (2) prevents a similar suit against a third party in respect of any contract by the firm unless it is registered and it is shown that the persons suing on behalf of the firm are partners in the firm. Sub-section (3) provides that sub-ss. (1) and (2) would also apply to a claim of set-off or other proceeding to enforce a right arising from a contract, but it proceeds to carve out exceptions by cls. (a) and (b) in two cases—(a) the enforcement of any right to sue for the dissolution of a firm or for accounts of a dissolved firm, or any right or power to realise the property of a dissolved firm, and (b) the powers of an official assignee, receiver or Court under the two Insolvency Acts for realisation of the property of an insolvent partner. The exceptions to the section created by sub-s. (4) have no application to the present case, and we need not consider them. Clauses (a) and (b) of sub-s. (3) which provide exceptions clearly enable a suit to be filed either for dissolution of a firm or for accounts of a dissolved firm or for realisation of the property of a dissolved firm. An argument was made that the last portion of cl. (a) applies only to a suit against a third person. But then it is extremely difficult to hold that the provision which is made as an exception to both sub-ss. (1) and (2) should be split up in such a way that one portion of it should be applied to sub-s. (1) and the other portion to sub-s. (2), without even adding the word “respectively” by the Legislature. To do so would appear to be adding some words which are not to be found in the clause or re-drafting the statute. If the Legislature really intended to create an exception in this limited form, then to each of the sub-sections, a proviso could have been added—making an exception only to that sub-section. Giving a natural meaning to the provisions of cl. (a) which are applicable in the present case, in our view, a suit for accounts of a dissolved firm or for realisation of the property of a dissolved firm from any person, whether he be a partner or not, can be filed. This view was taken in the case of *Sheo Dutt v. Pushi Ram*¹ and it was subsequently followed in the case of Daitari Mohapatra v. Brundaban Matia.² Mr. Abhyankar relied on the observations of Sir John Beaumont in the case of *Appaya v. Subrao*³ where the learned Chief Justice appeared to be of the view that the first sentence of sub-cl. (a) should be read as creating exceptions from sub-s. (1), the exceptions being enforcement of a right to sue for dissolution or accounts of a dissolved firm, and the last sentence of that sub-clause should be read as creating an exception to sub-s. (2) in respect of a suit to enforce any right to realise property of a dissolved firm. The question arose in a suit by the plaintiffs who were partners of the defendant for the recovery of an amount due to the partnership by the defendant after the partnership was dissolved. Now, if really the learned Chief Justice had laid down the rule purported to have been formulated by him, the suit would have been dismissed. In that case, the trial Court had dismissed the suit on this ground, but the learned Chief Justice in a Revision Application allowed the suit and decreed the plaintiffs claim. The learned Chief Justice held that the suit in question fell within the exception and, therefore, setting aside the decree of the trial Court, decreed the plaintiffs' suit. It is obvious from the reasoning of the learned Chief Justice that he did not limit the exception to suits against third parties only; and, if this is so, with respect, it would seem it does not matter whether the exception is to sub-s. (2) or sub-s. (1). This case, therefore, is really not against the conclusion at which we have arrived.

Even a suit by one partner against another for damages for misconduct, in the ultimate analysis, must fall within the exceptions. When a partner claims damages on the ground of the misconduct of his partner, what he really means is that the partner must make good the loss sustained by the partnership by his misconduct and the amount so brought into the partnership should be divided between the partners. The amount brought into the partnership is, of course, the realisation of the properties of the partnership. One must notice in this connection that the Partnership Act imposes no disability on the partners of an unregistered firm entering into contracts either with third parties or amongst themselves. The prohibition is only in respect of either the partners or the firm being able to file suits during the continuance of the partnership. Suits, however, of the nature referred to in the exceptions could be filed. In *Bihari Lal v. Union of India*⁴ a suit for damages against a third party was held maintainable. In Daitari Mohapatra v. Brundaban Matia, referred to earlier, a suit for money due from a partner of a dissolved firm to another was held to be maintainable. It is not necessary to state what kind of suit may not be maintainable as between partners. Suffice it to say that the present suit, even as a suit for damages, is maintainable.

K. K. DESAI J. This is a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution challenging the validity of an order of the Central Government dated March 24, 1962, purported to have been passed under sub-s. (4) of s. 89 of the Companies Act, 1956 (I of 1956) (hereinafter referred to as the Act). The order that was passed is annexed as document No. 7 to the petition. The substance of the order is:

"...in exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (4) of section 89 of the said Act the Central Government hereby rescinds its Order No. 3(1)-CL. VI/57, dated 29-7-1957."

The previous order was passed also under sub-s. (4) of s. 89 of the Act. That was an "exemption order" granting the petitioner-Company an exemption from the requirements of sub-ss. (1), (2) and (3) of s. 89.

The facts leading to the filing of this petition are shortly as follows: The petitioner-Company is a joint stock company registered on May 5, 1947, under the Indian Companies Act, 1913 (VII of 1913). The memorandum of association and the articles of association of the petitioner-Company are annexed as document No. 2 to the petition. It appears that the authorised capital of the Company is Rs. 10 lakhs divided into (a) 38,000 Ordinary shares of Rs. 25 each, and (b) 25,000 Deferred shares of Rs. 2 each. The issued and subscribed capital of the Company is Rs. 7,88,175 divided into 31,527 ordinary shares of Rs. 25 each and Rs. 50,000 divided into 25,000 deferred shares of Rs. 2 each. Admittedly, the Table A in the First Schedule to the Indian Companies Act, 1913, was adopted in a large way, and as regards the voting rights in respect of these shares, the result was that each holder of an ordinary share of Rs. 25 and each holder of a deferred share of Rs. 2 was entitled to the same voting rights, namely, one vote for each share owned by him. The whole of the deferred share capital of Rs. 50,000 was owned by five persons. In anticipation of the coming into force of the Companies Act, 1956, the petitioner-Company made an application to the Central Government in connection with a situation which was likely to arise by reason of the present provisions in ss. 87 to 90 of the Act. In pursuance of what transpired in correspondence between the petitioner-Company and the Central Government, the five share-holders being the owners of the deferred shares of the capital of Rs. 50,000 executed a deed of trust transferring all the deferred shares to the trustees of the trust who now own these shares. The managing agency rights were also made property and subject matter of this trust. After the present Companies Act came into force in April 1956, the Central Government, in pursuance of the powers reserved to it under sub-s. (4) of s. 89, passed an order dated March 30, 1957, exempting the petitioner-Company from the requirements of sub-ss. (1), (2) and (3) of s. 89, in respect of the above 25,000 deferred shares for a period of three months with effect from April 1, 1957. The recitals in the order refer to the application made by the petitioner-Company for exemption and also to the fact that the Central Government was of the opinion that the exemption was "required in the public interest". By a further order of exemption also passed under sub-s. (4) of s. 89 of the Act on July 29, 1957, the Central Government again exempted the petitioner-Company from the requirements of sub-ss. (1), (2) and (3) of s. 89 in respect of the above 25,000 deferred shares. There are no conditions attached to the above exemption order as regards the period or any other matter. In this order also, one of the recitals is that the Central Government was of the opinion that the exemption was "required in the public interest."

It appears that in February 1960 and thereafter representations were made to the Central Government making certain allegations regarding the management of the Company and requesting the Central Government to withdraw the exemption. In response to the correspondence addressed, the petitioner-Company gave detailed replies regarding all these representations and submitted the same to the Central Government. Ultimately, by the impugned order dated March 24, 1962, it was recited that sufficient time to consolidate its position had been given to the petitioner-Company and that the exemption was no longer required in the public interest; and on the basis of these recitals and in purported exercise of the powers reserved to it under sub-s. (4) of s. 89, the Central Government rescinded the order of exemption dated July 29, 1957. Certain correspondence and representations on behalf of the petitioner-Company were thereafter addressed to the Central Government details of which it is unnecessary to refer here. Having not succeeded in its representations, the petitioner-Company ultimately filed this petition on July 4, 1962, challenging the validity of the above order of rescission of exemption dated March 24, 1962.

The substance of the main contention made in the petition is as follows: There is no power under sub-s. (4) of s. 89 of the Act in the Central Government to revoke and withdraw an exemption granted under that sub-section. Having regard to the time-limit mentioned in sub-ss. (1) and (3) of s. 89 and in respect whereof exemption could be granted under sub-s. (4) upon expiry of the time-limit specified in sub-s. (1) there can be no power, express or implied, to revoke orders of exemption previously made. The order of revocation having been passed long after the expiry of the time-limit specified in sub-s. (1) a situation had been created which resulted into impossibility of carrying out the obligations mentioned in sub-ss. (1) and (3). The order, therefore, is arbitrary and without jurisdiction. The petitioners have also made certain other contentions in the petition; but in the view which we are taking we find it unnecessary to recite those contentions here.

After the Fifteenth Amendment to the Constitution was passed, the Union of India was joined in this petition as respondent No. 2. The Union of India has not filed separate return in reply to the contentions made in the petition. The case of respondents Nos. 1 and 2 is to be found in the return filed by respondent No. 1. In his return respondent No. 1 has denied the contentions raised by the Petition. Apart from certain preliminary contentions, the reply of the respondents as appearing in the return filed by respondent No. 1 is that the power to grant exemption under sub-s. (4) of s. 89 of the Act implied the power to withdraw that exemption and also obviously the order of exemption. Reliance is strongly placed in that connection on the provisions in ss. 14 and 21 of the General Clauses Act. Respondent No. 1 also contends that the exemption having been withdrawn, the petitioner-Company is now bound to comply with the substantive requirements of sub-ss. (1) and (3) of s. 89 within a reasonable time. He denies that the order of withdrawal is a quasi-judicial order as alleged by the petitioner-Company. He also denies the petitioner's contention that the deferred shares are protected by the provisions of s. 90 read with s. 106 of the Act. The main defence to the petition is that having regard to the provisions in ss. 14 and 21 of the General Clauses Act, there was implied power in the Central Government to withdraw the exemption granted under sub-s. (4) of s. 89. It is admitted that express power was not given by sections of the Act then existing to the Central Government to withdraw or cancel exemptions granted under sub-s. (4) of s. 89.

Counsel for both sides have developed their arguments in connection with the contentions made in the petition on the footing of the contents of ss. 85 to 90 of the Act. The arguments advanced have all been about the true effect and construction of the provisions in s. 89. It is, therefore, convenient to refer to these sections first before mentioning how the arguments were developed. These sections fall in Part IV of the Act relating to "Share Capital and Debentures". This part begins with s. 82. The first three sections relate to the nature of shares, numbering of shares and certificate of shares. The heading of the portion beginning with s. 85 is "Kinds of share capital". Section 85 defines "preference share capital" and "equity share capital". Section 86 provides that the share capital of a company limited by shares formed after the commencement of this Act, or issued after such commencement, shall be of two kinds only, namely: (a) equity share capital; and (b) preference share capital. Sections 85 to 89 have a bearing and affect voting rights attached to, inter alia, deferred shares, issued i.e. brought into existence prior to the date of the commencement of the Act. These voting rights are specifically referred to in s. 90 which mentions the extent to which voting rights attached to these shares would continue to be protected. For that reason, in s. 90 it is provided that nothing in ss. 85 to 89 shall affect these rights "except as otherwise provided in section 89". Section 87 relates to voting rights and provides by sub-s. (1) as follows:

"87. (1) Subject to the provisions of section 89...

(a) every member of a company limited by shares and holding any equity share capital therein shall have a right to vote, in respect of such capital, on every resolution placed before the company; and

(b) his voting right on a poll shall be in proportion to his share of the paid up equity capital of the company."

It is not necessary to refer to the further sub-sections of that section. It is sufficient to emphasise that the intent and purpose of s. 87 is that every shareholder holding equity share capital should be entitled to have a vote, and on a poll should be entitled to voting right in proportion to his share of and/or contribution to the paid up equity capital of the company. This section further deals with preference share capital and holders of preference shares, with which subject we are not concerned in this petition. Section 88 provides, inter alia, that no company shall issue any shares which carry voting rights or rights as to dividend, capital or otherwise which are disproportionate to the rights attaching to the holders of other shares.

The relevant parts of s. 89 run as follows:

"89. (1) If at the commencement of this Act any shares, by whatever name called, of any existing company limited by shares carry voting rights in excess of the voting rights attaching under sub-section (1) of section 87 to equity shares in respect of which the same amount of capital has been paid up, the company shall, within a period of one year from the commencement of this Act, reduce the voting rights in respect of the shares first mentioned so as to bring them into conformity with the voting rights attached to such equity shares under sub-section (1) of section 87.

(2) Before the voting rights are brought into such conformity, the holders of the shares in question shall not exercise in respect thereof voting rights in excess of what would have been exercisable by them if the capital paid up on their shares had been equity share capital, in respect of the following resolutions placed before the company,..."

[The resolutions mentioned relate to the appointment of a director or of a managing agent or secretaries and treasurers and agreements in respect of these matters; to the appointment of buying or selling agents; and to the grant of loans and such other matter.]

"(3) If by reason of the failure of the requisite proportion of any class of members to agree, it is not found possible to comply with the provisions of sub-section (1), the company shall, within one month of the expiry of the period of one year mentioned in that sub-section, apply to the Court for an order specifying the manner in which the provisions of that sub-section shall be complied with; and any order made by the Court in this behalf shall bind the company and all its shareholders.

If default is made in complying with this sub-section, the company, and every officer of the company who is in default, shall be punishable with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees.

(4) The Central Government may, in respect of any shares issued by a company before the 1st day of December, 1949, exempt the company from the requirements of sub-sections (1), (2), and (3), wholly or in part, if in the opinion of the Central Government the exemption is required either in the public interest or in the interests of the company or of any class of shareholders therein or of the creditors or any class of creditors thereof.

Every order of exemption made by the Central Government under this sub-section shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament as soon as may be after it is made."

Section 90 is in the following terms:

"90. Nothing in sections 85 to 89 shall,—

(a) in the case of any shares issued before the commencement of this Act, affect any voting rights attached to the shares save as otherwise provided in section 89, or any right attached to the shares as to dividend, capital or otherwise; or

(b) apply to a private company, unless it is a subsidiary of a public company."

The main question that arises in this petition is whether under sub-s. (4) of s. 89 of the Act there is power in the Central Government to revoke, rescind and/or withdraw an exemption order once made. Mr. Phadke for the petitioner has submitted that on a true construction of the provisions in ss. 87 to 90, it is clear that once exemption is granted from the obligations created under sub-s. (1) of s. 89 there is no power left in the Central Government to withdraw the exemption. The exemption must always in his submission refer to all the liabilities and obligations created under sub-ss. (1), (2) and (3) of s. 89. The nature of the obligations is such that it could only be discharged in the manner and within the time prescribed in sub-ss. (1) and (3). The manner and time prescribed is such that exemptions once granted cannot be withdrawn. The power to exempt as contained in sub-s. (4) relates to property rights, being voting rights in this case of deferred share-holders. The power once exercised affects and deals with the share-holders and the company in general permanently. The exemption once granted so affects this property and alters the situation in such a manner that it cannot be permissible to retrace the step of exemption once taken. The power is to be exercised on the fulfilment of the conditions mentioned in sub-s. (4). These conditions, if once fulfilled, apply to the facts and circumstances of a company "at the date of the commencement of the Act". These circumstances cannot be reconsidered after the exemption is granted. He submitted at one stage that the orders of exemption would be quasi-judicial orders but has at a later stage of the proceedings not pressed that contention. His submission is that the power of exemption vested under sub-s. (4) in the Central Government is to be exercised for the reasons of (i) public interest, or (ii) the interests of the company, or (iii) of any class of share-holders, and this power when exercised decides finally matters which cannot be reconsidered. These adjudications and opinions deal, finally and once for all, with rights to property and for that reason there can be no warrant for revoking and/or rescinding them. In developing his arguments, he has mainly emphasised the consequence of the period of one year mentioned in sub-ss. (1) and (3). He relied upon the fact that the orders made under sub-s. (4) are directed to be placed on the Table of the Parliament. He relied upon the provisions in ss. 25(3)(b) and 250(5) of the Act. He has relied upon s. 637A which was pointed out in reply by Mr. Bhabha for the respondents. His further contention was that the mischief that is sought to be dealt with by the provisions in s. 87 relates to oppression of minority by majority. It relates to mismanagement by minority of the affairs of the company. There are other alternative provisions like ss. 397 and 408 which are available to deal with such mischief. He again laid great emphasis on the language of the provisions in s. 90, which, according to him, saved voting rights of previously existing deferred share-holders.

Mr. Bhabha for the respondents has contended that some of the arguments made on behalf of the petitioner are not relevant. He also mainly relied upon the provisions in ss. 87 to 90. The burden of his contention was that the only substantive provision which governed the rights of all share-holders from the date of the commencement of the 1956 Act was contained in s. 87(1)(a) read with s. 9 of the Act. According to him, after the date of the coming into force of the Act, having regard to the provisions in s. 87, it was not possible for any company to have any shares by way of equity capital wherein the voting rights were not in proportion to share-holders' paid up equity capital of the company. Basing his further arguments on the above contention, he submitted that the provisions in sub-ss. (1) and (3) of s. 89 are merely "machinery sections" to bring the constitution of all the companies into conformity, as regards the voting rights of the share-holders, with the provisions in s. 87. His contention was that there is no fresh obligation of any kind created against any company under sub-ss. (1) and (3) of s. 89. Developing his argument, he stated that each of the sub-sections must be construed as a whole and each throwing light on the other. He had to make this submission having regard to the difficult language regarding time-limit in sub-ss. (1) and (3). His further argument was that having regard to the well-established principle that power to do anything must include power to revoke that thing, and under the provisions in ss. 14 and 21 of the General Clauses Act it was permissible at all times for the Central Government to withdraw exemptions granted under sub-s. (4). Towards this submission he contended that the phrase in sub-s. (3) "shall, within one month of the expiry of the period of one year mentioned in that sub-section, apply to the Court" meant and should be read as "within one month of the expiry of the period of one year from the date of revocation and/or rescission of the order of exemption". He developed this contention by referring to some authorities where the phrase "the commencement of this Act" had been considered. We will presently refer to these authorities. His case was that having regard to the provisions in s. 14 of the General Clauses Act, the power contained in sub-s. (4) could from time to time be exercised and that under s. 21 of the same Act there was implied right to withdraw orders made previously. It is not necessary that the conditions of the time-limit contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 89 should continue to exist for exercising the powers of exemption under sub-s. (4). He denied that the provisions of s. 637A were helpful to the petitioner.

The clients of Mr. Bobde being a group of shareholders had applied to be made parties to this petition on September 8, 1964. That application was first made in August 1964 and the consideration of the application was adjourned to hearing of this petition. His clients wanted to raise several controversial facts in connection with the management of the petitioner-Company, and also as regards the controversial question of rights of different groups of share-holders of the Company. We have refused that application as, in our view, it is impossible that such controversies can be decided in writ jurisdiction. Even so, we have permitted Mr. Bobde to advance arguments in connection with the questions raised by the petitioner and the respondents. Mr. Bobde submitted that on a true construction of sub-s. (1) of s. 89, it is not possible that during the one year mentioned in that sub-section any order of exemption can become necessary or be made by the Central Government. He has made certain submissions regarding the true construction and effect of s. 87(1)(a), which we will deal with while discussing that section.

In connection with the questions raised by the parties, it has appeared to us that the real question is about the true construction and effect of the provisions in ss. 87 to 90. In connection with the question of implied powers and the application of s. 21 of the General Clauses Act, it is first necessary to mention that in the case of *State of Bihar v. D. N. Ganguly*¹ the same question arose. In that case, in the first instance references to arbitration had been made by the Government of Bihar under s. 10(1) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. By a subsequent notification also purported to have been made under the very same provisions the Government purported to supersede the prior notifications of reference to arbitration. This action of the Government was challenged by the petitions filed before the High Court at Patna under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution. The contention of the petitioners was that the Government of Bihar had no power or authority to supersede the earlier notifications. The petitioners succeeded in the High Court and the matters were taken in appeal by the State Government to the Supreme Court. Dr. Bannerjee for the appellant urged before the Supreme Court that in dealing with the question about the powers of the appropriate Government under s. 10(1) of the Act, the relevant facts which transpired between the parties must be borne in mind. He also argued that the power to cancel a reference made under s. 10(1) of the Act must be held to be implied, and in support of his argument he relied upon s. 21 of the General Clauses Act. It is convenient to quote the section here:

"Where, by any Central Act or Regulation, a power to issue notifications, orders, rules or bye-laws is conferred, then that power includes a power, exercisable in the like manner and subject to the like sanction and conditions (if any), to add to, amend, vary or rescind any notifications, orders, rules or bye-laws so issued."

Now, in connection with this contention, the Supreme Court observed (p. 1021):

"...It is well settled that this section embodies a rule of construction and the question whether or not it applies to the provisions of a particular statute would depend on the subject-matter, context, and the effect, of the relevant provisions of the said statute. In other words it would be necessary to examine carefully the scheme of the Act, its object and all its relevant and material provisions before deciding whether by the application of the rule of construction enunciated by Sec. 21, the appellant's contention is justified that the power to cancel the reference made under Sec. 10(1) can be said to vest in the appropriate government by necessary implication. If we come to the conclusion that the context and effect of the relevant provisions is repugnant to the application of the said rule of construction, the appellant would not be entitled to invoke the assistance of the said section."

The contention of the petitioner before us is that the context and effect of the relevant provisions of the Act is such that it would be repugnant to apply the above rule of construction to the power of exemption created in favour of the Central Government under sub-s. (4) of s. 89. Having regard to the observations of the Supreme Court in the above case it will be necessary to examine the scheme of the Act, its object and all relevant and material provisions. If on such examination it appears to us that the power of revocation claimed by way of implication would be repugnant to the provisions, object and/or the scheme of the Act, we would be justified in holding that the contentions made by the respondents are not tenable.

Reference has been made to other authorities where the effect of s. 21 of the General Clauses Act is discussed. In view of the above complete observations of the Supreme Court regarding the true effect of s. 21 in the above decision, we do not deem it necessary to refer to those authorities.

We will now consider the question of the true effect and construction of the above sections of the Companies Act relied upon by the parties.

It is clear on a reading of ss. 87 and 88 of the Act that the intent of the provisions of these sections was that every shareholder of equity capital must on a poll have voting right in proportion to his share of contribution to the paid up equity capital of the Company. The Legislature disapproved of all the previously existing disproportion as regards voting rights of parties holding equity capital. The intention of the Legislature was that the disproportion previously existing must not continue. Provision about this matter having been made in ss. 87 and 88, provision was made for protecting the existing disproportionate voting rights of parties holding shares issued before the date of the commencement of the Act. It is clear on a reading of s. 90 that nothing in the above two sections or even s. 89 could affect any voting rights attached to shares-issued before the commencement of the Act "save as otherwise provided in section 89". This provision in s. 90 is clear and unambiguous. In considering the rights of deferred share-holders of any company the Court would be bound to give effect to the above saving provisions in s. 90. Now, it is also clear on a reading of s. 90 that voting rights of the deferred share-holders of the previously existing companies are liable to be altered in the only prescribed manner, that is, in accordance with the provisions in s. 89 and not otherwise. If the above is the effect of the provisions in s. 90, it is difficult to appreciate the argument that the provisions in sub-ss. (1) and (3) of s. 89 do not create any fresh obligations and are merely "machinery sections". It is difficult to accept this contention that the rights of deferred share-holders are not protected by s. 90 and that they are in fact and for all purposes having regard to the provisions in ss. 87 and 89 of the Act, governed by s. 87. The contention that there is no new obligation created under s. 89, seems to us not justified having regard to the language of sub-ss. (1) and (3) of s. 89. The provision in sub-s. (1) which creates (fresh) obligation is in the phrase—

"...the company shall...reduce the voting rights in respect of the shares first mentioned so as to bring them into conformity with the voting rights attached to such equity shares under sub-section (1) of section 87."

As the provisions in s. 90 exclude altogether the application of s. 87 so as to affect voting rights attached to the share issued before the commencement of the Act, we would not be justified in holding that to such voting rights or to the shares carrying such voting rights, the provisions in s. 87 are directly applicable. On the contrary, it requires to be repeated that though the policy of the law is clear as regards the voting rights in respect of the equity share capital and is contained in ss. 87 and 88, because of the protection granted to the holders of shares issued before the commencement of the Act by s. 90, the voting rights attached to such shares can only be affected by and in the manner prescribed under sub-ss. (1), (2) and (3) of s. 89 and not otherwise.

The true effect, therefore, of the provisions in sub-ss. (1) and (3) of the s. 89 is that there was an obligation on all previously existing companies to reduce the voting rights of the deferred shareholders with disproportionately excessive voting rights so as to bring them into conformity with sub-s. (1) of s. 87 within one year from the date of the commencement of the Act. Mr. Bhabha contended that the importance in sub-s. (1) of s. 89 is to the period. According to him, there is no emphasis in this section on the obligation to reduce. This was so, according to him, because this must be held to be a "machinery section". Having regard to the construction which we have arrived at about the provisions in s. 90 read with sub-s. (1) of s. 89, we are unable to accept this contention.

In connection with the construction which we have arrived at, the reference to the period of time mentioned in sub-s. (3) is relevant. This sub-section refers (i) to the failure of the requisite proportion of any class of members to agree, and (ii) to the reduction mentioned in sub-s. (1). For that reason, if it is found impossible to comply with the provisions in sub-s. (1), it is provided that the company must make an application within one month of the expiry of the period of one year mentioned in that sub-section. The question is: Is it permissible to construe this provision to read 'within one month of the expiry of the period of one year from the date of revocation of exemption granted under sub-section (4)' as suggested by Mr. Bhabha? The language of the sub-section is clear. The obligation that is cast on the defaulting companies is to make the application mentioned in the sub-section within one month of the expiry of the period of one year. That provision has relation with the next sub-paragraph in the sub-section which makes it an offence not to make such an application. This phrase in the sub-section directly refers to the period of one year mentioned in sub-s. (1). That period, as we have already pointed out, is of one year from the commencement of the Act. Obviously, the date of the commencement of the Act must for all purposes remain the same. In this case, it was April 1, 1956. The application to Court must therefore be made on or before May 1, 1957. That date is not liable to be extended. Having regard to the clear language in these sub-sections, we are unable to accept this contention made by Mr. Bhabha.

The power of exemption referred to in sub-s. (4) must of necessity relate to obligations mentioned in sub-ss. (1), (2) and (3). That is apparent on a reading of the language of sub-s. (4). If our construction of sub-s. (1) is correct, the exemption must relate to the obligation of the petitioner-Company to so alter its memorandum of association and articles of association that the deferred share-holders who contributed Rs. 2 each per share should not have one vote per share. The right of vote of other share-holders who contributed Rs. 25 per share to the equity capital would have to be altered so that the proportion of the voting rights would be equalized in proportion to the capital contribution by each shareholder to the whole of the capital of the company. In substance, the company had to alter its memorandum and articles so that the share-holders had voting rights in accordance with and in proportion to their contribution to the capital of the Company. This change in the memorandum and articles was to be brought about in accordance with the powers reserved to the company and share-holders under the articles of association and the relevant provisions in the Act. It is for this reason that reference is made in sub-s. (3) to "If... it is not possible to comply with the provisions of sub-section (1)" because of "the requisite proportion of any class of members not agreeing" to the resolution proposed for amending the company's memorandum of association and articles of association to bring the voting rights in conformity with the provisions in s. 87. It is necessary to remember in this connection that it is not the attempt of the Parliament to change the memoranda of association and articles of association of different companies. The Act provides about the manner and method in which these deeds of constitution of companies can be altered. The Legislature did not forget while enacting the provisions of ss. 87 to 90 that the matter of alteration to be made in these documents would require to be carried out in accordance with the usual procedure. It is for that reason that in spite of having made provision relating to voting rights in ss. 87 and 88, by s. 90 protection was given in respect of the previously existing companies and the direct application of these sections was specifically avoided. It was for this reason that in sub-s. (3) Courts were invested with powers which are altogether new. The memorandum of association and articles of association were not sought to be altered by any provisions of law at all. In regard to companies which defaulted in carrying out the obligations created by s. 89, provision was made in sub-s. (3) to empower the Court to get the memorandum and articles altered, and in that connection, to make orders specifying the manner in which the same had to be done. In other words, the Court was empowered to overlook, if necessary, the relevant provisions in the memorandum and articles of different companies as also the scheme of the Act for the alteration of these documents. It is thus clear that the provisions in s. 87 were not made (directly) applicable so as to affect voting rights of the shareholders in respect of the shares issued before the commencement of the Act.

What we have discussed above goes to emphasise the fact that on a true construction of sub-s. (4) of s. 89 the exemption that can be granted under that sub-section must of necessity be related to the obligations created under sub-s. (1) and (3) and the consequential matters referred to in sub-s. (2). This exemption has no relevance to the period of one year mentioned in sub-s. (1). To accept the contention that this has only relevance and bearing on the period of one year would result into the absurd position that by executive action of exemption, the period prescribed by statute in sub-s. (1) could be altered. The contention that the exemption related only to the period of one year mentioned in sub-s. (1) appears to us to be far-fetched and involving the proposition that executive orders could be made to enlarge the time prescribed by statute.

The obligations cast on companies under sub-ss. (1) and (3) could be carried out only once and relate to the circumstances of a company as at the commencement of the Act. For the purposes of the time of one year prescribed by sub-s. (1) the only material date is the date of the commencement of the Act. If examination is granted in connection with these obligations at any time, it is difficult to see what other obligations can thereafter survive. Obviously, after the expiry of one year mentioned in sub-s. (1) no obligation can survive. Of necessity, by executive action of withdrawal of exemption once granted, a second and new obligation of the same nature as mentioned in sub-s. (1) cannot be created. The nature of the obligation being of the above kind, it appears to us that the scheme of this section is such that an exemption once granted cannot be withdrawn at any stage whatsoever. The withdrawal of exemption after the period of one year in sub-s. (1) would of necessity result into creation of a new obligation by executive action. This circumstance appears to us to be of such importance that we must come to the conclusion that exemptions once granted under sub-s. (1) cannot be revocable at all.

In connection with the argument that the provisions in s. 21 of the General Clauses Act would apply to the power of exemption it is relevant again to notice that the matter of voting rights was, up to the date of the commencement of the 1956 Act, wholly governed in respect of each company by the provisions in its memorandum of association and articles of association. The Act makes specific provision relating to the method and manner of alteration of memorandum of association and articles of association. Reference in this connection can be made to ss. 16 and 17, as also s. 31. It is necessary to remember that where rights of different classes of share-holders are to be affected, the provisions for alteration of articles are more stringent as can be ascertained by reading ss. 106 and 107. Indirect reference to these sections is contained in sub-s. (3) of s. 89 when it states "If, by reason of the failure of the requisite proportion of any class of members to agree it is not found possible to comply with the provisions of sub-section (1)..."

The right of voting is an important right and by a study of the various relevant sections of the Act, it can with ease be ascertained that protection of such right is the subject-matter of diverse sections of the Act. There is provision for exercising right of vote so as to affect the whole administration of companies.

The consequence of the provisions in the Act relating to general meetings of the shareholders and the right of voting of the shareholders at these meetings and the right of the general meeting to appoint directors and managing agents and to decide other matters is that a group of shareholders controlling a majority of votes controls business, management, and finance of the whole company. This is often done through elected directors. The result of provisions relating to the right of sale of shares and having the transfer of shares registered is that by sale of the controlling block of shares, control of business, management, and finance of a company could be completely transferred in favour of the new purchasers of that block of shares. It is not convenient to refer here in that connection to all the provisions and sections of the Act. It appears to us that these are well-established consequences of the provisions of the Act. It is also permissible to take judicial notice of the fact that in the context of the modern times, large industries and businesses requiring large finances cannot be carried on in private sector except through the machinery of incorporated companies. It is in the context of these provisions, objects and scheme of the Act that we are called upon to construe the provisions in sub-s. (4) of s. 89. It is in this context that we have to find whether it can justifiably be held that the rule of construction as contained in s. 21 of the General Clauses Act is applicable to the power of exemption created in favour of the Central Government under this sub-section. The more relevant provisions in this context are obviously the provisions in ss. 87 to 90. If the construction which we have arrived at as regards the true effect of sub-s. (1) of s. 89 is true, apparently, the exemption that could be given under sub-s. (4) relates to the obligation of the companies existing prior to the date of the commencement of the Act to amend their memoranda of association and articles of association, so as to bring the right of vote in the shareholders into conformity with the provisions in s. 87. It is obvious that that obligation as against the companies existing, at the date of the commencement of the Act, can only be found to exist in the provisions in sub-s. (1) of s. 89. That, as we have already said, is the result of the phrases "Subject to the provisions of section 89" in s. 87, and "Nothing in sections 85 to 89" in s. 90, in the first part of the section. The obligation created against these companies under sub-s. (1) of s. 89 was apparently to deal with the mischief of disproportionately excessive voting rights held by shareholders in proportion to the capital contributed by them as against other shareholders who made excessive and larger contribution to the capital of the company. Even so, under sub-s. (4) of s. 89 a right has been conferred on the Central Government to exempt the previously existing companies from the obligation created under sub-s. (1) of s. 89. The opinion, therefore, that the Central Government has to form under sub-s. (4) primarily relates to the question as to whether for any of the reasons mentioned in sub-s. (4), it was desirable, in spite of the provisions in s. 87, that the previously existing companies should carry on the management and business of the company under the control of a few shareholders having disproportionately excessive voting rights as compared to the proportion of their capital contribution as against the other shareholders. The obvious result of the exemption granted under sub-s. (4) in the case of the petitioner-Company was that a few shareholders owning the 25,000 deferred shares continued to control, by exercise of their single vote in respect of each share, the whole of the business, management, and finances of the petitioner-Company. The question that the Central Government had, therefore, to consider and in fact considered was desirability for one or more of the reasons mentioned in sub-s. (4) to allow that situation to continue by granting exemption from the obligations created against the company under sub-s. (1). The opinion had to be based on one of the four reasons mentioned in sub-s. (4), namely: (i) public interest, (ii) interests of the company, (iii) interests of any class of shareholders therein, and (iv) interests of the creditors or any class of creditors thereof. The question had, in view of the language of sub-s. (4), to be decided on the facts which must exist on the date when the obligation mentioned in sub-s. (1) arose and continued to exist against the petitioner-Company. It should have been apparent to the Central Government having regard to the above general scheme of the Act that in the event of exemption being granted, the obligation under sub-s. (1) would cease to exist altogether, and as from the date of exemption the company and its shareholders would proceed to deal with their rights as regards the management, business and finances of the company and their shares as if there was no obligation of any kind against the Company to bring the voting rights of its deferred shareholders into conformity with the provisions in s. 87. It is needless to state that these are extremely important and serious consequences as regards the property rights of the company on the one hand and its shareholders on the other.

In addition, it is necessary to repeat that the period of time mentioned in sub-s. (1) was not liable to be extended by any executive action taken under sub-s. (4). The intention of the Legislature was that the obligation must be carried out in the manner prescribed under sub-ss. (1) and (3). The question is whether having regard to the above circumstances, it is permissible to hold that the rule of construction as contained in s. 21 of the General Clauses Act was intended to be applicable to the power created under sub-s. (4). In our view, the situation that would be created by holding that the exemptions granted under sub-s. (4) could be revocable would be entirely contrary and repugnant to the whole of the scheme of the Act. As the administration, management and affairs of a limited company are liable to be controlled by a group of shareholders owning majority of votes it appears to us that it was never intended that the rule of construction in s. 21 of the General Clauses Act should be applicable to the power of exemption vested in the Central Government under sub-s. (4). It is difficult to find that it was permissible for the Central Government, having regard to the provisions in s. 14 of the General Clauses Act, from time to time to pass and revoke orders of exemption under sub-s. (4).

It needs to be repeated that the circumstances on the basis whereof the Central Government is to form its opinion that exemption be granted under sub-s. (4) will be circumstances existing during the period in which the obligation cast under sub-s. (1) commenced and continued to exist. That period must expire within one year from the date of the commencement of the Act. It is necessary to state that we do not want to express any opinion as regards the question of the right of a Court to make orders under sub-s. (3), to enable a company to bring its memorandum of association and articles of association into conformity with the provisions in s. 87 even after the expiry of the above period. It is quite possible that the Court would continue to have such powers continuously and at all times. We are, however, not called upon to decide that question.

It is necessary to refer here to the case of Juvan Sinhji v. Balbhadrasinhji.² Having regard to the facts involved it became necessary in that case for Mr. Justice Bhagwati to consider the true effect of the provisions in ss. 87 to 90 of the Act. The relevant observations in para. 6 at page 215 are as follows:

“...Whatever inequality in respect of voting rights existed under the Articles of Association would have come to an end immediately on the coming into force of the Companies Act, 1956, by reason of the combined operation of Sections 87 and 9 and the new structure of voting rights prescribed by Section 87 would have become operative immediately on the commencement of the Act. Section 90, however, provides that nothing in Secs. 85 to 89 shall, in the case of any shares issued before the commencement of the Act, affect any voting rights attached to the shares save as otherwise provided in Section 89. There is thus an express provision in the Act that the provisions of Section 87 shall not in the case of any shares issued before the commencement of the Act, affect any voting rights attached to the shares save as otherwise provided in Section 89. The new structure of voting rights prescribed by Section 87 would not, therefore, apply to the shares issued before the commencement of the the Companies Act, 1956, save to the extent provided in Section 89.”

In further considering the true effect of these sections in para. 14 at page 221 the learned Judge observed:

"...it is obvious that the Company failed to bring the voting rights of the shares into conformity with the voting rights prescribed by Section 87(1) within the period of one year prescribed by Section 89(1) but that cannot make any difference. Even if the Company did not bring the voting rights of the shares into conformity with the voting rights prescribed by Section 87(1) as required by Section 89(1), the voting rights could not be exercised by the members of the Company in accordance with the old Articles of Association after the expiration of the period of one year from the date of commencement of the Companies Act, 1956, in view of the provisions of Section 9. The Company could not by refusing to carry out the provisions of Section 89(1) perpetuate the disproportionate voting rights provided under the old Articles of Association. It was only for a period of one year from the date of commencement of the Companies Act, 1956, that the old voting rights could continue and thereafter the voting rights had to be exercised in accordance with the provisions of Section 87."

With respect, we regret that we are unable to agree with the observations in the last quoted passage. The Court has not given due effect to the provisions in s. 90 that the voting rights attached to the shares issued prior to the commencement of the 1956 Act could not be affected except in the manner prescribed by s. 89. The Court has not considered the fact that voting rights could not be affected without necessary alterations in the articles of association of the company by resolutions passed in that connection in accordance with the procedure prescribed by the Act.

Reliance has been placed in connection with the true effect of the provisions in s. 21 of the General Clauses Act on the case of Bhola Prasad v. U. A. Goswami.³ The observations in that case are to the effect that the provisions of s. 21 contain a rule of construction relating to powers exercised by executive authority under what is described as "delegated legislative powers". This rule of construction is not applicable to orders of administrative nature. The contention on behalf of the respondent is that the powers to give exemption as contained in sub-s. (4) of s. 89 are of the nature of "delegation of legislative powers" and/or "subordinate legislation". The rule of construction contained in s. 21 is, therefore, applicable to these powers. We have in this connection already considered all relevant matters and find it unnecessary to further discuss the question.

Reference has also been made to the case of K. P. Khetan v. Union of India.⁴ In this case also the Supreme Court came to consider the true effect of the provisions in s. 21 of the General Clauses Act. The observations in this case are of the nature similar to the observations in the subsequent case of State of Bihar v. D. N. Ganguly, which we have referred to.

On behalf of the respondents reference has been made to the case of *Rambhau v. D. G. Tatke*⁵ and Parthasarathy Mudaliar v. State of Madras.⁶ These cases relate to withdrawal of exemptions once granted. In the first case, the observations relate to the withdrawal of exemption granted under the Minimum Wages Act, 1948. In the second case, they relate to the withdrawal of exemption granted under the Madras General Sales Tax Act, 1939. There is no dispute between the parties that exemptions granted for non-application of Minimum Wages Act and Sales Tax Act can always be withdrawn. The reason for this is that the context of the legislative provisions in the cases referred to above clearly indicates the policy to be enforced by executive authority. The context also indicates that the executive authority must have from time to time a right to include and exclude certain industries and goods from the applicability of these Acts. The question in all cases must be, as observed by the Supreme Court in the case of State of Bihar v. D. N. Ganguly, to find out upon examination of the scheme and object of the relevant Act and the context in which the powers are conferred if the rules of construction as contained in ss. 14 and 21 are applicable or repugnant.

In connection with the true construction of the phrase "at the commencement of this Act" as contained in s. 89, Mr. Bhabha relied upon the case of Kedar Nath v. Kishan Lal.⁷ The question before the Court in that case related to the provisions in s. 15 of the U.P. Temporary Control of Rent and Eviction Act, 1947. Section 15 of that Act provided:

"In all suits for eviction of a tenant from any accommodation pending on the date of the commencement of this Act, no decree for eviction shall be passed, except on one or more of the grounds mentioned in section 3."

The Act provided for the extension of applicability of the provisions of the Act to the areas notified under the provisions of the Act. The suit for ejectment related to property situate in the area to which the Act had not been applied. Much subsequent to the date of the institutions of the suit by a notification issued under the Act the provisions of the Act were made applicable to the area in question. The question that arose before the Court was whether the suit was pending on the date of the commencement of the Act. On behalf of the plaintiff, it was contended that the suit was not pending "on the date of the commencement of the Act". In that connection, the Court observed:

"There is no valid ground to make any distinction between 'the date of the commencement of the Act' in section 15 and 'the date when the Act is applied to a particular area'".

On the footing of the above construction, the contention made on behalf of the plaintiff was rejected. We do not see how the observations made in that case can affect the true construction and effect of the phrase "at the commencement of this Act" as contained in s. 89 of the Companies Act. In the context in which the phrase is used in s. 89, it is abundantly clear that it is meant to indicate the date from which the obligation mentioned in sub-s. (1) attaches and is created against all the previously existing companies. This date must for all purposes continue to remain April 1, 1956.

The result of the above discussion is that in our view the rule of construction as contained in s. 21 of the General Clauses Act is not applicable to the provisions in sub-s. (4) of s. 89 of the Act. The power of exemption created under sub-s. (4) can be exercised once and finally only, and there is no right of revocation of exemption once granted.

In that view of the matter, we find it unnecessary to discuss the various arguments advanced in connection with the true construction of s. 637A on behalf of the petitioner-Company and the respondents. As we are in favour of the petitioner on the main ground of the true construction and effect of sub-s. (4) of s. 89 and/or ss. 87 to 90 of the Companies Act, we deem it unnecessary to decide the further questions raised on behalf of the petitioner-Company.

The result is that we must strike down and we hereby declare the impugned order of revocation of exemption dated March 24, 1962, as invalid and of no effect. There shall be a mandamus against the respondents restraining them from enforcing that order of revocation. The respondents will pay the costs of the petitioner-Company.

Order accordingly.

Companies (Court) Rules, Rule 96—Companies Act (I of 1956), Secs. 439, 442, 443—Whether Company should be heard before admission of petition for its winding up.

Under rule 96 of the Companies (Court) Rules, 1959, there is no right in a company to be issued a notice before a petition for winding-up is admitted nor before the Court fixes the date of hearing of the petition. There can, therefore, be no question of hearing the company at the stage of admission. As to giving of notice to the Company before giving directions regarding advertisements there is a discretion left in the Court.

Mere admission of a petition for winding-up will not necessarily mean that a Provisional Liquidator should follow as a matter of course.

M. R. Mody, with Booch instructed by Bhaishankar Kanga & Girdharlal, for the respondent.

Madhukar H. Kania, for Kashibhai Patel and Dinubhai Patel, in support of winding-up petition.

PATEL J. The present appeal comes up from the order of Mr. Justice Kantawala in a winding-up petition.

The respondent in this appeal had filed a winding-up petition against the Extrusion Processes Private Ltd., the appellant company. It is a private limited company and a substantial portion of the shares is held by the Managing Director and his relations and friends. In the petition for winding-up serious allegations were made to show that it was proper and fit that the company should be wound up. It came first before Mr. Justice K. K. Desai for preliminary orders under Rule 96 of the Companies (Court) Rules framed under the Companies Act. Desai J. dismissed the petition in limine. Against his order an appeal, being Appeal No. 32, of 1963, was filed and that appeal was heard by us on November 5, 1963. After hearing counsel on both the sides we made the following order:

"In the result, we allow the appeal, admit the petition, give a notice to the company and postpone the giving of the advertisement until after it is heard. The trial Court will hear the matter hereafter..."

Before the matter came on board affidavits were filed on behalf of the company to show cause. Affidavits in rejoinder were filed by the petitioning share-holder and also the other share-holders including a Director who was according to his allegation excluded from management. Mr. Justice Kantawala felt that we had heard the company and that we had already admitted the petition. He, therefore, directed advertisements. It is against this order that the present appeal is brought.

Mr. Parpia argues that by our order we only accepted the petition and that before it is admitted it should be heard on merits, i.e. the company ought to be heard and as Mr. Justice Kantawala did not hear all the arguments of the company before admitting the petition, the order is bad. In support Mr. Parpia relies upon Western India Theatres v. Ass. B'bay Cinemas,¹ a decision regarding the practice followed in such matters by this Court before the Act was amended and new rules were made.

The question is of importance for obvious reasons. If the contention is accepted it would mean that there would be appeal from order admitting a petition, appeal from an order of advertisement and appeal from the final order. In between there may be other appeals. We must, therefore, carefully examine the provisions of the Act and the rules.

Section 439 relates to the making of the winding-up petitions and enumerates the persons or classes of persons who are entitled to make a petition. Section 442 relates to the powers of the Court in a winding-up petition to stay any proceedings pending in any other Court. Section 443 defines the powers of the Court on hearing the petition. There is no provision in the Act dealing with procedural matters in relation to winding-up petitions. This is left to rules to be made under s. 643 of the Act to which we must now turn.

Part I of the Company (Court) Rules deals generally with applications. Rule 11 requires that applications made under the sections there referred to shall be made by petition, one of the sections being s. 439. Rule 27 relates to the form and time of service of the notice. Rule 28 requires in case a petition is presented against a company that it shall be accompanied by a notice in the prescribed form together with a copy of the petition and a stamped envelope addressed to the company and that "the Registrar shall immediately on the admission of the petition send the notice together with the copy of the petition to the company by registered post."

Part III deals with winding-up petitions. Rule 95 relates to the form of the petition and rule 96 relates to admission of petition and directions as to advertisement. Rule 99 requires that subject to the directions of the Court, the petition shall be advertised as provided by Rule 24 in Form No. 48. Rule 96 directs that after the petition is filed, it shall be posted before the Judge in Chambers for admission of the petition and fixing a date for the hearing thereof and for directions as to the advertisements to be published and the persons, if any, upon whom copies of the petition are to be served and the Judge may, if he thinks fit, direct notice to be given to the company before giving directions as to the advertisement of the petition. A plain reading of the rule indicates that there is no right in a company to be issued a notice before a petition is admitted nor before the Court fixes the date of hearing. As to giving of notice to the company before giving directions regarding advertisements there is a discretion left in the Court. It is true that if the Judge is not satisfied on reading the petition itself regarding the grounds for winding-up he would be entitled to reject the same. There can, however, be no question of hearing the company at the stage of admission.

In response to the notice under Rule 96 the company may show cause why the petition should not be proceeded with or rejected. But then this could only be on grounds which do not involve facts. In the case referred to, at p. 1242 the learned Chief Justice says while considering Rule 733 of the old rules:

"...In the winding-up of a company the creditors are interested, the share-holders are interested, and therefore it is but right that before the Court makes a final order on the petition these parties should be heard. But that does not mean that the discretion of the Court is taken away to dismiss a petition at an early stage if no answer is called for on the merits of the petition. If this is clearly borne in mind, then the practice followed by this Court is a perfectly proper practice...."

The subsequent observations of the Court have to be read in the light of this principle. It is possible, therefore, that in response to such a notice the company may be able to show that the application does not lie or that without going into the merits the application ought to be dismissed and this is what is pointed out by the learned Chief Justice in next paragraph of the judgment. He says (p. 1242):

"...In answer to the notice all that the respondent is entitled to urge is that for any justifiable reason the petition should not be proceeded with and further steps should not be taken."

Mr. Parpia's contention that before admission of the petition the company ought to be heard cannot possibly be supported. Our order, therefore, rightly admits the petition. We had only postponed the advertisement until after the company was heard on the question of advertisement.

As the petition is admitted and the advertisement is issued, the matter will have to be heard on merits. The learned Judge will be free on the materials before him to come to his own conclusion as to the allegations made in the petition and he would be free to exercise any of the powers as are vested in him under s. 443 of the Companies Act necessitated by his own conclusions on facts. We have disposed of all legal contentions on law by our previous judgment. We may also make it clear that the mere admission of a petition would not necessarily mean that a Provisional Liquidator should follow as a matter of course. Both the parties are agreed that the matter should be heard as expeditiously as possible. Both the parties will have liberty to file further affidavits if they so choose within such time as the trial Judge may allow. The matter should be heard as early as possible. Costs of the appeal would be costs in the petition.

Order accordingly.

Bombay Village Panchayats Rules, 1959. Rules 8, 7—Nomination paper presented through representative of candidate—Authority authorising representative to present nomination paper not produced along with nomination paper—Validity of nomination paper.

Under rule 8(1) of the Bombay Village Panchayats Election Rules, 1959, in cases in which a nomination paper is not presented personally by the candidate, the requirements of the rule will be complied with, if the authority authorising the representative to present the nomination paper on behalf of the candidate is given in writing before the nomination paper is presented, and it is immaterial whether such authority is produced or not at the time when the nomination paper is presented. It must, however, be produced before the nominations are scrutinised so as to enable the returning officer to decide whether the nomination paper was presented properly. The question whether the representative had been given the authority before the nomination paper was presented will have to be decided in each case on the facts of that case.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. M. Limaye, with N. M. Konkar, for the petitioner.

M. A. Rane, Assistant Government Pleader, for respondents Nos. 3 and 4.

CHAITANI C. J. The petitioner was one of the candidates at the election which was to be held for electing members of the Gram Panchayat of Nirmal in Bassein Taluka from Ward No. 3-C. Under rule 7 of the Bombay Village Panchayats Election Rules, 1959, the Mamlatdar had fixed the time between *Decided, February 11, 1965. Special Civil Application No. 158 of 1965.

11 a.m. and 3 p.m. on January 4, 1965, for filing nomination papers. Respondents Nos. 1 and 2 also filed their nomination papers, but these were not presented by them personally but through their agent. The agent did not have with him the authority in writing authorising him to present the nomination papers at the time when these were presented. This authority was produced by him on the same day at 5.45 p.m. after the time for presenting nomination papers had expired. At the time of scrutiny of nominations, which was held on the following day, the Returning Officer rejected the nomination papers of respondents Nos. 1 and 2 on the ground that the authority authorising their agent to present the nomination papers had not been produced within the time prescribed for filing the nominations. Against the order made by him respondents Nos. 1 and 2 appealed to the Mamlatdar. The Mamlatdar took the view that it was not necessary to produce the authority along with the nomination papers and that since the authority had been produced subsequently the agent must be held to have been authorised in writing to present the nomination paper as required by rule 8. The Mamlatdar, therefore, directed that the nominations of respondents Nos. 1 and 2 should be accepted. That order is being challenged in the present application.

Mr. Limaye, the learned advocate for the petitioner, has contended that the view taken by the Mamlatdar is erroneous. He has argued that the authority in writing which is required by rule 8 must be produced at the time when the nomination paper is presented. Mr. Rane, who appears on behalf of respondents Nos. 3 and 4, has, on the other hand, contended that rule 8 does not require that the authority to present the nomination paper must be produced at the time when the nomination paper is presented and that consequently the view taken by the Mamlatdar is correct. In order to decide which one of these views is correct it is necessary to refer to the relevant provisions of the rules.

Sub-rule (1) of rule 7 states that the Mamlatdar shall appoint the date, the hours and place or places for the following stages of an election, namely, (i) the nomination of candidates, (ii) the scrutiny of nominations, (iii) the recording of votes and (iv) the counting of votes. The date and the hours for the nomination of candidates are, therefore, fixed by the Mamlatdar under this rule. Sub-rule (3) of rule 7 states that the dates, hours and place or places appointed under sub-rule (1) shall not be changed except with the sanction of the Collector, unless there is not sufficient time for obtaining the previous sanction of the Collector to such change. Sub-rule (1) of rule 8 provides that on the day appointed for the nomination of candidates, and during the hours appointed by the Mamlatdar under rule 7 in this behalf, each candidate shall make an application in writing in Form A signed by him and present it either in person or through a representative authorised in writing in this behalf by such candidate to the Returning Officer signifying his willingness to serve as a member of the Panchayat. This rule, therefore, requires that the nomination paper shall be presented by the candidate personally or through a representative authorised in writing in this behalf by the candidate. The rule gives an option to the candidate. He may present the nomination paper personally or he may present it through another person whom he has authorised in writing in this behalf. The rule does not require that where a candidate does not present a nomination paper personally but through another person, the authority authorising that person to present the nomination paper must also be produced along with the nomination paper. All that is required by the rule is that the person who presents the nomination paper must possess an authority in writing from the candidate authorising him to do so. The authority must, therefore, be in existence before the nomination paper is presented. It cannot be given after the nomination paper is presented, because, in that case, the nomination paper cannot be said to have been presented by a person who at that time had the authority to present such nomination paper. If, however, the authority in writing is given before the nomination paper is presented, then the mere fact that it is not produced along with the nomination paper will not make the nomination paper invalid. In cases in which, therefore, a nomination paper is not presented personally by the candidate, the requirements of the rule will be complied with, if the authority authorising the representative to present the nomination paper on behalf of the candidate is given in writing before the nomination paper is presented and it is immaterial whether such authority is produced or not at the time when the nomination paper is presented. It must, however, be produced before the nominations are scrutinised so as to enable the returning officer to decide whether the nomination paper was presented properly. The question whether the representative had been given the authority before the nomination paper was presented will have to be decided in each case on the facts of that case.

In the present case, the authority authorising the agent of respondents Nos. 1 and 2 to present the nomination papers was produced on the same day at 5.45 p.m. It is, however, not clear from the papers whether this authority was given before or after the nomination papers were presented. The Mamlatdar has not recorded a finding on this question. Since, however, the Mamlatdar has already accepted the nominations of respondents Nos. 1 and 2 and since we do not think that it would be desirable to postpone the election for a further period, we have decided not to remand the matter to the Mamlatdar for an inquiry on the above point. If it is the case of the petitioner that the agent, who had presented the nomination papers of respondents Nos. 1 and 2, did not possess the requisite authority at the time when these nomination papers were presented, it will be open to him to file an election petition, if so advised, after the election has been held.

Rule discharged. No order as to costs.

Contempt of Court—Contempt by defendant appearing in person—Defendant at hearing threatening plaintiff's advocate with prosecution for defamation for statements made by advocate at hearing—Whether such threat amounts to contempt of Court.

In the course of the hearing of a case in Court the defendant, who appeared in person, gave a threat to the plaintiff's advocate suggesting that prosecution for defamation would be launched against him in respect of statements made by him against the defendant which were supported by unimpeachable evidence. One prosecution for defamation for similar statements was launched by the defendant against the advocate before the threat was administered and a second prosecution for defamation against the advocate for statements made by the advocate in the aforesaid litigation was subsequently started by the defendant. On the question whether the threat held out by the defendant amounted to contempt of Court:—

Held, that the threat held out by the defendant was intended to operate upon the mind of the advocate so that he should flinch from performing his duties towards his client, the plaintiff, and that, therefore, it amounted to contempt of Court.

A piece of conduct intended or calculated to bring pressure upon a party, which must necessarily include his advocate, not to pursue the matter according to his choice, would amount to an attempt to interfere with the administration of justice. The threat need not be direct, in the sense that the contemner specifically asserted that he would take such action. It is sufficient if the context showed that the action contemplated was the action of the contemner himself.

The question as to whether the words amounted to a threat is not of the essence of the matter. What is of the essence of the matter is the course of conduct adopted by the contemner, and if, on the whole, the conduct has a tendency to interfere with the course of administration of justice or subvert the course of justice, it would amount to contempt of Court. The nexus between the threat and the demand for doing something or refraining from doing something need not be express or need be expressly stated. It is enough if from the context the link between the two is apparent.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

V. K. Punwani, for the plaintiff.

S. Vaney, defendant, in person.

V. S. Deshpande, Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

NAIR J. This proceeding for contempt of Court has been initiated by the High Court on the report submitted by Mr. Vimadalal, Judge, City Civil Court, Bombay, (as he then was), in respect of an incident which took place in his Court on March 4, 1963. The facts leading up to the incident on March 4, 1963, may be briefly outlined as follows: The plaintiff, Mrs Damayanti G. Chandiramani, filed a suit against the defendant, S. Vaney, for recovery of possession and arrears of compensation on the basis that the defendant was a licensee and that the licence was revoked. That suit was filed on October 26, 1962. After the service of the summons, the defendant attended the office of advocate Punwani, who appeared on behalf of the plaintiff in the suit, for inspection of the documents. This was on November 10, 1962. On January 10, 1963, the defendant started prosecution under s. 24 of the Rent Control Act against the plaintiff, her parents and advocate Punwani on the basis that the plaintiff had withheld essential services in respect of the flat which he had taken from the plaintiff. The Presidency Magistrate, before whom the prosecution was launched, issued process only against the plaintiff and not against the rest. The plaintiff then took out a notice of motion in the suit for possession asking for temporary injunction restraining the defendant from proceeding with the prosecution launched by him under s. 24 of the Rent Control Act. The mother of the plaintiff, who held the power-of-attorney for the plaintiff, put in an affidavit in support of the notice of motion. The notice came up for hearing on March 4, 1963, and it is in the course of the arguments on the notice of motion that the incident, from which this proceeding has arisen, took place. Before dealing with the happenings of March 4, 1963, in the Court of Judge Vimadalal, it is necessary to set out a few more facts.

On January 10, 1963, the defendant launched a prosecution against advocate Punwani for defamation. This complaint arose in the following circumstances: The defendant had started a criminal case (No. 588/S of 1962) on October 23, 1962, against the members of the managing committee of Bela Housing Society for defamation. It may be mentioned that the flat in respect of which the plaintiff had asked for possession in the suit in the City Civil Court was a part of the building known as Bela Court, which belonged to Bela Co-operative Housing Society. In Criminal Case No. 588/S of 1962 advocate Punwani appeared for the accused, i.e., the members of the managing committee. Mr. Punwani argued that the defendant who complained of a libel against himself, had no reputation to defend. It was the case for the defendant that the statements made by Mr. Punwani in the course of the argument amounted to defamation and that is why he started prosecution against advocate Punwani on January 10, 1963, under s. 500, Indian Penal Code. On February 26, 1963, the defendant started a criminal case against the plaintiff's father, her mother, members of the managing committee and advocate Punwani for intimidation and insult and abetment of the said offence. It may be mentioned at this stage that advocate Punwani happens to be the legal adviser of the Bela Co-operative Housing Society. The defendant had refused to become a member of the said Housing Society. Because of his refusal to become a member of the said society, the managing committee passed a resolution that the use of the lift should be refused to the occupants who were not members of the Housing Society. A notice was put up in that regard. The defendant alleged that the two lift-men and advocate Punwani actually prevented him from using the lift and in that way insulted him. It is on that basis that he lodged the complaint on February 26, 1963, for insult and intimidation. It would thus be seen that the two cases launched by the defendant against advocate Punwani were pending on the day, when the notice of motion came up for hearing before Judge Vimadlal on March 4, 1963. It appears that the criminal case launched by the defendant on February 26, 1963, was dismissed on March 13, 1963, without issuing process against any of the accused.

Let us now turn to the happenings of March 4, 1963. Advocate Punwani, in the course of his arguments, referred to the contents of para. (6) of the affidavit put in by the plaintiff's attorney in support of the notice of motion. Paragraph (6) of the affidavit runs thus:

"I say that the defendant seems to be a notorious litigant. He has been convicted four times for offences under the Indian Penal Code, the last of which was for assaulting a lady (Case No. 135/P of 1951) for which he was sentenced to rigorous imprisonment for three months, as recorded in the judgment dated 3-10-1952 of the 8th Court, Esplanade, Bombay. He has filed many cases against the owners of the Guest Houses or Hotels, where he used to reside before shifting to the suit premises..."

The apparent object of advocate Punwani in referring to the contents of para. (6) of the said affidavit was to show that the defendant was in the habit of launching upon vexatious cases and complaints and the complaint lodged by him under s. 24 of the Rent Control Act against the plaintiff stood in the same category. It may be recalled that by the notice of motion, the plaintiff had asked for a temporary injunction restraining the defendant from proceeding with the criminal complaint lodged by him under s. 24 of the Rent Control Act. The learned City Civil Court Judge asked the defendant as to whether he had to say anything with regard to the allegations contained in para. (6) of the affidavit. The defendant stated that he would see to it that the plaintiff's advocate, Mr. Punwani, would go to jail; that two criminal cases had already been filed by the defendant himself against the plaintiff's advocate, the said Mr. Punwani and that he would file two more criminal cases against him shortly. It appears that Judge Vimadlal made a note of these statements on the docket sheet and asked the defendant to explain as to why he should not be proceeded with for contempt of Court. The defendant did not offer any explanation and on March 12, 1963, Judge Vimadlal submitted a report to the High Court requesting that action for contempt of Court should be taken against the defendant. On the same day, he disposed of the notice of motion and made the rule, which was already granted restraining the defendant from proceeding with the criminal case under s. 24 of the Rent Control Act, absolute.

It is also necessary to refer to certain events, which took place after March 4, 1963, because one of the contentions raised by Mr. Punwani in the course of these proceedings was that, the threat given by the defendant was not just a piece of bravado, but he actually carried that threat into action. We will consider the question as to whether and how far these happenings are relevant for deciding the present case, at a later stage of this judgment. For the time being, we will proceed to narrate the events as have taken place after March 4, 1963. On March 6, 1963, the defendant started prosecution against the plaintiff's father, members of the managing committee, two lift-men and advocate Punwani for insult and intimidation in respect of an incident which took place on March 5, 1963, in which, according to the defendant, he was refused the use of the lift. On March 7, 1963, the criminal case No. 588/S of 1962, to which a reference has already been made, was taken up for hearing. Advocate Punwani was appearing on behalf of the accused in that case. The defendant made an application requesting that advocate Punwani should be made a co-accused on the ground that he had instigated the managing committee to pass the resolution refusing the services of the lift to the defendant. Notice was issued to advocate Punwani and on his showing cause, Mr. Punwani was discharged on June 26, 1963. The defendant went in appeal from the order in the notice of motion passed on March 12, 1963. He obtained an interim stay order on March 30, 1963. On April 3, 1963, he launched a second prosecution under s. 24 of the Rent Control Act against the plaintiff, her parents, members of the managing committee, the two lift-men and advocate Punwani. The plaintiff appeared in the appeal before the High Court and eventually, the stay was vacated. The High Court passed an order restraining the defendant from starting fresh proceedings under s. 24 of the Rent Control Act pending the hearing of the appeal. The High Court, however, refused to pass any stay order in respect of the prosecution already launched by the defendant on April 3, 1963, and suggested that the plaintiff may approach the Magistrate for such relief. On May 9, 1963, the defendant started another prosecution for defamation against the plaintiff's mother and advocate Punwani in regard to the contents of para. (6) of the affidavit put in by the plaintiff's mother in support of the notice of motion.

The defendant has appeared in answer to the notice and put in his affidavit showing cause as to why he should not be punished for contempt of Court. He has given his own version as to what transpired on March 4, 1963, and denied some of the statements attributed to him by Judge Vimadalal in his report. The defendant has complained that Judge Vimadalal did not allow him to read his affidavit. At para. (8) of the affidavit, the defendant has set out a lengthy conversation, which, according to him, took place between him and Judge Vimadalal. He has suggested that it was only after the Judge asked him as to what was his occupation that he told him that he was engaged in writing a book about the administration of justice and when the Judge further asked him as to what he was doing prior to his engagement of writing the book, the defendant told the Judge that he could have become a Judge if he wanted to. When further asked as to what Government posts were offered to him, the defendant told the Judge that he was offered a nomination to the Indian Civil Service and if he had accepted the same, he would have started as an Assistant Judge and in that case, he would have become senior to the present Chief Justice of Bombay in the Civil Service Cadre. At para. (11) he has explained as to how advocate Punwani has gone on making defamatory statements about him wherever he appeared against the defendant. According to him, Mr. Punwani made some defamatory statements on December 10, 1962, at the hearing of the notice of motion before Judge Walavalkar; that again he made the same statements before the Court of the 16th Presidency Magistrate on January 10, 1963, and that he repeated the same statements on March 4, 1963. He has admitted that he filed a criminal case for defamation against advocate Punwani (No. 101/S of 1963) which is pending in the 28th Presidency Magistrate's Court in regard to the defamatory statements made by Mr. Punwani on January 10, 1963, in the Court of the 16th Presidency Magistrate. He has then referred to the incident, which took place in the Court of Judge Vimadalal and according to the defendant, this is what has happened:

"In this Court the learned Judge Vimadalal himself asked me, if I had anything to say regarding the allegations made against me. I replied, 'Yes, a good deal, Sir'. Then the learned Judge asked, 'Have you suffered imprisonment for three months?' I replied, 'These are false allegations. I have never suffered any sentence of imprisonment at any time. But, apart from that your Honour would appreciate that even if it were true that I had spent a number of years in prison, there is no occasion or justification for the plaintiff's advocate to make that fact known here as it has no bearing on the issues before the Court. I respectfully submit that the purpose of this Advocate in making these statements is to defame me and create an atmosphere of prejudice and provoke me to make a brawl in Court or indulge in violence and, therefore, he is guilty of contempt of Court, and I request that the Court will be pleased to take action against him...' I thereupon continued, '...If the certificate granted to the Society is cancelled, this advocate stands to lose his job. He, therefore, bears me great malice and everywhere he goes, he makes defamatory statements about me. Already I have filed a complaint of defamation against him which is case No. 101/S of 1963 in the 28th Presidency Magistrate's Court. Also he is an accused in another criminal case in his capacity of an employee of the said Housing Society. And in a day or two, I intend to file two more criminal cases in which this Advocate will be one of the accused for his 'wrong doing'. I have also made an application to the Bar Council for suspending him on account of his professional misconduct on five counts, one being that he has been an employee of the Housing Society for more than two years, and the President of the Bar Council informed me that my application would be kept pending and action will be taken when the Chapter V of the Advocates Act comes into force. I am hoping that there would be a conviction in each of the four cases in which he will appear as an accused, and that there will be a jail sentence'".

The defendant has denied that he gave any threat or intimidated the advocate. He has also denied that he uttered the words 'I would see to it that the plaintiff's advocate would go to jail'. He has argued that he has no power of sending anybody to jail and, therefore, it is unlikely that he would utter any such words towards the advocate. In short, his contention is that he warned the advocate of the consequences of his own 'wrong doing' and what he contemplated was to take action against the advocate to vindicate his own legal rights.

It is also necessary to refer to certain stages through which the contempt proceedings have gone on in this Court. The proceedings came up for hearing before a Division Bench comprising Patel and Kantawala JJ. on August 7, 1963. It appears that the defendant was then represented by Mr. K. L. Gauba, a senior advocate of this Court. After some brief discussion, the Division Bench adjourned the case and gave a direction to the City Civil Court Judge to expedite the suit filed by the plaintiff against the defendant. It appears that thereafter the suit was heard and disposed of in March 1964. On April 15, 1964 this case came up for hearing before another Division Bench comprising the Chief Justice and Gokhale J. It was adjourned and then it was placed before the Division Bench comprising Kotwal and Palekar JJ. This was on June 25, 1964. At that time, the defendant put in a written affidavit stating that Patel J. had expressed the view that the statements attributed to the defendant, even if true, would not amount to contempt. The Division Bench felt that in view of the various allegations contained in the affidavit put in by the defendant against Judge Vimadalal, it would be more appropriate if a report was called for from Judge Vimadalal. Accordingly, a report was called for from Judge Vimadalal, who submitted the report on August 26, 1964. In May 1964, the defendant launched another prosecution against the plaintiff, her parents, advocate Punwani and certain lift-men.

In the affidavit put in by the defendant, in order to show that the case was part-heard and that certain views were expressed by the Division Bench comprising Patel and Kantawala JJ., the defendant has formulated four propositions as follows:

"(a) Whether the report against me which is made by a senior Judge of the Bombay City Civil Court bears a semblance of correctness?

(b) Whether the alleged vague statements amount to contempt?

(c) Whether if the statements amount to contempt, they fall within the mischief of s. 228 I.P.C. and the jurisdiction of this Court is excluded by s. 3(2) of the Contempt of Courts Act?

(d) Whether s. 3(1) of the Contempt of Courts Act offends article 14 of the Constitution and is invalid."

The defendant, who has himself argued his case in detail, has developed his arguments on the basis of the four propositions formulated by him in his affidavit dated June 22, 1964.

The defendant has strenuously contended that the version set out by Judge Vimadalal as to what transpired on March 4, 1963, is not correct. He has argued that there is intrinsic evidence in the report to show that some of the statements attributed to him could not possibly be true. In that connection, he pointed out that he is a man of good education; that he knows English very well and that he has also considerable experience about the working of Courts. In these circumstances, it is unimaginable that he would make a statement to the effect that he would see to it that advocate Punwani would go to jail. He has pointed out that he has no powers to send even a thief or a murderer to jail and all that he can do is to make a report in regard to the offence of theft or murder. That being the case, it is unlikely that he would utter the said words as regards advocate Punwani. It is necessary to note that Judge Vimadalal has made the following note on the docket sheet presumably on the day of the argument on March 4, 1963:

"The defendant states that the advocate would go to jail. Two cases already filed and two more proceedings".

The defendant has argued that assuming that the learned Judge made the said note at the time of the argument in his Court, even so, the note does not say that he (defendant) uttered the words 'He would see to it that advocate Punwani would go to jail'. There is undoubtedly slight difference in the wording of the report on this point and the wording in the note made on the docket sheet. But the distinction is without difference and no importance can be attached to the small hair-splitting distinction, which the defendant has ingeniously pointed out to us. The version that the defendant has set out in great detail at para. (11) of his affidavit is not also materially different from the one which the learned Judge has set out in his report. The defendant has admitted in the affidavit at para. (11) that he has lodged a complaint for defamation against advocate Punwani and has gone a step further and stated that advocate Punwani bears malice towards him. This complaint of defamation relates to the statements made by advocate Punwani in the course of his arguments in criminal case No. 588/S of 1962. The statements made by Mr. Punwani were similar to the statements which he made in the course of the arguments in support of the notice of motion in the City Civil Court. The defendant has also admitted that advocate Punwani is an accused in another criminal case, which was filed against the members of the managing committee of the Housing Society. He has also admitted that he stated that he intended to file two more criminal cases in which advocate Punwani would be an accused. He has then proceeded to say, 'I am hoping that there would be a conviction in each of the four cases in which he will appear as an accused and that there will be a jail sentence'. This is what he stated before Judge Vimadalal on his own admission in this affidavit. Therefore, whether the version set out by Judge Vimadalal is accepted as true in its entirety,—and we see no reason as to why we should not accept the same,—or not, on his own admissions contained in the affidavit, it is quite clear that the defendant did say in the course of his arguments in respect of the notice of motion that he had already launched a criminal case for defamation against advocate Punwani in respect of the statements made by the advocate to the effect that the defendant is a notorious litigation-monger and that he has been convicted four times. On his own admission, the defendant also gave a threat that he intended to file two more criminal cases for what he calls the advocate's 'wrong doing'. Of course, in this affidavit, he does not admit that he told the Court that he would launch a prosecution for defamation against advocate Punwani for the defamatory words uttered by him on March 4, 1963. At the same time, taking the context into account, it is clear that what the defendant hinted was that, he would launch such a prosecution and that too in respect of the statements made by the advocate in the course of the arguments. According to the defendant, the statements made by him do not amount to threat and what he stated was that he would take such legal action as he would be entitled to take on the basis of the wrong deeds committed by advocate Punwani. The question as to whether the statements made by the defendant amounted to threat or not would be considered by us at a later stage of this discussion. We will also consider the question as to whether, assuming that the statements do not amount to threat, they amounted to a conduct, which would interfere with or subvert the administration of justice. For the time being, we are only considering the two rival versions that have been placed before us and on a due consideration of the two versions, we have no hesitation in preferring the version put forward by the learned Judge Vimadalal, particularly, when the admissions contained in the affidavit of the defendant support the version of the learned Judge in its broad outline. It may be pointed out that advocate Punwani also has put in his affidavit fully supporting the version set out by Judge Vimadalal.

The next point that was urged by the defendant was that he had sufficient justification to make the comments which he made. According to him, the statements made by advocate Punwani were entirely irrelevant and beside the point, which was being considered by the City Civil Court. The defendant suggested that advocate Punwani went out of his way to make these defamatory statements so that he would be provoked into engaging himself into a brawl with the advocate. In the course of his arguments, he went so far as to say that had he been a little younger, he would perhaps have engaged himself in a brawl with the advocate on account of the highly provocative statements made by him. We are unable to accept that advocate Punwani's statements were beside the point or that they were provocative. Advocate Punwani was within his rights in referring to the past history of the defendant, and in particular, his conduct in launching upon unwarranted prosecutions and indulging in frivolous litigation. Mr. Punwani wanted to suggest that the defendant's action in launching the prosecution under s. 24 of the Rent Control Act was a piece of his general conduct. In other words, his argument was that the action of the defendant in going to the criminal Court under s. 24 of the Rent Control Act was utterly vexatious and made with a view to bring pressure upon the plaintiff to withdraw the suit. Nor do we think that the reference made by advocate Punwani in regard to the previous convictions of the defendant was beside the point. In the first place, these statements were based on the contents of the affidavit sworn to by the attorney of the plaintiff. In the second place, Mr. Punwani says that not only he was instructed by his client but that he tried to ascertain the truth of these statements and that he was supplied with a copy of the judgment in criminal case No. 135/P of 1951, which was pronounced on October 3, 1952. That was a prosecution under s. 323, Indian Penal Code, against the defendant initiated by the Colaba Police Station, in which the defendant was sentenced to undergo three months' rigorous imprisonment and to pay a fine of Rs. 150 or in default to undergo further three months' rigorous imprisonment. The defendant admitted in the above case that he had three previous convictions to his credit. In view of these circumstances, advocate Punwani was fully justified and enjoyed a privilege in making the statements, which he made in the course of his arguments. It is significant to note that in his affidavit the defendant has not denied the fact of any of these four previous convictions. He has only stated that these statements were defamatory. In the course of his arguments before us, the defendant asserted with considerable vehemence that he had preferred an appeal or a revision (he said, he did not remember which) from the conviction and sentence in criminal case No. 135/P of 1951 and that the conviction and sentence were quashed by the higher authorities. He has gone to the length of adding that the higher authorities had passed strictures against the Magistrate, who recorded the conviction. We repeatedly asked the defendant to give us the number of the appeal or revision or at least the year in which these proceedings were instituted. He told us frankly that he did not know either the number or the year when he preferred the appeal or revision. He has, however, advanced a somewhat ingenious argument before us in this respect. He quoted the maxim 'every saint has a past and every sinner a future'. He pointed out that the convictions to which reference was made is a matter of past history and that many developments had taken place since 1952 and there has been no conviction against him since then. It is not necessary for us to pursue this line of reasoning any further. It is sufficient for us to observe that it is implicit in the argument advanced by the defendant himself that he does not dispute the factum of previous convictions. If that is so, advocate Punwani would be within his rights to make that statement.

In the course of his arguments, the defendant also made reference to the fact that he had made applications to the Bar Council for starting proceedings for misconduct against advocate Punwani. It is not disputed that the defendant has made an application on April 20, 1963, to the High Court for starting proceeding for misconduct in respect of certain acts committed by advocate Punwani between April 1963 and April 1964. It is not necessary for us to enter into the details of this question. The defendant however contended that this was not the first application made by him, but that he had made applications earlier, one in December 1962 and another in February 1963. Whatever that may be it is quite clear that he has made these applications against advocate Punwani after the institution of the suit by the plaintiff against the defendant for eviction. We have referred to the multiplicity of the proceedings, which the defendant had started against advocate Punwani. We have to see in perspective as to whether the object of the defendant in launching these cases was to deter advocate Punwani from appearing on behalf of the plaintiff in the said suit or at least preventing him from discharging his duties fearlessly and impartially towards his client. The answer to this question will depend upon the answer to another question viz., whether the statements attributed to the defendant by Judge Vimadalal amount to threat or, at any rate, amount to a course of conduct motivated with the object of frightening the advocate from discharging his duties towards his client. One of the arguments advanced by the defendant was that, assuming that all the statements attributed to him are true, still they do not amount to any kind of threat.

We will first consider the effect, in law of the words uttered by the defendant. In the present case, the defendant has not been accused of having committed any act of contempt, disregard or defiance or disobedience to the Judge. He has been accused of having made statements in respect of an advocate of the opposite party, and the point for consideration is, whether the statements amount to interference with the administration of justice. Oswald in his book on Contempt of Court, 3rd edn., page 6, says:

"To speak generally, contempt of Court may be said to be constituted by any conduct that tends to bring the authority and administration of law into disrespect or disregard, or to interfere with or prejudice parties litigant or their witnesses during the litigation".

At p. 91 of 'Contempt, Committal & Attachment' by Oswald, occurs the following passage:

"An insult to counsel may be punished as contempt. All publications which offend against the dignity of Court or are calculated to prejudice the course of justice will constitute contempt."

It is settled law that disrespect or disregard to an advocate in certain circumstances so as to deter him from discharging his duties would amount to contempt of Court. The decision very much to the point was given by Niyogi J. in Telhara Cotton Ginning Co. v. Kashinath.¹ In that case, the defendant had addressed a notice to the advocate of the plaintiff demanding that certain allegations in the written statement of his client should be withdrawn unconditionally and an apology tendered on pain of legal proceedings being taken against him. Another letter was sent by the defendant or somebody interested in him to the plaintiff complaining against the counsel for his refusal to withdraw the allegations described as foolish. It was held:

"In sending the notice containing threats to the counsel, the defendant made a clear invasion of the counsel's right to represent his client's case loyally and properly and further interfered with the due performance of his duty towards his client. The addressing of notice and the letter was calculated to interfere with and to obstruct or divert the course of justice. Hence, he was guilty of contempt of Court".

"...The law of contempt covers the whole field of litigation itself. The real end of a judicial proceeding, civil or criminal, is to ascertain the true facts and dispense justice. Various persons have their respective contributions to make in the proper fulfilment of that task. They are necessarily the Judges or the Magistrates, the parties to the proceeding, or their agents or pleaders or advocates, the witnesses and the ministerial or menial staff of the Court. All these persons can well be described as the limbs of the judicial proceeding. For proper administration of justice it is essential that all these persons are, in the performance of their respective duties, ensured such fullness of freedom as is fair and legitimate. Anything that tends to curtail or impair the freedom of the limbs of the judicial proceeding must of necessity result in hampering the due administration of law and in interfering with the course of justice. It must therefore be held to constitute contempt of Court".

The view taken by the Nagpur High Court has been endorsed by the Allahabad, Madras and Lahore High Courts. In *Rajendra Singh v. Uma Prasad*² during the pendency of the suit a notice was sent on behalf of the plaintiff through his advocate to the defendant, threatening him that unless he withdrew the plea and paid a certain sum as damages he would be criminally prosecuted for defamation of the plaintiff's deceased father. Proceedings for contempt were taken out on this notice. It was held:

"Interference with the administration of justice is one of the well recognized heads of contempt of Court. In the present case the notice was undoubtedly intended to put extraneous pressure on the defendant in order to compel him, under threat of drastic action being taken against him, to withdraw the plea which had been taken by him specifically in the written statement. It amounted to a direct interference with the administration of justice in preventing or attempting to prevent the defendant from pressing the plea, which might prove to be a very substantial and legitimate defence; and in that way an indirect attempt was made to exclude that plea from the consideration of the court".

In the course of the judgment, the learned Judges relied upon the decision in *Smith v. Lakeman*³ in which an unsigned letter had been sent by the plaintiff to the defendant with a view to intimidating him in the conduct of his defence. The letter warned the defendant that he had a suit pending in Chancery and should it go up for judgment, he would at once be indicted for swindling, perjury and forgery and thus bring disgrace on his family. It was not mentioned who would start such prosecution, but the threat was that certain legal action in Court would be taken if the matter was pressed to final conclusion. Stuart, V.C., in committing the plaintiff for contempt remarked that the letter amounted to a threat for the purpose of intimidating him as a suitor, and therefore, whether it had had that effect or not, was unquestionably a contempt of Court. It would be clear from the above decisions that a piece of conduct intended or calculated to bring pressure upon a party, which must necessarily include his advocate, not to pursue the matter according to his choice, would amount to an attempt to interfere with the administration of justice. Secondly, the threat need not be direct, in the sense that the contemner specifically asserted that he would take such action. It is sufficient if the context showed that the action contemplated was the action of the contemner himself. A similar question arose in Thirumalaiappa v. Kumaraswami.⁴ The Madras High Court referred to the leading case of French v. French,⁵ which formed the basis of the statement on this subject contained in Oswald's Contempt of Court. The passage in Oswald (part of which has already been quoted) runs thus:

"An insult to counsel may be punished as a contempt. All publications which offend against the dignity of the Court, or are calculated to prejudice the course of justice, will constitute contempts. Offences of this nature are of three kinds, namely, those which (1) scandalise the Court, or (2) abuse the parties concerned in causes there, or (3) prejudices mankind against persons before the cause is heard. Under the first head fall libels on the integrity of the Court, its Judges, officers or proceedings; under the second and third heads anything which tends to excite prejudice against the parties or their litigation, while it is pending. For example, attacks on or abuse of a party, not amounting to an interference with the course of justice, does not amount to contempt, the party being left to his remedy by action".

In French v. French an insult was given to a counsel while he was attending in the Master's office, which was situated within the precincts of the Court. It was held (p. 623):

"...Advocates who appear for the parties being officers of Court, any abuse or insult or aspersions cast on them, which would interfere with the course of administration of justice, must necessarily be held to amount to contempt of Court".

Reference was made by the Madras High Court to the Nagpur case and the observations of Niyogi J. have been cited with approval. At the same time, the Madras High Court did not take any action in regard to the insult levelled against the counsel, because the incident took place two days after the termination of the case.

In Nand Lal Bhalla v. Kishori Lal,⁶ the Inspector of Police issued threats and used insulting language towards an advocate. It was held that the advocate was threatened in the performance of his duties, and although there was no contempt of the Court directly, there was contempt inasmuch as an officer of the Court such as an advocate appearing in his professional capacity was threatened and insulted while in the performance of his professional duties in the Court.

In this background, let us now examine some of the arguments that were advanced by the defendant-contemner. The defendant referred to the meaning of the word 'threat' contained in the concise Oxford Dictionary. Several meanings of that word are mentioned. The defendant wanted to rely on the first and second meaning viz., 'Declaration of intention to punish or hurt'; 'such menace of bodily hurt or injury to reputation or property as may restrain person's freedom of action.' The third meaning of that word as given is, indication of coming evil and the fourth meaning is, threat of calamity. Even under the second meaning, it is quite clear that the language in order to amount to a threat need not necessarily be aimed at causing bodily injury or hurt. It is enough if it is calculated to cause injury to the reputation so as to restrain the freedom of action of that person. On examining the words used by the defendant, we feel no hesitation in holding that in effect the words amounted to a threat. As stated above, the question as to whether the words amounted to a threat is not of the essence of the matter. What is of the essence of the matter is the course of conduct adopted by the contemner, and if, on the whole, the conduct has a tendency to interfere with the course of administration of justice or subvert the course of justice, it would amount to contempt of Court. The defendant also argued that unless the threat is accompanied by a demand that the party or the counsel should not proceed with his action, the threat does not amount to contempt of Court. We do not think that the nexus between the threat and the demand for doing something or refraining from doing something need be express or need be expressly stated. It is enough if from the context the link between the two is apparent. In the present case, it is necessary to note that the threat was issued in the presence of the Court and in the course of the arguments before the Judge. It is quite clear that the object of the defendant was to bring undue pressure upon the advocate not to perform his duties in a fearless and proper manner. As we have already mentioned, the defendant had started a prosecution for defamation against advocate Punwani on account of similar statements made by him in the course of his arguments in criminal case No. 588/S of 1962. He also expressly stated that he would start two more prosecutions against the advocate and actually, he did start a prosecution on May 9, 1963, in connection with the arguments advanced by Mr. Punwani on March 4, 1963. The subsequent conduct of the defendant in so far as it relates to the prosecutions having been started against advocate Punwani is concerned, would, in our view, be relevant, and taking an overall view of the matter and having regard to the entire conduct of the defendant and further taking into account the circumstance that the threat was uttered in the course of the arguments and in the presence of the Judge, we feel no hesitation in holding that the threat was intended to operate upon the mind of the counsel so that he should flinch from performing his duties towards his client.

The defendant relied upon a decision of the Allahabad High Court in Kamta Prasad v. Ram Agyan.⁷ In that case, the party to the dispute had made an offer for settlement of the dispute between the parties out of Court and as part of the settlement he suggested that the pending litigation should be withdrawn. He suggested that failing this, he would take legal proceedings open to him under the law. It was held that the party could not be said to be interfering with the course of justice, because all that he suggested was that if the suggested terms were not accepted, he would take such proceedings as were open to him to take in the matter. We are unable to understand how the decision of the Allahabad High Court, which proceeded on the peculiar facts of that case would in any way help the defendant in the arguments, which he is advancing. We notice that the Allahabad High Court referred to its earlier decision in Rajendra Singh's case and expressed its approval of the view taken in that case. It also referred to the decision in Smith v. Lakeman and pointed out that in the circumstances of that case, the threat issued by the party amounted to contempt of Court. The Allahabad High Court explained that in the notice merely an offer for compromise of a pending dispute was made and that offer was coupled with a warning that proceedings which were open in law to the opposite parties would be taken in case the offer was rejected. At pages 541 and 542 the learned Judges have set out five propositions, and it was the contention of the defendant, in the present case, that these propositions assist him in the argument, which he is advancing. Now, the first proposition was based on the decision of Smith v. Lakeman, and, in our view, the present case would fall within the ambit of the first proposition laid down in the said case. The other propositions enunciated in that case have no relation to the facts of the present case. Some of the propositions were not necessary even for the decision of the case and, therefore, will have to be treated as obiter dicta. The facts of the present case are particularly strong, as we have repeatedly pointed out, because unlike in most of the cases referred to above wherein the threats were given outside the Court, in the present case, the threat was given in the presence of the Court and in the course of the hearing of the case, and one prosecution for defamation was launched before the threat was administered and again a second prosecution for defamation against the advocate Punwani, for the arguments advanced by him in the present case, was actually started by the defendant and in that way, the threat was carried out.

It may be pointed out that just as the statements made by advocate Punwani viz., that the defendant was an ex-convict, was supported by the judgment, a certified copy of which was with him, in the same way, his statement that the defendant was a notorious litigant was also supported from the observations made by Stone C. J. in Emperor v. Jehangir Jassawalla.⁸ It is not necessary to refer to the facts of that case and it is enough to point out that the defendant had started as many as twenty prosecutions against one Jassawalla, who in his turn had also started some prosecutions against the defendant restraining him from starting subsequent prosecutions against the same party and it was in that connection that the learned Chief Justice observed:

"... in Mr. Vaney's case there is no doubt that he is a vexatious litigant".

Now, to give a threat to an advocate suggesting that prosecution for defamation would be launched against him in respect of the statements made by him against the defendant which were supported by unimpeachable evidence, is certainly to try to bring pressure on the advocate with the object of deterring him from performing his duties towards his client. It is established law that a statement made by an advocate on the basis of instructions taken from the client and after verifying that it is well-founded, is privileged and protected. It is in respect of a privileged statement that the defendant had taken the extraordinary step of launching prosecution for defamation. Again, it is in respect of a similar statement made in support of the notice of motion that the defendant brandished a threat of prosecution. Later on, he has implemented that and started a second prosecution. And in his affidavit in this Court, he has repeatedly stated that the statements of the advocate are per se defamatory. The course of conduct on which the defendant had launched himself will have to be taken into account for the purpose of finding out whether it was the object of the defendant to pressurise advocate Punwani into withdrawing from the case so as to avoid further harassment or, at any rate, to deter him from discharging his duties to his client, honestly, efficiently and fearlessly, by keeping the sword of prosecution hanging over his head.

The law on this question has been clarified in a recent judgment of the Supreme Court in Pratap Singh v. Gurbaksh Singh.⁹ In that case, after citing the passage from Oswald's Contempt of Court, which has already been quoted by us above, their Lordships referred to the facts of the case and observed that although departmental proceedings were started against the officer in accordance with the directions contained in the circular still the launching of these proceedings would have a deterring effect upon the officer, who had already filed a suit to ventilate his grievances. At page 1177, their Lordships observed:

"...What would be the effect of these proceedings on the suit which was pending in the Court of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Amritsar? From the practical point of view, the institution of the proceedings at a time when the suit in the Court of the Senior Subordinate Judge, Amritsar, was pending could only be to put pressure on the respondent to withdraw his suit, or face the consequences of disciplinary action. This, in our opinion, undoubtedly amounted to contempt of Court. There are many ways of obstructing the Court and 'any conduct by which the course of justice is perverted, either by a party or a stranger, is a contempt; thus the use of threats, by letter or otherwise, to a party while his suit is pending; or abusing a party in letters to persons likely to be witnesses in the cause, have been held to be contempts'. ...The question is not whether the action in fact interfered, but whether it had a tendency to interfere with the due course of justice. The action taken in this case against the respondent by way of a proceeding against him can, in our opinion, have only one tendency, namely, the tendency to coerce the respondent and force him to withdraw his suit or otherwise not press it. If that be the clear and unmistakable tendency of the proceedings taken against the respondent, then there can be no doubt that in law the appellants have been guilty of contempt of Court, even though they were merely carrying out the instructions contained in the circular letter".

It may be noted that in the above case, there were no threats issued by the Government. What the Government did was that it started departmental disciplinary action against the respondent, and it was this action which was taken by the Government in accordance with a circular issued by it which raised the question as to whether it amounted to contempt. Their Lordships held that launching of departmental proceedings itself amounted to contempt of Court, because it would exert pressure upon the respondent either to withdraw from the case or at any rate not to press it. Their Lordships have considered the question from the practical point of view and have considered the possible effect of the institution of the proceedings upon the respondent. In the present case also, advocate Punwani would be placed on the horns of a dilemma either to withdraw from the case or face the consequences of multiplicity of criminal proceedings and all these in respect of the statements made by him in the discharge of his duties as a counsel. We, therefore, feel no hesitation in holding that judged, as a whole, the words used by the defendant and his conduct amounted to contempt of Court.

We may consider one more argument that was urged by the defendant. The defendant contended that since the words, which, according to the Judge, amount to contempt, were uttered in his presence, the matter can be dealt with under s. 228, Indian Penal Code, and, therefore, the High Court cannot take cognizance of that matter in view of the provisions of s. 3(2) of the Contempt of Courts Act. Sub-section (2) of s. 3 of the said Act runs thus:

"No High Court shall take cognizance of a contempt alleged to have been committed in respect of a Court subordinate to it where such contempt is an offence punishable under the Indian Penal Code".

Section 228, Indian Penal Code, runs thus:

"Whoever intentionally offers any insult, or causes any interruption to any public servant, while such public servant is sitting in any stage of a judicial proceeding, shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both".

The offence under s. 228, Indian Penal Code, can arise only in the case of a public servant, while he is sitting in a judicial proceeding. In the present case, the threat has not been addressed to the Judge, but it has been addressed to the advocate. Although the advocate is a part of the machinery of the administration of justice, he is not a public servant within the meaning of that expression in s. 228, Indian Penal Code. It is on this short ground that the argument advanced by the defendant can be disposed of. But the matter does not rest there. In order that the proceedings are barred under s. 3(2) of the Contempt of Courts Act, it is further necessary to establish that the offence committed by the contemner in the presence of the Court is such as can be punished as contempt. It is not enough that the offence is punishable under any other law. This position is clear from the wording of s. 3(2) of the Contempt of Courts Act. There is also ample authority in support of the said proposition, vide *Ramakrishna Reddy v. State of Madras*¹⁰ and State of M. P. v. Revashankar.¹¹ As against this, the defendant relied upon a decision of the Allahabad High Court in Emperor v. Alla.¹² We, however, notice that the learned Judge (it was a decision of a single Judge) has not discussed the question at all and since the conclusion is stated without any discussion or reasoning, we do not think that that conclusion is entitled to much weight. Although the defendant had urged as one of the points in the affidavit that s. 3 of the Contempt of Courts Act was ultra vires the Constitution, in the course of his arguments however he fairly conceded that that would not be the position and did not press the matter further.

Before concluding, we may refer to one more circumstance and it is this. We are told at the bar that when this matter came up before the Division Bench comprising the Chief Justice and Gokhale J., and when it was suggested that the defendant should offer an apology, the defendant told the Court that he would offer an apology if he was convinced that he had committed a wrong. The defendant accepted the above statement made by advocate Punwani at the bar. When the matter came up before the Division Bench comprising Patel and Kantawala JJ. the defendant told us that he did offer an apology, but he added that the Government Pleader as also the plaintiff's advocate objected to accepting his apology and requested that the matter should be proceeded with. When the defendant started his arguments before us, he began by asking us as to what would happen if he were to tender an apology. We told him that if he thought it proper, he may tender an unconditional apology, because after all, the apology should be born out of repentance or remorse. We also pointed out to him that he could not enter into any kind of stipulation with the Court. The matter rested at that.

We have now to consider the quantum of punishment to be imposed on the defendant. We asked the learned Assistant Government Pleader as also the defendant as to what should be the proper punishment for this offence. The learned Assistant Government Pleader pointed out that this is a third contempt committed by the defendant. The first contempt committed by the defendant appears to have taken place before 1947. Reference to the same is to be had at p. 395 in Emperor v. Jehangir Jassawalla where Stone C. J. during the course of the narration of the antecedents of the defendant observed:

"...Mr. Vaney was fined for his contempt of Court".

The learned Assistant Government Pleader also drew our attention to a recent case, wherein the defendant was charged with the same offence by this Court. That was in Miscellaneous Civil Application No. 188 of 1960. That matter came up before the Chief Justice and one of us viz., Tambe J., on January 9, 1961. The defendant having tendered an unconditional apology the proceedings were dropped. It, therefore, appears that the defendant has been in the habit of making reckless allegations against the Court or the officers of the Court. Ordinarily, we would have awarded a sentence which would have deterred him from taking similar action in future. When we asked the defendant as to what he has to say about the punishment, he stated that the matter is left in our hands. In the course of his arguments, the defendant told us that he was suffering from low blood pressure and he found it difficult to argue the matter beyond the first part of the day on the 14th. He, therefore, requested that the matter should be adjourned to the next day. The defendant also appears to be an old man. In view of his age and the condition of his health, we feel averse to sending him to jail. In our view, the ends of justice would be met if we direct him to pay a fine of Rs. 1,000. We hope that the imposition of the said punishment, which errs on the side of leniency, would have a sobering effect upon the defendant. We also direct that the defendant should pay the costs of these proceedings. We grant two months' time from today to the defendant to pay the amount of fine.

THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, BOMBAY CITY I, BOMBAY.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 10(2)(xv)—Loan secured by assessee by mortgage of land and building constructed for sale—Expenditure incurred over execution of mortgage—Whether such expenditure a deductible revenue expenditure.

The assessee firm which was brought into existence solely for the purpose of constructing a building and selling it, not having sufficient funds for the construction of the building secured a loan from some persons. This loan was secured by executing mortgages of the land and the building under construction in favour of the creditors. The firm incurred a certain expenditure over the execution of the mortgages and in its assessment proceedings for the year 1956-57 it claimed this amount as an admissible deduction against the profits which it had made from the construction and sale of the building. The Tribunal disallowed the claim on the ground that the said expenditure was incurred solely for the purpose of raising capital and not for the purpose of the running of the assessee's business or for acquiring the stock-in-trade:—

Held, that the expenditure incurred by the assessee for executing the mortgage in favour of the mortgagee-creditors for obtaining monies for construction and completion of the building was an expenditure not of a capital nature but wholly laid out in the business of the assessee for obtaining profits and gains therefrom, and that, therefore, the said sum could be claimed by the assessee as a deductible revenue expenditure under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922.

V. S. DESAI J. The question, which the Income Tax Appellate Tribunal has referred to us under s. 66(I) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, is:—

“Whether in the computation of its business profits under Sec. 10, the assessee firm is entitled to a deduction of the sum of Rs. 15,172/-?”

The assessee firm consists of three partners and was brought into existence solely for the purpose of constructing a building and selling the same. The firm acquired a piece of land, on which the building was to be constructed, in September 1946. Immediately after its construction, it let it out to the Government of India with effect from November 15, 1954, and ultimately sold it to the Government in September 1955. This business venture of the assessee firm resulted in some profit, which came to be assessed in the assessment year 1956-57 on the assessee in the status of an unregistered firm. Now, the assessee firm having started with an initial capital of Rs. 60,000 had not sufficient funds for the construction of the building, which it was going to construct. It, therefore, secured a loan to the extent of Rs. 2,50,000 from two persons, borrowing 2 lakhs from one of them and Rs. 50,000 from the other and secured the said loans by executing mortgages of the land and the building under construction in favour of the creditors. It incurred a total expenditure of Rs. 15,172 over the execution of the mortgages and in its assessment proceedings it claimed this amount as an admissible deduction against the profits from the construction and sale of the building. The Departmental authorities held that the amount was not deductible either under s. 10(3)(iii) or under s. 10(2)(xv) as the expenditure was incurred not on the building but for acquiring loans for financing the building. In the appeal before the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal, the assessee contended that the building, for the construction of which the money was obtained, was the stock-in-trade and the amount taken by way of loan was actually expended on the construction of the building; that no capital asset was brought into existence, as the building constituted the assessee-firm's stock-in-trade and the money having been obtained for the acquisition of the stock-in-trade, the expenditure incurred in obtaining the loan was revenue expenditure and not an expenditure of a capital nature. The Tribunal negatived the assessee's contention by holding that the expenditure was incurred solely for the purpose of raising capital and not for the purpose of running of the assessee's business or for acquiring the stock-in-trade. It observed:

"It was not an expense incurred for the purpose of the assessee's business but for the purpose of enabling it to obtain capital, with which the business was to be run. Whether the capital so raised was spent over the stock-in-trade of the assessee or over its capital assets is not at all material for determining the admissibility of this expense, the expense having been incurred solely for the purpose of running capital and not for the purpose of the running of the assessee's business or for acquiring the stock-in-trade."

In other words, the view taken by the Tribunal was that the expenditure incurred in raising the loan was not a part of the activity of the assessee in running the business, though the loan itself was used for the purposes of the business, the expenditure incurred for raising the loan, therefore, could not be regarded as expenditure for the running of the business and for the purpose of obtaining profits and gains, and could not, therefore, be regarded as a deductible expenditure under s. 10(2)(xv). The Tribunal was of the opinion that the view that it was taking was supported by a decision of the Kerala High Court reported in Western India Plywood Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc-tax.¹

In our opinion the view taken by the Tribunal is not correct. In Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay v. Tata Sons, Ltd.,² the assessee who were the managing agents obtained finances for the managed companies by entering into an agreement with a stranger, who agreed to lend a crore of rupees to the managed company on condition that the assessee gave and assigned to him a share of six annas in the rupee in the commission and other remuneration, which the assessee might be entitled to recover from the managed company. "The share of the commission, which was paid to the stranger under the said arrangement was claimed to be deducted in computing the profits and gains of the assessee on two grounds: firstly, that the agreement operated as an assignment of the portion of the commission to the stranger and in that view the share assigned had ceased to be income of the assessee, and secondly, that the share of the commission given to the stranger was an expenditure incurred by the assessee solely for the purpose of earning profits and gains in the conduct of their business and was, therefore, an expenditure of a revenue nature. Both the contentions of the assessee were accepted in that case. Now, the commission, which was agreed to be paid to the stranger, was clearly for the purpose of obtaining finances to the managed company. The finances, however, were used for the purposes of earning profits and gains in business and the expenditure, which was incurred for raising the said finances, was regarded as an expenditure for the purpose of earning profits and gains in the course of the business. It would, therefore, appear that in order to determine whether the expenditure incurred in borrowing the loans would be a part of the expenditure for running the business would depend upon the nature and purpose of the borrowed money. In *Dharamvir Dhir v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*³ the assessee not having requisite funds for its business, entered into an agreement with a public charitable trust for the advance to him of funds upto 1½ lakhs of rupees on payment of interest at 6 per cent. per annum and 11/16ths of the profits of the business. The share of the profits paid under this agreement was claimed as a revenue expenditure and the claim was allowed by the Supreme Court, which held that in the commercial sense the payments were an expenditure wholly and exclusively laid out for the purpose of the assessee's business and they were, therefore, deductible revenue expenditure. Here again the agreement to give 11/16ths of the profits was an expenditure incurred for the purpose of raising the monies. But since the purpose of raising the monies was wholly for the running of the business of the assessee, the expenditure incurred in raising the monies was also regarded as an expenditure of the business and not an expenditure, which was unconnected with it, but solely related to the transaction of borrowing.

Under the English Income-tax Act, there are prohibitions against allowing interest or other expenditure connected with capital employed or intended to be employed in the business of the assessee. There are, however, provisions, which allow the deduction of revenue expenditure wholly laid out for the purpose of assessee's business. In several cases of loans borrowed, the interest paid or the other expenditure incurred for obtaining the loans has been claimed on the basis of permissible revenue expenditure on the ground that the loans obtained were of short duration or in the nature of temporary or day to day accommodation by way of banking or over-draft facilities, which could not be regarded as capital employed or intended to be employed in the business of the assessee and the expenditure incurred for raising such loans would, therefore, be deductible as revenue expenditure incurred wholly for the purpose of earning profits or gains of the business. The decisions, in these cases, have turned upon the question as to whether the loans borrowed constituted capital employed or intended to be employed in the business of the assessee and in cases where it was held that it could not be so regarded, the interest paid or the other expenditure incurred in raising the loans has been allowed on the ground that it is an expenditure of a revenue nature. Thus in Texas Land and Mortgage Co. v. Holtham,⁴ the assessee company increased its capital by raising money on debentures and claimed the commission for raising the money as deductible revenue expenditure. The claim was considered on the footing as to whether the raised money was capital of the company and having held that it was the capital of the company, the claim was disallowed. It may be pointed out that the disallowance of the claim was on the ground that the expenditure incurred was solely connected with the raising of the capital and not for the purposes of running the business.

In *Scottish North American Trust v. Farmer*⁵ the assessee, who were a company and whose main business was to buy and sell investments, having found that the value of their purchases of investments abroad exceeded the amounts of their available cash, pledged certain of their securities with their bankers in New York to obtain a fluctuating overdraft, on which interest was charged at current rates from day to day. Subsequently, in addition to the overdraft, the Bank granted the company a loan with a fixed maximum for six months at 6 per cent., which was renewed for a further six months and then terminated. A question arose as to whether the interest that was paid to the bankers in New York, was deductible as an outgoing for the purpose of the business, in computing the liability of the company for assessment. It may be remembered that if the borrowings constituted capital employed or intended to be employed in the business of the assessee, the interest would not be deductible in view of the prohibitions contained in the English Income-tax Act. If, however, the borrowings did not constitute capital employed or intended to be employed in the business of the company, the interest paid on the borrowings could be regarded as an expenditure incurred for the purpose of obtaining the borrowed money for the purpose of the business and could be claimed as a revenue deduction. Lord Atkinson observed after having considered several authorities as follows (p. 707):

"These authorities show that money borrowed by such a Company as the Appellant Company in this case in the fluctuating temporary manner in which it has been borrowed by them—the daily borrowing and lending of money being part of their trade and business—is not to be treated under the Joint Stock Companies Act as 'capital'. There is nothing to show that that word should bear a different meaning in the Income Tax Acts when applied to the proceedings of Joint Stock Companies. The interest is, in truth, money paid for the use or hire of an instrument of their trade as much as is the rent paid for their office or the hire paid for a typewriting machine. It is an outgoing by means of which the Company procures the use of the thing by which it makes a profit, and like any similar outgoing should be deducted from the receipts, to ascertain the taxable profits and gains which the Company earns. Were it otherwise they might be taxed on assumed profits when, in fact, they made a loss".

In a recent case of the Supreme Court, State of Madras v. G. J. Coelho,⁶ under the Madras Plantations Agricultural Income-tax Act, 1955, the assessee claimed in computing his agricultural income from his plantations, the entire interest paid by him on monies borrowed for the purpose of purchasing the plantations as expenditure laid out wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the plantations under s. 5(e) of the said Act. It may be pointed out that in the Madras Plantations Agricultural Income tax Act there was no provision corresponding to s. 10(2)(iii) of the Indian Income-tax Act, which allowed the deduction of interest on borrowed capital. The provision of s. 5(6) of the said Act was identical with the provisions of s. 10(2)(xv) of the Indian Income-tax Act. It was held that the payment of interest on the amount borrowed for the purchase and the working of the plantations viewed as an integrated whole was so closely related to the plantations that the expenditure could be said to be laid out or expended wholly and exclusively for the purpose of the plantations.

In view of these authorities, in our opinion, the short work, which the Tribunal has made of the question which was before it by holding that the expenditure was solely for the purpose of raising capital and not for the purpose of running the assessee's business or acquiring the stock-in-trade, will not be permissible, and it will have to be further seen, having regard to the nature and the purpose of the loan, the manner in which it was raised and the manner in which it was used, whether the expenditure incurred in raising the loan was an expenditure not in the nature of a capital expenditure or personal expenses and wholly laid out for the purpose of the assessee's business within the meaning of s. 10(2)(xv) of the Act.

Now, "capital expenditure" has not been defined in the Act, and it has often been said that it is difficult to lay down a general test, which is both sufficiently accurate and sufficiently exhaustive to cover all or even a great number of possible cases (Rowlatt J. in Countess Warwick Steamship Co. v. Ogg.⁷). In Benarsidas Jagannath, In re.⁸, Justice Mahajan of the Lahore High Court, as he then was, observed (p. 197):

"In order to distinguish between a revenue expenditure ... which is deductible in assessing income-tax and a capital expenditure, which is not so deductible, one must carefully consider the nature of the concern, the ordinary course of business usually adopted by a manufacturer in that concern and the object with which an expense is incurred by him and then decide the category under which it falls."

The learned Judge also observed (p. 198):

"...It is not easy to define the term 'capital expenditure' in the abstract or to lay down a general and satisfactory test to discriminate between a capital and a revenue expenditure. Nor is it easy to reconcile all the decisions that were cited before us for each case has been decided on its peculiar facts. Some broad principles can, however, be deduced from what the learned Judges have laid down from time to time."

He then formulated three tests, which will be helpful in determining whether a given item of expenditure was a capital or a revenue expenditure. These three tests are as following (p. 198):

"(1) Outlay is deemed to be capital when it is made for the initiation of a business, for extension of a business, or for a substantial replacement of equipment;

(2) Expenditure may be treated as properly attributable to capital when it is made not only once and for all, but with a view to bringing into existence an asset or an advantage for the enduring benefit of a trade, and

(3) Whether for the purpose of the expenditure, any capital was withdrawn, or, in other words, whether the object of incurring the expenditure was to employ what was taken in as capital of the business. Again, it is to be seen whether the expenditure incurred was part of the fixed capital of the business or part of its circulating capital. Fixed capital is what the owner turns to profit by keeping it in his own possession. Circulating or floating capital is what he makes profit of by parting with it or letting it change masters. Circulating capital is capital which is turned over and in the process of being turned over yields profit or loss. Fixed capital, on the other hand, is not involved directly in that process and remains unaffected by it."

These tests were approved of and accepted by the Supreme Court in Assam Bengal Cement Co. Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc-tax.⁹ Bhagwati J. after having enumerated the said tests observed (p. 45):

"This synthesis attempted by the Full Bench of the Lahore High Court truly enunciates the principles which emerge from the authorities. In cases where the expenditure is made for the initial outlay or for extension of a business or a substantial replacement of the equipment, there is no doubt that it is capital expenditure. A capital asset of the business is either acquired or extended or substantially replaced and that outlay whatever be its source whether it is drawn from the capital or the income of the concern is certainly in the nature of capital expenditure. The question however arises for consideration where expenditure is incurred while the business is going on and is not incurred either for extension of the business or for the substantial replacement of its equipment. Such expenditure can be looked at either from the point of view of what is acquired or from the point of view of what is the source from which the expenditure is incurred. If the expenditure is made for acquiring or bringing into existence an asset or advantage for the enduring benefit of the business it is properly attributable to capital and is of the nature of capital expenditure. If on the other hand it is made not for the purpose of bringing into existence any such asset or advantage but for running the business or working it with a view to produce the profits it is revenue expenditure. If any such asset or advantage for the enduring benefit of the business is thus acquired or brought into existence it would be immaterial whether the source of the payment was the capital or the income of the concern or whether the payment was made once and for all or was made periodically. The aim and object of the expenditure would determine the character of the expenditure whether it is a capital expenditure or a revenue expenditure. The source or manner of the payment would then be of no consequence. It is only in those cases where this test is of no avail that one may go to the test of fixed or circulating capital and consider whether the expenditure incurred was part of the fixed capital of the business or part of its circulating capital. If it was part of the fixed capital of the business it would be of the nature of capital expenditure and if it was part of its circulating capital it would be of the nature of revenue expenditure. These tests are thus mutually exclusive and have to be applied to the facts of each particular case in the manner above indicated. It has been rightly observed that in the great diversity of human affairs and the complicated nature of business operations it is difficult to lay down a test which would apply to all situations. One has therefore got to apply these criteria one after the other from the business point of view and come to the conclusion whether on a fair appreciation of the whole situation the expenditure incurred in a particular case is of the nature of capital expenditure or revenue expenditure in which latter event only it would be a deductible allowance under section 10(2)(xv) of the Income-tax Act."

These tests have again been referred to as the principles formulated in determining the question as to whether a given item of expenditure is a capital or a revenue expenditure in State of Madras v. G. J. Coelho already referred to. In a still more recent decision of the Supreme Court given in the case of *Bombay Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay*¹⁰ decided on October 21, 1964 (not yet fully reported), it has been observed:

"The question whether a particular expenditure is revenue expenditure incurred for the purpose of the business must be viewed in the larger context of business necessity or expediency. If the outgoing or expenditure is so related to the carrying on or conduct of the business that it may be regarded as an integral part of the profit-earning process and not for acquisition of an asset or a right of a permanent character, the possession of which is a condition to the carrying on of the business, the expenditure may be regarded as revenue expenditure."

What will have to be seen, therefore, is whether on the application of those tests the expenditure in the present case is an expenditure in the nature of a capital expenditure or in the nature of a revenue expenditure. As we have already pointed out earlier, the nature of the expenditure incurred in raising a loan will depend upon the nature and purpose of the loan. In the present case, the assessee had embarked upon a single venture, which was obtaining a land and construction of a building on it and selling the same after construction and make profits in the transaction. It is undisputed that the land and the building constructed on it was the stock-in-trade of the assessee, and the entire venture consisted of acquiring the stock-in-trade and disposing it off. The assessee had no fixed assets and did not require any fixed assets for its business. Its asset was the only trading asset or the stock-in-trade, which it proposed to acquire and dispose off. It had commenced its venture in the year 1946 with the funds of Rs. 60,000, which it possessed. In the course of acquiring the stock-in-trade, viz. the building to be constructed, it required monies, which were to be spent solely for the purpose of the construction of the building. The whole purpose of the loans, which it borrowed, was for completing the acquisition of the stock-in-trade and it is not contended that the amount has not been utilised solely for that purpose. Applying the tests, we find that the amount of Rs. 2,50,000, which was borrowed by the assessee, did not form its initial outlay because it was obtained not at the initiation of the business but during the course of it. It was not for the expansion of the business or for the replacement of any equipment. The business of the assessee was the single venture of the assessee of constructing only one building and selling it off after its completion. This business was never expanded by the assessee. No equipments in the nature of fixed assets were also required by the assessee and no part of the loan borrowed was utilised for any such purpose. Applying the second test, the expenditure incurred did not bring into existence any fixed asset or advantage of the nature of an enduring benefit to trade. The amount obtained was wholly spent on the construction of the building, which was the stock-in-trade itself. It was contended that the expenditure was incurred for obtaining a facility of money, which endured for the entire duration of the venture by providing money for the business of the assessee. It was, therefore, argued that the expenditure incurred was for the purpose of obtaining something more than mere finances for the acquisition of the stock-in-trade, viz. a right or facility to carry on or continue the business. In our opinion this argument cannot be accepted. Every time money is borrowed for the purpose of business it undoubtedly helps or facilitates the business and thus allows it to continue to run, which, but for the help of the finance, would ultimately cripple and stop. That, however, would not necessarily give the borrowed money the status of capital of the assessee. As observed by Lord Atkinson in Scottish North American Trust Ltd. v. Farmer, already referred to, the borrowed monies may be as well an instrument of the trade, and the expenses of borrowing, the hire for the instrument, as much as is the rent paid for the office or the hire paid for a type-writing machine. There is no doubt in the present case that building was the circulating capital or the stock-in-trade of the assessee. The monies, which were borrowed went towards the circulating capital and did not form any part of the fixed capital of the assessee, which, as we have already pointed out, was not there altogether. The three tests, therefore, which were laid down by the Full Bench of the Lahore High Court and subsequently adopted by the Supreme Court, when applied to the present case, would show that the monies borrowed by the assessee in the present case were for the purpose of being employed as circulating capital to earn profits and gain and could not be regarded as on account of capital and consequently the expenditure incurred in connection with the borrowing could not be regarded as an expenditure of a capital nature. The tests given by the Supreme Court in the last decision referred to, viz. the decision in Bombay Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. v. The Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay, would also, when applied to the borrowing in the present case, show that it was a borrowing on account of revenue. Viewed in the larger context of business necessity or expediency of the assessee's business, the borrowing in the present case was so related to the carrying on or conduct of the business that it could be regarded as the integral part of the profit-earning process and not for the acquisition of an asset or a right of permanent character, the possession of which was a condition to the carrying on of the business. The expenditure, therefore, incurred in obtaining the borrowed money must be regarded as a revenue expenditure. In State of Madras v. G. J. Coelho, which we have already referred to above, the assessee purchased an estate of tea, coffee and rubber plantations for a sum of Rs. 3,10,000 and for the purpose of the said purchase, borrowed a sum of Rs. 2,90,000 at interest varying from 7 to 8 per cent. per annum. The annual interest paid by the assessee to the creditors was sought to be deducted by the assessee from the profits and gains of his business for the year under a provision of the Madras Plantations of Agricultural Income-tax Act, which was identical with the provision of s. 10(2)(xv) of the Indian Income-tax Act. After having applied the tests the Supreme Court held that the payment of interest was a revenue expenditure because no new asset was acquired with it, no enduring benefit was obtained and the expenditure incurred was a part of the circulating or floating capital of the assessee.

In our opinion, therefore, the expenditure incurred by the assessee for executing the mortgages in favour of the mortgagee-creditors for obtaining monies for construction and completion of the building was an expenditure not of a capital nature but wholly laid out in the business of the assessee for obtaining profits and gains therefrom.

The Income-tax Appellate Tribunal, for the view that it has taken, has relied on Western India Plywood Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Madras. In that case the assessee was a company carrying on business of manufacture of plywood and plywood articles. It raised a loan of Rs. 3 lakhs by way of first mortgage debentures redeemable in three successive years at Rs. 1 lakh a year to be utilised towards the working capital of the company. A major part of the borrowed amount was paid for the purchase of raw materials. Some part was expended for discharging loans on suspense account and a part was deposited in a separate account for the payment of dividends. The assessee had incurred an expenditure of Rs. 12,924 in issuing the debentures by way of expenses towards the purchase of stamp paper for the trust deed, under-writing, commission and registration and lawyer's fees. The question was whether the sum of Rs. 12,924 was a business expenditure and allowable under s. 10(2) (xv) of the Indian Income-tax Act as a deduction. On the facts of the case, the Court held that the raising of money by debentures or mortgages by the company could not be regarded as an ordinary incident in carrying on the business, or be treated as on a par with trading or banking facilities, but must prima facie and in the absence of other indications, be considered to affect the capital of the concern and its profit-making structure. The learned Judges proceeded to consider the question before them by finding out whether the money raised by debentures could be regarded as having been received by the assessee as a capital receipt and took the view that the manner in which the money had been raised by the company, viz. by issuing mortgage debentures showed that it was not raising money as by way of temporary or day to day accommodation as an ordinary incident in carrying on the business but that it was raising it with a view to affect its capital and profit-making structure. According to them, the monies having been borrowed with this object and purpose the subsequent utilisation of the part of the money borrowed for the stock-in-trade did not affect the character of the borrowing, which was of a capital nature. They pointed out that the company in the resolution of its Board of Directors had referred to the loan that they were raising as the working capital of the company and the expenses incurred in raising the said capital, therefore, was an expenditure of a capital nature. It was argued before the Court that the borrowing was for the purpose of augmenting the circulating capital of the company, if not wholly, at least to the extent of a major part of it and to the extent to which the borrowed money was used as a circulating capital or for the acquisition of the raw material for the business, the expenditure pro tanto should be considered as a revenue expenditure. The argument, however, was not accepted. The learned Judges held that the money was borrowed for the purpose of enlarging or extending the business, if it was paying its way, or was by way of establishing its business, if it was not: in either of which case the borrowed money must be taken to have been obtained on capital account.

As to the utilisation of part of the money for the stock-in-trade, they observed that in the first place the nature of the receipt of borrowing, whether capital or revenue, was not to be judged solely by the use, which the assessee had found for it subsequently and, secondly, the argument that a part of the borrowed money was utilised for purchasing the stock-in-trade conceded a dual character to the borrowing and involved a notional splitting of the borrowed amount and the expenses, for which there was no rational basis and besides it was also contrary to the prescription in s. 10(2) (xv), which was implicit in the expression "laid out or expended wholly and exclusively".

In our opinion, this decision cannot be said to be an authority for the view, which has been taken by the Tribunal that the expenses incurred for raising capital can never be regarded as expenses for the running of the business. The view taken in this case was that on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the borrowing by the company was for the purposes of enlarging and extending its business and the borrowed money affected the capital of the company and entered the capital structure of the company. It was for that reason that the Court held that the expenses incurred for raising the loan, which was on capital account, could not be treated as a revenue expenditure deductible under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Act.

In two other cases, which were referred to us in the course of the arguments, where money was borrowed by a company on the security of the company's assets, the expenses of the borrowing were regarded as on capital account. In *Commr. of Inc.-tax v. India Cements Ltd.*¹¹, which is a case of the Madras High Court, the assessee company obtained a loan of Rs. 40 lakhs from a Finance Corporation on the mortgage of the company's assets agreeing to pay the loan in 10 annual instalments of Rs. 4 lakhs each. It incurred an expenditure of Rs. 84,633 for acquiring the loan by way of stamp duty, counsel's fee, etc. and claimed that amount as business expenditure. It was admitted that out of the amount of Rs. 40 lakhs, 25 lakhs were used for repaying a loan, which had been utilised for capital assets, and there was no material to show that the balance of Rs. 15 lakhs was incurred wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the business and was not used for capital purposes. It was held, in view of these facts, that the amount was not a revenue expenditure and could not be allowed under s. 10(2)(xv) on the ground that the loan was incurred for securing an enduring benefit to the assessee and the expenditure was incurred once and for all. It was further held that the fact that the loan was to be repaid within ten years could not affect the nature of the loan, which was raised on capital account. This case, in our opinion, would not help the Department. It would be seen that the nature and purpose of the loan in that case to the extent to which it could be determined on the facts of the case, was that it was obtained for bringing into existence an advantage of an enduring nature to the company. The purpose of the loan, therefore, being that the amount borrowed was to be spent on capital account, the expenses incurred for the borrowing was an expenditure in the nature of capital expenditure.

In *Sri Annappurna Cotton Mills Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*¹² the assessee company by a debenture trust deed raised a loan of Rs. 10 lakhs, the debentures being redeemable in 10 annual instalments. The loan was secured by the mortgage of movable and immovable properties of the company and carried interest at 7 per cent. per annum. The company also agreed to pay to the brokers in perpetuity a commission of 1 per cent. on the gross sales of the assessee's products. Pursuant to this agreement the assessee paid the assignees of the brokers a sum of Rs. 21,798 during the relevant previous year, for which it claimed deduction under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Indian Income-tax Act. It was held that the sum was capital expenditure and, therefore, not an allowable deduction under s. 10(2)(xv). This conclusion was arrived at on the ground that having regard to the long term of the loan and having regard to the nature and purpose of the loan and the manner of raising it, the loan formed a part of the capital assets of the company and the commission paid in connection therewith was an expenditure of a capital nature and not allowable as a revenue expenditure under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Indian Income-tax Act. In our opinion, this case also cannot help the Department. In the case before us the loan was only for the duration of the acquisition and disposal of the stock-in-trade of the single venture of the assessee. The purpose for which it was raised was only for the acquisition of the stock-in-trade and the manner in which it was raised was the ordinary commercial manner, where a trader for the purpose of acquiring its stock-in-trade borrows monies and utilises them for the acquisition of the stock-in-trade of the business and after disposal of the stock-in-trade repays the borrowed money to the creditor. The manner of raising the loan, therefore, was as an ordinary incident of the trade, where circulating capital or stock-in-trade is held by borrowing temporary loans.

In our opinion, therefore, the sum of Rs. 15,172 could be claimed by the assessee as a deductible revenue expenditure under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Act and the Departmental authorities and the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal were in error in not allowing the said deduction.

Our answer, therefore to the question referred to us is in the affirmative. The assessee will get his costs from the Department.

Answer accordingly.

v.

THE COMMISSIONER OF INCOME-TAX, BOMBAY CITY I.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 26A—Indian Stamp Act (II of 1899), Sec. 2(4)—Requisites of instrument of partnership—Whether such instrument must be in existence in relevant account year—Mere record of some terms of partnership whether sufficient to constitute such instrument—Document coupled with other evidence whether will constitute such instrument—"Instrument," meaning of word.

What is required under s. 26A of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, is a single document or a number of documents all existing in the relevant account year which will together form an instrument of partnership. If the documents by themselves do not have that effect, then there is no instrument of partnership as required under s. 26A of the Act.

Under s. 26A the instrument has to be an instrument not of any partnership, but of the partnership of certain specified individuals. A mere record of some terms of partnership will not make the document an instrument of partnership of certain specified individuals.

Under s. 26A it must be the document itself which must constitute the instrument of partnership and not the document coupled with certain other evidence.

The word "instrument" as used in s. 26A means a document of a legal nature, by which any right or liability is or purported to be created, transferred, limited, extended, extinguished or recorded.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

S. P. Mehta, with Y. P. Trivedi, U. T. Shah and S. J. Mehta, for the applicant.

G. N. Joshi, instructed by P. G. Gokhale, for the respondent.

V. S. DESAI J. On a requisition by the High Court under s. 66(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, the Income-tax Appellate Tribunal has drawn up a statement of the case referring the following question which it was directed to refer:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, was the Tribunal justified in holding that the application for registration was rightly rejected by the Income-tax authorities on the ground that there was no instrument of partnership?"

The question arises out of the proceedings relating to the assessment of the assessee for the assessment year 1950-51, for which the relevant accounting year was the year ended on December 31, 1949. The business of the assessee was of exporting raw wool procured in Rajasthan to England and America. It also owned a factory for ginning and pressing wool, an ice factory and a flour mill at a place in the erstwhile Indian State of Palanpur. The States in which the assessee was carrying on its business merged in the Indian Union, and from August 1, 1949, the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, became applicable to the area. For the purpose of the assessment of the assessee for the year 1950-51, it applied for registration under s. 26A of the Indian Income-tax Act, on February 20, 1953. That application was signed by two persons as the partners of the assessee firm, namely, Mohanbhai Devjibhai Hiraji and R. M. Dave. The partnership was alleged to have come into existence from January 1, 1946. The Income-tax Officer came to the conclusion that Dave was not a partner of the alleged partnership firm, because there was no regular deed of partnership; secondly, the Bank declarations of three banks showed that Dave was not a partner; and there were also certain other documents which showed that Dave was only a manager. The Income-tax Officer, therefore, refused registration. In the appeal to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, he held that Dave was associated with the partnership and there was evidence showing that he was a working partner. He, however, held that there was no instrument of partnership under which the assessee firm was constituted within the meaning of s. 26A of the Act, and the Income-tax Officer, therefore, was right in refusing registration. In the second appeal before the Tribunal, the Tribunal confirmed the decision of the Departmental authorities, holding that the partnership was not constituted under an instrument of partnership within the provisions of s. 26A of the Act.

Admittedly no properly executed partnership deed was produced before the Income-tax Officer. What was produced before him was an alleged draft of the partnership deed which was said to have been written up late in 1949. The assessee's case was that Mohanbhai Devjibhai, one of the partners, had gone to Pakistan and was unable to return to India for reasons of health. When the Indian Income-tax Act became applicable in August 1949, the partners wanted to have a deed of partnership executed. A draft was accordingly prepared which was taken by the other partner Dave to Pakistan, where it was shown to Mohanbhai Devjibhai, and was approved of by him. It was also agreed to between the partners that the regular deed of partnership should be executed in India on the return to India of Mohanbhai. Mohanbhai, however, could not return to India, and the draft therefore remained un-executed. In addition to this document, the assessee also relied on certain other documents, which were: an order of the Custodian of Evacuee Property, Bombay, passed on September 30, 1950, relating to the right, title and interest of Mohanbhai Devjibhai in the wool ginning and pressing factory, the ice factory and the flour mill, etc. In this order, it was observed by the Custodian that there was evidence to support the view that Dave was accepted as a working partner by Mohanbhai for a period up to 1956 with eight annas share in the profits. The next document was a copy of the writ application made by Dave in the High Court against the order of the Custodian of the Evacuee Property. This application was made on January 2, 1951. The allegations in this application were to the effect that there was a partnership between him and Mohanbhai which had commenced from 1946 and in which each of them had an eight annas share. This application also made reference to the draft deed of partnership which was alleged to have been made late in 1949 and approved of by both the partners. In these writ proceedings, an affidavit was put in by Mohanbhai in February 1951, in which he stated that the draft deed of partnership referred to by Dave in the petition was prepared in the circumstances set out in the writ petition, and it was agreed that he would execute the said deed of partnership on his return to India from Karachi. A copy of the consent terms alleged to have been agreed to by the parties to the writ proceedings was also produced. The date on which these consent terms appear to have been agreed upon was November 21, 1951, and were to the effect that all properties including lands, buildings, structures, machinery and plant, acquired or brought or bought with the capital property by the evacuee for the partnership were to be deemed his exclusive property and all such property bought or acquired with the profits accrued during the partnership was to be deemed the partnership property in which Dave was to have eight annas share. It was contended on behalf of the assessee that the draft deed of partnership along with other documents formed an instrument constituting a partnership and specifying the individual shares of the partners.

Now, under s. 26A, in order to obtain registration, the firm must be constituted under an instrument of partnership which specifies the individual shares of the partners. It is now well-settled that the instrument of partnership may be a single document, or may be spelt out of several documents. It is, however, necessary that the single document or the several documents, constituting the partnership instrument, must be in existence in the year of account. Now, in the present case all the other documents excepting the alleged draft of partnership deed were not in existence in the relevant accounting year which is the year ended on December 31, 1949, because all of them have come into existence after that date. The only document, which is said to have been in existence in the relevant accounting year is the draft of the partnership agreement, which is said to have been prepared late in 1949. Now, the said document itself is undated and unsigned, and there is nothing in the document itself to show that it was in existence in 1949. Moreover, it is difficult to see how the said document could qualify to be an instrument. The expression "instrument" imports a document of a formal legal kind. In Stroud's Judicial Dictionary, an "Instrument" is stated to be a writing generally importing a document of a formal legal kind. In the Dictionary of English Law by Earl Jowitt, pages 984-985, it is stated that an "Instrument" is a writing and generally means writing of a formal nature. The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary gives the meaning in law of the word "Instrument" as a formal legal document whereby a right is created or confirmed or a fact recorded; a formal writing of any kind, as an agreement, deed, charter or record, drawn up and executed in technical form. The Indian Stamp Act, s. 2(14) defines an instrument as including every document by which any right or liability is or purported to be created, transferred, limited, extended, extinguished or recorded. The word "instrument", therefore, as used in s. 26A of the Indian Income-tax Act will mean a document of a legal nature, by which any right or liability is or purported to be created, transferred, limited, extended, extinguished or recorded. The alleged draft which has been produced on behalf of the assessee could not be regarded as having created rights or liabilities or even forming a record of the same. A document, in order to create rights or liabilities or even to record rights and liabilities, must be executed by the parties, whose rights or liabilities the document creates, or whose rights and liabilities it records. A mere piece of a paper on which appears a recital of certain rights and liabilities could not by itself be able to fasten the said rights and liabilities to any particular person. Mr. Mehta has argued that although the document by itself would not be sufficient to show that it is the record of the rights and liabilities of certain specified persons, the said document along with further evidence showing that the contents of the documents relate to the rights and liabilities of certain specified individuals, and that the said certain specific individuals have agreed to and accepted the said contents, would make it an instrument recording the said facts. We are afraid, the argument even if it were sound, does not avail Mr. Mehta in the present case. What is required under s. 26A is a single document or a number of documents all existing in the relevant account year which will together form an instrument of partnership. If the documents by themselves do not have that effect, then there is no instrument of partnership as is required under s. 26A. In the present case the only document alleged to have been in existence in the relevant account year is the draft and that by itself cannot show that it is the instrument of partnership of certain specified individuals namely Mohanbhai and Dave. Under s. 26A, the instrument has to be an instrument not of any partnership, but of the partnership of certain specified individuals. A mere record of some terms of partnership will not make the document an instrument of partnership of certain specified individuals. On the argument advanced by Mr. Mehta, what may make it a document relating to the partnership of certain specified individuals is not the document itself but the document coupled with certain other evidence. Under s. 26A, however, it must be the document itself which must constitute the instrument of partnership. In our opinion, therefore, the draft of partnership deed produced on behalf of the assessee will not be sufficient to constitute an instrument of partnership. The other documents, as we have already pointed out, will not avail, because they were not in existence in the year of account, and cannot, therefore, form part of the instrument of partnership.

The result, therefore, is that the Tribunal was right in the view it took that there was no instrument under which the partnership was constituted within the meaning of s. 26A of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922.

Therefore, the question must be answered in the affirmative. The assessee will pay the costs of the Department.

Answer accordingly.

GIFT-TAX REFERENCE

Before Mr. Justice Tambe and Mr. Justice V. S. Desai

THE COMMISSIONER OF GIFT-TAX, BOMBAY CITY I

v.

G. G. MORARJI.*

Gift-tax Act (XVIII of 1958), Secs. 5, 2(xii) (xxii) (xxiv), 6—Indian Trusts Act (II of 1882), Sec. 3—Assessee executing deed of settlement under which his wife receiving income of trust fund during her life—Whether transfer of such interest in fund a gift—Assessee whether entitled to exemption under s. 5(1) (viii) of Gift-tax Act—Practice—Reference—Larger relief claimed by assessee before Tribunal—Whether assessee in reference to High Court precluded from claiming smaller relief on same provision of law.

Under a deed of settlement executed in 1958 the wife of the settlor-assessee acquired the beneficial interest to receive interest and income of the trust fund during her life-time. Thereafter the property was to go to his children and others as provided in the deed. On the question whether the assessee was entitled to exemption under s. 5(1) (viii) of the Gift-tax Act, 1958, to the extent of the value of the gift to his wife if any:—

Held, that by creating the settlement the assessee had transferred interest in the trust fund to his wife and as it was voluntary and without consideration it was a gift of an interest in the trust fund, and that the assessee was entitled to the exemption under s. 5(1) (viii) of the Act to the extent of the value of the gift to his wife as ascertained in accordance with s. 6 of the Act and the rules framed under s. 6(3).

When a larger relief is claimed by the assessee before the Tribunal on the strength of a certain provision of law, he is not prevented from arguing in a reference that he is entitled to a lesser relief under the same provision of law on the ground that the claim for a smaller relief is not one arising out of the order of the Tribunal.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

G. N. Joshi, with R. J. Joshi, instructed by P. G. Gokhale, for the applicant.
S. P. Mehta, with Y. P. Trivedi, for the respondent.

TAMBE J. This is a reference under sub-s. (1) of s. 26 of the Gift-tax Act (hereinafter called as "the Act") at the instance of the Commissioner of Gift-Tax.

Facts giving rise to this reference are: We are here concerned with the assessment year 1958-59. The assessee, Gordhandas Goculdas Morarji, has been assessed in the status of an individual. The Bombay Municipality acquired certain immoveable property belonging to the assessee, paying the assessee a compensation of Rs. 2,90,000. Out of this amount, Rs. 2,80,000 were deposited by the assessee in the following manner:

(1) Rs. 1,00,000 (comprising of two deposits, one of Rs. 50,000 deposited in Canara Bank in the joint names of the assessee and his son V. G. Morarji, and the other deposit of Rs. 50,000 in the United Commercial Bank in the joint names of the assessee and his another son D. G. Morarji). Both these deposits were made on October 9, 1958.

(2) Rs. 1,45,000 (comprising of three fixed deposits of Rs. 1,00,000, Rs. 25,000, and Rs. 20,000; the first in the joint names of the assessee and his wife, and the others in the joint names of the assessee and his son).

(3) Rs. 40,000 kept in a fixed deposit in the joint names of the assessee and his son V. G. Morarji, in the Bank of Baroda, on October 9, 1958.

After making these deposits, the assessee made three settlements in respect of these aforesaid three groups of deposits and Rs. 5,000 the balance of Rs. 2,90,000. We are here concerned only with the first item relating to Rs. 1 lakh, comprising the two deposits of Rs. 50,000, each. By a deed of settlement, dated December 22, 1958, the assessee settled the said sum of Rs. 1 lakh in favour of his wife and his three sons. It was not in dispute either before the Gift-tax authorities or before the Tribunal that the aforesaid three settlements were gifts within the meaning of the Act, and were chargeable to tax thereunder. It was, however, contended before the Gift-tax Officer that the assessee was entitled for exemption under s. 5(I)(viii) of the Act in respect of the said sum of Rs. 1 lakh settled by the assessee on his wife by the aforesaid deed dated December 22, 1958. The Gift-tax Officer held that the assessee was not entitled to exemption. The view taken by him was that under the settlement, the sum of Rs. 1 lakh was not gifted outright by the assessee to his wife. On the other hand, the said sum of Rs. 1 lakh was only settled on trust in favour of his wife and three sons, the wife having only a life interest therein, and, therefore, the assessee was not entitled to the exemption under s. 5(I)(viii). An appeal taken by the assessee before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner also failed. The view taken by him was:

"All that had happened is, sum of Rs. 1 lakh has been placed in trust in favour of the appellant's wife and her sons with the stipulation that the appellant's wife was to be entitled only for the income of the trust fund during her life time. Since the beneficiary namely the appellant's wife had only a limited interest in the trust fund, the sum of Rs. 1 lakh cannot be regarded as gifted by the appellant to his wife."

The assessee took a further appeal to the Tribunal. The Tribunal allowed the appeal. The view taken by the Tribunal was:

"This approach of the Department on the argument that there was no gift by the appellant to his wife is based on an argument which is self-contradictory. It is on the basis that this is a gift or a deemed gift within the meaning of Sec. 2(xii) read with sec. 2(xxiv) of the Act that it has been included and taxed as a gift and therefore, to say that this was no gift and to deny the claim for exemption, is an argument which destroys the case for taxing it even. The reason adduced for denying this relief is, therefore, clearly unsustainable. A gift which is a deemed gift if good for being taxed is also good enough for the exemption. The contention of the appellant is accepted."

In this view of the matter, the Tribunal allowed the appeal. At the instance of the Commissioner, the Tribunal has stated the case referring the following question of law to us:

"Whether on the facts and circumstances of this case, the assessee is entitled to the exemption under section 5(1)(viii) of the Gift-tax Act in the sum of Rs. 1 lac?"

Mr. Joshi, learned counsel for the Revenue, contends that the Tribunal was in error in holding that the stand of the Department was self-contradictory. A transaction could be a gift under the Act, but none the less, it may not be a gift falling under the exemption clause. The question which fell for consideration was whether it was a gift falling within the exemption clause, namely, s. 5. According to Mr. Joshi, on a true construction of the relevant provisions of the settlement deed, there is a gift, but the gift is only to the trustee, and not to the wife. The property that is transferred is the sum of Rs. 1 lakh. That property is transferred to the trustee. Creation of a life interest in the income of the trust fund in favour of the wife is not a transfer of any property to the wife. The gift does not, therefore, fall under the exemption clause of s. 5(1)(viii) of the Gift-tax Act. The assessee, therefore, is not entitled to get exemption in respect of Rs. 1 lakh claimed by him.

Mr. Mehta, learned counsel for the assessee, on the other hand, contends that no doubt the claim made by the assessee in the beginning was that he was entitled to exemption in respect of the entire amount of Rs. 1 lakh. But before the Tribunal, according to Mr. Mehta, it was also contended that even though the assessee may not be entitled to exemption in respect of the entire amount of Rs. 1 lakh, the assessee would be entitled to the exemption to the extent of the amount ascertained to be the value of the gift made by the assessee in favour of his wife under the trust deed. Mr. Mehta further stated that he himself had appeared for the assessee before the Tribunal, and had urged this point before the Tribunal. He further made it clear before us that he was not contending that the assessee should be given an exemption in respect of the entire amount of Rs. 1 lakh. The argument of Mr. Mehta is that under the trust the assessee has provided that the income of the said amount of Rs. 1 lakh was to be given to his wife during her life time. That amounts to creation of an interest in the property, and there is a transfer of property to that extent involved in favour of the assessee's wife. There is, therefore, a gift within the meaning of s. 5(1)(viii) of the Act, and the assessee is entitled to exemption to the extent of the value of the gift determined under s. 6 of the Act.

Before we proceed to deal with the contentions raised by counsel for parties, it is first necessary to deal with the preliminary objection raised by Mr. Joshi. He contends that there is no warrant to assume that a submission as stated by Mr. Mehta just now had been made before the Tribunal. The order of the Tribunal does not disclose it, nor does the Statement of the Case. He further stated before us that in the grounds of appeal in the Memo of Appeal (not before us) filed by the assessee before the Tribunal, such a ground has not been expressly taken. The contention raised by Mr. Mehta, therefore, is not one arising out of the order made by the Tribunal under s. 23 of the Act, and therefore, we have no jurisdiction to answer such a question. We find it difficult to uphold the preliminary objection raised by Mr. Joshi. Under sub-s. (1) of s. 26, the Tribunal is empowered to refer to this Court "any question of law arising out of such order (i.e. order under section 23 or 25)". In the instant case the appellate order of the Tribunal has been one under s. 23. It is indeed true that neither the appellate order of the Tribunal nor the Statement of the Case mentions that the contention in the form now raised by Mr. Mehta before us had been raised before the Tribunal. But then it has to be noticed that the contentions raised on behalf of the assessee before the Tribunal have not been summarised either in the order or in the Statement of the Case. There is, therefore, nothing in the order or in the Statement of the Case to assume that such a contention had not been raised by the assessee before the Tribunal. Mr. Mehta, advocate of this Court, has made a statement at the Bar that he himself had argued the appeal and had raised the contention before the Tribunal and advanced an argument thereon. No statement has been made at the Bar to counter that statement. There is no warrant not to accept the statement of Mr. Mehta. The said contention relates to a question of law. No doubt, the Tribunal has not in its order dealt with it, but it must be deemed to have been dealt with by the Tribunal, and therefore, is one arising out of the order of the Tribunal. Presumably the Tribunal has not dealt with it because it took the view that the assessee was entitled to exemption in respect of the entire amount of Rs. 1 lakh. Having regard to the respective cases of the Revenue and the assessee, and the question referred to us, the contention raised by

Mr. Mehta is covered by the question referred to us. Now, the rival contentions in brief were: According to the Department, the assessee was not entitled to any exemption at all under s. 5(1)(viii) of the Act, while according to the assessee, he was entitled to the exemption under the said provision, and the principal question is whether the transaction falls within the provisions of s. 5(1)(viii) entitling the assessee to claim exemption thereunder. If, on the construction of the relevant provision, we come to the conclusion that the assessee is entitled to exemption under s. 5(1)(viii), the mere fact that he was claiming exemption to the extent of Rs. 1 lakh would not disentitle the assessee from claiming exemption to the extent of the amount he would in law be entitled to. The assessee may pray for a larger relief, but that would not disentitle him from claiming a smaller relief in respect of the right claimed by him. Nor can it be said that when a larger relief is claimed by the assessee before the Tribunal on the strength of a certain provision of law, he cannot be entitled to argue in a reference that he is entitled to a lesser relief under the same provision of law on the ground that the claim for a smaller relief is not one arising out of the order of the Tribunal. In this view of the matter, the preliminary objection raised is over-ruled.

Sub-section (6) of s. 26 in express terms provides that the High Court in deciding the question of law raised before it may, if it thinks fit, alter the form of question of law. Having regard to the statement made by Mr. Mehta, we reframe the question as under:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the assessee is entitled to the exemption under section 5(1)(viii) of the Gift-tax Act to the extent of the value of the gift to his wife if any?"

Before we proceed to deal with the relevant provisions of the Act, it would be convenient to refer to certain clauses of the settlement deed. As already stated, the settlor is the assessee, G. G. Morarji. He had a wife by name Indumati and three sons by names Narsingh, Vijaysingh and Dilipsingh. The preamble recites:

"Whereas in consideration of the natural love and affection which the Settlor bears towards his wife and his three sons and their respective issues and in order to make a provision inter alia for them and for other diverse other good causes and considerations he is desirous of irrevocably settling and has agreed to settle irrevocably the said sum of Rupees one lac upon the trust..."

And to effectuate the said desire, he under the said deed of settlement, assigned and transferred to the trustees the said amount of Rs. 1 lakh, upon trust, subject to the powers and provisions declared and contained in the deed of settlement. Clauses 1 and 2 relate to the power conferred on the trustees in investing the said fund of Rs. 1 lakh. Clause (2) confers power on the trustees to incur certain expenses incidental to the performance of the trust, and cl. (3) provides:

"Subject to the foregoing clause two the said trustees shall pay the said interest and income of the said trust funds to the said Indumatibai wife of the Settlor for and during her life and down to her death."

It is not necessary to refer to the other clauses which relate to the duties of the trustees after the death of his wife Indumati. Under the deed of settlement thus, the beneficial interest which the wife of the assessee had acquired was to receive interest and income of the trust fund of Rs. 1 lakh during her life time. The question to be considered is whether this constitutes a "gift" to his wife within the meaning of s. 5(1)(viii) of the Act.

And this brings us to the relevant provisions of the Gift-tax Act. This Act has been enacted in the year 1958 by Parliament to provide for levy of gift-tax. The charging section is s. 3, and it provides:

"3. Subject to the other provisions contained in this Act, there shall be charged for every financial year commencing on and from the 1st day of April, 1958, a tax (hereinafter referred to as gift-tax) in respect of the gifts, if any, made by a person during the previous year (other than gifts made before the 1st day of April, 1957) at the rate or rates specified in the Schedule."

Under the charging section thus, gifts made after April 1, 1957, are chargeable to tax under s. 3 subject to the other provisions contained in the Act. The charge is on the person making the gift in respect of the gifts made by him. Section 5 provides that gift-tax shall not be charged under this Act in respect of certain gifts described in cls. (i) to (xvi) of sub-s. (1) thereof. The material clause, viz. cl. (viii), as it stood at the material time, reads:

"(viii) to his or her spouse, subject to a maximum of rupees one lakh in value in the aggregate in one or more previous years,..."

The question to be considered is whether, by settling the interest and income of the trust fund of Rs. 1 lakh on his wife Indumati during her life time, the assessee had made any gift to his wife. If there is any such gift in the said settlement, the assessee would be entitled to exemption under s. 5(1)(viii) of the Act. If, on the other hand, therein no gift is involved to his wife, the assessee is not entitled to any exemption. Gift has been defined in s. 3, which is the interpretation clause. Clause (xi) defines a "gift" and it provides:

"'gift' means the transfer by one person to another of any existing movable or immovable property made voluntarily and without consideration in money or money's worth, and includes the transfer of any property deemed to be a gift under section 4."

It is not necessary for the purposes of this case to refer to s. 4 which deals with the deemed gifts. Now, the essence of gift thus is a voluntary transfer of an existing moveable or immovable property by one person to another without consideration in money or money's worth. Property has been defined in cl. (xxii) as: "'property' includes any interest in property, moveable or immovable." Clause (xxiv) defining "transfer of property", inter alia provides:

"(xxiv) 'transfer of property' means any disposition, conveyance, assignment, settlement, delivery, payment or other alienation of property and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, includes—

(a) the creation of a trust in property;

(b) the grant or creation of any lease, mortgage, charge, easement, licence, power, partnership or interest in property;"

It is not necessary to read the other sub-clauses of cl. (xxiv). Reading these three clauses—(xi), (xxii) and (xxiv)—together, it is clear that interest in property is itself property, and grant of interest in property by one to another would be a transfer of property within the meaning of the Act. On the reading of these three clauses together, it would necessarily follow that when a person voluntarily grants interest in property to another without consideration in money or money's worth, it would amount to a gift within the meaning of the Act. Mr. Joshi also referred us to the definition of "donee" which provides:

"'donee' means any person who acquires any property under a gift, and, where a gift is made to a trustee for the benefit of another person, includes both the trustee and the beneficiary."

It is his argument, that under the settlement, the property transferred is a sum of Rs. 1 lakh. The said property has been transferred by the assessee to the trustees. The trustees are the donees of the property. The wife of the assessee has acquired no interest in the trust property. There is, therefore, no gift involved by the assessee to his wife. It is not possible to accept the argument of Mr. Joshi. It is indeed true that the legal title to the trust fund has been transferred by the assessee to the trustees. But that has not the effect of creating no interest in trust property in favour of his wife who is the beneficiary under the settlement. A "trust" is defined in s. 3 of the Indian Trusts Act, and reading the section, it becomes clear that though the legal title in the trust property vests in the trustees, what he gets under the trust by accepting the trust is only an obligation annexed to the trust property arising out of the confidence placed in him by the settlor. He has to carry out these obligations which he has accepted in accordance with the directions given to him by the settlor under the settlement for the benefit of other persons. The persons for whose benefit the trustee discharges these obligations are termed as the beneficiaries, and the interest of the beneficiary under the settlement is termed in s. 3 as the "beneficial interest". The subject-matter of the trust is called "trust property". The nature of the beneficial interest or the interest of the beneficiary has been described in s. 3 as "his (beneficiary's) right against the trustee as owner of the trust property". The argument of Mr. Joshi is that what a beneficiary gets under the settlement is only a right against the trustee and not any interest in the trust fund. Now, reading s. 3 as a whole, it is clear that the right which the beneficiary gets against the trustee is not a right in air. It is a right in respect of the property which is called the trust property. The right of the beneficiary against the trustee in respect of the trust property is called beneficial interest. It is in law termed as equitable title to the property. It is not possible to hold that the right which a beneficiary gets under the trust is not an interest in the trust property. The fundamental attributes of ownership of property is power or right of transfer and right to possess and enjoy property and/or its income. The trustee has no power to transfer trust property for his benefit, nor can he enjoy the trust property for his benefit. He undoubtedly possesses the trust property, but the possession is for the benefit of others, the beneficiaries. The trust thus is merely a means or a vehicle by which a donor passes on his interest in the trust property to the beneficiaries. In effect, a trust is a gift of trust property or an interest therein to the beneficiaries. Mr. Joshi, however, contends that that may be the position under the Trusts Act, but, by reason of the definition of "transfer of property" contained in cl. (xxiv), such is not the position under the Gift-tax Act. Sub-clause (a) of cl. (xxiv) provides that the creation of a trust is transfer of property. A transfer of property is complete when the trust is created. It is not open then to travel to sub-cl. (b) of cl. (xxiv) to see whether by making a trust an interest in the property has also been created by the author of the trust. We see nothing in the language used in cl. (xxiv) so to restrict the operation and legal effect of creation of a trust in favour of the beneficiaries. To accept the contention of Mr. Joshi would lead to unforeseen results. It would virtually amount to denial of the benefit which the Legislature by enacting s. 5 have conferred on a donor. It would mean that the gifts which fall within s. 5 would fall out of s. 5 if made through the instrumentality of a trust. Various types of gifts are, to the extent stated therein, exempted from tax. To illustrate, cl. (vii) provides: "to any relative dependent upon him for support and maintenance...". The section contemplates that a person, who by making a gift of his property makes a provision for support and maintenance of a relative dependent on him, should get certain exemptions from liability to pay tax. A person, who has to provide for maintenance of his minor children, if the construction is accepted, would have to make it otherwise than by trust or settlement. In certain cases, assuming that there are minor children, it would not be possible even to make provision for support and maintenance of these minor children without making a trust. On the construction, a person if he does make provision for support and maintenance of his minor children by creating a trust, invites a liability to tax. Such illustrations could be multiplied by referring to certain other clauses of s. 5, e.g. (iv), (v), (xi), etc. There is no warrant to assume such an intention on the part of the Legislature, specially when making a trust has been taken to be a mode of "transfer of property". In our opinion, therefore, by creating a settlement of date December 22, 1958, the assessee has transferred interest in the trust fund to his wife. There is no dispute that the settlement has been voluntarily made, and there is no consideration in money or money's worth. It would, therefore, be a gift of an interest in the trust property, namely, the trust fund, which was in existence at the time of making of the transfer. Mr. Joshi, however, contends that even if on the view we have taken, it is a gift, it is not a gift falling under cl. (viii) of s. 5(1). According to him, in order to bring a gift under the said cl. (viii), it must be established that the spouse has a disposing power over the property gifted to him or her. Reliance in support of this argument is placed on sub-s. (3) of s. 5. Sub-section (3) provides that

"Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (1) or sub-section (2), where either spouse makes any gifts out of any such gifts received by the spouse as fall within clause (viii) of sub-section (1), the gifts so made shall be deemed to be taxable gifts made by that spouse and nothing contained in sub-section (1) or sub-section (2) shall apply in relation to any such gifts."

It is difficult to read the said sub-section as limiting the operation of cl. (viii) of s. 5(1), or as a proviso to cl. (viii) taking out of it certain gifts which fairly fall under cl. (viii). Sub-section (3) is a provision relating to subsequent gifts of the gifted property. All that has been stated in this sub-section is that a spouse after getting a property by way of a gift, if makes another gift of the same property, he or she would not be entitled to get any exemption provided for either in sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2) of s. 5. That does not mean that for a gift to fall under cl. (viii), it must be one in respect of which the donor's spouse should necessarily have capacity to dispose it off. Mr. Joshi, in the alternative, argued that unless the spouse is the only donee of the gift, the gift does not fall under cl. (viii). Here the donees are more than one. The settlement deed provides that the wife Indumati is entitled to the interest and income of the trust fund during her life time. Thereafter the property is to go to his children and others as provided for in the trust deed. The wife is not the only donee. There are other donees also. A gift to the spouse under the settlement deed, therefore, does not fall under cl. (viii). Again, we are unable to read any such proviso to the said cl. (viii). All that is provided in the clause is that if there is a gift in favour of the spouse, then to the extent of the gift not exceeding Rs. 1 lakh, the assessee is entitled to an exemption. Further, in our opinion, having regard to the terms of the settlement-deed, there is no joint donee along with the spouse Indumati in the year of assessment. The interest whatever the children and others have in the trust property is a contingent beneficial interest which would come into existence on the happening of the event, namely, the death of Indumati. There had been no transfer of interest as such in presenti in favour of these persons in the year of assessment. In our judgment, therefore, the assessee is entitled to an exemption under s. 5(1)(viii) to the extent of the value of the gift involved in the settlement to his spouse. The manner or the mode of ascertaining the value of a gift is provided in s. 6 and the rules framed under sub-s. (3) of s. 6 of the Act.

In the result, our answer to the question re-framed is that on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the assessee is entitled to the exemption under s. 5(1)(viii) of the Gift-tax Act to the extent of the value of the gift to the spouse as may be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of law. No order as to costs.

Answer accordingly.

v.

YOGENDRA N. MAFATLAL.*

Gift-tax Act (XVIII of 1958), Sec. 5(1)(v)—Initial gifts made for constituting fund for charitable purposes—Whether such gifts entitled to exemption—Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 12B.

Under s. 5(1)(v) of the Gift Tax Act, 1958, the initial gifts which are made for the purpose of starting or constituting a fund for the charitable purposes of the kinds specified in the section will be entitled to exemption under it in the same manner in which the subsequent gifts to the fund will be.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

G. N. Joshi, with R. J. Joshi, for the applicant.

N. A. Palkhivala, with F. N. Kaka, for the respondents.

V. S. DESAI J. The assessee concerned in this reference had executed trust deeds constituting charitable funds in respect of certain shares possessed by them. The question, which arises for consideration, is:

"Whether the assessee is entitled to exemption under Sec. 5(1)(v) of the Gift Tax Act for the value of the shares transferred as aforesaid."

The Tribunal has held that the assessee was entitled to exemption as claimed by them and the reference has been made at the instance of the Department under s. 26(1) of the Gift-tax Act.

One of the two assessee had executed a trust-deed on March 26, 1959 settling on trust 5 ordinary shares of the Mafatlal Gagalbhai & Co. Pvt. Ltd., possessed by him, for the creation of a trust called "Shri Yogendra Navinchandra Mafatlal and Smt. Madhuri Yogendra Mafatlal Trust", and the shares settled under this trust were to constitute the trust fund. In the preamble of the trust-deed it was stated:

"And whereas the Settlers are desirous of settling the said shares on trust for public charitable purposes as hereinafter expressed or contained in these presents and have in pursuance of such desire prior to the execution of these presents delivered the share certificates and duly executed transfer-forms in respect of the said shares to the Trustees." Clause 1 of the trust deed thereafter stated:

"In pursuance of the said desire and for carrying out such desire into effect the Settlers respectively do hereby grant transfer and assign unto the Trustees all those respective shares particularly described in the Schedule hereunder written AND ALL the respective estate right title and interest claim and demand of the Settlers respectively into upon or out of the said shares TO HAVE AND TO HOLD the said shares unto and to the use of the Trustees but upon and subject to the Trusts powers and provisions hereinafter declared and expressed of and concerning the same."

The other assessee had similarly executed a trust-deed on June 21, 1958, settling 500 ordinary shares on trust for the constitution and creation of a charitable trust fund to be known as "Shardaben Bhagubhai Mafatlal Public Charitable Trust". The said trust-deed also contained identical recitals in the preamble and clause (1) thereof as in the other trust-deed. After the first trust fund was constituted on March 26, 1959, the assessee made another gift of 177 ordinary shares to the Fund on March 28, 1959. In the gift-tax assessment of the first assessee for the assessment year 1959-60, the assessee claimed exemption for the value of all the 182 shares, which had been donated by him, viz. the initial five shares donated at the time of the creation of the trust fund and the subsequent 177 shares donated to the trust two days later. In the assessment of the other assessee, she claimed exemption for the value of the 500 shares, which she had gifted under the trust-deed for the creation of the fund. In the case of the first assessee, the Gift-tax Officer was willing to allow him exemption in respect of the value of 177 shares, which were donated to the trust after the creation of the trust fund, because, according to him, this gift of 177 shares qualified for exemption under s. 5(I)(v) of the Gift-tax Act as being a gift to a fund established for a charitable purpose, to which the provisions of s. 15B of the Income-tax Act applied. In respect of the initial gift of 5 shares, he was of the opinion that the assessee was not entitled to exemption: his view being that the gift in respect of the said shares had been completed and tax attracted to it even before the execution of the trust or the creation of the fund for a charitable purpose. Secondly, according to him, the gift contemplated under s. 5(I)(v) was a gift to a charitable fund after the fund had been created and brought into existence. In the present case the gift was made first and the fund was created subsequently as a result of the gift, and the assessee, therefore, was not entitled to any exemption in respect of the value of the 5 shares initially gifted by him. Thirdly, according to him, it is only where a gift is made to an existing charity, fund or institution, which possesses the qualifications specified in s. 15B of the Income-tax Act that it is exempted from gift-tax. In the present case, the gift is not to any such fund, which was already there in existence to receive it and it would not, therefore, qualify for exemption from tax. He, accordingly, disallowed exemption in respect of the value of the initial 5 shares settled in trust by the first assessee. For the same reasons he disallowed exemption in respect of the value of the 500 shares donated by the second assessee under the trust-deed executed by her. In the appeals to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner against the decision of the Gift Tax Officer in their respective assessment orders, the Appellate Assistant Commissioner held that there was a gift to a fund established for a charitable purpose, which would be covered by the provisions of s. 5(I)(v) and would, therefore, be entitled to exemption from gift tax. He, accordingly, allowed the appeals of the assessee and modified the orders passed by the Gift Tax Officer. In the appeals preferred by the Department against the decision and orders of the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, the Appellate Tribunal upheld the orders passed by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and dismissed the appeals, holding that although the formation of the trust fund and the transfers of the shares to the trust fund were actually coterminous, the transfers of the shares must be taken to have been received by the trust fund after it came into existence and consequently the gifts under the trust deeds were gifts to a charitable fund so as to qualify for exemption under s. 5(I)(v) of the Gift-tax Act. Thereafter at the instance of the Department, it has drawn up a Statement of the Case and referred the question arising out of its order, which we have already stated earlier.

Mr. Joshi, the learned counsel, who appears for the Department, has argued that a gift, which is entitled to exemption under s. 5(I)(v), must be a gift to a fund for a charitable purpose, which is already established and in existence at the point of time when the gift is made. It must be a gift to a fund and, therefore, the fund must be already there to receive it. A gift, which is made not to a fund already existing, but which by the gift itself is brought into existence, cannot be said to be a gift to a fund and would not, therefore, qualify for the exemption under s. 5(I)(v) of the Gift-tax Act. He points out that the scheme of the Gift-tax Act allowing exemption from tax in respect of gifts and donations made out of the property of the assessee for charitable purposes is the same as under the Income-tax Act for exemption of income-tax for donations and gifts of income made for such purposes. Even under the Indian Income-tax Act, donations and gifts of incomes made for charitable purposes or for the purpose of founding charities or charitable purposes are not exempted. It is only gifts or donations, which are made to institutions or funds, which satisfy the requirements of s. 15B of the Indian Income-tax Act that are exempted. The same is the position under the Gift-tax Act and it is only gifts or donations, which are made to institutions or funds to which the provisions of s. 15B of the Income-tax Act apply that are permitted exemption from gift-tax. An examination of the provisions of the trust-deeds in the present case will show, says Mr. Joshi, that the shares settled under the said trust-deeds constitute or create the charitable trust fund and are not gifts made to a charitable fund. According to Mr. Joshi, therefore, the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and the Tribunal have erred in allowing exemption to the assessee in respect of the value of the shares transferred by them under their respective trust deeds.

The main question that is involved in the present case is what, on a proper construction, is the nature and scope of the exemption allowed under s. 5(I)(v) of the Gift-tax Act, and that would depend upon what is meant by a gift to any institution or fund established for a charitable purpose, to which the provisions of s. 15B of the Indian Income-tax Act apply. "Gift" as defined in s. 2(xii) of the Gift-tax Act means the transfer by one person to another of any existing movable or immovable property made voluntarily and without consideration in money or money's worth. "Property" under s. 2(xxii) includes any interest in property, movable or immovable and under s. 2(xxiv) "transfer of property" means any disposition, conveyance, assignment, settlement, delivery, payment or other alienation of property, and includes amongst other things, the creation of a trust in property. The settling in trust of a fund as a charitable fund would be the creation of a trust in property and would, therefore, amount to transfer of property. There would, therefore, be a gift within the meaning of the Gift-tax Act if there is a creation of trust in property for a charitable purpose. There can, therefore, be no doubt whatsoever that there has been a gift under the respective trust-deeds within the meaning of the Gift-tax Act. The further question to be considered is whether this is a gift to a fund established for a charitable purpose.

Now, it seems to us that if the creation of a trust in property for a charitable purpose is a gift for a charitable purpose and if the gift is so made under the trust-deed as to belong to a charitable fund, which was created under the trust-deed for a charitable purpose, the gift could be said to be made to a fund for charitable purpose within the meaning of s. 5(I)(v) of the Act.

Mr. Joshi argues that in order to satisfy the provision of s. 5(I)(v) the fund must be already in existence at the point of time when the gift is made. The gift, which starts the fund itself, cannot be said to be made to a fund, which is already established and in existence. In other words, what the section has intended, according to Mr. Joshi, is that the initial gift, which starts the fund, is not exempted but a gift, which is made the very next moment, after the initial gift has been made and all subsequent gifts, will be entitled to exemption. In other words, the person, who conceives of the idea of a charitable fund and starts it by his initial payment, is not entitled to exemption for his donation while all others, who come in subsequently and augment the fund are given exemption by the statute.

We find it difficult to understand why the Legislature should have looked upon with disfavour the founder of the fund and disentitle him to exemption, which is allowed to others, who donate to the fund. Mr. Joshi says that it is not necessary to look into why the Legislature has made a certain provision. What has got to be considered is what the provision made by the Legislature is and to give effect to it. If there can be no doubt about what the Legislature has intended and the language, which the Legislature has used is so clear as to leave no manner of doubt about its meaning, what Mr. Joshi says is undoubtedly right. When, however, the language used by the Legislature is capable of more than one interpretation, it would be relevant to consider if one of the constructions suggested leads to a curious or strange result, as to whether any good reason can be found why the Legislature should have intended that result. In the absence of any such good reason which can be suggested, the construction which avoids curious or strange results will have to be accepted in preference to the other which yields such results.

Now, it seems to us that the intention of the Legislature is to allow exemption in respect of gifts made to institutions or funds, which satisfy certain qualifications, which are laid down in s. 15B of the Indian Income-tax Act. In view of that intention it would be reasonable to hold that all gifts made to such institutions or funds, are intended to be exempted irrespective of whether any of the said gifts are the initial gifts for starting the fund or the institution or whether they are made subsequent to the starting or establishment of the institution or fund. It may be worthy to note that the language used in s. 5(I) (v) is "to any institution or fund established for a charitable purpose" and not "to any institution or fund, which has been established..." The interpretation, which Mr. Joshi wants to put upon it, is that "any institution or fund established" must mean "any institution or fund, which has been established". It is possible to construe the expression "any institution or fund established for a charitable purpose" as meaning any institution or fund, which has for its objects charitable purposes and a gift made to such an institution or to a fund at its very starting can reasonably be regarded as a gift made to an institution or fund established for a charitable purpose within the meaning of the Act.

In our opinion, the language of s. 5(I)(v) of the Gift-tax Act need not be restricted so as to cover gifts made to an institution or fund subsequent to its being established and not include those that are given at the very inception or commencement of the institution or fund. It may be pointed out that a gift when it is made to a charitable fund adds to it and becomes part of it. The very initial gift by which the fund starts constitutes the part, to which the further gifts are added. All gifts together form the fund, which is augmented by them. If the subsequent gifts, which are parts of the fund itself, are gifts to the fund, the initial gift, which starts the fund itself, could as well be a gift to the fund. Even if we were to take the view that a gift to be exempted under s. 5(I)(v) of the Gift-tax Act must be made to a fund after it has come into existence, the trust-deeds in the present case could be regarded as constituting the fund in the sense of a receptacle in which the donations go and donating the gifts to them. In our opinion, therefore, the initial gifts made under the respective trust-deeds by the assessee in the present case were rightly held by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner and the Appellate Tribunal as entitled to exemption.

Mr. Joshi has argued that the scheme for exemption of gift tax under the Gift-tax Act is the same as for exemption from income-tax under the Indian Income-tax Act so far as gifts or donations to charities are concerned. He has, therefore, invited our attention to s. 15B of the Indian Income-tax Act and has urged that having regard to the provisions of that section there can be no doubt whatsoever that the initial gifts made out of income for the purpose of constituting or creating charitable funds would not be entitled to exemption from gift-tax.

We do not want to consider what would be the position under the Indian Income-tax Act, though we are by no means satisfied that the provisions of that section are even prima facie so clear that under the Indian Income-tax Act no exemption of gifts of income for the creation or constitution of a charitable fund will ever be allowed. We do not, however, wish to go into the position under the Indian Income-tax Act in the present case. We are here concerned with the provisions of the Gift-tax Act, and having regard to the definitions of the words "gift", "property" and "transfer of property" under the Gift-tax Act and the provision of s. 5(I)(v), which allows exemption in respect of gifts to charitable institutions or funds, we are of the opinion that under s. 5(I)(v) of the Gift-tax Act, the initial gifts, which are made for the purpose of starting or constituting a fund for the charitable purposes of the kinds specified in s. 5(1)(v) of the Gift-tax Act would be entitled to exemption under the said provision in the same manner in which the subsequent gifts to the fund would be.

In the result, therefore, our answer to the question referred to us is in the affirmative. The Department will pay the costs of the assesseees.

Answer accordingly.

Before Mr. Justice Tambe and Mr. Justice V. S. Desai

THE COMMISSIONER OF GIFT TAX, POONA

v.

HIS HIGHNESS SIR SAHAJI THE CHHATRAPATI
MAHARAJSAHEB OF KOLHAPUR.*

Gift-tax Act (XVIII of 1958), Sec. 5(1)(vi)—Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 4(3), 15B—Wealth-tax Act (XXVII of 1957), Sec. 5(1)—Expenditure-tax Act (XXIX of 1957), Sec. 5(m)—“Charitable purpose” in s. 5(1) (vi) of Gift-tax Act whether includes “religious purpose”—Construction of statute—Omission of words in later Act which were superfluous in earlier Act—Whether such omission indicative of change of intention.

The expression “charitable purpose” in s. 5(1) (vi) of the Gift Tax Act, 1958, includes “religious purpose”.

Presumption as to the change of intention on the part of the Legislature on account of the variation in language between an earlier Act and a later Act is of the slightest weight especially when the omission of certain words in the later Act is of words, which were more or less superfluous in the earlier Act. In such cases the omission of words cannot necessarily be said to be indicative of a change of intention on the part of the Legislature. It is equally possible that a draftsman of a later Act may omit the unnecessary words.

The facts are stated in the judgment.

G. N. Joshi, with R. J. Joshi, for the applicant.

N. A. Palkhivala, with B. A. Palkhivala and S. B. Mujumdar, for the respondent.

TAMBE J. At the instance of the Commissioner of Gift Tax, this reference has been made under sub-s. (1) of s. 26 of the Gift-tax Act (hereinafter referred to as the Act). The assessee before us is His Highness Sir Shahaji the Chhatrapati Maharajasaheb of Kolhapur. The assessment year with which we are concerned is 1958-59: the relevant previous year being one commencing from April 1, 1957 and ending with March 31, 1958, and the question to be considered is:

“Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of this case the gifts amounting to Rs. 3,30,000 are exempt from Gift-tax within the meaning of section 5(1) (vi) (a) of the Gift-tax Act?”

The assessee executed a settlement on January 1, 1956, setting apart certain agricultural lands valued at Rs. 5 lakhs in trust. The income of this property was to be utilised in the manner indicated in the said deed. The deed mentions that there are several public temples in the States of Bombay and Hyderabad for the upkeep and maintenance of which the assessee had been for several years contributing. The assessee was desirous of making and declaring a religious and charitable trust in respect of the said lands and giving the trustees certain directions. Clause (3) of the Trust Deed shows that the income was, inter alia, to be utilised:

*Decided, February 12/15, 1965. Gift Tax Reference No. 3 of 1962.

(1) for the upkeep and maintenance of the public temples mentioned in the Schedule including the expenses of the repair and the maintenance of the temple buildings;

(2) for the expenses of the repair and replacement of any ornaments and utensils and other articles required for the said temples;

(3) for the expenses in respect of the maintenance of the Nagarkhana attached to the temples;

(4) for the payment of rates and taxes and other outgoings in respect of the temples and the temple buildings;

(5) for the expenses in respect of the performance of pujas and other ceremonies, and

(6) for the expenses of the performance of temple festivals (utsavs) and the salaries of the priests and the payment of dakshinas to Purohits attending religious rites and ceremonies and for other expenses relating to the said temples.

It is not in dispute that the gift made under this settlement is not taxable under the Act, it being one made prior to April 1, 1957.

Now, the assessee later on felt that the income of the properties, which he had already settled and set apart on trust under the aforesaid settlement deed, would not be sufficient to satisfy and fulfil the purposes of the trust. The assessee, therefore, executed further supplementary Trust Deeds on October 1, 1957, settling certain other properties worth Rs. 2 lakhs in trust for carrying out the purposes already mentioned in the said earlier settlement deed of January 18, 1956. A month thereafter, i.e. on November 1, 1957 the assessee further executed a third deed of settlement setting apart certain further properties worth Rs. 1,38,000 in trust as he was desirous of making permanent provision for the up-keep and maintenance of certain newly added properties, which, according to the settlor, were all of religious and historical importance to the settlor as well as to the public as those properties were attached to the Amba Bhavani Chauk in the old Palace and he was desirous of making and declaring a religious charitable trust in respect of those properties newly added. The terms and conditions enumerated in the other two Trust Deeds also were incorporated in this Trust Deed with slight modifications. One of the properties set apart on trust under this Trust Deed of November 1, 1957, was a portion of the old palace attached to the Amba Bhavani Chauk in a portion of which Her Highness the Junior Dowager Maharanisahab of Kolhapur was residing.

In respect of this palace certain directions were given in clauses 5 and 6 of the Trust Deed, which need be reproduced for the purposes of this case. This property has been mentioned as Property A in the Schedule attached to the Trust Deed. Clauses 5 and 6 of the Trust Deed of November 1, 1957 read as follows:

(5) "In respect of the property mentioned below as item (A) in the Schedule given below, there is the portion of the Old Palace now in possession of Her Highness the Junior Dowager Maharanisahab of Kolhapur to be enjoyed by her as residence for her lifetime. The right title and interest in this portion is transferred to the trustees by this deed of settlement subject to a condition that the Trustees are to allow to Her Highness the Junior Dowager Maharanisahab of Kolhapur to occupy the same for her life time as residential quarters for Her Highness the Junior Dowager Maharanisahab of Kolhapur; and after her death this portion in her possession will be taken in possession by the Trustees."

(6) "Though the possession of the portion of the property in possession of Her Highness the Junior Dowager Maharanisahab of Kolhapur is postponed for a future period contingent on the death of Her Highness the Junior Dowager Maharanisahab of Kolhapur, still the Trustees are responsible to maintain and keep the same in good order and condition by making suitable repairs and spending for the upkeep and maintenance of the said portion of the property settled on the Trust."

The assessee had also executed a fourth Trust Deed setting apart certain properties in trust for a trust named "Chhatrapati Charitable Aid to the deserving Trust". Under this Trust Deed the assessee had further settled properties valued at Rs. 45,500. The gift made under this fourth Trust Deed was also sought to be brought to tax by the Revenue. The Tribunal, however, held that the assessee was entitled to exemption in respect of the amount gifted under this Trust. The reference which has been made to us does not include this amount, the Department having given up its claim in respect of this Trust at the time of making the Reference. It is, therefore, not necessary to narrate the terms and conditions of this Trust Deed. Now, we are here concerned only with the gifts made under the aforesaid second and third Settlement Deeds of October 1, 1957 and November 1, 1957. It would be noticed that these gifts under the aforesaid Trust Deeds have been made between the period April 1, 1957 and March 31, 1958. At this stage it may be mentioned that the Act came on the statute book on May 15, 1958 and s. 3, which is the charging section, provided:

"Subject to the other provisions contained in this Act, there shall be charged for every financial year commencing on and from the 1st day of April, 1958, a tax (hereinafter referred to as gift-tax) in respect of the gifts, if any, made by a person during the previous year (other than gifts made before the 1st day of April, 1957) at the rate or rates specified in the Schedule".

Under this charging section tax is levied on an assessee in respect of the gifts made by him from and after April 1, 1957. The levy of the tax under the said section is "subject to the other provisions contained in this Act" and s. 5 is the section, which grants exemption in respect of certain gifts. It is not in dispute that the properties settled under these two Deeds constitute a gift within the meaning of the Act but not falling under s. 5(1)(v). The question to be considered is whether the assessee is entitled to exemption under s. 5(1)(vi)(a). That section inter alia provides that a gift made for any charitable purpose not falling within cl. (v) at any time before April 1, 1958, will be exempted from the charge to tax. The assessee claimed that the gifts made under the said two Deeds were for a charitable purpose and, therefore, he was entitled to exemption in respect of these two gifts. The Gift Tax Officer took the view that the gifts in respect of which exemptions have been claimed are made for religious purposes and gifts, which are exempted from tax under s. 5(1)(vi)(a) are only those gifts, which are made for charitable purposes. The gifts not being for charitable purposes, the assessee was not entitled to exemption. In this view of the matter, he brought to tax both the gifts of Rs. 2 lakhs and Rs. 1,38,000 made under the aforesaid two settlement deeds. The Appellate Assistant Commissioner also took the view that the objects of the trust were religious and the gifts were for religious purposes. Examining the provisions in certain other enactments he came to the conclusion that the omission of the word "religious" in s. 5(1)(vi) was not accidental but was with a definite purpose of excluding gifts made for religious purposes from the exemption provided in s. 5(1)(vi)(a) and, therefore, the assessee was not entitled to claim any exemption in respect of these two gifts. The Appellate Assistant Commissioner, however, granted a very small relief to the assessee in respect of the gift pertaining to the maintenance of the Nagarkhana provided in the Trust Deed of date October 1, 1957. The Appellate Assistant Commissioner held that the maintenance of Nagarkhana was a charitable purpose and that part of the gift, which related to the maintenance of the Nagarkhana, was, therefore, liable to be exempted. After valuing that part, the Appellate Assistant Commissioner held that the assessee was entitled to exemption to the extent of Rs. 8,000. Thus the Appellate Assistant Commissioner brought to tax gifts amounting to Rs. 3,30,000. The assessee took a further appeal to the Tribunal and the same contentions were reiterated by the parties before it. The Tribunal has written a very elaborate order reviewing both English as well as Indian cases commencing from *Commissioner for special purposes of Income Tax v. Pemsel*¹ in which the question has been considered as to whether the expression "charitable purposes" includes religious purposes or not. On a review of these authorities the Tribunal came to the conclusion that the expression "charitable purpose" in s. 5(I)(vi) includes "religious purpose". The Tribunal further held that the mention of the word "religious" in some enactments and non-mention of the words "religious purposes" in the said clause made no material difference. In this view of the matter, the Tribunal allowed the appeal and held that the assessee's claim for exemption from gift tax was proper. It may be mentioned here that before the Tribunal it had also been contended on behalf of the Department that in the Trust Deed of November 1, 1957, a direction had been given to the trustees to expend money for the repairs, upkeep and maintenance of the building in possession of Her Highness the Junior Dowager Maharani Sahab of Kolhapur. The said object was not charitable and, therefore, a gift attributable for that object should not be granted exemption in any event. The Tribunal over-ruled this contention taking the view that the building in a portion of which the Dowager Maharani Sahab of Kolhapur was residing, was a trust property and the direction given was only for the purpose of maintenance of the trust property. The object was, therefore, a charitable one. On an application made on behalf of the Department the Tribunal has referred to us the aforesaid question.

Having regard to the arguments advanced before us, it is not necessary to elaborately consider the judicial decisions as to the import of the expression "charitable purpose". It is not in dispute before us that under the Indian law the expression "charitable purpose" is a generic term of a very wide import and scope covering both public charitable as well as religious trusts. It is also not in dispute, save and except to the extent of the gift relating to the repairs of the portion of the palace occupied by the Junior Dowager Maharani Sahab, that the trusts are for religious purposes. On this undisputed position, it is apparent that the said two gifts would be for a charitable purpose and would ordinarily fall within "charitable purpose" as understood in Indian law.

Mr. Joshi, however, contends that the expression "charitable purpose" occurring in s. 5(I)(vi) must be given a restricted meaning. That expression does not include gifts made for religious purposes. The contention is founded on certain provisions in the Income-tax Act, Wealth-tax Act and the Expenditure-tax Act. Mr. Joshi, referring to s. 4(3) of the Income-tax Act, s. 5(I) of the Wealth-tax Act and s. 5(m) of the Expenditure-tax Act, argued that these Acts and the Gift-tax Act are allied Acts enacted with a certain objective. They are all Acts of Central Legislature. Whenever the Legislature has desired to grant exemptions to a tax-payer in respect of his contributions to or expenditure on public religious and charitable institutions, funds or purposes, the Legislature has in express terms said so. In the aforesaid three provisions, the Legislature has used both the terms "religious" and "charitable" purpose. In s. 5(I)(vi) of the Gift-tax Act, however, the words "religious purpose" have been omitted and the only expression used is "charitable purpose". The said omission, according to Mr. Joshi, is deliberate and, therefore, restricted meaning is required to be given to the expression "charitable purpose" and when this expression is so read in a restricted sense, the gifts in question, which are admittedly for public religious purpose, get excluded or fall out of the exemption provided in s. 5(I)(vi)(a) of the Act.

We find it difficult to accept the contention raised by Mr. Joshi. There is no ambiguity in the provisions of the said cl. (vi). The expression "charitable purpose" is a generic term in law and has assumed a definite meaning in Indian law. As already stated that expression is wide enough to include both "charitable purpose" as well as "religious purpose". If the Legislature desired to give this well understood term a limited meaning, it would be reasonable to assume that the Legislature would have in express terms said so.

Presumption as to the change of intention on the part of the Legislature on account of the variation in language between the earlier Acts and later Acts is of slightest weight especially when the omission of certain words in the later Act is of words, which were more or less superfluous in the earlier Acts. In such cases the omission of words cannot necessarily be said to be indicative of a change of intention on the part of the Legislature. It is equally possible that a draftsman of a later Act may omit the unnecessary words. It has been observed in Maxwell, 11th edn., p. 317:

"A change of language effected by the omission in the later statute of words which occurred in an earlier one would make no difference in the sense when the omitted words of the earlier enactment were unnecessary."

Here, in certain sections of the earlier enactment, the words used were either "religious charitable purposes" or "public purposes of a charitable or religious nature". In the instant Act the words "religious purpose" have been omitted but the omission has been of unnecessary words only. As stated earlier, the expression "charitable purpose" is wide enough to include public religious purposes also.

Further there is positive indication in the Gift-tax Act itself that the expression "charitable purpose" has been used in a wider sense covering religious purposes and not in a restricted sense as is contended for by Mr. Joshi. Clauses (v) and (vi) (clauses with which we are concerned), are connected clauses. Clause (v) speaks of certain gifts to institutions or funds established for a charitable purpose to which the provisions of s. 15B of the Indian Income-tax Act apply. Sub-clause (a) of cl. (vi) speaks of exemption granted to gifts made for charitable purpose not falling within cl. (v). It would be noticed that exemption in respect of gifts made for charitable purpose falling under cl. (v) is not restricted to any period. The exemption is available all the time. Exemption under sub-cl. (a) of cl. (vi), i.e. relating to gifts made to charitable purpose not falling under cl. (v) is available only when the gift had been made before April 1, 1958. Both clauses speak of gifts to charitable purpose. When cl. (v) is read along with the relevant clause of s. 15B of the Indian Income-tax Act, it leaves no doubt that the expression "charitable purpose" includes religious purpose as well. Sub-section (1) of s. 15B of the Indian Income-tax Act provides:

"The tax shall not be payable by an assessee in respect of any sums paid by him on or after the 1st day of April 1953, as donations to any institution or fund to which this section applies."

Sub-section (2) of s. 15B enumerates the institution or fund to which this section applies. Clause (2) of sub-s. (2) of s. 15B is material for the purposes of this reference. It reads:

15-B. (2) "This section applies to any institution or fund established in the taxable territories for a charitable purpose—

(i) ...

(ii) which is not expressed to be for the benefit of any particular religious community."

It is clear that the donation for religious purpose is not excluded from the expression "charitable purpose".

Turning to the provisions of the earlier Act to which Mr. Joshi had referred us, the first provision that has to be considered is cl. (i) of sub-s. (3) of s. 4 of the Indian Income-tax Act. The sub-section relates to the exclusion of certain income, profits and gains from being included in the total income of the assessee. The material part reads:

(3) "Any income, profits or gains falling within the following classes shall not be included in the total income of the person receiving them:

(i) ...any income derived from property held under trust or other legal obligation wholly for religious or charitable purposes, in so far as such income is applied or accumulated for application to such religious or charitable purposes..."

It is indeed true that in this clause the expression used is "religious or charitable purposes", but the definition clause for the purposes of this section occurring at the end of the section refers only to "charitable purposes". It is in following terms:

"In this sub-section 'charitable purposes' includes relief of the poor, education, medical relief and the advancement of any other object of general public utility, but nothing contained in clause (i) or clause (ii) shall operate to exempt from the provisions of this Act that part of the income from property held under a trust or other legal obligation for private religious purposes which does not enure for the benefit of the public."

The definition is an inclusive definition and is not an exhaustive definition, and the concluding part of the definition itself shows that religious purposes enuring for the benefit of the public is included in the expression "charitable purposes". It would be seen on reading the definition clause and cl. (i) of sub-s. (3) of s. 4 that the expression "charitable purposes" and the expression "religious and charitable purposes" are inter-changeable and used for conveying the same meaning. This is the earliest Taxation Act enacted in the year 1922. The Wealth-tax Act and the Expenditure-tax Act have been enacted in the year 1957. The Gift-tax Act with which we are concerned here, however, was enacted later in the year 1958. It would be reasonable to assume that the Legislature in omitting the words "religious purposes" must have only intended to omit the unnecessary words which occurred in the earlier Acts and as already pointed out there is an indication in the Gift-tax Act itself and when cl. (v) is read there is no doubt that the expression "charitable purpose" has been used in the Act in a wider sense and not in a restricted sense.

Further, if it really be the true position as argued by Mr. Joshi that all these Acts, viz., Income-tax Act, Wealth-tax Act, Expenditure-tax Act and Gift-tax Act are allied Acts enacted with a certain objective, we fail to see why the Legislature would intend to give a restricted meaning to the expression "charitable purpose". Now, when the property is held under a trust or under a legal obligation for religious and charitable purposes its income does not enter "total income". When a donation is given to an institution or fund established for public religious and charitable purpose, the income is exempt from tax. When a property is held under trust or legal obligation relating to any public purpose of a charitable or religious nature it is not liable to be included in the wealth of a person for the purpose of levy of wealth tax. Similarly, if an expenditure is incurred for any public purpose of religious or charitable nature, it is excluded from the expenditure, which attracts tax. We see no reason why a person should not be entitled to exemption from tax in respect of gifts made for public religious and charitable purposes. In our judgment, therefore, the contention advanced on behalf of the Revenue should fail. In our judgment, therefore, the Tribunal was not in error in taking the view it has taken as to the interpretation of the expression "charitable purpose".

The other contention raised on behalf of the Revenue is that at any rate that part of the gift, which relates to the repairs of that part of the property, in which the Junior Dowager Maharanisahab of Kolhapur is given a right of residence for her lifetime, is not a gift for a religious purpose. The contention, in our opinion, has a little force. We have already referred to this clause in the Gift Deed of November 1, 1957. The material clauses already reproduced are clauses 5 and 6 therein and they relate to a portion of the property mentioned in clause A of the Schedule. It would be seen that the entire property mentioned in Clause A has been settled on trust and the portion in which the Maharanisahab of Kolhapur is staying is also a trust property. Maharanisahab has been given only a right of residence in that portion of the trust property for her lifetime. The trustees have been given a direction to take possession of that portion of the property on the death of the Maharanisahab for the purposes of the trust. It being a trust property, it was incumbent on the trustees to maintain this property in good repair in the interest of the trust. Lest the trustees may think that there was no obligation on them to keep in good order that part of the property in which the Junior Dowager Maharani-saheb of Kolhapur was staying, the direction appears to have been given in clause (6) of the Trust Deed. In the circumstances it is not possible to accept this contention raised on behalf of the Revenue. In our opinion, therefore, the Tribunal also was right in not accepting this contention of the Revenue.

In the result, our answer to the question referred to us is in the affirmative. The Commissioner shall pay the costs of the assessee.

Hindu Marriage Act (XXV of 1955), Secs. 17, 3(a)—Indian Penal Code (XLV of 1860), Secs. 494, 495—"Solemnized", meaning of word in s. 17.

It is essential for the purpose of s. 17 of the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, that the marriage to which s. 494 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, applies on account of the provisions of the Act, should have been celebrated with proper ceremonies and in due form. Merely going through certain ceremonies with the intention that the parties be taken to be married, will not make the ceremonies prescribed by law or approved by any established custom.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

S. G. Patwardhan, with M. S. Gupta, for the appellants.

Dr. W. S. Barlingay, with B. R. G. K. Achar, for R. H. Dhebar, for respondent No. 1.

RAGHUBAR DAYAL J. Bhaurao Shankar Lokhande, appellant No. 1, was married to the complainant Indubai in about 1956. He married Kamlabai in February 1962, during the lifetime of Indubai. Deorao Shankar Lokhande, appellant No. 2, is the brother of appellant No. 1. These two appellants, together with Kamlabai and her father and accused No. 5, a barber, were tried for an offence under s. 494, Indian Penal Code. The latter three were acquitted by the Magistrate. Appellant No. 1 was convicted under s. 494, Indian Penal Code and appellant No. 2 for an offence under s. 494 read with s. 114, Indian Penal Code. Their appeal to the Sessions Judge was dismissed. Their revision to the High Court also failed. They have preferred this appeal by special leave.

The only contention raised for the appellants is that in law it was necessary for the prosecution to establish that the alleged second marriage of appellant No. 1 with Kamlabai in 1962 had been duly performed in accordance with the religious rites applicable to the form of marriage gone through. It is urged for the appellants that the essential ceremonies for a valid marriage were not performed during the proceedings which took place when appellant No. 1 and Kamlabai married each other. On behalf of the State it is urged that the proceedings of that marriage were in accordance with the custom prevalent in the community of the appellant for Gandharva form of marriage and that, therefore, the second marriage of appellant No. 1 with Kamlabai was a valid marriage. It is also urged for the State that it is not necessary for the commission of the offence under s. 494, Indian Penal Code that the second marriage be a valid one and that a person going through any form of marriage during the life time of the first wife would commit the offence under s. 494, Indian Penal Code, even if the later marriage be void according to the law applicable to that person.

Section 494 Indian Penal Code reads:

"Whoever, having a husband or wife living, marries in any case in which such marriage is void by reason of its taking place during the life of such husband or wife, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to seven years, and shall also be liable to fine."

Prima facie, the expression 'whoever... marries' must mean 'whoever... marries validly' or 'whoever... marries and whose marriage is a valid one.' If the marriage is not a valid one, according to the law applicable to the parties, no question of its being void by reason of its taking place during the life of the husband or wife of the person marrying arises. If the marriage is not a valid marriage, it is no marriage in the eye of law. The bare fact of a man and a woman living as husband and wife does not, at any rate, normally give them the status of husband and wife even though they may hold themselves out before society as husband and wife and the society treats them as husband and wife.

Apart from these considerations, there is nothing in the Hindu law, as applicable to marriages till the enactment of the Hindu Marriage Act of 1955, which made a second marriage of a male Hindu, during the life time of his previous wife, void. Section 5 of the Hindu Marriage Act provides that a marriage may be solemnized between any two Hindus if the conditions mentioned in that section are fulfilled and one of those conditions is that neither party has a spouse living at the time of the marriage. Section 17 provides that any marriage between two Hindus solemnized after the commencement of the Act is void if at the date of such marriage either party had a husband or wife living, and that the provisions of ss. 494 and 495, Indian Penal Code, shall apply accordingly. The marriage between two Hindus is void in view of s. 17 if two conditions are satisfied: (i) the marriage is solemnized after the commencement of the Act; (ii) at the date of such marriage, either party had a spouse living. If the marriage which took place between the appellant and Kamlabai in February 1962 cannot be said to be 'solemnized', that marriage will not be void by virtue of s. 17 of the Act and s. 494, Indian Penal Code, will not apply to such parties to the marriage as had a spouse living.

The word 'solemnize' means, in connection with a marriage, 'to celebrate the marriage with proper ceremonies and in due form', according to the Shorter Oxford Dictionary. It follows, therefore, that unless the marriage is 'celebrated or performed with proper ceremonies and due form' it cannot be said to be 'solemnized'. It is, therefore, essential, for the purpose of s. 17 of the Act, that the marriage to which s. 494, Indian Penal Code, applies on account of the provisions of the Act, should have been celebrated with proper ceremonies and in due form. Merely going through certain ceremonies with the intention that the parties be taken to be married, will not make the ceremonies prescribed by law or approved by any established custom.

We are of opinion that unless the marriage which took place between appellant No. 1 and Kamlabai in February 1962 was performed in accordance with the requirements of the law applicable to a marriage between the parties, the marriage cannot be said to have been 'solemnized' and therefore appellant No. 1 cannot be held to have committed the offence under s. 494, Indian Penal Code.

We may now determine what the essential ceremonies for a valid marriage between the parties are. It is alleged for the respondent that the marriage between appellant No. 1 and Kamlabai was in 'gandharva' form, as modified by the custom prevailing among the Maharashtrians. It is noted in Mulla's Hindu Law, 12th ed. at p. 605:

"...The Gandharva marriage is the voluntary union of a youth and a damsel which springs from desire and sensual inclination. It has at times been erroneously described as an euphemism for concubinage. This view is based on a total misconception of the leading texts of the Smritis. It may be noted that the essential marriage ceremonies are as much a requisite part of this form of marriage as of any other unless it is shown that some modification of those ceremonies has been introduced by custom in any particular community or caste."

At p. 615 is stated:

"(1) There are two ceremonies essential to the validity of a marriage, whether the marriage be in the Brahma form or the Asura form, namely—

(1) invocation before the sacred fire, and

(2) saptapadi, that is, the taking of seven steps by the bridegroom and the bride jointly before the sacred fire.

(2) A marriage may be completed by the performance of ceremonies other than those referred to in sub-section (1), where it is allowed by the custom of the caste to which the parties belong."

It is not disputed that these two essential ceremonies were not performed when appellant No. 1 married Kamlabai in February 1962. There is no evidence on record to establish that the performance of these two essential ceremonies has been abrogated by the custom prevalent in their community. In fact, the prosecution led no evidence as to what the custom was. It led evidence of what was performed at the time of the alleged marriage. It was the counsel for the accused in the case who questioned certain witnesses about the performance of certain ceremonies and to such questions the witnesses replied that they were not necessary for the 'gandharva' form of marriage in their community. Such a statement does not mean that the custom of the community deemed what took place at the 'marriage' of appellant No. 1 and Kamlabai, sufficient for a valid marriage and that the performance of the two essential ceremonies had been abrogated. There ought to have been definite evidence to establish that the custom prevalent in the community had abrogated these ceremonies for such form of marriage.

What took place that night when appellant No. 1 married Kamlabai, has been stated thus, by P.W. 1:

"The marriage took place at 10 P.M. Pat—wooden sheets—were brought. A carpet was spread. Accused No. 1 then sat on the wooden sheet. On the other sheet accused No. 3 sat. She was sitting nearby accused No. 1. Accused No. 4 then performed some Puja by bringing a Tambya—pitcher. Betel leaves and cocoanut was kept on the Tambya. Two garlands were brought. Accused No. 2 was having one and accused No. 4 having one in his hand. Accused No. 4 gave the garland to accused No. 3 and accused No. 2 gave the garland to accused No. 1. Accused Nos. 1 and 3 then garlanded each other. Then they each struck each other's forehead."

In cross-examination this witness stated:

"It is not that Gandharva according to our custom is performed necessarily in a temple. It is also not that a Brahmin Priest is required to perform the Gandharva marriage. No 'Mangala Ashtakas' are required to be chanted at the time of Gandharva marriage. At the time of marriage in question, no Brahmin was called and 'Mangala Ashtakas' were chanted. There is no custom to blow a pipe called 'Bher' in vernacular." Sitaram, witness No. 2 for the complainant, made a similar statement about what happened at the marriage ceremony and further stated, in the examination-in-chief:

"Surpan is the village of accused No. 3's maternal uncle and as the custom is not to perform the ceremony at the house of maternal uncle, so it was performed at another place. There is no custom requiring a Brahmin Priest at the time of Gandharva."

He stated in cross-examination:

"A barber is not required and accused No. 5 was not present at the time of marriage.

There is a custom that the father of girl should make to touch the foreheads of the girl and boy to each other and the Gandharva is completed by the act."

It is urged for the respondent that as the touching of the forehead by the bridegroom and the bride is stated to complete the act of Gandharva marriage, it must be concluded that the ceremonies which, according to this witness, had been performed, were all the ceremonies which, by custom, were necessary for the validity of the marriage. In the absence of a statement by the witness himself that according to custom these ceremonies were the only necessary ceremonies for a valid marriage, we cannot construe the statement that the touching of the foreheads completed the Gandharva form of marriage and that the ceremonies gone through were all the ceremonies required for the validity of the marriage.

Bhagwan, witness No. 3 for the complainant, made no statement about the custom, but stated in cross-examination that it was not necessary for the valid performance of Gandharva marriage in their community that a Brahmin priest was required and mangal ashtakas were to be chanted. The statement of Jeebhau, witness No. 4 for the complainant, does not show how the custom has modified the essential forms of marriage. He stated in cross-examination:

"I had witnessed two Gandharvas before this. For the last 5 or 7 years a Brahmin Priest, a Barber and a Thakur is not required to perform the Gandharva but formerly it was essential. Formerly the Brahmin used to chant Mantras and Mangalashtakas. It was necessary to have a maternal uncle or any other person to make touch the foreheads of the sponsors together. A Brahmin from Kasara and Dhadana comes to our village for doing rituals but I do not know their names."

This statement too, does not establish that the two essential ceremonies are no more necessary to be performed, for a Gandharva marriage. The mere fact that they were probably not performed in the two Gandharva marriages Jeebhau had attended, does not establish that their performance is no more necessary according to the custom in that community. Further, Jeebhau has stated that about five or seven years earlier the performance of certain ceremonies which, till then, were essential for the marriage, were given up. If so, the departure from the essentials cannot be said to have become a custom, as contemplated by the Hindu Marriage Act.

Clause (a) of s. 3 of the Act provides that the expressions 'custom' and 'usage' signify any rule which, having been continuously and uniformly observed for a long time, has obtained the force of law among Hindus in any local area, tribe, community, group or family.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the prosecution has failed to establish that the marriage between appellant No. 1 and Kamlabai in February 1962 was performed in accordance with the customary rites as required by s. 7 of the Act. It was certainly not performed in accordance with the essential requirements for a valid marriage under Hindu law.

It follows, therefore, that the marriage between appellant No. 1 and Kamlabai does not come within the expression 'solemnized marriage' occurring in s. 17 of the Act and consequently does not come within the mischief of s. 494, Indian Penal Code, even though the first wife of appellant No. 1 was living when he married Kamlabai in February 1962.

We have not referred to and discussed the cases referred to in support of the contention that the 'subsequent marriage' referred to in s. 494, Indian Penal Code, need not be a valid marriage, as it is unnecessary to consider whether they have been correctly decided, in view of the fact that the marriage of appellant No. 1 with Kamlabai could be a void marriage only if it came within the purview of s. 17 of the Act.

The result is that the conviction of appellant No. 1 under s. 494, Indian Penal Code, and of appellant No. 2 under s. 494 read with s. 114, Indian Penal Code, cannot be sustained. We, therefore, allow their appeal, set aside their convictions and acquit them. The bail bonds of appellant No. 1 will stand discharged. Fines, if paid, will be refunded.

Appeal allowed.

THE BOMBAY MUNICIPAL CORPORATION

v.

DHONDU NARAYAN CHOWDHARY.*

Bombay Municipal Corporation Act (Bom. III of 1888), Sec. 68—Control envisaged in s. 68—Nature of.

The control envisaged in s. 68 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, 1888, is not control over the decision as such of the delegate but over the administrative aspects of cases and their disposal. The administrative side of the delegate's duties are the subject of control and revision by the Commissioner (e.g. the kinds of cases in which the delegate could take action or the period or time during which the power might be exercised) but not the essential power of the delegate to decide whether to take action or not in a particular case.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. C. Setalvad, with J. B. Dadachanji, O. C. Mathur and Ravinder Narain, for the appellant.

Dr. B. K. Bhattacharjee, with S. N. Mukherjee, for the respondent.

HIDAYATULLAH J. In this appeal by special leave against the judgment and order of the Principal Judge, City Civil Court, Bombay dated February 14, 1964, the only question is whether the delegation by the Commissioner, Municipal Corporation, of his functions under ss. 105B to 105E to certain officers of the Corporation was valid and proper. This question arises in the following circumstances: One Govind Hari was a monthly tenant of room No. 23 of a chawl at Chandanwadi. After his death in 1961 the tenancy devolved on his widow Anusuyabai, who took in a boarder. The chawl belonged to the Municipal Corporation and proceedings were taken to eject Anusuyabai and the boarder under Chap. VI-A of the Municipal Corporation Act. These proceedings were initiated by one of the officers to whom the powers of the Commissioner were delegated by him under s. 68 of the Act. After due enquiry the officer passed an order evicting these persons. An appeal was filed under s. 105F of the Act before the Bombay City Civil Court. In that appeal it was held that the delegation was not proper inasmuch as the judicial functions of the Commissioner under ss. 105B to 105E had been delegated to be exercised under the Commissioner's control and subject to his revision. The learned Judge pointed out that judicial or quasi-judicial power could not ordinarily be delegated and, in any event, it could not be delegated so that the control over the decision was kept by the Commissioner. He, therefore, held that the officer who had passed the order was not properly invested with jurisdiction and the order was thus a nullity.

The Bombay Municipal Corporation Act is an Act of 1888 and it has been amended frequently. Section 68 is one of the original sections and it provides as follows:

"68. Municipal officers may be empowered to exercise certain of the powers, etc. of the Commissioner.—

(1) Any of the powers, duties or functions conferred or imposed upon or vested in the Commissioner by any of the sections, sub-sections or clauses mentioned in sub-section (2) may be exercised, performed or discharged, under the Commissioner's control and subject to his revision and to such conditions and limitations, if any, as he shall think fit to prescribe, by any municipal officer whom the Commissioner generally or specially either by name or by virtue of office, empowers in writing in this behalf; and in each of the said sections, sub-sections and clauses the word 'Commissioner' shall, to the extent to which any municipal officer is so empowered, be deemed to include such officer.

(2) The sections, sub-sections and clauses of this Act referred to in sub-section (1) are the following namely:—...

Section 105B.

Section 105C.

Section 105D.

Section 105E."

A reference to ss. 105B, 105C, 105D and 105E was inserted by the Maharashtra Act XIV of 1961. These sections are in Chapter 6A which was also newly added by the same Act. It is not necessary to refer to these sections, except a portion from s. 105B which brings into prominence the action taken by the Corporation against the respondents:

"105B. Power to evict person from corporation premises.—

(1) Where the Commissioner is satisfied—

(a) that the person authorised to occupy any corporation premises has, whether before or after the commencement of the Bombay Municipal Corporation (Amendment) Act, 1960,—

(i) ...

(ii) sub-let, contrary to the terms or conditions of his occupation, the whole or any part of such premises; or...

the Commissioner may, notwithstanding anything contained in any law for the time being in force, by notice... order that that person, as well as any other person who may be in occupation of the whole or any part of the premises, shall vacate them within one month of the date of the service of the notice."

It will be noticed that s. 68 was originally intended to cover very different matters because Chapter 6A could not have been in contemplation. When Chapter 6A was added and a reference to ss. 105B to 105E was included in s. 68, the wording of that section became applicable to the powers exercisable under ss. 105B to 105E, even though that wording, taken literally, is somewhat inapt to cover delegation of judicial power.

No question has been raised that any of the amendments is ultra vires so the words of s. 68 must be reasonably construed. It goes without saying that judicial power cannot ordinarily be delegated unless the law expressly or by clear implication permits it. In the present case the amendment of s. 68 by inclusion of delegation of the functions of the Commissioner under ss. 105B to 105E does indicate the intention that the judicial or quasi-judicial powers contained in Chap. VIA were expressly intended to be delegated. To the delegation as such there can be no objection. What is objected to is the provision, both in the section as well as in the order of delegation, that the exercise of the function is to be under "the Commissioner's control" and "subject to his revision". These words are really appropriate to a delegation of administrative functions where the control may be deeper than in judicial matters. In respect of judicial or quasi-judicial functions these words cannot of course bear the meaning which they bear in the delegation of administrative functions. When the Commissioner stated that his functions were delegated subject to his control and revision it did not mean that he reserved to himself the right to intervene to impose his own decision upon his delegate. What those words meant was that the Commissioner could control the exercise administratively as to the kinds of cases in which the delegate could take action or the period or time during which the power might be exercised and so on and so forth. In other words, the administrative side of the delegate's duties were to be the subject of control and revision but not the essential power to decide whether to take action or not in a particular case. This is also the intention of s. 68 as interpreted in the context of the several delegated powers. This is apparent from the fact that the order of the delegate amounts to an order by the Commissioner and is appealable as such. If it were not so the appeal to the Bombay City

Civil Court would be incompetent and the order could not be assailed. The order of the delegate was the order of the Commissioner and the control envisaged both in s. 68 and the order of delegation was not control over the decision as such but over the administrative aspects of cases and their disposal. No allegation has been made that the Commissioner intervened in the decision of the case or improperly influenced it. In these circumstances, the order impugned in the appeal cannot be sustained.

We allow the appeal and set aside the order of the Bombay City Civil Court and restore the order of the officer who exercised powers under s. 105B of the Act, but make no order about costs.

Appeal allowed.

LOTUS LINE PRIVATE LTD. v. THE STATE OF MAHARASHTRA.*

A person to whom a wrong is done is entitled to full compensation for restoring the thing damaged to its original condition. This applies equally to a private person as to a corporation or trustee. WANCHOO J. This appeal on a certificate granted by the Bombay High Court arises out of a suit brought by the State of Bombay (respondent) against the appellant for recovery of Rs. 24,979-2-4. The facts which led to the filing of the suit are not now in dispute as they have been concurrently found by the two Courts below and may be briefly narrated. On April 27, 1948, at about mid-day, the vessel Padam belonging to the appellant arrived in the Dharamtar creek carrying a cargo of 3500 bags of manure weighing about 250 tons and laid anchor alongside Dharamtar jetty lying on the Pen side of the creek on the Pen-Khopoli road. The Dharamtar jetty is meant for small vessels bringing passengers and luggage crossing the creek and so the peon on duty there requested the master of the ship to remove the vessel into the creek and to unload the cargo with the help of small boats. The master of the ship agreed to do so. But when he tried to move the vessel away from the jetty, she actually came on top of it due to the force of the ebb tide and got stuck there. The incident was reported by the peon to his superior officer who directed the peon to inform the master to refloat the vessel at night when there was high tide. The master did so at about 3 A.M. The consequence of the vessel getting on the jetty and the attempt to take it off was serious damage to the jetty, which was broken. This damage was found on the next day i.e. April 28, 1948. An estimate for special repairs of the damage done was prepared soon after and was submitted on May 12, 1948, to the Executive Engineer. The appellant was asked by telegram on May 5, 1948, to send a representative in order that an estimate of the cost of special repairs for the damage done might be prepared. The appellant replied by telegram that a representative would be sent but no one appeared on behalf of the appellant when the estimate was prepared. This estimate was for Rs. 16,400. It appears that sometime thereafter emergent repairs costing Rs. 2,783 were undertaken to make the jetty workable. Later, some minor repairs costing about Rs. 1,223 were further carried out. In the meantime the appellant was asked again and again to pay for the damage done. The appellant refused to do so and, therefore, the State of Bombay filed the suit claiming the three sums mentioned above for special repairs, emergent repairs and minor repairs and also 6 per centum per annum interest thereon.

The trial Court found that the above facts had been established by the evidence led before it and that the appellant was liable to make good the loss as it arose on account of the negligence of the master of the ship. It then came to consider the quantum of damages. It came to the conclusion that the claim for Rs. 16,400 was really for reconstruction of the whole damaged area and this showed that the respondent-State wanted restitution and not compensation for the damage done. It however refused to give restitution on the ground that it had not been proved that special repairs to the extent of Rs. 16,400 were absolutely necessary for the damaged portion of the jetty. The trial Court also inspected the jetty and was of the opinion that the emergent and minor repairs that had been made had put the jetty in order and traffic was going on as usual. Further it took into account the statement of a witness that a bridge was being constructed over the Dharamtar creek and was likely to be completed within two years. It, therefore, finally gave a decree for Rs. 3,671-12-6 which had been actually spent by the State in making the repairs. The rest of the claim was dismissed.

This led to an appeal by the State before the High Court, and the only question which the High Court had to decide was the quantum of damages. In that connection the High Court relied on *Wednesbury Corporation v. The Lodge Holes Colliery Company, Limited*¹ and held that that case laid down that the general rule was to require the party in the wrong to make compensation and not restitution, but there was an exception to this rule and that exception was where the party complaining of a wrong to property was a corporation or a trustee charged with the maintenance of a highway or other public work. In such a case the wrongdoer was bound to make restitution because a corporation or a trustee who was charged with the maintenance of public works was bound to restore the property in its or his possession to its original condition. On this view, the High Court allowed the appeal and modified the decree of the trial Court by awarding Rs.19,038-8-0 and interest at 6 per centum from the date of suit till realisation. The present appeal on a certificate granted by the High Court challenges the principle laid down by the High Court, and it is urged that no such principle has been laid down in Wednesbury Corporation's case and that that case was overruled in The Lodge Holes Colliery Company, Limited v. Mayor of Wednesbury.²

The only question that arises for decision before us, therefore, is the quantum of damages in a case like this. Apart from the fact that the case relied upon by the High Court has been partly over-ruled in the Lodge Holes Colliery Co. Limited's case, we have been unable to find therein the principle which the High Court has deduced from the case of Wednesbury Corporation. Learned counsel for the respondent-State is also unable to point out any passage in the judgment of Cozens-Hardy L.J. which lays down the proposition in the form in which the High Court has stated it. As we read that case it lays down that the rights of a corporation in such a case are at least as high as that of a private owner, with this addition that a trustee or corporation cannot renounce those rights in the same way as a private owner could. The true measure of compensation was held in that case to be the cost of restoration and compensation must give full restoration. In that case the dispute really was whether the road which had subsided should be raised to the same level as it was before or whether the purpose would be served even though it was not raised to the same level and a dip was allowed therein. The Appeal Court held that the Corporation was entitled to full compensation for restoring the road to its original condition. It may be mentioned that this view was not accepted in full by the House of Lords. It seems to us, however, that the view taken in Wednesbury Corporation's case that a person to whom a wrong is done is entitled to full compensation for restoring the thing damaged to its original condition may be accepted as the true measure of damages in a case of this kind. This applies equally to a private person as to a corporation or trustee. Therefore, the respondent-State was entitled to compensation to the extent necessary to restore the jetty to its original condition. If this is to be called restitution, the corporation as well as a private person would be entitled to it. But if by restitution, the High Court meant complete reconstruction irrespective of the damage done, then neither a private person nor a corporation or a trustee is entitled to complete reconstruction irrespective of the damage done.

This being the principle, the respondent-State would be entitled to such cost as would restore the jetty to its original condition. It is in that connection that an estimate was submitted for special repairs to the jetty as early as May 12, 1948. The appellant was invited to send a representative to assess the cost of repairing the damage done but it neglected to do so. There is nothing on the record to show that the special repairs to the tune of Rs. 16,400 were for complete reconstruction of the jetty irrespective of the damage done to it. Nothing has been brought out in the evidence of Patel who prepared the estimate and of the Sub-Divisional Officer who supervised it to show that the estimate of Rs. 16,400 was for complete reconstruction of the jetty irrespective of the damage done. The covering letter to the estimate shows that it was an estimate for special repairs to the jetty. If the appellant neglected to send a representative to be present to assess the damage and the cost of repairing it, it cannot now come forward and say that the amount of Rs. 16,400 would not be the proper sum required for restoring the jetty to its original condition. All that has been brought out in the evidence of the two witnesses referred to above is that it could not be said whether any part of the dismantled material was fit for re-use; nor were the witnesses able to say what the dismantled material would have fetched if sold. Barring these two matters all that the evidence shows is that the amount of Rs. 16,400 was needed to carry out the special repairs, which would have presumably restored the jetty to its original condition. Therefore the respondent-State would be entitled to this sum of Rs. 16,400. But in view of the fact that some of the material might have been fit for re-use and some of the material might have been resold and thus fetched some price, we would deduct the item of Rs. 1,600 (from the total of Rs. 16,400) which refers to "dismantling the damaged portion and removing the debris outside including sorting materials and stacking the useful one to a suitable site etc.". The rest of the estimate amounting to Rs. 14,800 is clearly for restoration of the jetty to its original condition and the respondent-State would be entitled to that amount.

We may add however that there is no reason to allow anything to the respondent-State in the shape of emergent repairs. It has been shown that Rs. 14,800 would have restored the jetty to its original condition and that is all that the State is entitled to have. How it decided to spend that sum, whether at one time or at different times in the shape of emergent repairs or minor repairs, has no bearing on the quantum of compensation necessary for restoring the jetty to its original condition. For the same reason the fact that the State might not have spent the whole amount by the time the trial Court came to give its judgment or the fact that a bridge was going up and the jetty might not thereafter be required has no relevance on the question of damage done on April 27, 1948, though the former may affect the date from which interest may be awarded. We are, therefore, of opinion that the respondent-State is entitled to Rs. 14,800 as compensation for the damage done to the jetty to put it back in its original condition. We, therefore, partly allow the appeal and reduce the amount decreed to Rs. 14,800. This sum will carry interest at the rate of Rs. 6 per centum from the date of decree of the trial Court till realisation as ordered by the High Court. The appellant will pay proportionate costs throughout to the respondent-State.

Appeal partly allowed.

In giving directions under the first part of s. 56(1) of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950, the Court should give effect to the original intention of the founder as far as that intention can be carried out. If the method indicated by the founder cannot be carried out, the Court will substitute another method cy pres, that is to say, as nearly as possible to the method specified by the founder.

THE facts are stated at 59 Bombay Law Reporter p. 349.

BACHAWAT J. One Jhaverchand Dahyabhai Shah died in 1916, leaving a will dated August 6, 1915. He was a resident of Vejalpore in the suburbs of Broach and a Ladva Shrimali Bania by caste. He professed the Jain religion, and believed in the tenets of the Svetambar Murti Pujak sect of Jains. By cl. (7) of the will, he directed his executors to spend out of the earnings of his shop every year during the life-time of his niece, Bai Jakore, the amounts mentioned below on the following religious objects:

(1) Rs. 100 for feeding cattle with grass, fodder, oil cakes etc., in the Broach Pinjrapole.

(2) Rs. 100 for Jiva-daya Khata (fund for kindness to animals).

(3) Rs. 25 for offering flowers for the worship of Lord Rikabdev in the Jain temple at Vejalpore, Broach.

(4) Rs. 200 for providing food to Shravak pilgrims at the Shatroonjaya Hill at Palitana.

(5) Rs. 50 for providing food to pilgrims at Mount Girnar.

(6) Rs. 50 for providing food to pilgrims at Mount Abu.

(7) Rs. 250 for providing cereals, clothes etc., to Shravaks and Shravikas.

(8) Rs. 100 for providing cloth to Jain Sadhus and Sadhavies.

(9) Rs. 200 for education and food of Hindu orphans.

(10) Rs. 200 for Jain Gyan Khata (fund for imparting knowledge).

(11) Rs. 100 for feeding Shravaks and Shravikas who have observed fast.

(12) Rs. 300 for giving food, cloth etc., to the blind, lame and crippled members of the Hindu Community.

*Decided, January 22, 1965. Civil Appeal No. 634 of 1964.

In addition, he also directed his executors to give a Swamivatsal feast or meal consisting of methi-dal and ladus made of sugar to the members of his caste at 15 specified villages and towns in the Broach and Surat Districts every year on the occasion of the sacred festival of Pajusan. By cl. (15) of the will, he directed that after the death of his niece, Bai Jakore, a sum of Rs. 75,000 should be set apart by the executors, and out of the moneys so set apart, suitable amounts should be sent to the respective Khatas (funds) in his name, so that the religious acts mentioned in cl. (7) be continued for ever.

On the death of Bai Jakore on May 20, 1928, the estate vested in the residuary legatee, Bai Chanchal, daughter of Bai Jakore. Mulchandbhai, husband of Bai Chanchal, set apart Rs. 75,000 on trust for the purposes mentioned in cl. (7) of the will, and began to manage the trust estate. Out of the trust moneys, he invested Rs. 8,000 in 5 per cent. tax-free Government Loan, 1944-45, yielding an annual income of Rs. 400, and pursuant to the directions given in cl. (15) of the will, handed over loans of the face value of Rs. 4,000, Rs. 1,000, Rs. 1,000 and Rs. 2,000 respectively to four religious and charitable institutions in full discharge of the obligation of the trust for expending annually the sums of Rs. 200, Rs. 50, Rs. 50, and Rs. 100 on items 2, 4, 5 and 6 of the religious purposes mentioned in cl. (7) of the will. On December 8, 1947, Bai Chanchal executed a trust deed in respect of the investments representing the balance amount of Rs. 67,000 and an accumulation of surplus or unexpended income amounting to Rs. 25,796-6-8. The trust is registered as a public trust under the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950, hereinafter referred to as the Act. The trust deed provided that the unexpended accumulation of Rs. 25,796-6-8 should be applied for establishing, maintaining and supporting a Nivas for housing the poor and middle-class Ladva Shrimali Jains at low and cheap rents. The trust deed also provided that after setting apart the aforesaid sum of Rs. 25,796-6-8 the balance funds would be held in trust for applying its income to the charities mentioned in cl. (7) of the aforesaid will other than items 2, 4, 5 and 6. Now, the trustees had no authority to divert any part of the trust fund for the purposes of the Nivas scheme. The establishment of a Nivas for housing the poor and middle-class Ladva Shrimali Jains is not one of the original objects of the trust. As a matter of fact, the Nivas scheme was not carried into effect. The Charity Commissioner, Bombay challenged the validity of the Nivas scheme. The Courts below rightly proceeded on the footing that the Nivas scheme is invalid. Subsequent to the execution of the trust deed, there were further accumulations of unexpended income. The Swamivatsal feasts were given, and the fixed annual payments to all the charities were duly met up to Samvat year 1999 corresponding to 1942-1943 A.D. During the subsequent years, the fixed annual payments to the charities were duly made, but on account of rationing restrictions the feasts could not be given up to Samvat year 2010 corresponding to 1953-1954 A.D. During the samvat year 2011 corresponding to 1954-1955 A.D., the feast was not given in spite of the removal of rationing restrictions. The trustees allege that the current income of the trust fund after disbursing the fixed annual payments is not sufficient to meet the usual expenses of annual feasts. On June 3, 1955, the Charity Commissioner filed an application before the District Judge, Broach, under s. 55(1)(b) and s. 56 of the Act for suitable directions for the utilisation of the accumulations of the unexpended income of the trust for some educational purpose. The trustees were impleaded as respondents to this application. Pursuant to a general notice issued by the Court, the appellants and four other members of the Ladva Shrimali Shrivak Bania Community in Broach and Surat Districts appeared, and intervened in the application. On their behalf, it was contended that the trust was for religious purposes and its funds could not be diverted for other purposes under ss. 55(1)(b) and 56 of the Act, and that the accumulations should be utilised year after year for meeting the deficit amount required for the annual Swamivatsal feasts.

The district Judge held that the provisions of s. 56 of the Act did not apply to the funds of a public religious trust, and if the accumulations were held for a religious purpose, the Court could not give any directions for its utilisation under that section, that the Swamivatsal feast confers religious benefits and objects Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 and 11 are also religious in character, while the remaining objects are charitable, and therefore the entire feast was not of a religious character, but assuming that the trust was wholly religious, the accumulation was not held for religious purposes, and was subject to the directions of the Court as to its utilisation under s. 56 read with s. 55(1)(b) of the Act. He also held that the trustees could not save any moneys in future by simply refusing to give the Swamivatsal feasts but it was not in the public interest to provide for the expenses of the feast out of the accumulation, and the accumulation should be spent for educational and medical purposes. The District Judge passed final orders on October 25, 1956. On that date, the accumulation of unexpended income amounted to Rs. 45,019-14-0, besides another sum of Rs. 107-2-0. The District Judge directed the trustees to hand over a sum of Rs. 22,509-15-0 to an institution known as the Sad Vidya Mandal for giving four freeships every year to deserving students, who should preferably be Jains of Broach District and failing such deserving cases, to other Hindu students. Subject to the condition of giving freeships, the Sad Vidya Mandal would be at liberty to spend the amount for purposes of the building of the college or its hostel or in providing other educational facilities to the students. He also directed the trustees to pay another sum of Rs. 22,509-15-0 to the trustees of the Sevashram Hospital at Broach on condition that the amount be invested in any approved trust security and its income be utilised in providing maintenance, food and medicine to poor and deserving patients. He directed the payment of the remaining sum of Rs. 107-2-0 towards costs.

The appellants and two other members of the Ladva Shrimali Shravak Bania Community preferred an appeal to the Bombay High Court. The High Court held that the Court could on an application under s. 55 of the Act deviate from the directions of the settlor, even if the purpose of the trust has not failed, where the Court finds that it is inexpedient, impracticable, undesirable, unnecessary or improper in the public interest to abide by his directions, but the Court could exercise this power only in respect of funds of a public trust which was not a trust for religious purposes. The High Court held that none of the purposes mentioned in cl. (7) of the will except the one mentioned in item 3 of the clause could be regarded as religious, that the object of providing funds for annual Swamivatsal feasts was charitable and not religious, and that the Court was, therefore, competent to entertain the application under s. 55. The High Court further held that providing a feast to the members of the caste even on the occasion of a religious festival or on days which may be regarded as holy is not expedient, desirable, necessary or proper in the public interest, and the directions of the District Judge with regard to the distribution of the fund should not be interfered with. The High Court accordingly dismissed the appeal. The appellants now appeal to this Court by special leave. They challenge the propriety and the legality of the directions given by the District Judge below, and repeat the submission made on their behalf in the Courts below. The respondents contend that the aforesaid directions were rightly given under ss. 55(1)(b) and 56 of the Act.

The Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950, was passed on August 14, 1950, with a view to regulate and make better provision for the administration of public religious and charitable trusts in the State of Bombay. Soon after the Act came into force, its constitutional validity was assailed. In Ratilal Panachand Gandhi v. The State of Bombay,¹ this Court held that a religious sect or denomination has the right guaranteed by the Constitution to manage its own affairs in matters of religion, and this includes the right to spend the trust property or its income for religion and for religious purposes and objects indicated by the founder of the trust or established by usage obtaining in a particular institution. To divert the trust property or funds for purposes which the Charity Commissioner or the Court considers expedient or proper, although the original objects of the founder can still be carried out, is an unwarranted encroachment on the freedom of religious institutions in regard to the management of their religious affairs and therefore s. 55(1)(c), which contains the offending provision and the corresponding provision relating to the powers of the Court occurring in the latter part of s. 56(1) must be held to be void. Subsequently, Bombay Act LIX of 1954 amended s. 55(1)(c) by excluding from its purview a trust for a religious purpose. Sections 55 and 56 of the Bombay Trusts Act, 1950, as they stand now, are as follows:

"55. (1) If upon an application made to him or otherwise the Charity Commissioner is of opinion that—

(a) the original object for which the public trust was created has failed,

(b) the income or any surplus balance of any public trust has not been utilized or is not likely to be utilized,

(c) in the case of a public trust other than a trust for a religious purpose, it is not in public interest expedient, practicable, desirable, necessary or proper to carry out wholly or partially the original intention of the author of the public trust or the object for which the public trust was created and that the property or the income of the public trust or any portion thereof should be applied to any other charitable or religious object,

(d) in any of the cases mentioned in sections 10 to 13 or in regard to the appropriation of the dharmada sums held in trust under section 54 the directions of the court are necessary, the Charity Commissioner shall require the trustee to apply within the prescribed time for directions to the Court within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the whole or part of the subject-matter of the trust is situate.

(2) If the trustees fail to make the application as required under sub-section (1) or if the Charity Commissioner himself is a trustee or if there is no trustee of the public trust, the Charity Commissioner shall make an application to the Court.

56. (1) On such application being made, the court after hearing the parties and making an inquiry shall decide the matter and shall give directions. In giving the directions, the court shall, so far as may be expedient, practicable, desirable, necessary or proper in public interest, give effect to the original intention of the author of the public trust or the object for which the public trust was created. If the court is of opinion that the carrying out of such intention or object is not wholly or partially expedient, practicable, desirable, necessary or proper in public interest the court may direct the property or income of the public trust or any portion thereof to be applied cy pres to any other charitable or religious object. In doing so, it shall be lawful for the court to alter any scheme already settled or to vary the terms of any decree or order already passed in respect of the public trust or the conditions contained in the instrument of the public trust.

(2) Any decision or order passed by the court under sub-section (1) shall be deemed to be a decree of such court and an appeal shall lie therefrom to the High Court."

Section 2(13) of the Act provides that unless there is anything repugnant in the subject or context, public trust means an express or constructive trust for either a public religious or charitable purpose or both. Section 55(1)(c) expressly excludes from its operation a trust for a religious purpose. But ss. 55(1)(a) and 55(1)(b) do not exclude religious trusts from their operation, and they apply to all public trusts for religious and charitable purposes. On an application either under s. 55(1)(a) or s. 55(1)(b) read with s. 56(2), the Court is bound to give directions in respect of all public trusts. Section 56(1) provides that in giving the directions, the Court shall, so far as may be expedient, practicable, desirable, necessary or proper in the public interest, give effect to the original intention of the author of the trust or the object for which the trust was created. The conjunction "or" in this sentence introduces several alternatives. The Court must give effect to the original intention or object if and so far as it may be either expedient or practicable or desirable or proper or necessary to do so. If for example, the Court finds that it is proper in the public interest to give effect to the original object, the Court must give effect to it, though it is not necessary to do so in the public interest. Under the latter part of s. 56(1), if the Court finds that the carrying out of the original intention or object wholly or partially is neither expedient nor practicable nor desirable nor necessary nor proper in public interest, the Court may direct the property or income of the trust or any portion thereof to be applied cy pres to any other charitable or religious object. The latter part of s. 56(1) thus permits the diversion of trust funds for other objects, though the original objects of the founder can still be carried out. But we think that the respondents have made out no case for such a diversion of trust funds. One of the objects for which the trust was created was that a Swamivatsal feast to the members of the Ladva Shrimali Bania caste should be given every year on the occasion of the holy-festival of Pajusan. The Jains of Ladva Shrimali Shrivak Bania Community are the chief beneficiaries of this trust. Looking at their interest, it is certainly expedient, practicable, desirable and proper to give the feast. The giving and taking of the Swamivatsal feast on the occasion of the holy festival of Pajusan, if not a religious act, is a meritorious act prescribed by the scriptures of Swetambar Murti Pujak Jains. The wider public interest does not require that this special charity for a section of the Jain public should be subverted and overthrown. In the wider public interest also, it is expedient, practicable, desirable and proper to respect the sentiments and interests of this section of the Jain public and to give effect to this charity, and we find no reason for giving directions under the latter part of s. 56(1). We, therefore, propose to give directions under the first part of s. 56(1).

In this view of the matter, it is not necessary to decide whether the trust is a trust for religious purposes, and if so, whether, having regard to Ratilal Panachand's case its income or surplus balance spendable for the purposes of the trust can be diverted for other purposes, though the original object of the trust can still be carried out. The question whether or not objects mentioned in cl. (7) of the will are religious objects is not raised in the pleadings. No issues were framed and no evidence was led on this point by either party. What are religious purposes must be decided according to the tenets and religious beliefs of the Murti Pujak Swetambar sect of Jains, to which the testator belonged. It is difficult to decide the point in the absence of relevant pleadings, issues and evidence. The District Judge held that the Swamivatsal feast and many other objects are religious objects. The High Court too lightly brushed aside this finding. Chapter IX of the Report of the Hindu Religious Endowments Commission (1960-62) contains an interesting discussion of Jain endowments. Paragraphs 7 to 11 of Chap. IX of the Report refer to seven types of religious funds specifically recognised by the Jain scriptures concerning (1) Jeena Bimba, (2) Jeena Chaitya, (3) Gyan Fund, (4) Sadhu, (5) Sadhvi, (6) Shrivak and (7) Shravika. The Jains recognise numerous other endowments or funds for general or specific purposes, the corpus or interest of which is to be utilised as per the donor's intentions. The question whether the several objects of the trust including the giving of a Swamivatsal feast are religious in their character must be left open for future decision.

We must now consider what directions should be given under s. 56(1) on the present application. No case for applying the latter part of s. 56(1) and for refusing to give effect to the original objects of the trust has been made out. We should, therefore, give effect to the original intention of the founder as far as that intention can be carried out. If the method indicated by the founder cannot be carried out, the Court will substitute another method cy pres, that is to say, as nearly as possible to the method specified by the founder. The application of the cy pres principle is explained in Story's Equity Jurisprudence, 3rd edn., Art. 1176, at p. 494 thus:

"The doctrine of cy pres as applied to charities was formerly pushed to a most extravagant length. But this sensible distinction now prevails that the Court will not decree the execution of the trust of a charity in a manner different from that intended, except so far as it is seen that the intention cannot be literally executed. In that case another mode will be adopted, consistent with the general intention, so as to execute it, although not in mode, yet in substance. If the mode should become by subsequent circumstances impossible, the general object is not to be defeated, if it can in any other way be attained."

In the instant case, the overriding intention of the founder of the trust is that the sum of Rs. 75,000 set apart by him should be devoted to the objects mentioned in cl. (7) of the will, so that those objects may be continued and carried out for ever. His intention was that fixed sums should be expended annually for the 12 items of charity mentioned and reasonable sums should be expended annually in giving Swamivatsal feasts to members of his caste. The sum spendable annually for the feast was necessarily of a fluctuating character. In accordance with the directions given in cl. (15) of the will, the obligations of the trust for the charities mentioned in items 2, 4, 5 and 6 of cl. (7) of the will have been fully discharged by donating Rs. 8,000 out of the corpus of the trust. The expenses of the annual Swamivatsal feasts were met, and the payments to other charities were duly made out of the income of the balance funds every year up to Samvat 1999 corresponding to 1942-43 A.D., and the accumulations of the unexpended income up to that year represent a true surplus. In accordance with the intention of the founder of the trust, the surplus should be applied as nearly as possible to the original uses and purposes of the trust. In all the circumstances of the case, the surplus should be applied to increase the amounts spendable for the surviving objects of the trust. During the subsequent years up to Samvat year 2010 corresponding to 1953-54 A.D., the annual feasts could not be given due to rationing restrictions, but the expenses of the other charities were duly met. The savings of the income spendable during these years for the feasts should be applied suitably for carrying out the same object in future. The balance savings, if any, should be devoted towards increasing the amounts spendable for the other objects of the trust. The savings during Samvat year 2011 corresponding to 1954-55 A.D., were due to the fact that the annual feast was not given in spite of the absence of rationing restrictions. The savings for this year should be devoted towards the giving of the Swamivatsal feasts. The trustees cannot be allowed to defeat the objects of the trust by refusing to carry them out. It is said that the giving of a Swamivatsal feast on the scale given in the past would now cost about Rs. 3,000. But if the income at the disposal of the trustees will not permit the spending of such a large amount, there is no reason why the trustees would not spend a smaller amount and give the feast to a smaller number of guests. In view of the enormous rise in prices since the creation of the trust, an increase of the amounts spendable for the charities would be in accordance with general intention of the founder. This is an additional reason for applying the unexpended income for the original objects of the trust instead of diverting them for other purposes. It is desirable that instead of spending the accumulations, the same should be invested and its income should be applied towards the original objects. In the light of all these considerations, we propose to give the directions set out in our order.

The scheme framed by the Courts below is objectionable in several ways. In framing the scheme, the Courts below erroneously disregarded one of the main objects of the trust, viz., the giving of the annual Swamivatsal feast on the ground that it is not expedient, desirable, necessary or proper in the public interest to carry out this object. The scheme disregards the basic principle that the trust funds should be applied for effectuating the intention of the founder of the trust as far as possible. The direction for payment of one half of the accumulations to the Sad Vidya Mandal on the ground that its object is analogous to the object of the Jain Gyan Fund mentioned in item 8 of cl. 10 of the will is objectionable on the ground that the freeships are not restricted to the Jains and also on the ground that subject to giving the freeships the donee is entitled to spend the corpus for other purposes. Moreover, the purposes of the Sad Vidya Mandal and its freeships are not analogous to the purposes of the Jain Gyan Fund, which is a religious fund for imparting knowledge of Jain religion and Jain Shastras. The direction for payment of one half of the accumulated amount to the Sevashram Hospital is objectionable on the ground that medical treatment of the poor and deserving is not one of the objects specifically mentioned in cl. 7 of the will. Both these directions are also objectionable on the ground that they do not take into account the original objects of the trust. For all these reasons, the directions given by the Courts below must be set aside.

In the result the appeal is allowed, and the judgments and decrees passed by the Courts below are set aside. In lieu of the directions given by the Courts below, we give the following directions.

Out of the accumulations of the unexpended income up to October 25, 1956, amounting to Rs. 45,091-14-0 the trustees will set apart a reasonable sum not exceeding Rs. 5,000 as a working fund to meet current expenses. The trustees will invest the balance amount in such manner as they think fit in accordance with s. 35 of the Bombay Public Trusts Act, 1950. The trustees will spend and utilise every year one-half of the annual income from these investments for the charities mentioned in items 1, 3, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12 of cl. 7 of the will of Jhaverchand Dahyabhai Shah dated August 6, 1915 in such proportion and in such manner as the trustees think fit and proper. The trustees will spend and utilise every year the balance one-half of the annual income of those investments for the annual Swamivatsal feast (caste-dinner) mentioned in cl. 7 of the aforesaid will. The disbursements to be made under these directions will be in addition to the payments to be made by the trustees out of the income of the investments of the original corpus of the trust funds. Out of the net income of the investments of the original corpus, the trustees will continue to make the annual payments to the charities mentioned in items 1, 3, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12 of cl. 7 of the aforesaid will and will spend the balance income for giving the annual Swamivatsal feasts. The trustees shall give the Swamivatsal feast every year as far as possible. If for some reason the feast cannot be given in any year, the amount spendable for this object in that year should be spent for giving the feast in the following years.

In the circumstances of the case, we direct that the parties will pay and bear their own costs throughout in this Court as also in the Courts below, except that the trustees will pay the sum of Rs. 64-8-0 to the Charity Commissioner and the sum of Rs. 42-10-0 to opponents Nos. 6 to 13 to the application, as originally directed by the District Judge.

v.

SHIVABALAK GAURISHANKAR DUBE.*

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 65(1), 83—Enquiry to be made under s. 65(1) whether should be made only by delegate of State Government himself.

Section 65(1) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, requires that the State Government and, therefore, its delegate may after making such enquiry as it thinks fit, declare that the management of the land shall be resumed. In what form the enquiry should be held is a matter left entirely in the discretion of the State Government or its delegate. Therefore, where the Dy. Collector is the delegate of the State Government, s. 65(1) of the Act does not require that the Dy. Collector must himself go to the agricultural fields and enquire on the spot whether they are lying fallow. He may, if he so desires, record evidence himself, or the recording of the evidence and the actual inspection on the spot can be left to some subordinate officer.

GAJENDRAGADKAR C. J. What is the scope and effect of the provisions contained in s. 65 read with s. 83 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948 (No. LXVII of 1948) (hereinafter called the Act), that is the short question which arises for our decision in this appeal. The four respondents are the owners of certain agricultural lands in Deokhope in Taluka Palghar in Maharashtra. On June 23, 1951, a notice was served by the appellant, State of Bombay (now Maharashtra), inviting the attention of the respondents to the fact that the agricultural lands of which they were the owners had remained fallow since 1948-49, and intimating to them that the appellant State would resume management of the said lands under s. 65 of the Act unless the respondents took steps to bring them under cultivation in the following agricultural season. The respondents were told that in case they wanted to bring the said lands into cultivation, they should send intimation of their intention to do so within 15 days from the date of the receipt of the notice. It appears that later, an enquiry was made under the orders of the Dy. Collector as a result of which on December 30, 1951, he passed an order under s. 65 directing that the lands should be resumed by the Government for cultivation. Thereafter, representations were made by the respondents to the Dy. Collector as a result of which about 8 acres and 30 ghunthas of land were released on the ground that the owners had taken steps to cultivate that portion of the lands in pursuance of the direction given to them by the earlier notice. The order passed by the Dy. Collector in respect of other lands remained unaffected. Thereafter, respondent No. 1 approached the Collector by his application dated March 24, 1952. This application was, however, rejected. The respondents then moved the Revenue Department, but that effort also failed. That is why the present suit was filed by them on December 23, 1953 for a declaration that the order passed by the Dy. Collector on December 30, 1951 was illegal and void, and that it could not dispossess them of the lands which belonged to them. As a consequence of the declaration thus claimed by them, the respondents asked for a decree for possession and mesne profits against the appellant.

The appellant disputed the respondents' claim. It urged that the suit as framed was barred under s. 65(1) and s. 85 of the Act. On the merits, the appellant challenged the correctness of the allegations made by the respondents. It was averred by the appellant that the requisite enquiry had been duly and properly made and the impugned order was passed in accordance with the relevant provisions of the Act. According to the appellant, civil Court has no jurisdiction to consider the propriety or reasonableness of the conclusion reached by the Dy. Collector before he passed the impugned order.

The learned trial Judge who framed appropriate issues on these pleadings, in the main upheld the contentions raised by the appellant. In his opinion, the present suit was barred by ss. 65(1) and 85 of the Act. He also held that the declaration made by the Dy. Collector was not null and void. The plea raised by the respondents against the validity of the statutory provisions contained in ss. 65 and 66 of the Act was rejected by him, because he thought that the said sections did not contravene the provisions of arts. 19 and 31 of the Constitution. The learned Judge also found that the grievance made by the respondents against the propriety or reasonableness of the enquiry made prior to the passing of the impugned order was not justified. In the result, the respondents' suit was dismissed.

The respondents then carried the matter before the High Court by an appeal, and on their behalf three contentions were raised before the High Court. It was first argued that the lands in respect of which the impugned declaration was made were not lands as defined by the Act, and so, the relevant provisions of the Act were inapplicable. It was then urged that before the Government could exercise its powers under s. 65 of the Act, a duty was cast on it to be satisfied that the lands had remained uncultivated for a period of two years before their management was assumed; and this condition had not been satisfied, because delegation by the State Government to subordinate officers of its duty to satisfy itself, or its power to make the declaration, was not justified in law. It was also contended that since the satisfaction had to be by the authority who was competent to make the declaration, he could not delegate any part of his function and duty in that behalf and the said authority had to hold the enquiry himself.

The High Court has upheld the second of these contentions. It has found that on a fair and reasonable construction of s. 65(I) read with s. 83, the appellant could delegate its powers prescribed by s. 65(I), but could not delegate its duty incidental to the exercise of the said power. That is why the decree passed by the trial Court has been reversed on this ground and the respondents' suit has been decreed. Consistently with this decision, an appropriate order has been passed in regard to the delivery of possession and the payment of mesne profits as claimed by the respondents. It is against this decree that the appellant has come to this Court by special leave; and the only point which is raised on its behalf by Mr. Patwardhan is that the view taken by the High Court in regard to the scope and effect of the provisions contained in s. 65(I) read with s. 83 is not well-founded.

Section 65(I) reads thus:—

"If it appears to the State Government that for any two consecutive years, any land has remained uncultivated or the full and efficient use of the land has not been made for the purpose of agriculture, through the default of the holder or any other cause whatsoever not beyond his control the State Government may, after making such enquiry as it thinks fit, declare that the management of such land shall be assumed. The declaration so made shall be conclusive."

Along with this section, it is necessary to refer to s. 83 which reads thus:—

"The State Government may, subject to such restrictions and conditions as it may impose, by notification in the Official Gazette, delegate to any of its officers not below the rank of an Assistant or Deputy Collector, all or any of the powers conferred on it by this Act."

The High Court appears to have taken the view that though it was competent to the State Government to delegate its powers under s. 65(I), it could not delegate its duty or obligation to make an enquiry as a result of which the declaration in question can be made. The State Government, says the High Court, can exercise its authority to make a declaration and this authority or power can be delegated under s. 83; but before such authority or power can be exercised, there is an obligation imposed on the State Government to make an enquiry as to whether the agricultural land in question has remained uncultivated or fallow for the period prescribed by the statute, and the obligation or duty to hold such an enquiry which is distinct and separate from the power or authority to make a declaration consequent upon the enquiry, cannot be delegated under s. 83. It is common ground that the enquiry was not made by the State Government, and if the view taken by the High Court is right that the obligation or duty to hold the enquiry cannot be delegated, then the impugned declaration would be open to attack, because it had not been preceded by a proper enquiry. Mr. Patwardhan contends that the view taken by the High Court is plainly erroneous and we are satisfied that this contention is well-founded.

Section 83 in terms authorises delegation by the State Government to any of its officers of the specified status and the delegation can be in respect of all or any of the powers conferred on the State Government by the provisions of the Act. Now, it seems to us that the authority to delegate all or any of the powers which is expressly conferred on the State Government by s. 83 would be rendered almost meaningless if the duty to hold an enquiry as a condition precedent for the exercise of the said authority cannot be delegated. In the context, the power which can be delegated is inseparable from the enquiry which must precede the exercise of the power, and so, in order to make s. 83 effective it is necessary to hold that the delegation of the power authorised by the said section must necessarily involve the delegation of the discharge of obligations or functions which are necessary for the exercise of the said power.

If the view taken by the High Court is right it would mean that whereas the State Government can authorise any of the officers belonging to the specified class to exercise its powers under s. 65(1), it must hold the preliminary enquiry itself without delegating the authority to hold such an enquiry to any officer. It is hardly necessary to emphasise that this position is so plainly illogical that it would be unreasonable to recognise the validity of the authority to confer powers while insisting that the conditions precedent for the exercise of the powers are of such a separate and distinct character that in order to satisfy the said conditions, the required enquiry must be held not by any delegate of the State Government but by the State Government itself. In coming to the conclusion that the duty, as distinct from the power, cannot be delegated, the High Court was apparently influenced by the fact that there would be no appeal against the enquiry and the conclusion reached at such an enquiry. We do not propose to express any opinion on this part of the reasoning adopted by the High Court; that will depend upon the construction of s. 86 of the Act. But whatever may be the position in respect of the competence of an appeal, we are satisfied that on a fair and reasonable construction of s. 83 it must be held to authorise the delegation not only of the powers mentioned by it, but also of duties or functions which are incidental to the exercise of the powers and are integrally connected with them.

In this connection, we may usefully refer to the decision of the Privy Council in Mungoni v. Attorney-General of Northern Rhodesia.¹ In that case, in dealing with a similar question under regulation 16(1) of the Emergency powers Regulations, 1956, of Northern Rhodesia, made by the Acting Governor of Northern Rhodesia under his statutory powers, the Privy Council has held that the power and the duty under reg. 16(1) were so interwoven that it was not possible to split the one from the other so as to put the duty on one person and the power in another; the regulation contained not so much a duty, but rather a power coupled with a duty, and he who exercised the power had to carry out the duty. In the result, the Privy Council took the view that in delegating his functions under reg. 16(1) the Governor could delegate both the power and duty together to one and the same person—he could not delegate the power to another and keep the duty to himself. It is not difficult to realise what anomalous consequences would follow if it is held that the power can be delegated, but not the duty to hold the incidental enquiry which alone can lead to the exercise of the power. In substance, the view taken by the High Court would make the authority to delegate the power wholly meaningless. In fairness, we ought to add that Mr. Pathak who appeared for the respondents did not seek to support this part of the High Court's decision.

It appears that as a result of the decision of the High Court in the present case, the Maharashtra Legislature thought it prudent to make the necessary amendment in s. 83 of the Act. Section 29(a) of the Amending Act provides that for the words "powers conferred" the words "powers conferred or duties imposed" shall be and shall be deemed to have been, substituted on October 31, 1949; and accordingly, the delegation or the purported delegation by the State Government under s. 83 of any duty imposed shall (notwithstanding the judgment, decree or order of any Court) be deemed always to have been valid, and the discharge of any such duty by any officer shall for all purposes be valid and effective and shall not be called in question in any Court on the ground only that the State Government had no power to delegate the duty; and clause (b) provides that to the marginal note the words "and duties" shall be added. It is not surprising that in view of the serious consequences which would have inevitably followed if the judgment under appeal had remained unchanged, the Legislature thought it necessary to make a suitable amendment in order to avoid any interruption in the peaceful and smooth working of the relevant provisions of the Act.

Realising the infirmity in the view taken by the High Court, Mr. Pathak attempted to support the decision of the High Court on another ground. He argued that since the enquiry was made by the Talathi and the Mamlatdar under s. 65 and not by the Dy. Collector, the declaration made by the Dy. Collector was invalid. In other words, the argument is that the State Government may have validly delegated its powers under s. 65(1) to the Dy. Collector, but the Dy. Collector who is a delegate of the State Government cannot, in turn, delegate a part of his power or authority to a subordinate of his own, and that is what he has done in the present case. This argument proceeds on the basis that in exercising his powers under s. 65(1), the Dy. Collector must himself hold the enquiry and cannot delegate the function of holding such an enquiry to any other subordinate revenue officer. There is no doubt that a delegate who has received the authority from the principal cannot, in turn, delegate his own authority to a delegate of his own, but there is hardly any question of delegation by a delegate in the present case. All that s. 65(1) requires is that the State Government and therefore its delegate may after making such enquiry as it thinks fit, declare that the management of the land shall be resumed. In other words, in what form the enquiry should be held is a matter left entirely in the discretion of the State Government or its delegate. All that the Dy. Collector has done in the present case is to direct his subordinate officers to collect material relevant to the purpose of the enquiry. The Talathi went on the spot and ascertained as to whether the respondents' lands were lying fallow for the requisite period. He submitted his report to the Mamlatdar. The Mamlatdar in turn made his report to the Dy. Collector. In other words, all that the Dy. Collector has done is to collect the relevant material, so that he can enquire into the question as to whether the lands are lying fallow or not. This procedure does not, in our opinion, involve the question of any delegation at all. The form of the enquiry and its mode are entirely in the discretion of the Dy. Collector. Section 65(1) does not require that the Dy. Collector must himself go to the agricultural fields and enquire on the spot whether they are lying fallow. He may, if he so desires, record evidence himself, or the recording of the evidence and the actual inspection on the spot can be left to some subordinate officer. The report of such local inspection and the record of the evidence collected in that behalf would be forwarded to the Dy. Collector, and that would be the material on which he would hold the enquiry himself. The enquiry is thus held by the Dy. Collector, though the mechanical work of collecting material has been entrusted to a subordinate revenue officer. In such a case, we do not see how the principle that a delegate cannot delegate comes into operation.

In support of his argument, Mr. Pathak has relied on a decision of the King's Bench Division in Allingham v. Min. of Agriculture.² In that case, the Court held that on the principle of delegatus non potest delegare, the Committee exercising its powers under reg. 62(1) could not delegate its powers to determine the land to be cultivated to its officers and, therefore, the notice issued in that behalf was ineffective and non-compliance with it was not an offence. It, however, appears that the War Agricultural Committee for the County did appoint the Biggleswade District Committee as a sub-committee to act under the instructions of the executive committee and to make recommendations to the executive committee. Apparently, they made some recommendations to the executive officer and the executive officer accordingly made the order. On these facts, Lord Goddard, C. J., observed that he could find nothing in the regulations or the statute which enabled the executive officer to make the order. The appellants had contended before the Court that they were entitled to have the decision of the executive committee and no one else on the matter, and this contention was upheld on the facts of that case. We do not see how this case can assist Mr. Pathak's argument in the appeal before us, because there has been no delegation to hold an enquiry as such. What the Dy. Collector has done in the present proceedings is not to delegate his authority to hold an enquiry, but to get the material necessary for the enquiry collected by his subordinate officers. After the material was thus collected, he examined the material himself, held the enquiry and came to the conclusion that the lands had remained fallow and uncultivated for the requisite period. We are, therefore, satisfied that the English decision on which Mr. Pathak relies does not assist him in the present case.

This contention appears to have been raised before the High Court and has been rejected by it and, we think, rightly. In fact, in *Nathubhai Gandabhai v. State*³ a similar contention was raised before the High Court and had been rejected by it. In that case, the High Court has held that inasmuch as the Legislature has left it entirely to the discretion of the State Government or the delegated authority to hold such enquiry as it thinks proper, if an enquiry is held the Court cannot consider as to whether the enquiry was a proper one or whether a better enquiry would not have yielded better results. This view has been consistently followed in the Bombay High Court and we see no reason to doubt its correctness.

In the result, the appeal succeeds, the decree passed by the High Court is set aside and that of the trial Court restored. There would be no order as to costs throughout.

Appeal allowed.

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of 1860) Secs. 405, 403—“Entrustment of dominion” over property, what constitutes under s. 405—Whether mere existence of dominion over property enough—Partner whether can be convicted under s. 406 for failure to account for monies belonging to his firm—Whether partner criminally liable under s. 403 for using partnership money for his own purposes.

Under s. 405 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, in order to establish “entrustment of dominion” over property to an accused person the mere existence of that person's dominion over property is not enough. It must be further shown that his dominion was the result of entrustment.

Therefore, in a prosecution against a partner for an offence under s. 406 of the Code on the ground that his failure to account for monies belonging to the firm in which he is a partner amounts to criminal breach of trust, the prosecution must establish that dominion over the assets or a particular asset of the partnership was, by a special agreement between the parties, entrusted to the accused partner. If in the absence of such a special agreement a partner receives money belonging to the MUDHOLKAR J. In this appeal from the judgment of the Bombay High Court the question which falls to be considered is whether a partner can be convicted under s. 406, Indian Penal Code, on the ground that his failure to account for monies belonging to the firm in which he was a partner amounts to criminal breach of trust.

The admitted facts are briefly these:

The firm, Messrs. Bharat Silp Pramandal, which was formed for carrying on the business of building construction, originally consisted of eight partners and the appellant was its working partner. This firm was constituted in the year 1954. But on February 6, 1957, three of the partners retired and the business was continued by the remaining five partners. Disputes arose amongst them, which were referred to arbitration of Mr. J. T. Desai, a Solicitor. Apparently, in pursuance of his award a fresh agreement (exh. N) was entered into by the partners on June 4, 1958. By virtue of this agreement the appellant's share in the firm's business was to be of 50 nP. in a rupee while the other partners had different shares in the remaining 50 nP. Nagindas Jivraj Mehta, who is the complainant in this case had a share to the extent of 6 nP. Under this agreement the parties decided not to undertake new work. The agreement required the appellant to complete all the accounts and prohibited from borrowing money in the name of the firm. It required him to "to use his best efforts to realise all pending bills, security deposits, claims etc." as well as to dispose of the plant, machinery etc. The agreement also provided that partners, other than the appellant, would procure, if the need arose, further finance to the maximum limit of Rs. 25,000 but that if a sum in excess of this amount was required, that excess was to be brought in by all the partners including the appellant "individually pro rata in proportion to their shares of profits and losses in the firm". Clause 8 of this agreement permitted the appellant to withdraw on his own account a sum of Rs. 10,000 "no sooner he is able to realise any of the pending claims of bills of the firm or security deposits". We have dealt with this agreement at some length because it will be relevant to consider these matters in the context of the argument of Mr. Rana to the effect that the appellant as working partner was entitled to utilise the realizations made by him for carrying on the work of the firm.

According to the complainant the appellant committed misappropriation to the tune of Rs. 8,905 consisting of the following six items:

Rs.
3,000

The trial Court acquitted the appellant with respect to the last two items but convicted him in respect of the first four items.

The appellant admits that he realised these four items but he says that he did so in his capacity as partner and he utilised them for the business of the partnership. Therefore, according to him, he is only liable to render accounts to his partners and cannot in any circumstances be said to be guilty of an offence under s. 406, Indian Penal Code. He also points out that the complainant has instituted a suit for the dissolution of the partnership and for rendition of accounts and that he instituted the present complaint solely with the idea of making it difficult, if not impossible, for the appellant to defend the civil suit properly.

On behalf of the appellant it is contended that even if the prosecution had succeeded in showing that the four items referred to above were realised by the appellant and that he has not accounted for them properly he will not be liable for criminal breach of trust under s. 406, Indian Penal Code but that his liability would be only of a civil nature. In support of this contention reliance is placed upon Bhuban Mohan Rana v. Surendra Mohan Das.¹ There the following question was referred for decision by the Full Bench:

"Can a charge under s. 406 of the Indian Penal Code be framed against a person, who, according to the complainant, is a partner with him and is accused of the offence in respect of property belonging to both of them as partners?"

All the five Judges constituting the Full Bench answered the question in the negative. In the leading judgment which was delivered by Harris C. J., he pointed out that before criminal breach of trust is established it must be shown that the person charged has been entrusted with property or with dominion over property and that a partner does not, in the ordinary course, hold property in a fiduciary capacity. The learned Chief Justice further pointed out that there is really no distinct or defined share of a partner in any item belonging to the partnership. Upon the dissolution of the partnership and after an account is taken it may turn out that a partner who retains an asset is entitled to the whole of the asset and may be, much more. He referred to the English view that a partner does not hold money belonging to the partnership in a fiduciary capacity and said that this view appeared to him to be correct. Referring to the decision in *The Queen v. Okhoy Coomar Shaw*² in which a Full Bench had held that a partner who dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use any of the partnership property with which he is entrusted or over which he has dominion, is guilty of an offence under s. 405, Indian Penal Code, Harris, C. J. observed (p. 32):

"The Full Bench never seems to have considered that there is really no partner's share in the property until an account (sic) and it may well be that a partner, who retains an asset, is entitled not only to his share according to the partnership agreement in that asset, but, on taking an account, it may be found that he is entitled to the whole of the asset and considerably more. In such a case, how can it be said that he has been guilty of a breach of trust and has acted dishonestly towards his co-partners, if an account would show that he was entitled to everything which he had retained?"

He has referred to a number of decisions of the Indian High Courts in some of which the view taken in Okhoy Coomar Shaw's case was followed. One of those cases was *Jagannath v. Emperor*³ where it was held that a partner may be prosecuted under s. 406, Indian Penal Code for failure to account for partnership monies and assets. In that case the partner who was the accused was given authority by the other partners to collect monies or property and according to the Bombay High Court in these circumstances he was "entrusted" with dominion over collections made by him. The learned Judges who decided that case had, however, pointed out that the Court should approach cases of this kind very carefully because it was impossible to say in many cases what the share of the accused might be, whether the accused was indebted to the firm or whether the firm was indebted to him. The High Court also pointed out that if the firm was indebted to him there might be no dishonest intention in his dealing with the partnership property. In the arguments before us, apart from these three decisions, our attention was called to a few more decisions of the High Courts in India. But whether they take one view or the other they do not seem to add to what has been said in these three decisions. We, therefore, do not feel called upon to make any reference to these decisions.

It seems to us that the view taken in Bhuban Mohan Rana's case by the later Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court is the right one. Upon the plain reading of s. 405, Indian Penal Code, it is obvious that before a person can be said to have committed criminal breach of trust it must be established that he was either entrusted with or entrusted with dominion over property which he is said to have converted to his own use or disposed of in violation of any direction of law etc. Every partner has dominion over property by reason of the fact that he is a partner. This is a kind of dominion which every owner of property has over his property. But it is not dominion of this kind which satisfies the requirements of s. 405. In order to establish "entrustment of dominion" over property to an accused person the mere existence of that person's dominion over property is not enough. It must be further shown that his dominion was the result of entrustment. Therefore, as rightly pointed out by Harris C. J., the prosecution must establish that dominion over the assets or a particular asset of the partnership was, by a special agreement between the parties, entrusted to the accused person. If in the absence of such a special agreement a partner receives money belonging to the partnership he cannot be said to have received it in a fiduciary capacity or, in other words, cannot be held to have been "entrusted" with dominion over partnership properties.

Mr. Chatterjee who appears for the respondent sought to show that there was special agreement in this case. According to him, by virtue of certain decisions taken at a meeting of the partners held on January 7, 1959, the appellant had been entrusted with the duty of making recoveries of monies from the debtors of the firm and, therefore, this was a case of specific entrustment. All that he could point out was item No. 15 in the minutes of that meeting which runs thus:

"Shri Veljibhai agrees to recover the monies due by Shri Kablasingh immediately and shall deposit the same with the Bankers of the firm."

He has, however, not been able to explain the next item in the minutes, the relevant portion of which runs thus:

"(16) If in future any further moneys are required to be spent the same shall be spent out of the recoveries of the firm and no partner shall be bound or responsible to bring in any further moneys...."

Reading the two together the meaning seems to be only this that as working partner the appellant should carry on the work of recovery of the dues of the partnership and that in respect of the dues from one Kablasingh it was decided that they should be deposited in the bank. It does not follow from this that any of the other partners was precluded from making the recoveries. Further, even if this is said to be a mandate to the appellant item 16 authorises him to spend the money for the business of the partnership. That is to say, if the money was required for the business of the partnership it was not obligatory upon the appellant to deposit it in the bank. In our opinion, therefore, the appellant cannot be said to have been guilty of criminal breach of trust even with respect to the dues realised by him from Kablasingh and in not depositing them in the bank as alleged by the prosecution.

Mr. Chatterjee finally contends that the act of the appellant will at least amount to dishonest misappropriation of property even though it may not amount to criminal breach of trust and, therefore, his conviction could be altered from one under s. 406 to that under s. 403. Section 403 runs thus:

"Whoever dishonestly misappropriates or converts to his own use any movable property, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both."

It is obvious that an owner of property, in whichever way he uses his property and with whatever intention will not be liable for misappropriation and that would be so even if he is not the exclusive owner thereof. As already stated, a partner has, undefined ownership along with the other partners over all the assets of the partnership. If he chooses to use any of them for his own purposes he may be accountable civilly to the other partners. But he does not thereby commit any misappropriation. Mr. Chatterjee's alternative contention must be rejected.

In the result we allow the appeal and set aside the conviction and sentence passed against him.

Appeal allowed.

WANCHOO J. This appeal by special leave against the judgment of the Bombay High Court raises questions regarding the interpretation of s. 304-A and s. 285 of the Indian Penal Code. The facts are not now in dispute and may be briefly set out as found by the Courts below. The appellant along with three partners is the owner of a factory styled as Carbon Dry Colour Works which manufactures paints and varnish. The factory was licensed by the Bombay Municipality in the year 1953 to manufacture paints involving a cold process and was located at 79/81 Jail Road, Dongri. The factory was also licensed to store 455 litres of turpentine, 455 litres of varnish and 14000 gallons of paint. The licence was issued subject to certain conditions to which we shall refer later. The appellant is the manager and working partner. He converted the factory from the cold process of manufacturing dry paints to a process of manufacturing wet paints by heating. For that purpose four burners were used for the purpose of melting rosin or bitumen by heating them in barrels over the burners and adding turpentine thereto after the temperature cooled down to a certain degree. On April 20, 1962, this process was going on in the factory which had no licence for manufacturing wet paints through heating. Hatim Tasduq was the person looking after the operation. According to him the rosin was melted on one burner and lime was added and the whole thing was boiled for half an hour. Thereafter the burner was extinguished and the barrel in which the rosin was melted was allowed to cool. This began at about 4 p.m. The barrel in which the rosin is melted is about 4½ feet high and after the temperature comes down to a certain level turpentine is added in the barrel to prepare Black Japan. Hatim Tasduq takes a drum of 5 gallons of turpentine which is poured into the barrel. As turpentine is poured, the mixture begins frothing and in order to keep down the froth the whole thing is stirred all the time. One man helps Hatim Tasduq in this operation. On April 20, 1962, rosin was melted and the barrel was allowed to cool from 4 p.m. At about 5 p.m. Hatim started pouring turpentine into the barrel. It may be mentioned that 5 p.m. is the closing time and the process of pouring turpentine started just about that. As soon as Hatim started pouring turpentine the mixture began to froth. Hatim was unable to stir as according to him his assistant had gone some distance and he could not give the drum of turpentine to him so that he might stir the mixture. The result was that froth overflowed out of the barrel and because of heat, varnish and turpentine, which were stored at a short distance, caught fire. Seven men were working in a loft which is reached by a ladder and where manufactured paint is stored. The material in the premises being of combustible nature, the fire spread rapidly. Those who were working on the ground-floor managed to get out with burns only but those who were working in the loft could not get out in time with the result that all seven of them were burnt to death. The fire-brigade was sent for, but in view of the combustible nature of the material stored, it took 2½ hours to bring the fire under control. After the fire was controlled, bodies of four workmen were recovered the same night. Next morning two more bodies were recovered and in the afternoon one more body was found. Thus seven of the workmen lost their lives while seven other workmen suffered burns and were sent to hospital where they were treated as indoor patients. It may be mentioned that the appellant was not present on the premises when the fire took place, though he came there as soon as the information about it reached him.

These facts have been found by Courts below to be proved. Originally the other three partners were also prosecuted but the Magistrate acquitted them as the appellant was the managing partner and was directly in charge of work in the factory. On these facts the appellant was convicted under s. 304-A and s. 285 of the Indian Penal Code and it is the correctness of that conviction which is being assailed in the present appeal. The appellant appealed to the High Court but his appeal was summarily dismissed. His application for leave to appeal to this Court having been refused, he came to this Court and was granted special leave.

We shall first take up s. 304-A which runs thus:—

“Whoever causes the death of any person by doing any rash or negligent act not amounting to culpable homicide shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both.”

The main contention of the appellant is that he was not present when the fire broke out resulting in the death of seven workmen by burning and it cannot, therefore, be said that he caused the death of these seven persons by doing any rash or negligent act. The view taken by the Magistrate on the other hand which appears to have been accepted by the High Court was that as the appellant allowed the manufacture of wet paints in the same room where varnish and turpentine were stored and the fire resulted because of the proximity of the burners to the stored varnish and turpentine, he must be held responsible for the death of the seven workmen who were burnt in the fire. We are however of opinion that this view of the Magistrate is not correct. The mere fact that the appellant allowed the burners to be used in the same room in which varnish and turpentine were stored, even though it might be a negligent act, would not be enough to make the appellant responsible for the fire which broke out. The cause of the fire was not merely the presence of burners in the room in which varnish and turpentine were stored, though this circumstance was indirectly responsible for the fire which broke out. But what s. 304-A requires is causing of death by doing any rash or negligent act, and this means that death must be the direct or proximate result of the rash or negligent act. It appears that the direct or proximate cause of the fire which resulted in seven deaths was the act of Hatim. It seems to us clear that Hatim was apparently in a hurry and, therefore, he did not perhaps allow the rosin to cool down sufficiently and poured turpentine too quickly. The evidence of the expert is that the process of adding turpentine to melted rosin is a hazardous process and the proportion of froth would depend upon the quantity of turpentine added. The expert also stated that if turpentine is not slowly added to bitumen and rosin before it is cooled down to a certain temperature, such fire is likely to break out. It seems, therefore, that as turpentine was being added at about closing time, Hatim was not as careful as he should have been and probably did not wait sufficiently for bitumen or rosin to cool down and added turpentine too quickly. The expert has stated that bitumen or rosin melts at 300 degree F and if turpentine is added at that temperature, it will catch fire. The flash point of turpentine varies from 76 to 110 degree F. Therefore, the cooling must be brought down, according to the expert, to below 76 degree F to avoid fire. In any case even if that is not done, turpentine has to be added slowly so that there may not be too much frothing. Clearly, therefore, the fire broke out because bitumen or rosin was not allowed to cool down sufficiently and turpentine was added too quickly in view of the fact that the process was performed at closing time. It is clearly the negligence of Hatim which was the direct or proximate cause of the fire breaking out, though the fact that burners were kept in the same room in which turpentine and varnish were stored, was indirectly responsible for the fire breaking out and spreading so quickly. Even so in order that a person may be guilty under s. 304-A, the rash or negligent act should be the direct or proximate cause of the death. In the present case it was Hatim's act which was the direct and proximate cause of the fire breaking out with the consequence that seven persons were burnt to death; the act of the appellant in allowing turpentine and varnish being stored at a short distance was only an indirect factor in the breaking out of fire.

We may in this connection refer to *Emperor v. Omkar*¹ where Sir Lawrence Jenkins had to interpret s. 304-A and observed as follows:—

“To impose criminal liability under s. 304-A, Indian Penal Code, it is necessary that the death should have been the direct result of a rash and negligent act of the accused, and that act must be the proximate and efficient cause without the intervention of another's negligence. It must be the causa causans; it is not enough that it may have been the causa sine qua non.”

This view has been generally followed by High Courts in India and is in our opinion the right view to take of the meaning of s. 304-A. It is not necessary to refer to other decisions, for as we have already said this view has been generally accepted. Therefore the mere fact that the fire would not have taken place if the appellant had not allowed burners to be put in the same room in which turpentine and varnish were stored, would not be enough to make him liable under s. 304-A, for the fire would not have taken place, with the result that seven persons were burnt to death, without the negligence of Hatim. The death in this case was, therefore, in our opinion not directly the result of a rash or negligent act on the part of the appellant and was not the proximate and efficient cause without the intervention of another's negligence. The appellant must, therefore, be acquitted of the offence under s. 304-A.

This brings us to s. 285 which runs as follows:—

“Whoever does, with fire or any combustible matter, any act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life, or to be likely to cause hurt or injury to any other person, or knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any fire or any combustible matter in his possession as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from such fire or combustible matter, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to six months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both." We are in the present case concerned with the second part of s. 285 which runs thus:

"Whoever knowingly or negligently omits to take such order with any fire or any combustible matter in his possession as is sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life from such fire or combustible matter, shall be punished...."

The question is whether the appellant on the facts which have been proved knowingly or negligently omitted to take such order with fire or combustible matter in his possession as was sufficient to guard against probable danger to human life from such fire or combustible matter. In this connection we may refer to the fact that the appellant did not have a licence for manufacturing wet paints and, therefore, when he allowed wet paints to be manufactured in the circumstances which have been proved, he must be held to have knowingly acted in a manner in which he should not have done. There is a map on the record which shows that four burners were in one corner while turpentine and varnish were in another corner of the same room, and the distance between the burners and the stores was about 8 or 10 feet. The licence for storage given to the appellant contained general and special conditions. One of the general conditions was that "the licensee shall not use or permit to be used any portion of the licensed premises for dwelling or cooking purposes and no fire shall be lighted therein other than what is authorised." The articles stored being combustible, this general condition was imposed on the appellant and he had no business to light any fire in the room where stores were kept unless he was authorised to do so. There is no proof that he was authorised to light any fire in that room; and therefore he acted in breach of the general condition of the licence which forbade him from lighting any fire in the room where varnish and turpentine were stored. We take it that when the general condition says that no fire would be lighted except what is authorised, the intention must have been that the municipal committee will take necessary steps to see that the fire would be sufficiently guarded, if lighted in the same room, so that there may not be any outbreak of fire. The appellant clearly acted against this general condition of the licence and must be held to have knowingly, or at any rate negligently, omitted to take such order with any fire or any combustible matter in his possession as was required. Further the special conditions for keeping turpentine and varnish and paints require that "no smoking, light or fire in any form shall be permitted at any time" in the room in which paints, turpentine and varnish are kept or even in any premises licensed for storage unless in the case of a light, such light be duly protected and on no account be naked. The appellant clearly committed breach of this special condition also in allowing the lighting of four burners in the same room without taking any precaution for duly protecting the fire and even allowed it to be naked. It must, therefore, be held that the appellant negligently or knowingly omitted to take proper order with the fire or combustible matter in his possession. The contention on behalf of the appellant however is that even if he may have negligently or knowingly omitted to take proper order with the fire or combustible matter in his possession it cannot be said that his omission to take proper order was such as was insufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life. What is urged is that his not taking precautions may result in possible danger to human life but it cannot be said that this omission was such as would result in probable danger to human life. In particular it is urged that this method of work had been going on for some years and no fire had broken out and this shows that though there may have been possible danger to human life from such fire or combustible matter there was no probable danger. We are unable to accept this contention. The fact that there was no fire earlier in this room even though the process had been going on for some years is not a criterion for determining whether the omission was such as would result in probable danger to human life. We have already pointed out that four burners were in one corner of the room and the combustible matter was in another corner of the same room and there was only a distance of 8 or 10 feet between the two. The burners were lighted against the general as well as the special conditions of the licence for storage granted to the appellant. The proximity of naked fire to the stores of turpentine and varnish is in our opinion always a matter of probable danger to human life, namely, the life of the persons working in the room. This was particularly so with respect to turpentine which has a low flash point i.e. 76 degree F to 110 degree F. The use of naked fire could in conceivable circumstances even raise the temperature of the room itself above the flash point of turpentine and if the turpentine ever happened to be exposed it might easily catch fire. There was in our opinion, therefore, always a probable danger to human life by the appellant negligently or knowingly omitting to take proper care in the matter of the four burners and turpentine and varnish. His action in allowing burners to be lighted in the room without any safeguard did in our opinion amount to omission to take such order with fire and combustible matter as would be sufficient to guard against probable danger to human life. We can only say that it was lucky that fire had not broken out earlier. But there can be no doubt that the omission of the appellant to take proper care with burners in particular when such combustible matter as turpentine in large quantity was stored at a distance of 8 to 10 feet from the burners was such omission as amounted to insufficient guard against probable danger to human life. Finally when we remember that all this was done in breach of the general and special conditions of the licence given to the appellant for storage of turpentine, varnish and paints, we have no doubt that the appellant knowingly, or at least negligently, failed to take such order with fire and the combustible matter as would be sufficient to guard against any probable danger to human life. In the circumstances we are of opinion that the appellant has been rightly convicted under s. 285 of the Indian Penal Code. Considering that seven lives have been lost on account of the negligence of the appellant in this connection, the sentence of six months' rigorous imprisonment which is the maximum provided under s. 285, cannot be said to be harsh.

We, therefore, partially allow the appeal and set aside the conviction and sentence of the appellant under s. 304-A of the Indian Penal Code. The appeal is dismissed so far as his conviction under s. 285 of the Indian Penal Code is concerned. The appellant will surrender to his bail to serve the remaining sentence under s. 285 of the Indian Penal Code.

Appeal partly allowed.

MISS ANINHA D'COSTA v. MRS. PARVATIBAI M. THAKUR.*

Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), Sec. 105—Indian Easements Act (V of 1882), Secs. 52, 56, 60—Bombay Court-fees Act (Bom. XXXVI of 1959), Secs. 8, 10—Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947)—Landlord engaging broker and inserting newspaper advertisement offering premises on leave and licence basis—Agreement between landlord and person given exclusive possession of premises—Agreement stating that licensee to use and occupy premises for eleven months renewable at licensee's option and to pay monthly compensation—Agreement also stating that licence would stand revoked on failure by licensee to observe its terms and licensee not to allow any other person use and occupation of premises—Whether such agreement created relationship of landlord and tenant between parties—Construction of document—Whether Court can refuse to give effect to term of document on ground that it is placed at one place and not at other—Sections 8 and 10 of Bombay Court-fees Act whether lay down any special procedure for inquiry.

The plaintiff who owned a flat in Bombay employed the services of a broker for the purpose of giving the premises on the basis of leave and licence. The broker inserted an advertisement in a newspaper that a licence was intended to be granted in respect of the premises. The defendant approached the broker in pursuance of the advertisement and paid a certain amount to the latter by way of deposit and also a substantial sum by way of brokerage. Subsequently an agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant whereby the plaintiff "agreed to grant leave and licence to use and occupy the flat, furniture and fittings for eleven months renewable at the option of the Licensee every eleven months... on the following terms... 1. that the Licensee shall pay monthly compensation for use and occupation; 2. that the premises shall be used for residence and business... 5. that if the Licensee fails to observe the terms of the agreement or if she commits nuisance, the licence shall stand revoked and the Licensor shall have the right to eject the Licensee forcibly; 6. that the Licensee shall not allow any other person to use and occupy the premises... 7. that the Licensee shall not claim any right as a tenant...". The premises were given in the exclusive possession of the defendant. On the question whether the agreement between the parties created a relationship of landlord and tenant:

Held, that on the terms of the agreement and the circumstances of the case, the relationship between the parties was that of landlord and tenant.

Booker v. Palmer,¹ Errington v. Errington and Woods,² Addiscombe Garden Estates Ltd. v. Crabbe,³ *Associated Hotels of India Ltd. v. R. N. Kapoor*⁴ and Ramjibhai Virpal v. Gordhandas,⁵ referred to.

While construing a document, the Court has to consider the whole document and cannot refuse to give effect to a term of the document on the ground that it is placed at one place and not at the other. Therefore, as long as the agreement between the parties is clear, the place where a term of the document is found cannot matter much.

Section 8 or s. 10 of the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, does not lay down any special procedure for the inquiry. Section 8 of the Act only gives discretion to the Court to hold "such inquiry as it deems proper" and s. 10 only confers powers of a Court upon the Court or the Commissioner holding the inquiry.

⁶ (1963) Letters Patent Appeal No. 13 of 1963, decided by Patel and S. M. Shah JJ., on April 3, 1963 (Unrep.).

ONE Mrs. Parvatibai M. Thakur (plaintiff) filed a suit against Miss Aninha D'Costa (defendant) for inter alia a mandatory injunction to remove herself and her belongings from the suit premises situate at Churchgate, Bombay, alleging that the premises which she had taken on ownership basis were given to the defendant on November 15, 1959, on leave and licence basis and that she had revoked the licence. The defendant inter alia contended that the agreement on which the premises were given to her was of tenancy and not of leave and licence and that as the relationship between the parties was one of landlord and tenant the City Civil Court in which the suit was filed had no jurisdiction to entertain and try the suit.

The trial Court held inter alia that the agreement between the parties created the relationship of leave and licence and not of tenancy and decreed the plaintiff's suit.

The defendant appealed to the High Court.

The appeal was heard by Naik J. who, after dealing with the question of the Court-fee to be paid in a suit for possession by a licensor against his licensee (reported at 66 Bombay Law Reporter 744) observed in his judgment, delivered on July 29, 1963, as follows:

NAIK J. That takes me to the only and the important question in this case viz. whether the agreement arrived at between the parties amounted to a tenancy or a mere leave and licence. Before setting out the important terms and conditions of the agreement of the leave and licence (exh. A), it would be necessary to outline a few facts on which there is no dispute today. The plaintiff had employed one Gulab as the broker for the purpose of giving the premises on the basis of leave and licence. She had handed over the possession of the premises to Gulab by giving him the key thereof. Gulab forwarded the advertisement to the Press on November 14, 1959, for being published in the issue of "The Times of India" dated November 15, 1959. Accordingly, the advertisement appeared in the "Times of India" dated November 15, 1959, which reads thus:

"Churchgate—Immediate possession, two rooms, kitchen, furniture, flat. Compensation Rs. 225. Contact Flat No. 2, Churchgate Mansion, 'A' Road, near Churchgate Station".

The address given in this advertisement is the address of the suit premises. There is no dispute that on November 15, 1959, the defendant approached broker Gulab. There is considerable divergence as to whether the defendant approached the plaintiff before approaching Gulab. I will deal with the rival versions on that point a little later. For the time being I am discussing the facts which are either admitted or proved beyond the pale of doubt. On November 15, 1959, the defendant paid a sum of Rs. 675 by way of deposit to the broker and also a sum of Rs. 350 by way of brokerage to Gulab and secured possession from him on the same day. The agreement was reduced to writing on November 15, but, it is an admitted fact that the signatures of the parties were taken on the 16th. The document also was attested on the 16th. -

I will now set out the principal terms of the agreement (exh. A). The agreement contains a lengthy preamble and it will be necessary to set out the important terms of this preamble as follows:

(1) The expression "licensee" shall include her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns.

(2) The licensor has agreed to grant the leave and licence to use and occupy the flat, furniture and also fittings for the period of eleven months renewable every eleven months at the option of the licensee.

(3) The agreement has been arrived at in view of the cordial relation between the said parties.

(4) The agreement does not confer upon the licensee any right or title whether as tenant or sub-tenant.

The only terms and conditions to which reference may be made are Nos. 2 and 6 of the agreement. Term No. 2 provides "that the licensee shall use and occupy the said furnished flat for residential purposes and business for her and her family". Term No. 6 provides "that the licensee shall not allow any other person to use and occupy the said furnished flat except for her business and the bona fide members of her family and shall not transfer or part with the possession of the said flat to any other person or persons". The rest of the terms are not material for the purpose of construing the document with a view to see whether the intention of the parties was to create an agreement of tenancy or an agreement of leave and licence.

The plaintiff, at para. (2) of the plaint, stated that the defendant on or about November 15, 1959, was permitted to use the suit premises as a licensee on terms and conditions incorporated in the agreement of leave and licence dated November 15, 1959. That means that the plaintiff has based her claim on the terms and conditions of the agreement at exh. A. The defendant contended that the suit premises were let out to her prior to the alleged agreement of leave and licence and that the agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant provisionally, but that the same was not to be acted upon.

At the trial, it was suggested on behalf of the plaintiff that the terms and conditions of the agreement (exh. A) were drawn up by the broker, who copied these provisions from some other document and that these terms would not afford the basis for arriving at the real intention of the parties. It is also suggested that the plaintiff herself knows very little English and, in fact, she did not apply her mind to the terms and conditions of the document. All that she told to the broker was that she wanted to give the premises on leave and licence basis for a stated compensation. This line has been adopted with a view to explain some of the clauses contained in the leave and licence agreement and particularly the clauses contained in the preamble. Mr. Patel contended that since the plaintiff has based her claim on the agreement (exh. A) it is not open to her to offer any explanation about the terms and conditions of the agreement. It is not open for the plaintiff to go behind the agreement. I am unable to accept this line of reasoning. The main question for me to decide is, what was the intention of the parties, and every piece of evidence, which affords a clue to the intention of the parties, would certainly be relevant.

Before discussing the evidence on the above question it will be necessary to refer to the legal position on the principles governing the interpretation of a document of the nature of leave and licence. These principles are fairly well established. But the difficulty is about the application of those principles to the facts of each case. The most authoritative pronouncement on this question is the judgment of the Supreme Court reported in Associated Hotels of India Ltd. v. R. N. Kapoor.¹ The preamble to the document in that case ran as follows:

"Whereas the Licensee approached the Licensor through their constituted Attorney to permit the Licensee to allow the use and occupation of space allotted in the Ladies and Gents Cloak Rooms, at the Hotel Imperial, New Delhi, for the consideration and on the terms and conditions as follows:"

The following were the terms and conditions:

"1. In pursuance of the said agreement, the Licensor hereby grants to the Licensee, Leave and License to use and occupy the said premises to carry on their business of Hair Dressers from 1st May, 1949 to 30th April, 1950.

2. ...

3. That in the first instance the Licensor shall allow to the Licensee leave and licence to use and occupy the said premises for a period of one year only.

4. That the licensee shall have the opportunity of further extension of the period of license after the expiry of one year at the option of the Licensor on the same terms and conditions...

5 to 7 ...

8. That in case the licensee for reasons beyond their control are forced to close their business in Delhi, the licensor agrees that during the remaining period the license shall be transferred to any person with the consent and approval of the licensor subject to charges so obtained not exceeding the monthly charge of Rs. 800".

On a construction of the terms set out above, the Supreme Court came to the conclusion that although the document was apparently in a language appropriate to a licence, the agreement between the parties, judged by its substance and real intentions, as it must be, left no manner of doubt that the document was a lease. In particular, their Lordships pointed out that the distinguishing features of this agreement were:

"(1) that it created an interest in the property in favour of the respondent, and,

(2) it gave him exclusive possession thereof, which, in the absence of any circumstances that negated it, must indicate a clear intention to grant a lease".

Subba Rao J. pointed out that the distinction between the two concepts viz., lease and leave and licence is clear though the dividing line becomes very thin and sometimes even blurred. Reference was made to the famous case of *Errington v. Errington*² wherein Lord Denning stated (vide p. 384):

"The result of all these cases is that, although a person who is let into exclusive possession is, prima facie, to be considered to be tenant, nevertheless he will not be held to be so if the circumstances negative any intention to create a tenancy".

Thereafter, Subba Rao J. laid down the following propositions which, he says, are fairly well established (p. 384):

"...(1) To ascertain whether a document creates a licence or lease, the substance of the document must be preferred to the form;

(2) the real test is the intention of the parties—whether they intended to create a lease or a licence;

(3) if the document creates an interest in the property, it is a lease; but, if it only permits another to make use of the property, of which the legal possession continues with the owner, it is a licence; and

(4) if under the document a party gets exclusive possession of the property, prima facie, he is considered to be a tenant; but circumstances may be established which negative the intention to create lease".

After laying down the above principles, Subba Rao J. proceeded to point out that the agreement puts the licensee in exclusive possession of the premises, untrammelled by the control and free from the directions of the appellants. His Lordship laid considerable emphasis upon the right of the respondent to transfer his interest, which, according to the learned Judge, was destructive of the theory of licence.

Applying the above test to the present case, let us try to find out which circumstances are favourable for the hypothesis that the agreement is an agreement of lease and what circumstances are favourable for the hypothesis that it is a leave and licence. Firstly, there was an advertisement in the newspaper, which mentioned that the premises were to be given along with furniture for a compensation of Rs. 225 p.m. It is the case for the plaintiff that it was in pursuance of this advertisement that the defendant went to the flat, the address of which was mentioned in the advertisement, and contacted the broker. It is further the plaintiff's case that the terms of the agreement were settled by the defendant with the broker and it was agreed that the defendant should take the premises on leave and licence basis on a monthly compensation of Rs. 225. It is further her case that the defendant was put in possession of the premises by the broker himself on November 15. An attempt was made by the defendant to show that it was not in pursuance of the advertisement that she contacted the broker of the plaintiff but that she had contacted the plaintiff before the date of the agreement through the intervention of one Watts. Sukhdev Watts has been examined in this case to support this theory. The evidence given by Watts is unacceptable, mainly because according to him, he made a casual discovery about this particular vacancy and took the defendant to the plaintiff. He admitted that he did not know the plaintiff before, nor had he contacted her any time before. For the same reason, the evidence of the defendant must be rejected, when she says that she had approached the plaintiff with Watts requesting for granting the premises to her. In the course of her cross-examination the defendant made a startling statement viz., that she went to the broker, Gulab, on November 15, 1959, in his office and that it was from him that she got the address of the suit premises. Gulab has been examined and he stated that the defendant went to him on November 15, 1959, at the flat. The evidence of Gulab is consistent with the circumstances of the case and in particular the advertisement put up by him. On reading the evidence of the plaintiff, defendant and broker Gulab, no room is left for doubting the position advanced on behalf of the plaintiff viz., that the defendant approached Gulab in pursuance of the advertisement and that the terms and conditions were settled between her and Gulab.

Let me now consider the evidence of Gulab as to how the terms and conditions were agreed upon between him and the defendant. In the first place, Gulab says that the plaintiff had told him to give the flat on leave and licence basis and it is on that account that he put up the advertisement. He then says that the defendant saw the premises, that he took her to the plaintiff in the evening and that he told the defendant that she would have to pay three months' deposit and also told her that the agreement would be of leave and licence. He also told her that the amount of compensation would be Rs. 225 p.m. According to him, she agreed to these terms, handed over a cheque for Rs. 675 and she was then put in possession of the premises. Gulab explained that he had agreements of leave and licence with him in respect of other properties and that he made changes as to the names, description and the amount of compensation therein and got the agreement typed by his clerk. He added that he knows a little English and that his partner, D'Souza had made changes in the agreement before it was typed. No reason has been shown as to why this part of the broker's evidence should not be accepted as true. It is clear that the defendant has introduced the story that she had seen the suit premises in the company of Watts prior to the date of the agreement with a view to avoid the consequence that the defendant had approached the broker in pursuance of the advertisement and that the terms and conditions were settled with him. The most important circumstances to be considered in this case are that the terms and conditions were settled between the defendant and the broker on November 15, 1959; that payment of deposit amount and brokerage was made on that date; that possession was delivered to the defendant in pursuance of the above agreement and that it was only thereafter that the terms and conditions were reduced to writing.

It is in this light that we have to consider the terms and conditions of the agreement. In the first place, it is significant to note that all the important conditions, on which reliance is placed on behalf of the defendant for spelling out a contract of lease, are set out in the form of a preamble. This is somewhat extraordinary. The principal term viz., that the licence was to be heritable, should have been put in the form of one of the conditions of the lease. Instead of that, it has been put in an oblique way as an explanation of the term "licencee", which "includes her heirs, executors, administrators and assigns". This supports Gulab's contention viz., that he was keeping some old and hackneyed forms of agreement which were with him. In the same way, the other important condition relating to renewal was also put in the form of a preamble. No mention, whatsoever, has been made with regard to the licensee's right to get the term extended on her option in the terms and conditions of the licence. Mr. Patel contended that the fact that an heritable interest was created under the agreement is indicative of an intention to transfer the interest in the property, that is to say, the right to enjoy the property hereditarily. In this connection, he pointed out that the decision of the Supreme Court has turned on the right of transfer, which was given to the licensee by the agreement. As pointed out above, in the agreement, in the present case, there is no specific clause that the right has been made heritable. It has been put only as an explanation of the term "licensee". That, in my view, makes considerable difference in the position arising in the present case. Again, no reason was shown as to why the broker's evidence should not be accepted, when he says that he copied some of the terms from the drafts, which were already with him. It is also necessary to remember that the plaintiff did not know much of English and all that she knows about English is that, she knows how to sign in English. She can neither read nor write except certain figures and names. Although the agreement stated that the premises were let out to the defendant for residential purpose and also for the purpose of her business as also the business of the family, still, it is in evidence that the defendant was making use of the premises only for the purpose of residence. She started doing tailoring business sometime after the institution of the suit. The dominant idea was, therefore, to give the premises to the defendant for residential purpose and not for the purpose of business.

Reliance was placed on the circumstance that in the rent receipts, which are at exh. 1, the word "rent" has been consistently mentioned. Rival versions have been placed before the Court as to how these receipts came into being. It is the case for the plaintiff that the defendant used to bring the receipts either typed or written and place them for her signature, whereas it is the case for the defendant that the plaintiff used to get those receipts either typed or written herself. The defendant was driven to admit that one of the receipts dated August 15, 1960, is in her own handwriting. This is sufficient to give a lie direct to her contention that it was the plaintiff who got the receipts prepared and she of her own put her signature and handed them over to the plaintiff. Two of the receipts are type-written and four written in hand. It was suggested in the course of the cross-examination of the defendant that, barring the receipt dated August 15, 1960, the other receipts are in the handwriting of one Sheshappa, who was helping her in this litigation; she dodged the issue by saying that she did not know the hand-writing of Sheshappa. The defendant knows English very well. In view of the plaintiff's deficiency in English, no importance can be attached to the use of the word "rent" in the receipts. Furthermore, at the back of one of these receipts dated March 1, 1960, the defendant had written the following in her own hand.

"I hereby agree that you (Defendant) may take paying guests and can give table space to anyone".

Below that the plaintiff has put her signature. It is significant that term No. 6 of the agreement prohibited the transfer or parting with possession of the flat to any other person. In the first place, such a term is destructive of the idea of tenancy. In the second place, the defendant appears to be clearly conscious of the prohibition contained in term No. 6. That seems to be the reason why she sought express permission of the plaintiff for keeping paying guests. As a matter of fact, the defendant has admitted that she had kept only one paying guest during the entire period. Of course, she tried to improve upon this admission by saying that she kept three paying guests in the course of her occupation of the premises.

The conduct of the defendant in not exercising the so-called option for the renewal of the so-called tenancy is also significant. At the end of the period of eleven months, the defendant never approached the plaintiff either orally or with a notice calling upon her to extend the term of the licence for a further period. The mere fact that exclusive possession was awarded to the defendant cannot be considered to be a decisive circumstance in the light of the direct evidence that has been led on the question as to how the agreement came to be hammered out. Having regard to the background in which the agreement was arrived at and the positive evidence led on the terms and conditions that were settled between the parties and construing the document, as a whole, and taking the conduct of the parties into account, I feel no hesitation in holding that the real intention of the parties was to give the premises on leave and licence basis.

The result is that the appeal fails and is dismissed. The decree of the lower Court is confirmed with the modification that the plaintiff do recover possession of the premises from the defendant. The remaining part of the decree is confirmed. The decree be drawn up as set out above on the condition that the plaintiff pays the court-fee on a sum of Rs. 15,000. In the peculiar circumstances of the case, I direct that the parties should bear their respective costs of this appeal.

THE defendant appealed under the Letters Patent.

C. P. Patel, for the appellant.

K. S. Lulla, for the respondent.

PATEL J. This is an appeal by the defendant who has failed in both the Courts in a suit which arose out of the occupation of the suit premises by the defendant apparently as a licensee. The plaintiff is the owner of the flat in suit situated in the Churchgate Co-operative Housing Society Ltd. On November 15, 1959, the defendant was let into possession on her agreeing to execute a document of leave and licence and the document was actually executed between the parties on November 16, 1959. The document is at ex. A. It purported to be for a period of 11 months. In terms of the document an attempt was made to obtain forcible possession without resort to Court, but the plaintiff did not succeed, with the result that the present suit was filed in the City Civil Court at Bombay as a short cause suit for recovery of possession from the defendant on the basis that the licence was ended or terminated. The reliefs claimed were those of mandatory injunctions and Court-fee was paid on the footing that the suit was one for mandatory injunctions. The defendant resisted the suit contending that she was a tenant, that the premises were let out to her as a tenant and that the Court had no jurisdiction as the dispute was one between a landlord and a tenant. She contended that the amount charged for the occupation was excessive and that she had already filed an application under the Rent Act for determination of standard rent before the Court of Small Causes at Bombay. She objected to the frame of the suit contending that a suit for mandatory injunctions was not maintainable. The learned trial Judge construed the agreement between the parties as an agreement of leave and licence. He negatived the contentions of the defendant and decreed the suit. Against this judgment, the defendant came in appeal which was heard by Mr. Justice Naik sitting singly. He agreed with the conclusion of the learned Judge of the City Civil Court and dismissed the appeal. Before him, three points were argued by the advocate for the defendant, viz. (i) that the frame of the suit was improper and it was not, therefore, maintainable; (ii) that on a proper valuation being made the Court would have no jurisdiction to deal with the suit; and (iii) that the agreement between the parties was one of tenancy and, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief. All these three contentions were negatived by the learned Judge.

The learned advocate for the defendant in this appeal has urged the same three contentions before us. His first contention is that the suit for injunctions as prayed for by the plaintiff is not maintainable, inasmuch as the defendant was in exclusive possession of the premises and the plaintiff's remedy was, therefore, to ask for possession of the property. In this contention he is supported by a judgment of the Division Bench of this Court (in which I was a member) in the case of Lakshiram v. Vidyut Etc. Industries.¹ But in that case we also pointed out that the Court would be entitled to construe the plaint, and if on a fair construction the Court could arrive at the conclusion that what was really intended by the plaint was a claim to possession, then the suit ought not to be dismissed only on the ground that Court-fee had been paid as on an injunction. In view of this judgment, Naik J. construed the plaint and directed the plaintiff to pay the Court-fee which she would have been bound to pay as in a suit for possession on the basis of the value of the property as fixed by him. In our view, the learned Judge was right in the course that he adopted in the matter. This contention, therefore, ought to fail.

The next question is about the market value of the property. Mr. Patel for the appellant invited our attention to the decision of the Division Bench in S. Sohonsingh Chhadda v. Jitkaur,² where we held that ordinarily the market value of the property could be arrived at by taking the licence fee as the return on the property and multiplying it by $12\frac{1}{2}$, i.e. at $12\frac{1}{2}$ years' purchase. While adopting that rule, we made some basic assumptions which we thought would be appreciated by most. But it seems necessary to amplify the reasons for our doing so.

Now, the Court-fees Act is a finance Act. It requires that proper Court-fee should be paid on a plaint in accordance with the nature of the subject matter of the suit. The section which imposes the Court-fee is s. 6 and it deals with a large number of subjects in respect of each of which it prescribes different amounts of Court-fee. In respect of some of the matters, the Court-fee that is required to be paid is proportionate to the market value of the property depending upon the nature of the reliefs claimed by the plaintiff. We do not think it is necessary to refer to these sub-sections specifically. Section 8 enables the Court, whenever a question of valuation of the subject-matter of the suit is raised to decide the same and to do so "it may hold such inquiry as it deems proper". The language shows that the manner of inquiry is left to the Court and would depend upon the nature of the subject-matter of the suit. The reason for the giving of this discretion is quite understandable. The valuation of the property for the purpose of Court-fee is not the real dispute between the parties which falls to be decided by the Court, but is only a collateral matter and that is why the strict procedure which applies for decision of suits need not be applied to such an inquiry. In order to reduce its work and not to waste its time in this inquiry, s. 9 enables the Court to appoint even a Commissioner for certain investigation. Section 10 gives some of the powers of a Court under the Civil Procedure Code to either the Court or the Commissioner making the inquiry. This may suggest that the inquiry may not even be regarded strictly as judicial. Thus the section does not prescribe that the Court which makes the inquiry shall follow a particular procedure such as is done by the Bombay Rent Act and the Tenancy Act. An analysis of the provisions of s. 6 of the Court-fees Act shows that in respect of certain kind of property the method of computing the value is laid down and in such cases no difficulty arises. It only arises in other cases where market value is to be determined.

Now, the words "market value" mean the price which a willing purchaser would pay to a willing seller for the property on the day when the suit is filed. The method of valuation is familiar to most who deal with land acquisition cases. Two methods are very frequently adopted for determining the market value. One is by production of sale deeds of comparable properties in the vicinity of the property in question during the period nearabout the date with respect to which the price has to be determined. The other is by reference to the net income of the property which it earns. One method is used to also check the result arrived at by the other. However, with all the care, the Court cannot determine the exact value. Sometimes, expert evidence is called to state the value of the property, but experience has shown in many cases that the expert for one party will say that the value is Rs. 100 and the expert for the other side will say that it is Rs. 1,000. Though discretion is given to the Court for adopting such procedure as it deems necessary for making the valuation, it has to determine the value of the property fairly though, of course, the same exactness as one may expect under the Land Acquisition Act may not be required. We, therefore, adopted a ready method for determining the value of the property where it is earning income in the above case.

At this stage, it is also desirable to explain why we took only 12½ years' purchase and not longer. If the market value of the property is to be assessed on the basis of the net income, then the number of years' purchase depends on the rate of interest on gold-edged securities. Usually, in respect of non-agricultural income, it has become customary to adopt a rule of 16 2/3 years' purchase upto even 20 years' purchase. But then this method is on the hypothesis that the income is the normal income and is likely to be recovered for a reasonably long period. Now, the licence fees which are earned in the present days are very exorbitant and the good or bad days cannot be expected to last for a considerably long time. We, therefore, took only 12½ years' purchase of the licence fee.

The learned Judge says:

"Section 10 of the Bombay Court-fees Act provides the mode and the manner in which the inquiry is to be conducted for arriving at the market value of the property in question. All that section 8 of the Court-fees Act lays down is that the correct valuation of the property is to be arrived at in all cases, where the suit has been wrongly valued by the plaintiff. I do not think that the learned Judges intended to lay down a rule, which will have the effect of superseding the provisions of the statute", the underlying suggestion being that the Court in L.P.A. No. 13 of 1963 laid down a rule contrary to the provisions of the Court-fees Act, which, to say the least, is hardly fair to the learned Judges. It is almost elementary that the function of the Court is to construe and not to legislate. With all respect to the learned Judge, neither s. 8 nor s. 10 lays down any special procedure for the inquiry. As pointed out above, s. 8 only gives discretion to the Court to hold "such inquiry as it deems proper" and s. 10 only confers powers of a Court upon the Court or the Commissioner holding the inquiry. The word "ordinarily" in our judgment in the case referred to is indicative enough. Mr. Lulla for the respondent practically disowned the argument.

Now, in the present case, it is true that in 1954 the plaintiff had paid approximately Rs. 10,000 for this property. But then that was six years before the date when the question arose. Evidently, if the property was being acquired, the plaintiff herself would not have relied upon the purchase price paid by her in view of the fact that the prices of properties in Bombay are rising by leaps and bounds. Even Mr. Lulla while addressing us on the reasonableness of the compensation stated that the prices had risen very high during the six years and in fixing the amount of compensation the price of the property at that date was taken into account. If that is so, we do not see what injustice can there be in applying the rule that we have laid down. It was suggested by Mr. Lulla before the learned Judge that the compensation for the furniture should be assessed at Rs. 75. Before such figure can reasonably be accepted, one must be put on an inquiry as to what is the value of the furniture, because very often furniture is used as a pretext for earning very high compensation and avoiding the payment of taxes to the Municipal Corporation. The Rent Act which defines the word "premises" includes by s. 5, cl. (8) in the word, "any furniture supplied by the landlord for use in such building or part of a building". If that is so, the framers of the Act clearly intended that the furniture should earn only reasonable compensation and not any exaggerated compensation for its use. In the present case, the document between the parties mentions five pieces of furniture—a cupboard, kitchen cupboard, 1 ceiling fan, 2 chairs and 1 bed—and having regard to the fact that we are not valuing the furniture of a millionaire in a palatial flat, the value of the furniture can hardly be about Rs. 1,000 even on a liberal basis. As we said, however, that is a matter of evidence and this is only a conjecture.

However, we do not think that any useful purpose can now be served by going further into this question. After all, in assessing the market value, one has to some extent enter into the realms of conjecture. The defendant had not raised the question of valuation in the trial Court and raised it for the first time in the Court of appeal. In order to arrive at the net income, the outgoings such as taxes and other charges of which there is no evidence have to be ascertained. In the case decided by the Bench, the licence fee was the net income of the tenant. We do not think, therefore, on the whole, that we will be justified in holding that the market value is more than Rs. 15,000, fixed by the learned Judge.

Even assuming that the value of the property is Rs. 25,000 or more, Mr. Patel is concluded by s. 11 of the Suits Valuation Act, which requires that before a judgment can be set aside on the ground of over or under-valuation of the property and consequential want of jurisdiction in the Court, it must be shown that prejudice is caused to the appellant. None has been pointed out by Mr. Patel and accordingly his contention must fail.

The third and the most important contention is whether the agreement between the parties creates relationship of landlord and tenant.

It is well to bear in mind the relevant definitions in our law. Section 105 of the Transfer of Property Act defines a lease of immovable property as a transfer of a right to enjoy the property for a certain time in consideration for a price paid or promised. The price paid is called rent. On the other hand, under s. 52 of the Indian Easements Act, licence is

"Where one person grants to another ... a right to do or continue to do, in or upon the immovable property of the grantor, something which would, in the absence of such a right be unlawful, and such right does not amount to an easement or an interest in the property, the right is called a licence", the underlying assumption in the case of a licence being that the owner continues to be in possession and control of the property. But this is not all. The attributes of a licence can be seen from some of the subsequent provisions in the Easements Act. By s. 56 a licence except one to attend a public place of entertainment is made non-transferable and it is not exercisable even by servants or agents. By s. 60 the licensor's transferee of the property is not bound as such by the licence. By this section it is also made revocable except in certain cases. In the case of a licence, therefore, there is something less than a right to enjoy the property in the licensee; it cannot be exercised by servants and agents, is terminable and a transferee of the property is not as such bound by the licence. On the other hand, in the case of a lease, there is a transfer of a right to enjoy the property or in other words the lessee is entitled to enjoy the property. Having regard to the statutory provisions, we think that the test of exclusive possession must be regarded as a very important test of tenancy.

The question has come before Courts since very early times and the test then adopted was that if exclusive possession was given to a party, the agreement between the parties must be regarded as a lease. Difficulties were felt in the application of this principle by reason of the stringent provisions of the Rent Acts and in order to meet these, the test has since been modified. In Booker v. Palmer,³ the owner had allowed as a matter of concession the appellant whose home was destroyed to live in one of the cottages belonging to him. The appellant then claimed right of tenancy. This claim was negatived by the Court. The learned Judge said (at p. 676):

"...Whether or not parties intend to create as between themselves the relationship of landlord and tenant, under which an estate is created in the tenant and certain mutual obligations arise by implication of law, must in the last resort be a question of intention".

It was held there that having regard to all circumstances no tenancy was intended. It is needless in this connection to refer to all the cases, but we may refer to *Errington v. Errington and Woods*⁴ where after referring to decided cases, Denning L. J. says (p. 298):

"The result of all these cases is that, although a person who is let into exclusive possession is prima facie to be considered to be a tenant, nevertheless he will not be held to be so if the circumstances negative any intention to create a tenancy. Words alone may not suffice. Parties cannot turn a tenancy into a licence merely by calling it one. But if the circumstances and the conduct of the parties show that all that was intended was that the occupier should be granted a personal privilege, with no interest in the land, he will be held to be a licensee only."

In this connection, we may refer with advantage to the case of *Addiscombe Garden Estate Ltd. v. Crabbe*⁵ wherein the observations of Denning L. J. in Facchini v. Bryson^{5a} to the following effect are referred to. He says (p. 1389):

"...We have had many cases lately where an occupier has been held to be a licensee and not a tenant. In addition to those which I mentioned in Errington v. Errington we have recently had three more, Gorham (Contractors) Ltd. v. Field,⁶ Forman v. Rudd,⁷ and Cobb v. Lane.⁸ In all the cases where an occupier has been held to be a licensee there has been something in the circumstances, such as a family arrangement, an act of friendship or generosity, or such like, to negative any intention to create a tenancy. In such circumstances it would be obviously unjust to saddle the owner with a tenancy, with all the momentous consequences that that entails nowadays, when there was no intention to create a tenancy at all. In the present case, however, there are no special circumstances. It is a simple case where the employer let a man into occupation of a house in consequence of his employment at a weekly sum payable by him...."

The Court held that the relationship was that of a service tenant and landlord and that their relationship was determined by the law and not by the label which they chose to put on it. After citing the case of Customs and Excise Commissioners v. Pools Finance (1937) Ltd.,⁹ the learned Judge proceeds:

"It is not necessary to go so far as to find the document a sham. It is simply a matter of finding the true relationship of the parties. It is most important that we should adhere to this principle, or else we might find all landlords granting licences and not tenancies, and we should make a hole in the Rent Acts through which could be driven—I will not in these days say a coach and four, but an articulated vehicle."

If one has regard to the conditions prevailing in Bombay and also at some other places, there can be no doubt about the truism of the remarks. In the city of Bombay, in the case of new premises, the Act practically is non-existent. There are also unscrupulous tenants who make huge profits out of their tenancies by inducting what are called licensees. While, therefore, construing the terms of a document, the Court would not lose sight of the fact that ingenious attempts are made to circumvent the provisions of the statute. Indeed, in such cases, it may even be possible to say that the document is bogus or sham. However, ultimately, as the relationship is determined by law irrespective of the label attached to it by the parties, one need not go so far. It is possible that when exclusive possession is given having regard to the special circumstances mentioned by Denning L. J., it can be said that in a given case a right to enjoy the property was not intended to be transferred or given.

In the case of Associated Hotels of India Ltd. v. R. N. Kapoor,¹⁰ the question arose before our Supreme Court, in respect of the occupation of two rooms by the respondent which were described as Ladies' and Gents' Cloak Rooms where he carried on the business of a hair-dresser. held that the rooms let, being rooms in the hotel were excluded from the operation of the Ajmer-Merwara Rent Control Act, 1947. Subba Rao J. dissenting from the above view considered the question whether the relationship was of landlord and tenant. After referring to s. 52 of the Easements Act, the learned Judge in connection with licence says (p. 383):

"...The legal possession, therefore, continues to be with the owner of the property, but the licensee is permitted to make use of the premises for a particular purpose. But for the permission, his occupation would be unlawful."

The learned Judge ultimately formulates the test of intention of the parties. In this case the terms of agreement between the parties as said by Subba Rao J. were apparently appropriate for a licence. Yet he was of the opinion that the legal relationship was that of landlord and tenant.

The terms of the agreement in the present case are:

Whereas the Licensor has agreed to grant leave and licence to use and occupy the flat, furniture and fittings for eleven months renewable at the option of the Licensee every eleventh month... and whereas the said leave and licence... does not confer on the Licensee any right or title, whether as tenant or sub-tenant, on the following terms:

1. That the Licensee shall pay monthly compensation for use and occupation;
2. that the premises shall be used for residence and business by her and her family;
3. that the Licensee shall deposit Rs. 675/- without any interest for the due performance of the terms and indemnifying the Licensor for loss or damage;
4. that the Licensor shall pay all taxes except the Chowkidar's charges of Rs. 10/- which shall be paid by the Licensee;
5. that if the Licensee fails to observe the terms of the agreement or if she commits any nuisance, the licence shall stand revoked and the Licensor shall have the right to eject the Licensee forcibly;
6. that the Licensee shall not allow any other person to use and occupy the premises except...;
7. that the Licensee shall not claim any right as a tenant; and
8. that the Licensee shall not make any additions and alternations in the flat without the written permission of the Licensor.

In the present case, there are many circumstances connected with the transaction that have to be considered. The plaintiff had inserted an advertisement in the newspaper that a licence was intended to be granted; but then it is hardly likely that a person who wants to circumvent the provisions of the Rent Act would say that the property is to be leased. The giving of the advertisement, in our view, would indicate that she wanted to give out the property to whosoever was prepared to take it and pay the price. Merely from the language employed in the advertisement, it cannot be inferred that a licence was intended. The second circumstance which emerges from the evidence is that admittedly the services of a broker were employed by the plaintiff. It is obvious, therefore, that the intention was not to accommodate any person who was known to the plaintiff, but to have anyone who was needy enough to agree per force to the terms proposed by the plaintiff. The employment of the broker must necessarily suggest that the intention was to earn whatever could be earned out of the property and no other. The amount paid to the broker is also not less. This circumstance also, therefore, cannot support the inference that it was because the plaintiff intended to give a licence only that she had employed the broker. A fair reading of the agreement between the parties leaves no room for doubt that the flat was given in the exclusive possession of the defendant for the use of herself and the members of her family and its use was intended to be for 11 months. The parties, however, did intend that the term was renewable at the end of 11 months at the option of the licensee. It was, therefore, not a short term accommodation. The learned advocate for the respondent says that as the term appears in the main body of the agreement and not in the subsequent clauses which lay down the terms, it should be held that it was not intended to be acted upon, a contention which found favour with the learned Judge. We cannot agree. As long as the agreement between the parties is clear, the place where the term is to be found cannot matter much. While construing the document, the Court has to consider the whole document and cannot refuse to give effect to a term of the document on the ground that it is placed at one place and not at the other. It specifically says:

"Whereas the said Licensor has agreed to grant the leave and licence... for the period of 11 (eleven) months renewable every eleventh month at the option of the Licensee,... the terms and conditions... are as follows:".

The main and the important term was embodied in that paragraph and the details were worked out in the subsequent paragraphs and it is no wonder, therefore, that we do not find a repetition of that term in the details. To show that licence was intended, a crude attempt is made by adding the recital that "the parties had cordial relations". The evidence of both the plaintiff and the defendant shows that they did not know each other prior to that date. In fact, the plaintiff had inserted an advertisement for finding a person likely to occupy the flat and the defendant was told about the vacancy of the premises by someone who had gone to see the premises for himself but found them to be unsuitable. This recital is untrue and it shows the working of the mind of the broker and that of the plaintiff. Indeed, the rest of the terms are such as are to be found in most tenancy agreements, the only difference being that instead of rent the occupational charges are described as compensation. No circumstances such as those described by Denning L. J. in the case cited above are disclosed either by the document or by the evidence of the parties. Why then one must construe the agreement between the parties as a licence and allow the evasion of the Rent Act merely because the plaintiff has chosen to apply the label that it is a licence?

Mr. Lulla has very strenuously argued that some of the terms show an intention that licence was intended by both parties and also relied upon the decision in Ramjibhai Virpal v. Gorāhandas.¹¹ Clause 6 makes possession non-transferable to anyone else; in clause 5 there is a condition that if the defendant commits any act of nuisance the licence shall be deemed to have been cancelled and it would be lawful for the licensor without prejudice to any other remedy to forcibly remove the defendant from the flat; the defendant would have to pay a deposit of Rs. 675 which works out compensation for 3 months and that the monthly payment is called compensation. Evidently, there are leases between landlords and tenants which may prescribe many such similar conditions, but merely because of the existence of such conditions, leases are not converted into licences. Calling the occupational price compensation does not make it a licence. Ramjibhai Virpal's case has no application. The principles formulated there are the same as in other cases and having regard to circumstances in the case it was held that tenancy was not intended to be created.

Mr. Lulla tried to take us through the evidence of the parties and relying on certain statements made by the defendant argued that she also intended that there should be a licence and not a tenancy. Now, one cannot forget the circumstances in which the defendant was. The hardships of finding accommodation in Bombay are well-known. One need not, therefore, wonder at a needy person agreeing to sign whatever document is required to be signed by him so long as he gets the premises and is able to live in the same. The defendant admitted that she agreed to execute the document as desired by the plaintiff as that of a licence, but she said that she was to be tenant. It is true that she has not said that she did so because she was in difficulties. But then this fact cannot be overlooked. Apart from this, as we have stated, oral evidence of prior communings between the parties cannot be allowed to influence the judgment of the Court in deciding the relationship between the parties. See Bomanji v. Secretary of State.¹² Now, what is to be determined is the legal relationship between the parties and, therefore, what they called it is not much material. Giving our best consideration to the terms between the parties and the surrounding circumstances, we hold that the relationship between the parties was that of landlord and tenant. In view of this conclusion, we must hold that the Court had no jurisdiction to decide the dispute between the parties.

In the result, the suit must fail and is dismissed.

The appeal has been filed in forma pauperis. Looking to the condition of the plaintiff herself, we do not think that we should require her to pay the Court-fee which she ought to pay. We also do not think that the circumstances demand that we should make an order for costs in these proceedings. We, therefore, direct the parties to bear their own costs throughout.

Suit dismissed.

DATTU BALA NIKAM

v.

VINAYAKRAO SHRIPATRAO PATWARDHAN.*

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 29, 14—Notice terminating tenancy for default in payment of rent served on 29-12-1954—Application for possession made on 23-3-1957—Whether application time-barred—Right to obtain possession whether accrues on expiry of period of notice or date on which default made.

The petitioner who was a tenant of certain lands made defaults in payment of rent to the opponents-owners for the years 1951-52, 1952-53 and 1953-54. A notice terminating the tenancy was served on the petitioner on December 29, 1954 and on March 23, 1957 the opponents made an application under s. 29 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, for obtaining possession of the lands. The petitioner contended that the opponents' application was time-barred under s. 29(2) of the Act, whereas the opponents contended that as the right to obtain possession of the lands accrued to them on the expiry of the period of notice terminating the tenancy i.e. on March 29, 1955, their application was in time:—

Held, that the period of limitation must be counted from the date on which there were defaults in the payment of rent, that the last default which took place being for the year 1953-54, the last date for payment of rent under s. 14 of the Act as it then stood, was April 20, 1954, which was the date on which the right to obtain possession must be deemed to have accrued to the opponents, and that as the application for possession was made more than two years later i.e. on March 23, 1957, it was beyond the period of limitation and was consequently not maintainable.

1953-54, the opponents gave a notice terminating the tenancy on December 27, 1954. This notice was served on the petitioner's father on December 29, 1954. It appears that there were further defaults in the payment of rent for the years 1954-55 and 1955-56. On March 23, 1957, the opponents made an application under s. 29 of the Tenancy Act for obtaining possession of the lands. The petitioner's father died during the pendency of the proceedings and the petitioner was brought on record as his heir. The Additional Tenancy Awai Karkun who heard the application came to the conclusion that there had been defaults for more than three years. He, therefore, directed that possession of the lands should be restored to the opponents. This order has been confirmed in appeal by the Prant Officer and in revision by the Revenue Tribunal.

Mr. Gole, who appears on behalf of the petitioner, has contended that the application made by the opponents for possession of the lands was time-barred. He has relied on the Full Bench decision of this Court in Chimnabai Rama v. Ganpat Jagannath.¹ This decision has been considered by the Revenue Tribunal. The Tribunal was, however, of the opinion that the matter must be decided in the light of the decision of another Full Bench of this Court in Ganpati Appa v. Maruti Bala,² in which it was held that the right to obtain possession of a land accrues to the landlord on the expiry of the period of notice terminating the tenancy given by him. Under s. 14 of the Tenancy Act a landlord has to give three months notice informing the tenant of his decision to terminate the tenancy, before the tenancy can be terminated on the ground that the tenant has failed to pay the rent due from him. The period of notice expired on March 29, 1955. The application for possession was made by the opponents on March 23, 1957, i.e., within two years from the date on which the notice terminating the tenancy expired. The Tribunal, therefore, held that the application was in time.

Sub-section (2) of s. 29 of the Tenancy Act provides that for obtaining an order for possession from the Mamlatdar the landlord shall make an application in the prescribed form within two years from the date on which the right to obtain possession of the land is deemed to have accrued to him. As pointed out in Chimnabai Rama v. Ganpat Jagannath, the section fixes as the starting point of limitation not the date on which the right to obtain possession has actually accrued to the landlord, but the date on which this right must be deemed to have accrued to him. At page 978 it has been observed:

"...The one fact that immediately strikes the reader of this section is that the Legislature has advisedly not made the time, when the actual right to take possession accrues to the landlord, the starting point of limitation... the Legislature has inserted a legal fiction and the legal fiction is that you have not to consider for the purpose of limitation when the right to obtain possession actually accrued to the landlord, but what you have to consider is when the right to obtain possession accrued to him fictionally by reason of the fiction introduced by the Legislature. Therefore, it is clear that under s. 29(2) limitation does not begin to run from the time when the right to obtain possession actually accrues to the landlord... It begins to run from a point of time when in fact he has no right to obtain possession, but the Legislature for the purpose of limitation considers that he has a right to obtain possession."

Later on, on the same page, it has been observed:

"...Therefore we must look to something antecedent to the actual moment of time when the right to possession accrues to the landlord and that antecedent point of time is the creation of the sub-tenancy. What the Legislature says is that when the tenant creates a sub-tenancy, although the right to obtain possession has not accrued to the landlord, for the purpose of limitation look upon the creation of the sub-tenancy as the starting point of limitation."

It was, therefore, held in this case that having regard to the language used in s. 29(2) limitation runs not from the date on which the right to obtain possession has actually accrued to the landlord but from the date on which it can be deemed to have accrued to him, i.e., when the sub-tenancy was created. On the same reasoning the right to obtain possession on account of the tenant's failure to pay rent within the prescribed time must be deemed to have accrued to the landlord on the date when there was a default in the payment of rent and limitation will run from this date.

Mr. Jahagirdar has urged that the authority of this decision is considerably shaken by Ganpati Appa v. Maruti Bala. In that case the Court was not considering the question of limitation under s. 29(2). The Court in that case had to determine the scope of sub-s. (2) of s. 25, as amended in 1956, and whether this section applied to cases in which tenancies had been terminated before August 1, 1956, when the sub-section, as amended, came into force. For the purpose of deciding this question the Court had to consider when the right to obtain possession accrues to a landlord. It was held that it is on the expiration of the period of notice that the tenancy is terminated and the landlord gets a right to obtain possession of the land. Even in the earlier decision of the Full Bench in Chinnabai Rama v. Ganpat Jagannath it was held that the right to obtain possession does not accrue when the sub-letting takes place but only after the landlord has given a notice indicating his intention to terminate the tenancy. This is clear from the following observations (p. 978) :—

“...When does the right to obtain possession actually accrue to the landlord? In view of what we have already said that sub-letting by itself does not bring about a termination and that the tenancy is only liable to be terminated, it is clear that when a tenant sub-lets there is no right in the landlord to obtain possession. Some further act is necessary on his part before the right to obtain possession can arise and that further act is either the giving of a notice or the taking of some unequivocal act indicating his intention to terminate the tenancy.”

In our opinion, there is no conflict between Chinnabai Rama v. Ganpat Jagannath and Ganpati Appa v. Maruti Bala, nor is the authority of the earlier decision shaken by the later decision. In the first case the question which has been decided is when the right to obtain possession can be said to have accrued to the landlord within the meaning of s. 29(2). In the latter case, the question decided is as to when the right to obtain possession actually accrues to the landlord.

Mr. Jahagirdar has also referred to the observation of the Supreme Court in *Raja Ram v. Aba Maruti*³ which is as follows (p. 573) :—

“The statute having provided for the termination of the tenancy would by necessary implication create a right in the landlord to recover possession... Indeed, s. 29(2) itself mentions this right expressly for it says that the application shall be made within two years from the date on which ‘the right to obtain possession of the land’ accrued to the landlord.”

Mr. Jahagirdar has relied on the words “accrued to the landlord” in this observation and has urged that the Supreme Court has interpreted the words “deemed to have accrued” in s. 29(2) as equivalent to “accrued”. We do not think that Mr. Jahagirdar is right on this point. The Supreme Court was not considering the question of limitation under s. 29(2). The question before the Supreme Court was whether a tenant is entitled to relief when he has committed more than three defaults in the payment of rent. The Supreme Court has pointed out that as there was a statutory right in the landlord to obtain possession, it could not be made subject to an equitable relief. Consequently no inference such as has been suggested by Mr. Jahagirdar can be drawn from the above observation of the Supreme Court.

Having regard to the decision in Chinnabai Rama v. Ganpat Jagannath, we must, therefore, hold that the period of limitation must be counted from the date on which there were defaults in the payment of rent. The last default which took place before the opponents gave a notice terminating the tenancy was for the year 1953-54. Under s. 14 of the Act, as it stood at the material time, the last date for the payment of rent was April 20, 1954. This was, therefore, the date on which the right to obtain possession must be deemed to have accrued to the opponents. The application for possession was made more than two years later, on March 23, 1957. It was, therefore, beyond the period of limitation and was consequently not maintainable.

Mr. Jahagirdar has urged that defaults for subsequent years, 1954-55 and 1955-56, should also be taken into consideration. These could, at the most, be considered for the purpose of deciding whether the case falls under sub-s. (1) of s. 25 or sub-s. (2) of that section. They have no bearing on the question as to whether the application for possession made by the opponents was in time.

We, therefore, allow the application, set aside the orders made by the Additional Tenancy Aval Karkun, the Prant Officer and the Revenue Tribunal and direct that the application for possession of the lands made by the opponents should be dismissed. No order as to costs.

POPAT SHANKAR BHUSAL.*

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Bom. LXVII of 1948), Secs. 33B, 31, 29—Application under s. 29 read with s. 31 pending when tenancy terminated and application under s. 33B(3) made—Subsequent order under s. 31—Applicability of s. 33B(5)(a).

Section 33B(5)(a) of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948, can only apply if the other land is resumed before the application is made under this section. It will have no application if the order under s. 31 of the Act is made after the application under s. 33B was filed, and the landlord will not be deprived of his right to have his application under s. 33B disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. M. Limaye, for the petitioner.

N. D. Hombalkar, for D. S. Nargolkar, for opponent No. 1.

CHAINANI C. J. The petitioner had made an application for obtaining possession of the land S. No. 380/1 held by opponent No. 1, hereinafter referred to as the opponent, under s. 29 read with s. 31 of the Tenancy Act. In that application an order for possession of half of the land was finally made by the Deputy Collector on October 26, 1962. Before then, on March 30, 1962, the petitioner had also made an application for obtaining possession of the land under s. 33B of the Act. In this application the Tenancy Aval Karkun made an order on August 21, 1962, that possession of the whole land should be given to the petitioner. Against this order the opponent appealed to the Deputy Collector. The Deputy Collector held that as an order for possession of half of the land had been made in favour of the petitioner under s. 29 read with s. 31 of the Act, the application made by the petitioner under s. 33B of the Act was not tenable. He, therefore, allowed the appeal and set aside the order of the Tenancy Aval Karkun directing that possession of the whole land should be handed over to the petitioner. The petitioner then applied in revision to the Revenue Tribunal. The Revenue Tribunal took the view that as the petitioner had already resumed half of the land, she could not obtain possession of any more land under s. 33B(5)(a) of the Act. That view is being challenged before us in this application.

Sub-section (1) of s. 33B provides that notwithstanding anything contained in s. 31, 31A or 31B a certificated landlord may, after giving notice and after making an application for possession as provided in sub-s. (3), terminate the tenancy of an excluded tenant, if the landlord bona fide requires such land for cultivating it personally. This sub-section, therefore, removes the bar on the right of a certificated landlord to terminate the tenancy, if he requires the land bona fide for personal cultivation. It also lays down the mode in which the tenancy can be terminated. Two things are necessary before a tenancy can be terminated under this sub-section: (1) a notice must be given to the tenant, and (2) an application for possession must be made as provided in sub-s. (3). Sub-section (2) states that a notice may be given and an application made by a certificated landlord under sub-s. (3), notwithstanding that in respect of the same tenancy an application of the landlord made in accordance with sub-s. (2) of s. 31 is pending before the Mamlatdar or in appeal before the Collector or in revision before the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal. An application under s. 33B may, therefore, be made during the pendency of an application under s. 31. The application made by the petitioner under s. 33B was, therefore, maintainable, even though the application made by her under s. 31 was then pending in appeal before the Deputy Collector.

Sub-section (5)(a) states that the right of a certificated landlord to terminate a tenancy shall be subject to the condition that if any land is left over from a tenancy in respect of which other land has already been resumed by the landlord for cultivating it personally under s. 31, the tenancy in respect of any land so left over shall not be liable to be terminated under sub-s. (1). This sub-section, therefore, imposes a limitation on the right conferred by sub-s. (1) and that is that if the landlord has already resumed some land covered by the same tenancy, he will not be entitled to terminate the tenancy in respect of the remaining land. The termination of the tenancy under sub-s. (1) however requires the making of an application for possession as provided in sub-s. (3). Consequently sub-s. (5)(a) can only apply if the other land is resumed before the application is made under this section. It will have no application if, as in the present case, the order under s. 31 is made after the application under s. 33B was filed. It will, of course, be desirable to hear both the applications together if the application under s. 33B is made during the pendency of the application under s. 31. But since under sub-s. (2) the application under s. 33B can be made even when the application under s. 31 is pending in revision before the Revenue Tribunal, the fact that an order under s. 31 has been made subsequently will not deprive the landlord of his right to have his application under s. 33B disposed of in accordance with the provisions of the Act. In any case, sub-s. (5)(a) will not come in his way.

Our attention has been invited to the judgment of the Full Bench of the Revenue Tribunal in Tenancy Application No. 708 of 1962 and other connected applications, dated July 9, 1963, in which a contrary view has been taken. In para. 9 of the judgment the Revenue Tribunal has observed:—

The observation of the Revenue Tribunal that the commencing words of sub-s. (5) relate to the right of a landlord to terminate a tenancy is correct. But the right in regard to which this sub-section imposes a condition is the right of the landlord to terminate a tenancy under sub-s. (1). This is clear from the last words in cl. (a), “shall not be liable to be terminated under sub-section (1)”. Under sub-s. (1) one of the things necessary for terminating a tenancy is the making of an application as provided in sub-s. (3). Sub-section (5)(a) can, therefore, only operate when the application under s. 31 has been disposed of before the application has been made under s. 33B. In other words, the bar imposed by this sub-section is to the making of an application under this section.

In the present case the application made by the petitioner under s. 29 read with s. 31 was pending when the petitioner terminated the tenancy of the opponent and made the application as provided by sub-s. (3) of s. 33B. No final order for possession had been made in that application. Consequently cl. (a) of sub-s. (5) of s. 33B has no application in the present case. The view taken by the Revenue Tribunal is consequently not correct.

We set aside the orders made by the Revenue Tribunal and by the Deputy Collector and restore the order made by the Tenancy Aval Karkun on August 21, 1962, by which he directed that possession of the entire land should be handed over to the petitioner. The petitioner should get her costs from opponent No. 1.

Orders set aside.

Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Rules, 1955. Rule 39—Whether word "may" in rule 39 mean "shall"—Claimant whether can claim open plot as matter of right.

Under rule 39 of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Rules, 1955, there is no obligation to sell an open plot by public auction; it is open to the appropriate authority to allot it if he so deems proper. But a claimant cannot claim as a matter of right that an open plot must be allotted to him. The authority has a discretion in the matter and he may pay compensation by the allotment of a Government plot, but he is not bound to do so.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

S. A. Desai, with K. C. Mandvikar, for respondents Nos. 1 to 4.

R. W. Adik, for respondent No. 5.

CHAIANANI C. J. The facts in this application are briefly these: There was an open Government land in Ulhasnagar Township. In 1949-50 portions of this land were given for temporary use to several displaced persons in order to enable them to carry on business. On January 23, 1950, the Administrator and Managing Officer, Ulhasnagar Township, authorised the petitioner to use a plot of land for the construction of a temporary structure, subject to certain conditions, two of which were that the grant was temporary and that the structure was subject to a short removal notice when required by the Government at owner's cost. The petitioner, thereafter, put up a structure on the plot which he was authorised to occupy. We are informed that he is using this structure for a charcoal shop. In 1954-55 the area was demarcated into several plots and the plot occupied by the petitioner now forms part of Plot No. 266. After the plots were demarcated, the plots, including plot No. 266, have been reserved for residential purposes. According to the Regional Settlement Commissioner, these plots could not be allotted to the persons who were occupying them, as they were neither evacuee property nor Government built property. Under rule 39 of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Rules, 1955, these plots were to be sold by public auction. In 1960 tenders were, therefore, invited for sale of plot No. 266. The petitioner then made an application that the plot should be allotted to him. On September 24,

Decided, February 19, 1965. Special Civil Application No. 1865 of 1963.*

1962, the Managing Officer informed the petitioner that his request had been rejected. The petitioner appealed to the Regional Settlement Commissioner, but his appeal was dismissed. He applied in revision to the Chief Settlement Commissioner, but his revision application was rejected. Thereafter the petitioner applied to the Government of India under s. 33 of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act, but his application was rejected. After respondent No. 1 had rejected the petitioner's application for allotment of the plot to him, tenders were invited for the sale of this plot. The petitioner did not submit any tender. The highest tender submitted was that of respondent No. 5. His tender was accepted on December 15, 1962 and a deed of conveyance was issued to him on December 20, 1962. Thereafter the petitioner filed the present Special Civil Application under art. 226 of the Constitution.

Mr. Mulchandani, the learned advocate of the petitioner, has first contended that the authorities were wrong in rejecting the petitioner's application for the allotment of the plot to him. Chapter V of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Rules provides for allotment of acquired evacuee properties, while Chapter VI contains rules which provide for allotment of Government built properties. Rule 36 specifies the classes of Government built properties which may be allotted. The plot, which the petitioner is occupying, is neither evacuee property nor is it Government built property. No other rule has been pointed out to us, which provides for the payment of compensation by the allotment of an open plot belonging to Government. Rule 39 states that a Government plot forming part of the Compensation Pool may be sold by public auction. There has been some argument before us as to whether the word "may" in this rule means "shall". Mr. Mulchandani has pointed out that while the word "may" has been used in this rule and some rules such as rules 25 and 42, the word "shall" has been used in some other rules. For instance, the relevant words in rule 41(I) are "shall be paid compensation by transfer". In rules 22 and 36 the material words are "shall ordinarily be allotable". It has, therefore, been urged by him that whenever it was intended not to give a discretion to the authority concerned, the word "shall" has been used. Mr. Mulchandani has also referred to rule 43, which states that the provisions of rules 25 to 34 shall apply to the transfer of any Government built property or Government plot under this Chapter. Rules 25 to 34 lay down the mode in which the properties can be transferred. As these rules also apply to the transfer of a Government plot under Chapter VI, which contains rule 39, it necessarily follows that even though there is no specific rule providing for the allotment of a Government plot, the rules contemplate the transfer or allotment of a Government plot. For, otherwise it would not have been necessary to apply the provisions of rules 25 to 34 to the transfer of a Government plot. We, therefore, accept Mr. Mulchandani's argument that the word "may" in rule 39 does not mean "shall". The position, therefore, is that there is no obligation to sell an open plot by public auction. This is not the only mode in which such property can be disposed of and it is open to the appropriate authority to dispose of it in some other manner. He may allot it, if he so deems proper, and if he decides to do so, the provisions of rules 25 to 34 will become applicable. But a claimant cannot claim as a matter of right that an open plot must be allotted to him. The authority has a discretion in the matter and he may pay compensation by the allotment of a Government plot, but he is not bound to do so. Consequently we are unable to accept Mr. Mulchandani's contention that there was an obligation on the Regional Settlement Commissioner to allot to the petitioner the plot in his occupation.

STATE v. BHALCHANDRA WAMAN PETHE.*

Indian Penal Code (Act XLV of-1860), Sec. 304A—Rules for Regulating Traffic in streets by surface markings, 1963. Rule 4—Charge of negligence—Burden of proof—Distinction between rashness and negligence—Motorist's duty to public at pedestrian crossing—Sentence—Whether limits to it could be fixed by judicial precedents.

In order to establish a charge of negligence under s. 304A of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, it must be shown that the accident was the direct cause of the negligence or rashness of the accused. The guilt of the accused must be proved beyond reasonable doubt.

*Vishwanath Vishnu v. The King*¹ and Rustom Sheriar Irani v. The State of Maharashtra,² referred to.

There is a distinction between rashness and negligence. When one does an act with utter indifference to the consequences of which the doer may be conscious and which he hopes may not take place, one is said to be rash, while criminal negligence is neglect to take that precaution which a reasonable and prudent person is expected to take under the circumstances obtaining in a given case. In order to infer whether or not there is criminal rashness or negligence on the part of the accused, all relevant facts must be considered.

A person who is driving a motor car owes a duty to the members of the public to keep a look-out on the road and more so when approaching a pedestrian crossing where he would normally expect a pedestrian to cross the road. He should be able to stop the car when it reaches it, if necessary. In other words he must not continue the normally high speed when he is nearing a crossing.

London Passenger Transport Board v. Upson,³ *Fardon v. Harcourt-Rivington*⁴ and Leicester v. Pearson,⁵ referred to.

Sentence is a matter of discretion and the limits cannot be fixed by judicial precedents for all time in the future.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

R. Jethmalani and R. W. Adik, with Shetty, for the accused.

Y. S. Chitale, Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

PATEL J. The accused in this case was convicted under s. 304A and s. 337 of the Indian Penal Code and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 2,000 and Rs. 200 in default to suffer rigorous imprisonment for six months and two months on each of these counts respectively. As it was felt that the sentence was inadequate, the case was directed to be placed before the Court dealing with criminal matters when a notice of enhancement was issued by Palekar J.

On February 15, 1964, the accused was driving his motor car on the Marine Drive, now known as Netaji Subhash Road, from North to South. At about 5.30 p.m. that day Kunda the deceased, who was aged about twenty-one years, and her younger sister, Vidya, aged about ten were crossing, it is said, the pedestrian crossing near 'B' Road, Churchgate, at which the accused's car knocked down Kunda and Vidya. As a result of this Kunda died and Vidya received some injuries.

There is a pedestrian crossing situated at the junction of 'B' Road and Netaji Subhash Road. There is a Bus Stop at the northern side of 'B' Road corner, and Natraj Hotel is at the southern corner of that road. The pedestrian crossing was indicated by two broken transverse lines opposite the Bus Stop and two transverse broken lines opposite the Natraj Hotel on the southern side.

There is a board "Pedestrian Crossing" on the northern side near where the pedestrian crossing begins and similar board is displayed on the southern side of the second set of transverse broken lines.

The story as given by Vidya is that they had gone to the University Club House situated at 'B' Road as there was some function. They were a bit early and as there was some time for the function to start, they decided to go for a walk at the sea wall. They were crossing the road between the northern side of transverse lines when they were knocked down by the accused just about the time that they were near the hedge. According to her, the car was proceeding at a fast pace. The accused was driving the car. She did not hear the sound of a horn and she did not remember now if she heard the sound of the application of brakes. In cross-examination her story was that before stepping on to the crossing, they looked and saw that there were no vehicles near but there was only one car at a long distance away from them approaching them from the right side. She could not say its position on the road. A suggestion was made to her whether on seeing the cars they ran. This suggestion was denied. She also denied that they dashed against the car while running.

In connection with this incident two witnesses were examined, one Rupsingh Sundarsingh and another Vishram Vithoo, prosecution witnesses Nos. 2 and 3. Vishram Vithoo has not been accepted by the learned trial Magistrate as a reliable witness as he was serving in the University of Bombay where the father of the deceased was employed, and his presence at the scene appeared to be doubtful. Rupsingh, the learned Magistrate observes, was an independent witness. He is a professional driver and is employed at Churchgate. At the time of the incident he came out of the 'C' Road which is to the north of 'B' Road, similarly joining the Netaji Subhash Road as does 'B' Road. He entered from this road Netaji Subhash Road and he was on the left side in the third row. There was one car on his right and beyond that on the further right was the car of the accused. These three cars formed one line but they were at a distance from one another. According to him, the car of the accused was proceeding at a fast pace of near about forty miles per hour. The accused applied the brakes the sound of which he heard but the car knocked down the two girls. The car halted after about five to seven feet near the hedge. In cross-examination he said that he had approached the entrance to 'B' Road when the accident occurred. He did not stop his car as he had to go to Congress House—a conduct displayed usually in such cases. He further asserted in answer to Court question that the girls were knocked down on the pedestrian crossing opposite the Bus Stop.

The accused in his written statement and in his oral statement before the learned Magistrate said that, he was driving his car at a speed of twenty to twenty-five miles per hour when the girls were knocked down, that the girls came running from the front of the cars on his left hand and then directly into the path of his car. He applied his brakes. At the time of the incident the girls were in between the space between the two sets of broken lines and not in the northern set of transverse lines. He applied the brakes hard and they made a screeching sound. He applied the brakes after he had crossed over the northern set of transverse lines. The tyre mark because of the application of the brakes started from the north of northern set of lines and ended within the sets. Some broken pieces of glass were behind his car. It may be mentioned that the car stopped between the two sets of the transverse lines. He examined his sister who was in the car as a defence witness.

Mr. Jethmalani has exercised his privilege of challenging the conviction.

Mr. Jethmalani contended that witness Rupsingh cannot be regarded as an independent witness but must be a got-up witness inasmuch as the incident occurred on February 15, 1964, while his statement came to be recorded on March 2, 1964, after about seventeen days. No doubt, the statement was recorded late but, on the other hand, it cannot be regarded as the fault of the police that his statement came to be recorded late. There is usually apathy of people to be involved in criminal cases even as witnesses and the police must have some difficulty in tracing the witness. In my view the learned Magistrate is right in regarding him as an independent witness.

Mr. Jethmalani contended that an attempt has been made to shift the point of impact. For this purpose he relies upon the statement of Kunda which was recorded on the next day, i.e. February 16, 1964, where she has stated that she was crossing the road from East to West in front of Natraj Hotel and she did not remember whether she was crossing through the pedestrian crossing. But then it is clear from the evidence of the medical witnesses that she was in shock and naturally, therefore, her notions must have been hazy. The fact that the marks of the brakes started from a point to the north of the northern set of the two transverse lines and stopped in the middle of those lines must necessarily show that the point of impact was at a place somewhere between the northern set of lines. The accused, finding that already an impact had taken place may have released the brakes and thereafter the car came to rest. It may also be that when she refers to the Natraj Hotel, she intended to refer to the only well-known point of identification and not exactly the southern set of transverse lines. In fact, the broken glasses of the lamps were lying near about the northern set of lines. The evidence of the police officer who has deposed to what he actually saw when he went to the scene of offence clearly shows that these two girls were knocked down only within the northern set of lines.

In connection with the evidence of the police officer regarding what he saw when he visited the scene of offence, Mr. Jethmalani made a grievance that he has practically tried to prove all the facts stated in the panchnama without examining the panchas which he says ought not to be permitted. The learned Magistrate was not prepared to rule out his evidence nor am I prepared to do so merely on this ground. The evidence shows that the two panchas and one eye-witness who was examined by the police officer almost immediately have not been traced. There is no reason why a police officer should not be able to depose to what he actually saw at the scene of offence immediately on his going there. His evidence coincides practically with the statements made by the accused himself. Having regard to these facts and having regard to the further fact that there is nothing taken out from the cross-examination of Vidya in connection with the actual site of the incident and its manner of happening, I have no doubt that the incident occurred in the northern set of transverse lines as deposed to by her and by the independent witness Rupsingh.

Mr. Jethmalani contended that even assuming that Rupsingh was driving his own car as stated by him, it is wrong to suppose that he would be in a position to speak about the speed at which the accused was driving his car. It is not possible to accept the suggestion that a man who actually drives the car would not be able to judge the speed of another car which is going almost parallel to him. Though the witness has been cross-examined, nothing substantial has been taken out to show that his estimate of the speed is very far wrong. Even assuming that his estimate of the speed of the car of the accused at forty miles cannot be exact, he cannot be said to be wrong in his estimate. The learned Magistrate has estimated the speed at which the accused was driving to be at 48 miles per hour. Mr. Jethmalani has made a grievance that the learned Magistrate was wrong in estimating the speed by adding the length of skid marks and the distance between the point where the tyre mark ended and the one where the car had halted from the table furnished by rule No. 147 framed under the Motor Vehicles Rules. To some extent there is some justification in the grievance. That would be correct if the car had stopped with a continuous application of the brakes. But apparently that is not so. It may be that after the impact the accused released the brakes and again reapplied them in which case there must be some time during which the car rolled on its own due to its momentum. Be that as it may, it seems to me that the accused must be driving at about thirty-five miles or more though probably not forty-eight miles per hour.

The question in all such cases is whether the accused was going at a reasonable speed and whether he was not sufficiently circumspect in the driving. In order to establish a charge of negligence under s. 304A of the Penal Code, it must be shown that the accident was the direct cause of the negligence or rashness of the accused. English Courts require a far higher standard of proof of negligence or rashness in a criminal prosecution as the offence in England is that of manslaughter if death is caused. The same standard cannot obtain in respect of the offence under ss. 304A and 337 of the Penal Code though no doubt the guilt must be proved beyond reasonable doubt. (See *Vishwanath Vishnu v. The King*¹ and *Rustom Sheriar Irani v. The State of Maharashtra*²).

There is a distinction between rashness and negligence. When one does an act with utter indifference to the consequences of which the doer may be conscious and which he hopes may not take place, one is said to be rash, while criminal negligence is neglect to take that precaution which a reasonable and prudent person is expected to take under the circumstances obtaining in a given case. In order to infer whether or not there is criminal rashness or negligence on the part of the accused, all relevant facts must be considered.

At one time it was suggested by Mr. Jethmalani that the pedestrian crossing was intended as a restriction for the pedestrians and not for a motor driver meaning thereby that a pedestrian must cross a road only at that point and at no other point and only when there was no car in sight. However, he ultimately gave it up. Mr. Chitale supplied me the regulations framed by the Commissioner of Police under the Bombay Police Act which define respective duties of the pedestrian and the driver of the car at these crossings. Mr. Jethmalani is right in saying that these rules were not even referred to in the trial Court. I must also confess that I myself did not know that such rules existed. When the case was first argued before me, even Mr. Chitale was not aware of them. Be that as it may, these regulations have been made under a statute and they have to be obeyed. These are published in Maharashtra Government Gazette, Part I, dated September 12, 1963, at page 1316†. Rule 4 is as follows:

"4. Pedestrian crossings.—(A) Pedestrian crossings shall be denoted by means of transverse broken lines.

(B) Prohibitions in regard to pedestrian crossings.

(i) No driver of a vehicle shall have precedence over a pedestrian who is actually on the carriageway at such crossing. The driver or rider shall stop before reaching the crossing till such pedestrian has crossed the carriageway provided that there is no policeman controlling traffic at or near such crossing or no signal is installed.

(ii) No driver of a vehicle while approaching a road intersection where for the time being traffic is controlled by a policeman or by signalling device, shall proceed till the pedestrians who were on the carriageway before he received the signal to proceed, have crossed safely to the kerb.

(iii) No driver of any vehicle shall cause such vehicle or any part thereof to stop upon any crossing unless either:—

pedestrian to cross the road. Having regard to cl. (v) of the Regulation which imposes a restriction on the pedestrian, the least that one can say is that the driver of a vehicle approaching a pedestrian crossing must keep a look out to see if any pedestrian is trying to cross the road at that point. Even if one assumes that these rules may not be known to all motor drivers, which they are bound to know, even so, the ordinary prudent man would approach a pedestrian crossing in such a way that he should be able to stop the car when it reaches it if necessary. In other words he would not continue the normally high speed when he is nearing a crossing. Mr. Jethmalani referred me to *London Passenger Transport Board v. Upson*³ where English Regulations came to be considered. We have a different set of regulations and the case could not be very relevant. But some of the general observations are useful. Lord Porter at p. 162 says:

"...if the driver could and ought to have seen the plaintiff hurrying towards the crossing before she reached the taxi-cab and to have anticipated that she was about to or might hasten across the crossing and did not do so, undoubtedly he would be guilty of negligence at common law."

At p. 176 Lord du Pareq referred to the following observations of Lord Dunedin with approval in Fardon v. Harcourt-Rivington:⁴

"...If the possibility of the danger emerging is reasonably apparent, then to take no precautions is negligence; but if the possibility of danger emerging is only a mere possibility which would never occur to the mind of a reasonable man, then there is no negligence in not having taken extraordinary precautions."

Lord Morton of Henryton said (p. 181):

"...To my mind, the failure of the driver to keep a look-out on the near-side pavement, coupled with his failure either to slow down or to sound his horn, afford ample evidence to support a finding of negligence at common law."

It seems to me that the principles involved in these statements are applicable in the present case. These observations suggest that a person who is driving a motor car owes a duty to the members of the public to keep a look-out on the road and more so when approaching a pedestrian crossing where he would normally expect a pedestrian to cross the road. The reasoning in this case also suggests that regard must be paid to the habits of the public.

Mr. Jethmalani contended that in any event as there were two other cars to the left of the accused, his vision was obstructed. But it is wrong to say that he could not have seen the girls crossing the road. It is not his case that he was behind any of the cars travelling on his left because he says that he was not overtaking any of the cars. Rupsing says they were in a line. Now, if that is so, when the width of the road which the girls had to cross was about 12.8 meters i.e. at least about forty feet if not more, it cannot be pretended that he did not notice them. If the girls were walking at ordinary pace of four miles per hour then if the accused were travelling even at thirty miles per hour he would be at a distance of about eighty meters when the girls entered the crossing from the kerb. If he had been watchful he would have seen the girls entering the road from a distance of about eighty meters.

The day was a Saturday, it was 5.30 P.M. and the accused was nearing a pedestrian crossing. The boards notifying the same could be seen from quite a distance. The accused was, therefore, bound to have his car under such control that he could stop if necessary at the crossing. If he had been on the look-out he could, even from a distance of about eighty meters of the crossing, have seen the girls entering the road between the two lines. It was too late when he applied the brakes. If he had seen them and still continued at the same speed at which he was going, he was too rash. Though Mr. Jethmalani has not referred to the evidence of Padma (D.W. 1), the sister of the accused, I have read the evidence. She does not carry his case any further. On the contrary she admits that the "girls did not run. They walked against the mudguard". Having regard to all the circumstances I have no doubt that the accident was the result of negligence and rashness on the part of the accused.

Mr. Adik, who took over on the second occasion, relied upon the decision of *Leicester v. Pearson*⁵ where the Court was construing the provisions of English regulations. The circumstances under which the case arose were as follows:

"The lighting in the neighbourhood of the crossing was poor, it was raining, and the road surface was in poor condition. At about 5.30 p.m. a woman, pushing an empty perambulator, and accompanied by her child, aged two, started to cross the pedestrian crossing from the east side. That side of the road was flanked by trees which cast shadows on the road. On the west side, to which the pedestrian was crossing, light showed through the windows of shops. While the pedestrian was within the limits of the crossing, the defendant, driving a motor-car at a reasonable and proper speed in the prevailing circumstances, approached the crossing from the south. The defendant did not see the pedestrian till she was on the crown of the road although there was no physical obstruction which prevented him from seeing either the woman or the crossing. When the defendant saw her he was seven or eight yards from the crossing. He applied his brakes and the car skidded and collided with the perambulator, thereby causing the child to be knocked over."

Devlin J. observed that it would be quite unreasonable to suppose that an absolute prohibition or an absolute obligation would be intended by saying to a driver: "You shall let so-and-so go first," or, "You shall accord so-and-so precedence." Assuming that I would be justified in importing such meaning into our regulations, even so, having regard to the manner in which the accused was driving at the time and place and on the day in question without the disabilities in that case, I must agree with the finding made by the learned Magistrate that the accident occurred as the accused was negligent and rash in driving his car, even if the above regulations are disregarded and it is impossible to sustain the contention of Mr. Jethmalani that the conviction was erroneous.

The next question is about the sentence. The learned Magistrate has observed that Kunda and Vidya themselves contributed in a measure to the accident. In other words, he finds contributory negligence on the part of these two girls. I do not see how the learned Magistrate could find contributory negligence on their part. He does not even refer to the evidence of Vidya whose evidence appears to be straightforward. She denied that on seeing the cars they ran. Padma (D.W. 1) also says so. There is no substance in the suggestion that there was contributory negligence on their part. It is not the law and it cannot be the law that unless there was no car on the road no pedestrian is to cross the road even at a pedestrian crossing since the condition can rarely be satisfied. In view of what I have stated above, once the reason for imposing only a sentence of fine, which, according to the learned Magistrate, was the contributory negligence on the part of the girls disappears, the sentence of only fine is highly inadequate even if the fine might otherwise appear comparatively to be heavier. Mr. Jethmalani has referred me to *Emperor v. Khan-Mohamed*⁶ and urged that merely because death is caused, sentence of imprisonment need not be imposed. Sentence is a matter of discretion and the limits cannot be fixed by judicial precedents for all time in the future. True, the discretion is of the trial Court and the High Court would not ordinarily interfere with the exercise thereof. Yet having regard to what I have stated above and the fact that the sentence must be such as to serve as a deterrent to others, as also what Mr. Adik has said about the accused it is necessary to impose substantive sentence of imprisonment.

Having regard to all the circumstances of the case, I direct that the accused do suffer simple imprisonment for a period of six months for the offence under s. 304A of the Penal Code in addition to the sentences in respect of both the offences imposed by the learned trial Magistrate. Warrant to issue.

CRIMINAL REFERENCE.

Before Mr. Justice Naik and Mr. Justice Palekar.

SHANKERRAO BASWANAPPA v. TEJABAI.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 488—Woman living separate from husband whether entitled to maintenance on ground that he has contracted marriage with another—Desertion by wife at anterior date whether disentitles her to maintenance—Marriage referred to in explanation to proviso in s. 488(3) whether refers to only second marriage.

A wife living separate from her husband on the ground that her husband has contracted marriage with another wife, is entitled to maintenance under s. 488 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898.

The proper approach to the case of such a husband's offer to maintain on condition of his wife's living with him, whether made before the issue of any order under s. 488(1) of the Code, or, after the issue of the order under s. 488(3) of the Code, would be to hold that there was no valid offer by the husband to maintain his wife. And, if there was no such offer, it must be held in view of the contest raised to the claim that there had been either neglect or refusal to maintain the wife within the meaning of s. 488(1) of the Code.

Thagubai v. Vedu Khusal Patil,¹ Ramji Malviya v. Smt. Munni Devi,² *Sm. Bela Rani v. Bhupal Chandra*³ and Kuppa Mudali,⁴ referred to.

Desertion by the wife at some anterior date is not made a ground under s. 488 of the Code for disallowing maintenance. It is her refusal to go back to her husband, when a genuine offer is made which disentitles her to maintenance.

*Ishar v. Soma Devi*⁵ and Ramji Malviya v. Smt. Munni Devi,⁶ doubted.

The marriage referred to in the explanation to the proviso under s. 488(3) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, may have been contracted at any time and will refer to the first as well as the second marriage.

PALEKAR J. This is a reference by the learned Additional Sessions Judge, Latur, arising out of an order passed under s. 488, Criminal Procedure Code, by the learned Judicial Magistrate, F.C., Udgir, awarding separate maintenance at the rate of Rs. 30 per month to the wife. The wife, Tejabai, was married to Shankarrao Baswanappa in about 1954, when she was a minor. Shankarrao had a first wife living at the time. Tejabai filed the application under s. 488, Criminal Procedure Code, on November 29, 1963, alleging that she was treated well for about a year after the marriage, and that, she was ill-treated thereafter, and, finally, beaten and driven out of the house on November 23, 1963. She, therefore, claimed maintenance at the rate of Rs. 50 p.m., pointing out that her husband had an annual agricultural income of Rs. 3,000 and used to earn Rs. 90 p.m. by way of salary as a Talathi. The allegations of ill-treatment were denied by the husband. He alleged that Tejabai lived with him for about eight years after her marriage, and that she had left him and gone away to her parent's house at the time of Nagpanchami in the year before the application was filed. He further alleged that he had called her to his house, but, she was refusing to return to him. He, therefore, contended that she was not entitled to any maintenance.

The learned Judicial Magistrate held that the alleged ill treatment had not been proved. At the same time he was of the opinion that she was entitled to claim separate maintenance, "neglect or refusal to maintain" being presumed on account of the husband having another wife. He, therefore, ordered that the husband Shankarrao should pay Rs. 30 p.m. as maintenance to her.

Shankarrao, thereupon, filed a revision petition in the Court of the Sessions Judge at Latur. The learned Additional Sessions Judge held that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction to pass the order of maintenance merely on the ground of Shankarrao having a second wife. He was of the view that the amendment to sub-s. (3) of s. 488, Criminal Procedure Code, by Act IX of 1949 did not enlarge the ambit of the provision of s. 488(1) of the Criminal Procedure Code and did not supply a new ground for claiming maintenance.

Both the Courts have held that there was no ill-treatment of the wife. That is a finding of fact and is binding on this Court. The wife Tejabai had put forward the ground of ill-treatment as the cause of her staying with her parents, but, since the ill-treatment has not been proved, it must be held that she had voluntarily left her husband's house to stay with her parents. The question is whether, living separate from her husband, she is entitled to claim maintenance under s. 488, Criminal Procedure Code, on the ground that her husband has contracted marriage with another wife.

Sub-section (1) of s. 488, Criminal Procedure Code, provides that, if any person having sufficient means neglects or refuses to maintain his wife ... a magistrate of the first class may, upon proof of such neglect or refusal, order such person to make a monthly allowance for the maintenance of his wife ... Sub-section (2) of s. 488 provides for payment of such allowance from the date of the order or of the application for maintenance. Sub-section (3) is important. It says—

"If any person so ordered fails without sufficient cause to comply with the order, any such Magistrate may, for every breach of the order, issue a warrant for levying the amount due ... and may sentence such person, for the whole or any part of each month's allowance remaining unpaid after the execution of the warrant, to imprisonment for a term which may extend to one month or until payment if sooner made:

Provided that, if such person offers to maintain his wife on condition of her living with him, and she refuses to live with him, such Magistrate may consider any grounds of refusal stated by her, and may make an order under this section notwithstanding such offer, if he is satisfied that there is just ground for so doing.

If a husband has contracted marriage with another wife or keeps a mistress, it shall be considered to be just ground for his wife's refusal to live with him."

This last provision, which explains the words "just ground" in the proviso in its application to a particular situation, has been added by s. 2 of Act IX of 1949. That brings us to sub-s. (4) of s. 488 which provides that, no wife shall be entitled to receive an allowance from her husband under this section if she is living in adultery, or if, without any sufficient reason, she refuses to live with her husband, or if they are living separately by mutual consent.

There has been considerable divergence of opinion as to whether the proviso under sub-s. (3) referred to above is a proviso to sub-s. (3) only or, to sub-s. (1). This Court has taken the view that it is a proviso to sub-s. (1) ... See, for example, Thagubai v. Vedu Khusal Patil.¹ Some other High Courts have taken the view that it is a proviso to sub-s. (3) only and will come into play when the offer has been made after an order has been passed granting maintenance under sub-s. (1). The point of view put forward is that the order for maintenance can be made only under sub-s. (1) of s. 488 when two requirements have been fulfilled, viz., that the husband, in the case of a wife, has sufficient means, and yet neglects or refuses to maintain her. Once an order has been passed under sub-s. (1), sub-s. (3) deals with the case, where, in execution of that order, the husband comes forward and offers to maintain his wife, and, that sub-section permits the magistrate to consider if there are any "just grounds" for the wife to refuse to live with her husband. If "just grounds" are made out, he may issue an order under sub-s. (3). But, if just grounds are not made out for living separately from the husband, the magistrate, notwithstanding the order made under sub-s. (1), may pass an order disallowing the maintenance by the execution of that order. What was "just ground" under the proviso to sub-s. (3) was always a matter of opinion on the facts of each case, but, after the Hindu Married Women's Right to Separate Residence and Maintenance Act, XIX of 1946, made provision for separate maintenance to a wife whose husband took a second wife, the Legislature thought that a similar provision should be made by suitably amending s. 488 to meet a similar situation. In other words, if after an order had been passed granting maintenance under sub-s. (1), that order was sought to be executed under sub-s. (3), it would be no longer open to the Magistrate to refuse execution of that order on the ground that the wife refuses to live with her husband due to his having contracted marriage with another wife. In that view, some High Courts have held that the explanation cannot be made a ground for granting maintenance but must be regarded as making special provision in relation to the execution proceedings, when an order for maintenance has already been made under sub-s. (1).

1959, decided by Naik J., on December 16,

But, what happens when the husband offers to maintain his wife on condition of living with him before any order under sub-s. (1) is passed? Sub-section (4) is the answer. That sub-section says that, no wife shall be entitled to receive an allowance from her husband under this section . . . if, without any sufficient reason, she refuses to live with her husband. It will be seen that in the proviso to sub-s. (3), the words used are "just ground", and, in sub-s. (4), the words used are "sufficient reason". In view of the enactment of 1946, already referred to, it may be taken as a principle of general acceptance that, if a husband contracts marriage with another wife, the wife would be justified in refusing to live with him, and, what is a "just ground" for the proviso under sub-s. (3) would also be a "sufficient reason" under sub-s. (4). In Ramji Malviya v. Smt. Murni Devi,² Desai J., as he then was, observed, with reference to the proviso under sub-s. (3) and sub-s. (4), as follows (p. 768):

"...Sub-section (4) governs the whole section including sub-s. (1); no maintenance can be granted to a wife under sub-s. (1) if she is living in adultery, or if without any sufficient reason she refuses to live with her husband, or if she and her husband are living separately by mutual consent. In the face of sub-s. (4) it was unnecessary for the legislature to apply the first proviso [to sub-s. (3)] to sub-s. (1) also. The proviso seems to have been enacted in order to give the husband one more opportunity of offering to maintain the wife on condition of her living with him. He might not have made such an offer while the application for maintenance under sub-s. (1) was pending against him; he might have thought that the wife would not succeed in proving a sufficient reason for her living separately from him.

So the legislature might have enacted the proviso [to sub-s. (3)] to give him the right to make such an offer when an order made against him under sub-s. (1) was sought to be enforced through issue of a warrant...

...Though the proviso governs only sub-s. (3), the provision that remarriage by the husband is a just ground for the wife's refusal to live with him lays down a general principle, which must be borne in mind when it is to be considered whether the wife's refusal to live with her husband is without any sufficient reason within the meaning of sub-s. (4). A just ground for refusal to live with the husband must necessarily be a sufficient reason. A sufficient reason may not be a just ground, but a just ground must always be a sufficient reason."

It is, therefore, really not necessary to decide whether the proviso to sub-s. (3) governs sub-s. (1), or, only sub-s. (3), so far as the ground of the wife's refusal to stay with her husband is concerned. As pointed out in the case cited above (Ramji Malviya v. Smt. Munni Devi), it is open to the husband to make his offer to maintain his wife on condition of her living with him before any order under sub-s. (1) is passed, and, when such an offer is made, the wife is entitled to point out that the husband has contracted a marriage with another wife, and, therefore, it was a sufficient reason for her not to live with him. It will be, therefore, seen that, in view of sub-s. (4), it will make no material difference to the situation arising from the wife's refusal to live with her husband on the ground that he has contracted another marriage, whether the proviso in sub-s. (3) is read as a proviso to sub-s. (1) or to sub-s. (3).

In *Sm. Bela Rani v. Bhupal Chandra*³ a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court took the view that, the mere fact of a second marriage cannot ipso facto establish "such neglect or refusal" within the meaning of sub-s. (1) of s. 488, Criminal Procedure Code, the reason given being that, a man may marry a second time and still not refuse to maintain his first wife. It was held that the mere fact that a husband has contracted marriage with another wife or keeps a mistress cannot, without more, be said to amount to neglect or refusal on the part of the husband to maintain his wife within the meaning of sub-s. (1) of s. 488, Criminal Procedure Code. This view has been expressly dissented from in this Court by my learned brother, Mr. Justice Naik, in Thagubai v. Vedu Khusal Patil. The learned Judge observed:

"...The very fact that the wife is entitled to live separately from the husband is sufficient to show that she has a right to claim maintenance from the husband. Of course, it will be open to the husband to provide separate maintenance for the wife if she is living away from him. In case, however, the husband does not provide separate maintenance, then the only conclusion that would follow is that he is refusing or neglecting to perform his duty qua husband. On this basis, it can even be said that the case would fall within the ambit of the words 'neglects or refuses to maintain'..." It may not be quite accurate to say that the explanation to the proviso to sub-s. (3) supplies a further ground to the wife for claiming maintenance under s. 488. The basis for passing an order under sub-s. (1) of s. 488 is 'neglect or refusal to maintain' by a person having the means. There can be no two opinions on the question that there should be either neglect or refusal to maintain before a wife is entitled to claim maintenance under that section. The question, therefore, is not whether the explanation to the proviso to sub-s. (3) gives a new ground for claiming maintenance, but the question is, whether the offer made by the husband to a wife, entitled to live separately, that, he will maintain her on condition of living with him does or does not virtually amount to a refusal to maintain her. We think, there could be only one answer to that question. When the husband knows that the wife has 'sufficient reason' or 'just ground' to live separately from him, the offer to maintain her on condition of living with him is not a valid offer at all. It is merely an evasion of his liability to maintain his wife who is destitute. That, in our opinion, really amounts to a refusal within the meaning of s. 488(1). When the wife makes an application for maintenance, the husband contests that application by making an offer to maintain her on condition that she lives with him, though, he knows that she was entitled to remain separate from him by reason of his contracting another marriage. The offer is made with the knowledge that the refusal would be the only answer. In such a case, therefore, the offer cannot be considered a valid offer, but, only an indirect way of refusing to maintain. The proviso to sub-s. (3) read with its explanation does not create a new ground for claiming maintenance but requires the magistrate to test the validity of the offer made by the husband to the wife to live with him. Similar is the position when the offer is made under sub-s. (4). If the offer is not valid, there is nothing for the magistrate to consider further, and, in view of the fact that a destitute wife is entitled to maintenance from a husband having sufficient means, an order for maintenance or for its execution must be passed. It makes no difference whether the offer is made before the issue of any order under sub-s. (1), or, after the issue of the order under sub-s. (3). As already stated, the question to be considered is whether there has been neglect or refusal to maintain within the meaning of sub-s. (1) of s. 488. It has been long held that a refusal or neglect must be a refusal or neglect in presenti, that is, at the time of the proceedings... (See Kuppa Mudali)⁴. The magistrate having jurisdiction under s. 488(1) will have to consider whether at the time of the proceeding before him, there has been a neglect or refusal to maintain the wife. If he comes to that conclusion, he has no alternative but to pass an order of maintenance.

Considerations extraneous to the requirements of that section cannot be entertained. Observations have been made in some of the reported cases to the effect that a husband is relieved from the obligation to maintain his wife so long as she voluntarily remains absent. (See Ishar v. Soma Devi)⁵. Or, that, where a wife deserts her husband first without any sufficient reason and the desertion continues for 4-5 years in spite of the husband pressing her to live with him with the result that the husband remarries and the desertion continues thereafter, the wife, in such a case, is not entitled to claim maintenance under sub-s. (1) merely because of her husband's remarriage. (See Ramji Malviya v. Smt. Munni Devi). It is, undoubtedly, true that in a majority of cases, where the wife voluntarily leaves her husband and refuses to return to her husband without a just ground or sufficient reason, it may be a good ground for refusing maintenance to her. But, the situation may radically change if the husband remarries. In the last mentioned case the wife was held to be disentitled to maintenance from the husband, because, she had deserted him and he was required to take a second wife, after several years, to look after their minor daughter. We doubt very much, with respect, if such considerations can legitimately enter into the question as to whether maintenance should be allowed under sub-s. (1) of s. 488. It would appear that the wife had been penalised, because, she had deserted her husband. It may be that, on account of the callous manner in which she deserted her husband while their child was young, she deserved no better treatment. But, these are extraneous considerations for the purpose of sub-s. (1). Desertion by the wife at some anterior date is not made a ground under the section for disallowing maintenance. It is her refusal to go back to her husband when a genuine offer is made which disentitles her to maintenance. For the purposes of that section, the Magistrate has to see whether the wife is destitute, and, the husband having means has refused or neglected to maintain her. If he finds that these requirements are fulfilled in presenti, that is, at the date of the proceeding, it would be no answer to her claim that some five years previously, she had voluntarily deserted her husband. In our opinion, the proper approach to the case of a husband's offer and wife's refusal to live with her husband on account of the remarriage would be to hold that there was no valid offer by the husband to maintain his wife. And, if there was no such offer, it must be held for the purposes of s. 488(1) that there had been either neglect or refusal to maintain the wife.

In the present case, the learned magistrate had rightly come to the conclusion that the wife was entitled to stay away from her husband and claim separate maintenance, because, a refusal to maintain her could be spelt out from the written-statement filed by the husband and the contest he raised to the application.

It is next contended that the 'just ground' or 'sufficient reason' of a husband contracting marriage with another wife was only available to the first wife vis- a-vis the second, and, not the second wife vis-a-vis the first. It is contended that the provision was not made for the benefit of the wife, who, with open eyes, marries a husband, who has already contracted a marriage. We do not think that we can accept this argument. We know that the second wife is many a time a minor when she is married, and, is hardly responsible for her marriage. It may also happen in some cases that a man may marry a second wife keeping her in ignorance of his first marriage. To refuse a second wife maintenance on this ground would, therefore, be clearly unjustified. Moreover, there is nothing in the explanation to the proviso which compels us to put the particular interpretation suggested. The words "if a husband has contracted marriage with another wife" are quite general in terms. The dichotomy between "has contracted marriage with another wife" and "keeps a mistress" is obvious. So far as the keeping of the mistress is concerned, the verb "keep" is used in its present tense. But, so far as the contracting of marriage is concerned, the verb is present perfect viz. "has contracted". The marriage may have been contracted at any time and will refer to the first as well as the second marriage. Much the same view has been taken of this provision by the Calcutta High Court in Kunti Bala Dasi v. Nabin Chandra.⁶ There too, the application for maintenance under s. 488 had been made by a second wife. It was held that there was nothing in the explanation to the proviso under sub-s. (3) of s. 488 which prevented a second wife from making an application for separate maintenance on the ground that the first wife had been living. The learned Judge observed (p. 108) :

"...This proviso obviously places the wife on a stronger footing. It has been contended, however, on behalf of the husband that this proviso means that its benefit can be taken only by the first wife when her husband marries for the second time and that so far as the second wife is concerned she is not entitled to the benefit of it except where the husband takes one wife or more after her (that is, the second wife's) marriage. In my opinion, there is nothing in the proviso justifying such limited construction of it. The phrase used in the proviso is 'has contracted' and not 'contracts'. The former phrase is, in my opinion, sufficiently wide to entitle the second wife to its benefit even in case where the husband has not married for the third time during the lifetime of the second wife. That being the position, when on the facts of the present case it has been proved that the husband is living with the first wife, that would be just ground on the part of the second wife to refuse to live with him even if he made an offer to the second wife inviting her to live with him at the same house with the first wife." We agree, with respect, with the view stated above. In our opinion, the order passed by the learned Magistrate is correct.

The rule is, therefore, discharged.

Rule discharged.

Section 394 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, 1888, is intra vires the State Legislature.

Calter (India) Ltd. v. Director W. B. F. Services,¹ agreed with.

The provisions of Entry No. 53 in List I of the Seventh Schedule to the Constitution of India, and the provisions of Entries Nos. 1, 5 and 6 in List II of the Constitution do not stand in conflict with one another.

It will be clear from the object, scheme and design of the impugned legislation that the Legislature wanted to provide for topics which clearly fall in List II. The pith and substance of the impugned legislation, therefore, is not to deal with or dabble in petroleum and petroleum products as such, but to devise special measures for ensuring the protection and safety of the citizens of a crowded city like Bombay. In so far as the Parliament has passed a legislation which makes provision for these matters, it can, in a sense, be said that there is some amount of impingement or encroachment or trespass into the field of legislation reserved for the Parliament. But the extent of invasion is insignificant and the provisions made have no relation to the field which has already been occupied by the Central Legislation (the Petroleum Act, 1934), but they concern the field which has been left unoccupied by the Central Legislation.

Quære: Whether the provisions contained in clauses (a) and (b) of s. 31 of the Petroleum Act, 1934, are valid after the promulgation of the Constitution of India.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. B. Ganatra and P. M. Doshi, for the accused.

R. B. Kotwal, Government Pleader, for the State.

NAIK J. The appellant, who would hereafter be called the accused, was convicted under s. 471 read with s. 394(1)(a)(ii) of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 201, in default, to undergo 15 days' rigorous imprisonment. The accused has preferred an appeal from the order of conviction and sentence. It was noticed that the vires of s. 394 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act was called in question, and, therefore, a notice was issued to the Advocate-General. The learned Government Pleader has appeared on behalf of the State as also on behalf of the Advocate-General. When the matter came up for hearing before me sitting singly, a request was made by Mr. Ganatra on behalf of the accused, and also by the learned Government Pleader that, in view of the importance of the question involved, the case may be referred to a Division Bench. Accordingly, the criminal appeal has been referred to a Division Bench, and, that is how, the matter has come up before us for final decision.

The accused has been keeping lubricating oil in Plot No. 56-58 at Mazgaon without a valid permit from the Municipal Commissioner. On November 26, 1962, an inspector visited the premises and found that lubricating oil was kept stored in 162 drums. It was found that each of these drums contained 45 gallons. The total quantity of lubricating oil came to 7290 gallons. A complaint was lodged on February 8, 1963, against the accused for contravention of the provisions of s. 394(I) (a) (ii).

*Decided, January 21/22, 1965. Criminal Appeal No. 1788 of 1963, against the order of conviction and sentence passed by M. Y. Gupte,

The accused pleaded not guilty to the charge. He contended that s. 394(I) (a) (ii) read with Schedule M of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act was ultra vires Entry No. 53, List I, of Seventh Schedule of the Constitution of India. He also contended that the provisions of s. 394 are in conflict with the provisions of the Petroleum Act, 1934 (Central Act No. XXX of 1934). The trying Magistrate rejected the defence set up on behalf of the accused and found the accused guilty of the offence with which he was charged and convicted and sentenced him as stated above. It is against that judgment that the accused has come up in appeal.

The points urged by Mr. Ganatra on behalf of the accused may be outlined as follows:—

(1) The provisions of s. 394(I) (a) (ii) read with Schedule M, Part II (a), (b) and (c) are ultra vires art. 246 read with Entries 53, 93 and 95 of List I, Seventh Schedule, of the Constitution of India.

(2) Assuming that the impugned legislation fell in any of the entries in List II, the impugned section substantially and seriously encroached upon the Union field of legislation, viz., Entry No. 53 and the Petroleum Act of 1934.

(3) The impugned section is inconsistent with the provisions of the Petroleum Act of 1934 and, therefore, void.

(4) In view of s. 31 of the Petroleum Act and the notification issued thereunder, the provisions of the impugned section must be read subject to all the provisions of the Petroleum Act.

(5) The impugned section infringes the fundamental right of the accused guaranteed under art. 19(I) (f) and (g).

Before proceeding to discuss the merits of these contentions, it will be convenient to set out the arguments advanced by the learned Government Pleader. They are—

(1) The impugned Act is within the legislative competence of the State Legislature under Entries 1, 5, 6, 25, 64 and 65. According to the doctrine of pith and substance, the object, purpose and design of the impugned Act is not to legislate on petroleum or petroleum products, but to legislate for the purposes of securing public order, public health and hygiene and to regulate trade and commerce for that purpose and confer necessary powers to the municipality in that regard, and, also to provide for penalties for contravention of the regulations.

(2) As petroleum happens to be a hazardous article, the impugned Act makes provision for controlling or regulating the storage and possession of the petroleum for achieving the objects mentioned above, viz., securing of the public order, public health and hygiene and to regulate trade and commerce. These provisions, however, are ancillary to the main purpose of the Act. At best, the provisions may make an incidental inroad or entrenchment on the topic of petroleum, but such incidental encroachment does not constitute usurpation of the powers of the Union Legislature.

(3) Once it is held that the Act is within the competence of the State Legislature, the question of repugnancy raised on behalf of the accused does not survive for consideration.

(4) Assuming that the question of repugnancy is relevant, in fact, there is no repugnancy nor any collision between the impugned Act and the Petroleum Act.

(5) That in respect of heavy oil (flashing point of which is above 200°F), all that the impugned Act does is to occupy a field which has been left unoccupied by the Petroleum Act. It will not be correct to say that the impugned provision reoccupies a field already occupied by the Petroleum Act.

(6) In respect of petroleum, the flashing point of which is below 200°F, the Petroleum Act is silent and makes no provisions. In fact, s. 31 contemplates occupation of the field left unoccupied by the State enactments. Such occupation, therefore, is clearly permissible.

(7) The impugned provision in no way infringes the fundamental right guaranteed under art. 19(1) (f) and (g).

In order to appreciate the rival contentions raised on behalf of the parties, it is necessary first of all to see what is the nature, scope and ambit of the impugned provision. In every case, where the vires of an enactment are challenged, the proper approach is to consider the real nature, purpose and design of the impugned enactment and see whether the enactment falls within any of the items assigned to the Legislature which has passed the enactment.

The first provision to be considered in that connection is s. 394 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, the vires of which have been called in question in these proceedings. Section 394, as it stood before its amendment by Maharashtra Act No. XXXII of 1962, in effect provided—

“(1) Except under and in conformity with the terms and conditions of a licence granted by the Commissioner, no person shall—

(a) keep, in or upon any premises, for any purpose whatever,

(i) any article specified in Part I of Schedule M, or

(ii) any article specified in Part II of Schedule M, in excess of the quantity therein prescribed as the maximum quantity of such article which may at any one time be kept in or upon the same premises without a licence.”

The sub-s. (1) of s. 394 as amended after 1962 is substantially similar to the section before amendment. Important changes, however, have been effected in the Schedule. So far as Part II of Schedule M is concerned the quantity of petroleum, which was permissible for being kept with a licence in any premises, was upto 10 gallons. Schedule M has been completely overhauled by the Amending Act No. XXXII of 1962. The “Statement of Objects and Reasons” runs as follows:

“Section 394 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act provides that certain articles shall not be kept, and certain trades shall not be carried on, without a licence, because they are dangerous or likely to create a nuisance. Since it is noticed that fires and explosions occur in the City due to unauthorised or negligent storage and handling of explosive or dangerous materials in or near residential buildings resulting in considerable loss of life and property, the question of tightening up the law was engaging the attention of Government. It is now proposed to make better provision for the prevention of fire, explosion and other danger to life, health and property where such articles are stored or such trades and processes are carried on. The control and supervision of the Commissioner will be stricter and the punishment for defaulters more severe.”

The preamble to Act No. XXXII of 1962 substantially incorporates these objects. The preamble runs thus:

“WHEREAS, it is expedient to make better provision for the prevention of fire, explosion and other danger to life, health and property in premises where certain articles are stored, and certain trades and processes are carried on, and for that and certain other purposes further to amend the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act;...”

Turning to Schedule M Part II, mineral oils with which we are concerned in this case fall under the category “A—Combustible Liquids”. Schedule M, Part II (b) provides that, mineral oils of all kinds (Flash point above 76°F); oils of all kinds excluding essential and mineral oils; paints of all kinds (Flash point above 76°F); ...shall not be kept without a licence in or upon any premises exceeding 50 litres. Part II (c) of Schedule M provides that, mineral oils of all kinds (Flash point below 76°F); paints of all kinds (Flash point below 76°F); varnish (Flash point below 76°F); ...shall not be kept without a licence in or upon any premises exceeding 10 litres.

It was contended by Mr. Ganatra that s. 394, in effect, legislates upon a topic which falls in Entry 53 of List I, Seventh Schedule of the Constitution of India. Entry No. 53 runs thus:

“Regulation and development of oilfields and mineral oil resources; petroleum and petroleum products; other liquids and substances declared by Parliament by law to be dangerously inflammable”.

In this connection, Mr. Ganatra pointed out that the Indian Legislature had passed an Act known as Petroleum Act, 1934, which relates to the import, transport, storage, production, refining and blending of petroleum and other inflammable substances. It is necessary to refer to some of the provisions of this Act without which it will be difficult to understand the significance of the expressions “Flashing Point above 76°F” and “Flashing point below 76°F”, etc. “Flashing Point” has been defined in s. 2(c) of the Petroleum Act, 1934, as—“‘flashing point’ of any petroleum means the lowest temperature at which it yields a vapour which will give a momentary flash when ignited, determined in accordance with the provisions of Chapter II and the rules made thereunder;”.

Chapter II of the Petroleum Act, 1934, relates to “Testing of Petroleum”. “Dangerous Petroleum” has been defined in s. 2(b) to mean, “petroleum having its flashing-point below seventy six degree Fahrenheit”. We will refer to the other relevant provisions of this Act as we proceed with the discussion of the points urged and also when we will consider the arguments advanced by Mr. Ganatra relating to the possible conflict or repugnancy of the provisions of the legislation of the State Legislature and the legislation of the Indian Legislature of 1934.

In addition to the Petroleum Act, 1934, the Parliament had passed another enactment known as “Inflammable Substances Act, 1952” (Act No. XX of 1952). It will be recalled that Entry No. 53 of List I, Seventh Schedule, not only relates to petroleum and petroleum products but also relates to other liquids and substances declared by Parliament by law to be dangerously inflammable. The object of the Inflammable Substances Act, 1952, is to declare certain substances to be dangerously inflammable. It is not necessary to refer to the provisions of this enactment any further so far as the decision of the present case is concerned.

Mr. Ganatra contended that the entry “petroleum and petroleum products” must be interpreted liberally, and, not in a doctrinaire, restricted and pedantic sense. These are words of wide amplitude and his argument was that these words are not qualified by words, such as regulation and development, which qualify the first Part of the entry relating to the oilfields and mineral oil resources. Mr. Ganatra, therefore, contended that it is the exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament to pass legislation on every aspect relating to petroleum and petroleum products, such as, storage, import, possession, transport, etc. He also pointed out that the Indian Legislature has actually passed a comprehensive legislation covering import, transport, storage, production, refining and blending of petroleum and other inflammable substances. The word “petroleum” has been defined in s. 2(a) of the Petroleum Act, 1934, to mean “any liquid hydrocarbon or mixture of hydrocarbons, and any inflammable mixture (liquid, viscous or solid) containing any liquid hydrocarbon”.

The comments by the Chief Inspector of Explosives show that crude oil and lubricating oils fall within the general description “liquid hydrocarbon or mixture of hydrocarbons”. Chapter I of the Petroleum Act, 1934, relates to “control over petroleum”. Section 3(1) provides—

“No one shall import, transport or store any petroleum save in accordance with the rules made under section 4”.

Sub-section (2) of s. 3 provides—

“Save in accordance with the conditions of any licence for the purpose which he may be required to obtain by rules made under section 4, no one shall import any dangerous petroleum, and no one shall transport or store any petroleum”.

Mr. Ganatra emphasized the word “store” and pointed out that even for the purpose of storage, a licence is required, and the storing is required to be made in accordance with the conditions of the licence. Section 4 empowers the Central Government to make rules for the import, transport and storage of petroleum. Clauses (a), (b) and (c) of s. 4 relate to the import and the conditions governing the import. Clauses (d) and (e) relate to the regulation of the transport. Clauses (f) and (g) relate to regulations about storage. It is necessary to set out these clauses in full:

"The Central Government may make rules ...

(f) regulating the places at which and prescribing the conditions subject to which petroleum may be stored;

(g) specifying the nature, situation and condition of all receptacles in which petroleum may be stored."

Clause (h) relates both to transport and storage and the form and conditions of licence for the import in regard to the same. It is not necessary to refer to cls. (i), (j) and (k). Clause (I) runs thus:—

"(1) generally, providing for any matter which in its opinion is expedient for proper control over the import, transport and storage of petroleum".

Section 7 provides:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Chapter, a person need not obtain a licence for the transport or storage of non-dangerous petroleum if the total quantity in his possession at any one place does not exceed five hundred gallons and none of it is contained in a receptacle exceeding two hundred gallons in capacity".

Section 8(I) provides:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Chapter, a person need not obtain a licence for the import, transport or storage of dangerous petroleum not intended for sale if the total quantity in his possession does not exceed six gallons".

Section 11 speaks of exemption of heavy oils and provides:—

"Nothing in this Chapter shall apply to any petroleum which has its flashing-point not below two hundred degrees Fahrenheit".

Chapter II of the said Act relates to "The Testing of Petroleum". Chapter III relates to "Penalties and Procedure". Chapter IV incorporates what are called supplemental provisions. Section 29 makes supplemental provisions relating to the rules and, in effect, provides that, in making any rules, the Central Government may provide for any matter ancillary to such rules. Section 31 is important and runs thus:

"Power to limit powers of local authorities over petroleum.—Where any enactment confers powers upon any local authority in respect of the transport or storage of petroleum, the Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette,—

(a) limit the operation of such enactment, or

(b) restrict the exercise of such powers, in any manner it deems fit."

It is not necessary to refer to the rules framed by the Central Government under the said Act, except to point out that "heavy petroleum" has been defined to mean "petroleum which has its flashing-point not below 150°F", (i.e. 150°F and above). Chapter IV of the Rules makes provisions for the storage of petroleum requiring licence. Chapter V of the Rules relates to the storage of petroleum not requiring licence. Rule 109, which is the first rule of Chapter V, provides for exemption of heavy petroleum. It is as under:

"Exemption of heavy petroleum.—(1) Notwithstanding anything contained in these rules, it shall be permissible to store without licence, subject to the conditions of this Chapter, heavy petroleum in quantities not exceeding 10,000 gallons which is not stored in the same installation or storage shed as other petroleum".

The learned Government Pleader, without disputing the correctness of the proposition pressed by Mr. Ganatra, viz., that the petroleum and petroleum products mentioned in Entry No. 53 of List I, Schedule 7, must receive their widest connotations, and without challenging the position that it would be open to the Parliament to legislate regarding the storage of petrol in any place in India, pointed out that, it is competent to State Government to pass legislation regulating the storage of petroleum and petroleum products in certain localities and empowering the local authority to make rules in that regard. He argued that, whereas the object of the Indian Legislature or the Parliament would be to make appropriate provisions about petroleum and petroleum products, in various aspects of these matters, it would still be competent for the State Government to pass a legislation for the storage of the petrol under Entries 1, 5, 6, 26, 64 and 65 of List II of the Seventh Schedule. As stated above, all that s. 394 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act provides is that, no person shall keep petroleum and petroleum products, except in accordance with the terms and conditions of licence granted by the Commissioner, in excess of the quantities specified as the maximum quantity in Schedule M. The object of the State legislation which empowers the Municipal Commissioner to issue licences setting out such terms and conditions as he finds necessary and desirable is to ensure the purposes set out in the various items mentioned above in List II.

Before coming to the entries in List II on which reliance is placed on behalf of the Government Pleader, it is necessary to discuss the general principles of the construction of the various items in the Schedule attached to the Constitution of India. The essence of a federal constitution consists in the distribution of powers between the federating units and the federal centre. With this end in view, the Constitution of India has prepared three lists setting out the items which fall in one or the other of these lists. List I of Seventh Schedule sets out the topics which fall within the exclusive domain of the Parliament. List II relates to the subjects which fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the State Legislature. And List III covers the topics over which both the Parliament and the State Legislature would exercise concurrent jurisdiction. The object of setting out various items and assigning them to separate lists is to make the division of power as clear cut and as exhaustive as possible. Notwithstanding any attempt at meticulous enumeration of the various topics and of arranging them in different lists, there is bound to be an amount of overlapping between the topics of the same list and also overlapping between topics of one list and those of the other. Article 246 of the Constitution of India is divided into three clauses. The first clause provides—

“(1) Notwithstanding anything in clauses (2) and (3), Parliament has exclusive power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List I in the Seventh Schedule (in this Constitution referred to as the ‘Union List’).”

Clause (1) begins with what is known as the “non obstante clause”. The power of the Parliament in respect of the topics mentioned in List I is absolute and paramount and is not trammelled by anything set out in cls. (2) and (3). Clause (2) runs thus:

“(2) Notwithstanding anything in clause (3), Parliament, and, subject to clause (1) the Legislature of any State also, have power to make laws with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List III in the Seventh Schedule (in this Constitution referred to as the ‘Concurrent List’).”

It is clear from cl. (2) that even in respect of the subjects mentioned in the Concurrent List, the power of the Parliament is paramount and superior to the power of the State Legislature. The Parliament can exercise its legislative functions in regard to the topics in the Concurrent List notwithstanding anything stated in cl. (3) which deals with the powers of the State Legislature to legislate on topics in the State List. The power of the Legislature of the State is qualified with the word “also”. We will discuss the significance of cl. (2) at a later stage of the judgment, while discussing the question of the field of legislation occupied by a parliamentary legislation. Clause (3) of art. 246 runs thus:

“(3) Subject to clauses (1) and (2), the Legislature of any State has exclusive power to make laws for such State or any part thereof with respect to any of the matters enumerated in List II in the Seventh Schedule (in this Constitution referred to as the ‘State List’).”

It is clear from the opening words of this clause that the power of the State Legislature is subject to cls. (1) and (2). It is not necessary to consider cl. (4) of art. 246 for our present discussion. At this stage, we may conveniently refer to the provisions of art. 254, sub-s. (1). It runs thus:—

“254. (1) If any provision of a law made by the Legislature of a State is repugnant to any provision of a law made by Parliament which Parliament is competent to enact, or to any provision of any existing law with respect to one of the matters enumerated in the Concurrent List, then, subject to the provisions of clause (2), the law made by Parliament, whether passed before or after the law made by the Legislature of such State, or, as the case may be, the existing law, shall prevail and the law made by the Legislature of the State shall, to the extent of the repugnancy, be void”.

Article 254 embodies the doctrine of repugnancy. There is some controversy as to when this doctrine of repugnancy can be invoked,—one authority holding that the doctrine can come into play only when the topics are mentioned in the Concurrent List and another holding that there can be repugnancy even if the rival legislations relate to topics falling in different lists. It is not necessary for us to probe into this controversy, and, we may touch upon it in passing so far as it becomes necessary for the advancement of the point of view which is adopted in our judgment.

We have already pointed out that the proper approach in considering the question as to whether a particular legislation is ultra vires the powers of the Legislature is to take the legislation as it is, consider the pith and substance thereof, or the real nature and substance of the legislation, or the purpose, design and scheme thereof, and see whether, in its real sense, the legislation can legitimately fall in any of the items of the list over which the Legislature wields powers. If it is found that, in pith and substance, the legislation relates to a topic falling within the jurisdiction of the Legislature, then even if there is an incidental trenching upon the powers of the rival Legislature, still the legislation will continue to remain valid. In State of Bombay v. R. M. D. Chamarbaughwala,¹ Das C. J., who delivered the judgment for the Court, has set out the correct approach to be adopted in a case like the present one. He says:

“When the validity of an Act is called in question, the first thing for the Court to do is to examine whether the Act is a law with respect to a topic assigned to the particular Legislature which enacted it. If it is, then the Court is next to consider whether, in the case of an Act passed by the Legislature of a Province (now a State), its operation extends beyond the boundaries of the Province or the State, for under the provisions conferring legislative powers on it such Legislature can only make a law for its territories or any part thereof and its laws cannot, in the absence of a territorial nexus, have any extra-territorial operation. If the impugned law satisfies both these tests, then finally the Court has to ascertain if there is anything in any other part of the Constitution which places any fetter on the legislative powers of such Legislature. The impugned law has to pass all these three tests.”

So far as the principles of construction of the words used in the items are concerned, the earliest and most important pronouncement comes from the Federal Court in In re The Central Provinces and Berar Act. No. XIV of 1938.² At page 36, Sir Maurice Gwyer, C. J., who gave the judgment for the Court, stated:

“This is the first case of importance that has come before the Federal Court; and it is desirable, more particularly in view of some of the arguments addressed to us during the hearing, to refer briefly to certain principles which the Court will take for its guidance. It will adhere to canons of interpretation and construction which are now well-known and established. It will seek to ascertain the meaning and intention of Parliament from the language of the statute itself; but with the motives of Parliament it has no concern. It is not for the Court to express, or indeed to entertain, any opinion on the expediency of a particular piece of legislation, if it is satisfied that it was within the competence of the Legislature which enacted it;...

The Judicial Committee have observed that a Constitution is not to be construed in any narrow and pedantic sense. The rules which apply to the interpretation of other statutes apply, it is true, equally to the interpretation of a constitutional enactment. But their application is of necessity conditioned by the subject-matter of the enactment itself; and I respectfully adopt the words of a learned Australian Judge:—"Although we are to interpret the words of the Constitution on the same principles of interpretation as we apply to any ordinary law, these very principles of interpretation compel us to take into account the nature and scope of the Act that we are interpreting,—to remember that it is a Constitution, a mechanism under which laws are to be made, and not a mere Act which declares what the law is to be: ... it (Federal Court) may rightly reflect that a Constitution of government is a living and organic thing, which of all instruments has the greatest claim to be construed ut res magis valeat quam pereat..."

Again, at page 38, His Lordship observed:—

"In Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for Canada,³ the Committee observed that in the interpretation of the British North America Act, 'if the text is explicit, the text is conclusive, alike in what it directs and what it forbids'..."

At page 39, his Lordship has referred to the case of Citizens Insurance Company of Canada v. Parsons; *Queen Insurance Company v. Parsons*⁴ and, has quoted a passage therefrom, which runs thus:

"In these cases it is the duty of the Courts, however difficult it may be, to ascertain in what degree, and to what extent, authority to deal with matters falling within these classes of subjects exists in each Legislature, and to define in the particular case before them the limits of their respective powers. It would not have been the intention that a conflict should exist; and in order to prevent such a result, the two sections must be read together and the language of one interpreted, and, where necessary, modified by that of the other. In this way it may, in most cases, be found possible to arrive at a reasonable and practical construction of the language of the sections, so as to reconcile the respective powers they contain, and to give effect to all of them. In performing this difficult duty it will be a wise course for those on whom it is thrown, to decide each case which arises as best they can, without entering more largely upon an interpretation of the statute than is necessary for a decision of the particular question in hand."

Again, in The United Provinces v. Atiqua Bagum,⁵ Sir Maurice Gwyer, C. J. observed (p. 134):

"...I think however that none of the items in the Lists is to be read in a narrow or restricted sense, and that each general word should be held to extend to all ancillary or subsidiary matters which can fairly and reasonably be said to be comprehended in it."

In Subrahmanyam Chettiar v. Muttuswami Goundan,⁶ the Court approved of the doctrine of pith and substance which had been evolved in interpreting items in the Lists defining the distribution of powers between the Centre and the States in a Federal Constitution. In that case, the validity of the Madras Agriculturists Relief Act passed by the Provincial Legislature was called in question. The Act provided for the scaling down of the decretal debt. The question arose as to whether the provision entrenched upon the power of the Central Legislature to legislate on a topic with respect to negotiable instruments. Sir Maurice Gwyer C. J. and Varadachariar J. held that it did not. After referring to the provisions of s. 100(1) of the Government of India Act, 1935, which are similar to the provisions of art. 246 of the Constitution of India, their Lordships proceeded to observe (p. 201):

"It must inevitably happen from time to time that legislation, though purporting to deal with a subject in one list, touches also on a subject in another list, and the different provisions of the enactment may be so closely intertwined that blind adherence to a strictly verbal interpretation would result in a large number of statutes being declared invalid because the Legislature enacting them may appear to have legislated forbidden sphere. Hence the rule which has been evolved by the Judicial Committee whereby the impugned statute is examined to ascertain its 'pith and substance', or 'true nature and character', for the purpose of determining whether it is legislation in respect to matters in this list or in that..."

Applying the doctrine of pith and substance, the majority of the Federal Court held that the Madras Act cannot be regarded as legislating in respect of negotiable instruments, a subject falling within the domain of the Central Legislature. They dismissed the argument that the Act will affect the majority of the debts evidenced by or based upon negotiable instruments as quite material, observing, "That is an accidental circumstance which cannot affect the question". Sulaiman J. who gave a dissenting judgment, but, who agreed on the general principles of interpretation, observed at page 208 as follows:

"...Nevertheless, in view of the large number of items in the three Lists, it is almost impossible to prevent a certain amount of overlapping. Absolutely sharp and distinct lines of demarcation are not always possible..."

After referring to the doctrine of pith and substance at page 210, his Lordship referred to the possibility of an incidental encroachment and stated that such an encroachment is not really forbidden.

The most important case dealing with the question of the extent of invasion is to be found in Prafulla Kumar v. Bank of Commerce, Khulna.⁷ In this case, the validity of the Bengal Money-lenders Act was called in question on the ground that it entrenched upon a topic of negotiable instruments which falls within the domain of the Federal Lists. At page 65, their Lordships of the Privy Council cite with approval a passage from the judgment of Sir Maurice Gwyer, C. J. in Subrahmanyam Chettiar v. Muttuswami Goundan which has been already reproduced above, and stated in paras. 36, 37 and 38

"Their Lordships agree that this passage (which is already set out above by us) correctly describes the grounds upon which the rule is founded, and that it applies to Indian as well as to Dominion legislation. No doubt experience of past difficulties has made the provisions of the Indian Act more exact in some particulars and the existence of the Concurrent List has made it easier to distinguish between those matters which are essential in determining to which list particular provisions should be attributed and those which are merely incidental. But the overlapping of subject-matter is not avoided by substituting three lists for two or even by arranging for a hierarchy of jurisdictions.

Subjects must still overlap and where they do the question must be asked what in pith and substance is the effect of the enactment of which complaint is made and in what list is its true nature and character to be found. If these questions could not be asked, much beneficent legislation would be stifled at birth, and many of the subjects entrusted to Provincial Legislation could never effectively be dealt with.

Thirdly, the extent of the invasion by the Provinces into subjects enumerated in the Federal List has to be considered. No doubt it is an important matter, not, as their Lordships think, because the validity of an Act can be determined by discriminating between degrees of invasion, but for the purpose of determining what is the pith and substance of the impugned Act. Its provisions may advance so far into Federal territory as to show that its true nature is not concerned with Provincial matters, but the question is not, has it trespassed more or less, but is the trespass, whatever it be, such as to show that the pith and substance of the impugned Act is not money-lending but promissory notes or banking? Once that question is determined the Act falls on one or the other side of the line and can be seen as valid or invalid according to its true content..."

It will be clear from the above that overlapping of the topics cannot be avoided in spite of the arrangement of the topics in three separate Lists. That being the case, it is necessary to look to the substance and the pith of each legislation remembering that some invasion into the domain reserved for the rival Legislature is unavoidable. The real point to be considered is the extent of that invasion, but, even the extent of invasion is material for the purpose of determining whether, in substance, the legislation is in respect of a topic reserved for the Provincial or the State Legislature, or, covers a topic which has been assigned to the Central Legislature or the Parliament. In other words, the question for consideration would be, whether the State Legislature, under the guise of legislating upon a topic falling into their domain, has really legislated upon a topic which falls in the domain of the Central Legislature or the Parliament.

Pausing here for a moment, let us try to examine the impugned legislation with a view to find out the pith and substance underlying that legislation. We have already referred to the Statement of Objects and Reasons and also the preamble of the Act which introduced the present s. 394 into the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act. The concern which has motivated the amended s. 394 is to prevent an outbreak of fire, and, with that end in view, to provide for certain precautionary measures or safeguards. It is true that the Petroleum Act, which is a Central legislation, also deals with the question of storage of petroleum and petroleum products. It is also true that it provides for certain precautions and safeguards which were required to be taken in the matter of transport and storage of petroleum and petroleum products. With that end in view, rules have been made requiring the taking of a licence. Rules framed under the Act also regulate the place at which and the conditions subject to which petroleum may be stored, and, also specify the nature and condition of receptacle in which petroleum may be stored. The provisions of the Petroleum Act are based on the fundamental distinction between dangerous petroleum and non-dangerous petroleum. A dangerous petroleum is petroleum the flashing-point of which is below 76°F. In regard to non-dangerous petroleum, s. 7 provides that, no licence would be necessary for storing petroleum upto 500 gallons. In regard to dangerous petroleum, s. 8 provides that, no licence is necessary for the possession of petroleum not exceeding six gallons. Section 11 makes it clear that the provisions of the Act do not apply to petroleum whose flashing-point is 200°F and above. Such petroleum falls within the category of "heavy petroleum" as defined in the Rules. Heavy petroleum is exempted from the operation of the provisions of the Petroleum Act. It will thus be seen that the precautions envisaged in the Act are based upon the intrinsic character of the petroleum and the degree at which its flashing-point is reached. If the flashing-point is reached at a higher temperature than 150°F, then no licence would be necessary. The impugned provision is designed to meet a different set of situation. It not only takes into account the intrinsic character of the petroleum, but it also takes into account the conditions prevailing in a crowded city. The cumulative effect of the intrinsic character of the product and the special conditions prevailing in a crowded city form the basis of the additional precautions which are envisaged in s. 394, that is, the impugned section. It is settled law that the objects and reasons which have motivated a legislation are relevant for the purpose of finding out the conditions which prevailed at the time the legislation is passed, and the evil which it sought to remedy.

"The statement of objects and reasons is certainly not admissible as an aid to the construction of a statute. But it can be referred to for the limited purpose of ascertaining the conditions prevailing at the time which actuated the sponsor of the Bill to introduce the same and the extent and urgency of the evil which he sought to remedy": (M. K. Ranganathan v. Govt. of Madras.)

The objects and reasons have referred to the fact of the occurrence of fires and explosions in the city due to unauthorized or negligent storage and handling of explosive or dangerous material in or near residential buildings resulting in considerable loss of life and property. It further says that, because of this, the question of tightening of the law was engaging the attention of the Government. It proceeds to say:

"It is now proposed to make better provision for the prevention of fire, explosion and other danger to life, health and property where such articles are stored or such trades and processes are carried on".

The expression "better provision for the prevention of fire, explosion and other danger to life, health and property" is extremely significant. It emphasizes the need for additional precautions, that is to say, precautions which must be superimposed upon the precautions called upon by the Petroleum Act because of the situation prevailing in a crowded city. The Petroleum Act extends to the entire land. The provisions, therefore, are of a general character and are not designed to meet peculiar situations prevailing in crowded towns.

Turning to the preamble, we notice that emphasis has been laid upon the need to make better provision for the prevention of fire, explosion and other danger to life, health and property in premises where certain articles are stored. It is with that end in view that the impugned provision has been designed. The provision does not relate to petroleum and petroleum products, nor it is in respect of petroleum and petroleum products as described in Entry 53 of List I of the Seventh Schedule. The legislation has nothing to do with petroleum and petroleum products as such. It is true that it will be open to the Parliament to make legislation ancillary or subsidiary to matters, such as, the storage of petroleum or petroleum products. Even the learned Government Pleader did not challenge such a position. But it is clear that, any provision relating to the storage or any precaution required by the Act for the purpose of storage or for subsidiary or ancillary character, made by the Central Legislature, has been made by it with the object of advancing the main purpose of the Central Act. The object of preventing the occurrence of fire and preventing consequent danger to life and property evidently falls within entry No. 1 of List II (State List). The expression "public order" mentioned in this entry has been authoritatively interpreted by the Supreme Court as being synonymous with public peace, safety and tranquillity.... (vide The Supdt., Central Prison v. Dr. Lohia.)⁹ So, the question of public safety is a concern of the State Government, and it is open to the State Government to pass a legislation to safeguard public safety. Item No. 5 of List II runs thus:

"Local government, that is to say, the constitution and powers of municipal corporations, improvement trusts, district boards, mining settlement authorities and other local authorities for the purpose of local self-government or village administration".

Under this item, it is competent to the State Legislature to constitute a local authority and to confer powers of local self-government or village administration on that body. A Municipal Corporation is such a local authority which is entrusted with powers of local self-government. One of the duties and functions of a municipal body will be to ensure the safety of the citizens from sporadic fires breaking out as a result of disorganized and chaotic storage of dangerous and inflammable materials. Item No. 6 in the List relates to public health, sanitation, hospitals and dispensaries. The task of ensuring sanitation and public health also can be and usually are delegated to the local authority. In this connection, it is interesting to refer to the provisions of s. 61 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, which falls under Chapter III relating to duties and powers of the municipal authorities. Section 61 is the first amongst the sections falling under the sub-heading "Obligatory and discretionary duties of the Corporation". Section 61 relates to the obligatory duties and, in effect, provides that,

"It shall be incumbent on the corporation to make adequate provision, by any means or measures which it is lawfully competent to them to use or to take, for each of the following matters".

The matters are thereafter enumerated from cl. (a) to cl. (t). Matter (g) relates to measures for preventing and checking the spread of dangerous diseases. Matter (j) relates to regulation of offensive and dangerous trade. Matter (k) relates to the entertainment of a fire-brigade and protection of life and property in case of fire. These are the obligatory duties cast upon the municipal corporation, and, it is not suggested that the duties do not fall within the purview of the powers of the State Legislature. The State Legislature is, undoubtedly, competent to transfer these powers and obligations enumerated in s. 61 upon a corporation. Just as the adoption of certain precautionary measures are found necessary in the interest of the prevention of the breaking out of fire, it may be equally necessary to take certain measures for preventing spread of contagious diseases as a result of the chaotic storage in large quantities of lubricating oil. Mr. Ganatra contended that there is no evidence to show that the storage of lubricating oil would be responsible for spreading any virus or bacteria. He further argued that the Corporation has not led any expert evidence on that point. It is not necessary to consider this question at any length, and, it is sufficient to observe that in certain extreme contingencies, the possibility of the spread of contagious diseases or virus cannot be ruled out. Mr. Ganatra contended that s. 394 itself does not lay down the conditions of the licence and leaves the matter entirely to the discretion of the Commissioner. He suggested that if the object of the legislation was to provide for certain precautions for preventing fires or the spread of diseases, etc., it was the duty of the Legislature to set out the precautions which are designed for that purpose. We do not think that it makes any difference in substance whether provisions have been made in the section itself for the precautions required to be taken or they are left to the discretion of the Municipal Commissioner. A copy of the licence containing the condition was placed in our hands in the course of the arguments by the learned Government Pleader, and we notice that a distinction has been made between "dangerous" and "non-dangerous" mineral oils, with reference to the flashing-points. The conditions of the licence in respect of non-dangerous mineral oils are materially different from the conditions in respect of dangerous mineral oils. The licence for keeping mineral oils of all kinds (flash point above 76°F), etc., lays down two conditions: (1) any of the above articles licensed herein should be kept either in vessels of sufficient strength with lid on the top and made of non-fragile material or in bottles tightly closed; and (2) no unauthorised person should have an access to the storage. The licence, on the other hand, for keeping mineral oils of all kinds, flash-point of which is below 76°F, lays down six conditions, which are more stringent than the conditions in the case of "non-dangerous" mineral oils. In addition to the requirement of a suitable receptacle or vessels in which these oils are required to be kept, other precautions have been envisaged, such as the distance from the residential buildings and the construction of storage premises. It has been provided that the premises should be of R.C.C. type or a metal enclosure where there are no structures around these premises. The conditions also provide that other licensable articles should not be kept side by side with the mineral oils etc. They also provide that the manufacturing or packing in smaller receptacles or processing etc. should not be done near the storage. Finally it is laid down that the storage should not be near the main entrance of the premises or of any room. The conditions of the licences give us a clear picture of the precautions which were considered necessary for the storage of petroleum products in the City of Bombay.

Turning now to the Items, Item No. 26 in List II relates to trade and commerce within the State. Items Nos. 64 and 65 relate to offences against laws with respect to any of the matters in the List and jurisdiction and powers of Courts, of course, except the Supreme Court, with respect to any of the matters in this List respectively. Under Item No. 26, the State can delegate its powers and functions to the local authority in respect of trade and commerce. It is under this delegation that it is open to the corporation to make provisions for regulating certain kinds of dangerous trades and provisions.

Before leaving the question of the scheme, design and purpose of the enactment, it is necessary to note that petroleum and petroleum products are but small fraction of items falling within Schedule M. Part I of the Schedule M relates to alloys and metals and other substances of explosive nature. Part II falls into four parts. A-Combustible Liquids, B-Combustible Solids and Semi Solids, C-Oxidising Substances; and D-Corrosive or poisonous Substances. In respect of articles falling within Part II, different quantities have been prescribed for different kinds of materials. It is evident that these quantities have been determined on the basis of the danger emanating therefrom for the safety of the locality.

It will be clear from the object, scheme and design of the impugned legislation that the Legislature wanted to provide for topics which clearly fall in List II. The pith and substance of the impugned legislation, therefore, is not to deal with or dabble in petroleum and petroleum products as such, but to devise special measures for ensuring the protection and safety of the citizens of a crowded city like Bombay. It is true that, in so far as the Central Legislation can also provide for storage and the conditions in respect thereof, and in so far as they have actually passed a legislation which makes provision for these matters, it can be said that there is some amount of impingement or encroachment or trespass into the field of legislation reserved for the Parliament. But the extent of invasion is insignificant, and, as we will labour to point out at a later stage, the provisions made have no relation to the field which has already been occupied by the Central legislation, but they concern the field which has been left unoccupied by the Central legislation. As has been rightly pointed out by the Privy Council in Prafulla Kumar's case, the extent of invasion is relevant not for the purpose of determining or discriminating between degrees of invasion, but for determining the pith and substance. If the invasion is extensive and on a large scale, then the reasonable inference would be that the State Legislature is passing a colourable legislation, that is to say, under the guise of legislating on a topic falling within their domain, they have invaded or trespassed upon the topics reserved for the Parliament.

Mr. Ganatra contended that petroleum and petroleum product has always been the exclusive sphere of the Central legislation. He argued that this legislative history and the background of the various laws passed in respect thereof has to be taken into account in considering the question of the pith and substance. The first Petroleum Act was passed in 1881, which is Act No. VIII of 1881. The preamble stated that this is an Act to regulate the importation, possession and transport of petroleum and other fluids of a like nature. This Act was repealed and replaced by the Petroleum Act XII of 1886, the preamble of which was similarly worded. It is, however, interesting to note that, in both these Acts, viz. the Act of 1881 and the Act of 1886, power was given to the local government to make rules consistent with the Act for regulating the importation of petroleum, of course, with the previous sanction of the Governor-General. The third Act was Act No. VIII of 1889. The purpose of the Act as set out in the preamble was to consolidate and amend the law relating to the importation, possession and transport of petroleum and other substances. Section 9 of this Act also gave power to local government to make rules to regulate the importation of petroleum and the granting of licences to possess or to transport petroleum within the Province. In the same connection, Mr. Ganatra pointed out that the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, which is Act No. III of 1888, was passed after the first two Petroleum Acts were enacted. The last Act, which is still in force, is the Petroleum Act XXX of 1934, which consolidates and amends the law relating to the import, transport, storage, production, refining and blending of petroleum and other inflammable substances. We have been unable to understand how the legislative history and the fact that the Central Legislature have made provisions for the storage of petroleum in all its Acts in any way help Mr. Ganatra in the point he has advanced before us. It is necessary to note that before the Government of India Act of 1935, the Indian Government was unitary in form. The entire power was concentrated in the Central Government, and the Provinces enjoyed such power as was delegated to them. The principle of devolution and decentralization of power was given effect to in small measure by the Government of India Act, 1919. Section 45A of the Government of India Act, 1919, empowered the Central Government to make rules for classification of central and provincial subjects. Accordingly, rules known as "devolution rules" were framed under s. 45A. One of these rules relates to the classification of the subjects as Central and Provincial. Entry No. 23 in the Central subjects relates to control of petroleum and explosives. Among the Provincial subjects are mentioned local self-government, which is entry No. 1, and, public health and sanitation, which is entry No. 3. Even in respect of the Provincial subjects, the Government of India Act, 1919, envisaged a diarchical form of government, that is to say, a distinction was made between reserved subjects and transferred subjects. Transferred subjects were the subjects which were transferred to the control of the Legislative Council. The Petroleum Act of 1934 was passed during the prevalence of Government of India Act, 1919. At that time, the Government was unitary, and notwithstanding the devolution and classification of subjects between Central and Provincial subjects, the power of the Centre was supreme in all fields and could not be called into question in any Court of law. The classification of subjects is not the same thing as the rigid division of powers as envisaged in Federal Constitution. Under the latter, authority is vested in the Courts to maintain delicate balance of power between the Centre and the States. This is not to suggest that even under the Constitution, the Union is not competent to pass a legislation similar to the Petroleum Act, 1934, nor is it suggested that the provisions of Petroleum Act, 1934, are in any way ultra vires the Constitution. The object in referring to the various provisions of the Government of India Act, 1919, and the constitutional position prevailing thereunder is to demonstrate the futility of any argument based upon the legislative history. The legislative history is not going to give us any guidance or clue in determining the powers of the respective Legislatures. Before concluding this topic, it is somewhat interesting to refer to the entry relating to petroleum in List I of the Government of India Act, 1935. It is entry No. 32 which runs thus:

"Petroleum and other liquids and substances declared by Dominion law to be dangerously inflammable, so far as regards possession, storage and transport".

It is evident that the scope of this entry is much more narrow and limited than the entry No. 53 in List I of the Constitution of India. Entry No. 53 envisages regulation and development of oil fields and mineral oil resources, and mentions petroleum and petroleum products simpliciter without any qualifying words. The enlargement in the scope is obviously due to the fact that India is now a free and sovereign country. Any way, the legislative history affords no clue to find out an answer to the question which has been raised in this proceeding about the vires of the impugned legislation. Reliance has been placed on the decision of the Supreme Court in Navinchandra v. Commr. of I.-T., Bombay,¹⁰ in which it has been held that, the "reference to legislative practice may be admissible for cutting down the meaning of a word in order to reconcile two conflicting provisions in two legislative Lists as was done in *In re the Central Provinces and Berar Act XVI of 1938*¹¹ or to enlarge their ordinary meaning as in *State of Bombay v. F. N. Balsara*¹²..." (p. 61).

In fact, according to us, the provisions of entry No. 53 in List I, and the provisions of entries Nos. 1, 5 and 6 in List II do not stand in conflict with one another and, therefore, the question of resolving that conflict does not arise. Again, the legislative practice does not help us in resolving the conflict for reasons set out above. After referring to the rule in C. P. and Berar Act case, their Lordships have proceeded to observe (p. 61):

"...The cardinal rule of interpretation, however, is that words should be read in their ordinary, natural and grammatical meaning subject to this rider that in construing words in a constitutional enactment conferring legislative power the most liberal construction should be put upon the words so that the same may have effect in their widest amplitude".

On the same page, their Lordships have approved of the decisions of the Federal Court to which reference has already been made, so far as the principles of interpretation are concerned.

We have already pointed out that some overlapping between the topics in the same Lists as also topics in different Lists is unavoidable. In Union Colliery Company of British Columbia v. Bryden,¹³ a question arose as to whether s. 4 of the British Columbian 'Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1890', which prohibits Chinamen of full age from employment in underground coal workings, is in that respect ultra vires of the Provincial Legislature, in view of the exclusive authority of the Dominion Parliament in regard to 'naturalization and aliens'. The Privy Council after examining the provisions of the impugned legislation pointed out that:

"...the leading feature of the enactments consists in this that they have, and can have, no application except to Chinamen who are aliens or naturalized subjects, and that they establish no rule or regulation except that these aliens or naturalized subjects shall not work, or be allowed to work, in underground coal mines within the Province of British Columbia". (p. 587).

They further held that, the whole pith and substance of the enactments of s. 4 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act consists in establishing a statutory prohibition which affects aliens or naturalized subjects and therefore trench upon the exclusive authority of the Parliament of Canada. We are unable to understand how this decision in any way helps Mr. Ganatra in the point he is urging before us. Emphasis was laid upon the leading feature of the enactment, which affords a guide or clue in arriving at the pith and substance. So far as the impugned legislation is concerned, the leading feature is to provide for the need of securing licences for storing mineral oils under certain conditions. It is only incidental that the Act also relates to a topic which falls under the jurisdiction of the Parliament. The extent of encroachment and the significance to be derived therefrom has been discussed by the Supreme Court in the case of A. S. Krishna v. Madras State.¹⁴ Venkatrama Ayyar J., who delivered the judgment of the Court, after referring to the overlapping of the fields of legislation and the need for evolving the doctrine of pith and substance for resolving the conflict, observes (p. 301):

"...The extent of the encroachment on matters beyond its competence may be an element in determining whether the legislation is colourable, that is, whether in the guise of making a law on a matter within its competence, the legislature is, in truth, making a law on a subject beyond its competence. But where that is not the position, then the fact of encroachment does not affect the vires of the law even as regards the area of encroachment."

He has further laid down that the statute must be approached as an organic whole and it is not permissible to disintegrate it into different parts. To ascertain the true character of the legislation which is impugned on the ground that it is ultra vires the powers of the Legislature which enacted it, one must have regard to the enactment as a whole, to its objects and to the scope and effect of its provisions. It would be quite an erroneous approach to the question to view such a statute not as an organic whole, but as a mere collection of sections, then disintegrate it into parts, examine under what heads of legislation those parts would severally fall, and by that process determine what portions thereof are intra vires, and what are not. In that case, their Lordships were considering the vires of the Madras Prohibition Act which made certain sub-rules and the argument was that in making these rules, it made inroad upon a topic which was in the exclusive domain of the Central Government.

14 [1957] A.I.R. S.C. 297.

Province of East Punjab,¹⁵ and argued that the extent of encroachment is very much material in determining the pith and substance of the impugned Act. Their Lordships were considering the vires of the provisions of the Punjab Urban Immoveable Property Tax Act levying certain tax as property tax. It was contended that this legislation conflicted with the item of income-tax which falls within the domain of the Central Legislature. At page 88, their Lordships observe:

"...The conclusion we have arrived at is that in substance the impugned tax is not a tax on income, that it is not impossible to reconcile the seeming conflict between the provisions of the two Acts, and that the extent of the alleged invasion by the Provincial Legislature into the field of the Federal Legislature is not so great in the present case as to justify the view that in pith and substance the impugned tax is a tax on income".

This passage again shows that the object of referring to the extent of invasion is to see whether in pith and substance the Legislature passes a legislation which will affect a topic reserved for the Centre under the guise of legislating on the topic falling within its own field. In the same context he referred to the decision of the Supreme Court in State of Rajasthan v. G. Chawla,¹⁶ to emphasize the argument that what is tolerated is slight transgression and nothing more. Although the expression "slight transgression" has been used in the aforesaid ruling (State of Rajasthan v. G. Chawla), we do not think that it makes any departure from the principles laid down in the rulings referred to above, viz., that the extent of encroachment is material only for the purpose of determining or ascertaining the pith and substance, and the degree of encroachment in itself is not decisive of the point. The entire legal position in this respect has been summed up in *Cal. Gas Co. (Prop.) Ltd. v. State of W. B.*¹⁷ Their Lordships observed:

"In the matter of construing entries in the Lists given in Sch. VII of the Constitution, the following rules of interpretation are now well settled. The power to legislate is given to the appropriate Legislatures by Art. 246 of the Constitution. The entries in the three Lists are only legislative heads or fields of legislation, they demarcate the area over which the appropriate Legislatures can operate. It is also settled that widest amplitude should be given to the language of the entries. But some of the entries in the different lists or in the same list may overlap and sometimes may also appear to be in direct conflict with each other. It is then the duty of the Court to reconcile the entries and bring about harmony between them. The underlying principle in such cases is that a general power ought not to be so construed as to make a nullity of a particular power conferred by the same Constitution and operating in the same field, when by reading the former in a more restricted sense effect can be given to the latter in its ordinary and natural meaning. Thus, every attempt should be made to harmonize the apparently conflicting entries not only of different Lists but also of the same List and to reject that construction which will rob one of the entries of its entire content and make it nugatory."

It would be thus seen that it is the duty of the Court to try to reconcile the conflict, if there is any, between the entries. In doing so, one of the principles to be borne in mind is that an entry which is specific would take precedence over the entry which is general. The general power ought not to be so construed as to make a nullity of a particular power conferred by the same Constitution and operating in the same field. Applying this principle to the present case, the power to deal with the question of possession and storage of petroleum and petroleum products under entry No. 53 is of a general character; whereas the power under entries Nos. 1, 5 and 6 of the State List is of a special character so far as the regulations relating to the storage are concerned, because these regulations have a bearing upon the question of public order, health and hygiene, and local self-government which fall within the domain of the State List. To similar effect is the decision of the Supreme Court in *Jagan-nath Baksh Singh v. State of U. P.*¹⁸ In addition to the rule about the need of harmonizing the entries and reconciling the conflicts, another rule has been laid down by the Supreme Court in *Waverly Jute Mills v. Raymon & Co.*¹⁹ That rule has been set out by Venkatarama Aiyar J. in the following terms:

"The entries in the Lists in the Seventh Schedule should be so construed as to give effect to all of them and a construction which will result in any of them being rendered futile or otiose must be avoided. Where there are two entries, one general in its character and the other specific, the former must be construed as excluding the latter. This is only an application of the general maxim that Generalia specialibus non derogant".

We must, therefore, make an attempt to give effect not only to entry No. 53 in List I, but also to entries 1, 5 and 6 of the State List. Applying these principles, we feel no hesitation in holding that the impugned legislation fairly and squarely falls within entries 1, 5, 6 and 23 of List II of the Constitution of India.

The above conclusion would be strengthened by reference to the decision of the Privy Council in Gallagher v. Lynn.²⁰ The facts were as follows: The appellant was a dairy farmer in the county of Donegal in the Irish Free State, where, for many years, he had carried on business and had been selling milk by retail in the city of Londonderry for human consumption, and since the imposition of customs duty on milk imported into Northern Ireland he had paid the appropriate duty on the milk so brought in by him. By s. I, sub-s. I, of the Milk and Milk Products (Northern Ireland) Act, 1934, passed by the Parliament of Northern Ireland, it was provided that "a person shall not, either by himself or by any servant or agent... (c) sell or offer or expose for sale any milk except under and in accordance with this Act and such licence, if any, as may be required under this Act", and by s. I, sub-s. 6, it was provided that

"milk shall not be sold or offered or exposed for sale for the purpose of human consumption unless it is milk of Grade A, Grade B, or Grade C". By s. 2, sub-s. I, it was provided that

"a person shall not sell milk of Grade A, Grade B or Grade C unless he holds a licence under this section, being either (a) a Producer's licence, that is to say, a licence for the production and sale of milk; or (b) a Distributor's licence, that is to say, a licence for the purchase and resale of milk, whether by wholesale or by retail"; and by sub-s 2,

"the Ministry of Agriculture shall, on application being made in the prescribed manner, and on payment of the appropriate fee specified in this section, grant to any person upon the prescribed conditions a licence under this section".

After the passing of the Act the appellant applied for but was refused, a Producer's licence under the Act so as to enable him to continue to sell in Londonderry milk for human consumption produced at his dairy in the county of Donegal. The licence was refused by the Ministry of Agriculture on the ground that licences under the Act could be granted only to persons whose dairies where the milk was produced were situate in Northern Ireland. Licences were also refused to other dairy farmers for the same reason.

As the appellant sold milk in Londonderry without having obtained a licence under the Act, proceedings were taken against him and he was convicted, and on appeal that conviction was upheld. At the hearing of the appeal it was contended inter alia that the Milk Act, 1934, was ultra vires as being an undue interference with trade and so in violation of s. 4 of the Government of Ireland Act, 1920, which provides that have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of...Northern Ireland with the following limitation..."

"Subject to the provisions of this Act...the Parliament of Northern Ireland shall...

The Court of Appeal of Northern Ireland held that the primary object of the Milk Act, 1934, was not interference with trade, and therefore the Act did not come within the limitation imposed by s. 4, sub-s. 7, of the Government of Ireland Act, 1920. The House of Lords relied upon the expression, "have power to make laws for the peace, order, and good government of" ...Northern Ireland for justifying the Milk and Milk Products (Northern Ireland) Act, 1934. Lord Atkin emphasized that,

"...the Milk Act is not a law 'in respect of' trade; but is a law for the peace, order and good government of Northern Ireland 'in respect of' precautions taken to secure the health of the inhabitants of Northern Ireland by protecting them from the dangers of an unregulated supply of milk". (p. 869).

He then proceeded to refer to the well established general principles and observed (p. 870):

"...It is well established that you are to look at the 'true nature and character of the legislation'... 'the pith and substance of the legislation'. If, on the view of the statute as a whole, you find that the substance of the legislation is within the express powers, then it is not invalidated if incidentally it affects matters which are outside the authorized field. The legislation must not under the guise of dealing with one matter in fact encroach upon the forbidden field...In the present case any suggestion of an indirect attack upon trade is disclaimed by the appellant. There could be no foundation for it. The true nature and character of the Act, its pith and substance, is that it is an Act to protect the health of the inhabitants of Northern Ireland; and in those circumstances, though it may incidentally affect trade with County Donegal, it is not passed, 'in respect of' trade, and is therefore not subject to attack on that ground..."

Applying these principles, it is clear to us that the impugned section is not a legislation in respect of petroleum and petroleum products. The words conferring power upon the Parliament of Northern Ireland were of a general character, viz. "the Parliament shall have power to make laws for peace, order and good government". It is on the basis of these general words that the Milk Products Act was held intra vires as the dominant object was to take precautions to secure the health of the inhabitants of Northern Ireland by protecting them from the danger of unregulated supply of milk. The entry 1 of List II specifically refers to public order, entry 5 to local government and entry 6 to public health and sanitation. The words employed in these entries are far more specific and clear than the general words "peace, order and good government". Therefore, if the legislation of the Irish Parliament could be justified on the basis of the general words "peace, order and good government", there can be no doubt that the present impugned legislation could be justified with greater force and strength on the basis of the more specific words used in the entries referred to above.

Having come to the conclusion that, in pith and substance, the impugned legislation falls within any one or more of the entries in List II, all that is necessary now to see is whether by reason of certain overlapping on a narrow field, viz., the field of storage of petroleum and petroleum products, there can arise a clash between the State legislation and the Central legislation, particularly, on the ground that the Central legislation, is occupying the whole of the same field. If the encroachment is incidental and is confined to a narrow ground, that would not introduce a serious infirmity in the enactment except when it relates to a field which has been already occupied by a Central legislation. If the encroachment is on unoccupied field and the encroachment is also of a minor character, then the legislation would not be invalid. Before considering the question as to whether, as a matter of fact, the whole field is occupied, and whether there has been any encroachment by the State Legislature over the occupied part of the field, it is necessary to consider some of the general principles that have been evolved on this point. Mr. Ganatra contended that the provisions of the impugned section are inconsistent or repugnant with some of the provisions of the Petroleum Act, 1934. Nicholas in his Australian Constitution, 2nd edn., p. 303, has laid down three tests of inconsistency or repugnancy:—(1) There may be inconsistency in the actual terms of the competing statutes; (2) Though there may be no direct conflict, a State law may be inoperative because the Commonwealth law, or the award of the Commonwealth Court, is intended to be a complete exhaustive code; and (3) Even in the absence of intention, a conflict may arise when both State and Commonwealth seek to exercise their powers over the same subject-matter. These principles have been approved of by the Supreme Court in *Ch. Tika Ramji v. The State of Uttar Pradesh*²¹ and in *Deep Chand v. State of U. P.*²² As has been explained by Bhagwati, J. in Ch. Tika Ramji's case,

"...Repugnancy falls to be considered when the law made by Parliament and the law made by the State Legislature occupy the same field because, if both these pieces of legislation deal with separate and distinct matters though of a cognate and allied character, repugnancy does not arise."

At page 425, he has cited a passage from the judgment of Dixon, J. in Ex. parte Mclean,²³ with approval, which is as under:

"When the Parliament of the Commonwealth and the Parliament of a State each legislate upon the same subject and prescribe what the rule of conduct shall be, they make laws which are inconsistent, notwithstanding that the rule of conduct is identical which each prescribes, and sec. 109 applies. That this is so is settled, at least when the sanctions they impose are diverse...But the reason is that, by prescribing the rule to be observed, the Federal statute shows an intention to cover the subject matter and provide what the law upon it shall be. If it appeared that the Federal law was intended to be supplementary to or cumulative upon State law, then no inconsistency would be exhibited in imposing the same duties or in inflicting different penalties. The inconsistency does not lie in the mere coexistence of two laws which are susceptible of simultaneous obedience. It depends upon the intention of the paramount Legislature to express by its enactment, completely, exhaustively, or exclusively, what shall be the law governing the particular conduct or matter to which its attention is directed. When a Federal statute discloses such an intention, it is inconsistent with it for the law of a State to govern the same conduct or matter."

At page 427, Bhagwati J. has cited a passage from the judgment of Sulaiman J. in Shyamakant Lal v. Rambhajan Singh,²⁴ in which the following sentence occurs:

"Further, repugnancy must exist in fact, and not depend merely on a possibility". In Deep Chand v. State of U. P., Subba Rao J., after citing the three tests laid down by Nicholas in his Australian Constitution, has explained the meaning of the three tests in the following terms (p. 665):

"Repugnancy between two statutes may thus be ascertained on the basis of the following three principles:

(1) Whether there is direct conflict between the two provisions;

(2) Whether Parliament intended to lay down an exhaustive code in respect of the subject matter replacing the Act of the State Legislature; and

(3) Whether the law made by Parliament and the law made by the State Legislature occupy the same field."

These three propositions are virtually the paraphrase of the propositions laid down by Nicholas.

Bearing these principles in mind, let us examine the provisions of the Petroleum Act to see, firstly, whether it was intended to be an exhaustive code and what field it has occupied. We have already pointed out that the dominant object of the Petroleum Act is not to make regulation relating to storage. The object of the Central legislation is far wider and covers several other matters, viz., import, export, production, refining and blending petroleum and other inflammable substances. On the other hand, the object of the impugned legislation is to make regulations relating to the storage of petrol in the City of Bombay with a view to protect life and property. Mr. Ganatra contended that the two legislations are made on one point, viz., the storage of petroleum and petroleum products, and this field has been occupied by Central legislation. He further argued that in so far as the State Legislature undertakes to cover the same field, it makes a serious and substantial invasion upon the field occupied by the Central legislation, viz., the Petroleum Act. We have already referred to the various provisions relating to the storage of the Petroleum Act. The most important provision to be considered on this aspect of the problem is s. 31 which runs thus:

"Power to limit powers of local authorities over petroleum.—Where any enactment confers powers upon any local authority in respect of the transport or storage of petroleum, the Central Government may, by notification in the official Gazette,—

(a) limit the operation of such enactment, or

(b) restrict the exercise of such powers, in any manner it deems fit."

It is evident from the language of s. 31 that the Central Legislature envisaged the possibility of Provincial Legislature passing enactments conferring powers upon local authority in respect of transport or storage of petroleum. In other words, it evinces a clear intention of not occupying or covering the entire field. The intention to operate in a limited field is implicit in the wording of s. 31. Of course, it is open to the Central Government to limit the operation of any such enactment or to restrict exercise of such powers in any manner it deems fit by issuing an appropriate notification. How far the provisions contained in cls. (a) and (b) of s. 31 would be valid after the promulgation of the Constitution of India is a matter, which, it is not necessary for us to consider. It is possible to argue that, after the promulgation of the Constitution, the Parliament has lost the jurisdiction to limit the operation of the State legislations in regard to the storage of petroleum. For the purpose of discussion, however, we are assuming that the powers of the Parliament in the matter of limiting the operation of the State enactments remain intact. Even so, it is clear that the Parliament had no intention of occupying the entire field in so far as it has allowed the Provincial Legislatures to confer upon the local authorities certain powers relating to the transport or storage of petroleum. In this connection, it is interesting to note that a notification has been issued under s. 31 on April 1, 1950, in exercise of the powers conferred by s. 31 of the Petroleum Act. In effect, the notification declares that the Central Government is pleased to limit the operation of the enactments specified in the Schedule annexed, in so far as the said enactments relate to the storage or transport of petroleum other than petroleum which has its flashing point not below 200°F to specified quantities.... It is significant to note that s. 394 has operated on the field which was left open by this notification. One of the enactments referred to in this Schedule of the notification is the City of Bombay Municipal Act, 1888 (Bombay Act III of 1888). We are, therefore, unable to understand how it is open to contend that the entire field relating to the regulation of storage has been occupied by the Central Legislature. In this connection, we may refer to another important provision of the Act, viz. s. 11 which lays down that, nothing in this Chapter shall apply to any petroleum which has its flashing-point not below two hundred degrees Fahrenheit, that is, 200° and above. In other words, heavy oils, the flashing point of which is 200 degrees, are wholly excluded from the operation of the Petroleum Act, and in so far as s. 394 and Schedule M lay down the need of a licence in respect of certain quantities, it provides for a matter which has been left out of consideration by the Central Act. Mr. Ganatra contended that there is a clear contradiction in the terms of the two statutes. Whereas the Central enactment lays down in ss. 7 and 8 respectively that no licence is needed for small stocks of non-dangerous petroleum, and, for small quantities of dangerous petroleum, s. 394 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act prescribes a licence precisely in respect of the same material. We have already explained that the motivation and purpose of the Central enactment was to take certain precautions in respect of petroleum and petroleum products in so far as they arise out of the intrinsic quality of the material. The licence which is required under s. 394 is based on a different consideration, viz. ensuring safety of the lives of persons inhabiting a crowded city. In our view, there is no contradiction whatsoever in the Central enactment under which no licence is required for certain cases, and s. 394 under which licence is required in respect of these very cases. It appears to us that far from there being any contradiction between the two statutes, one is supplementary to or cumulative of the other (to borrow the phraseology of Dixon, J. in Ex parte Mclean.) According to us, none of the three tests laid down by Nicholas applies to the present case. There is no direct conflict between the two provisions. The Central Act was in no sense of the term intended to be an exhaustive code. Finally the two legislations viz. the Petroleum Act and s. 394 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act do not occupy the same field.

Mr. Ganatra then referred to the decision of the Privy Council in Att.-Gen. for Alberta v. Att.-Gen. for Canada,²⁵ and contended that the impugned section constitutes a serious and substantial invasion of the exclusive powers of the Parliament as set out in entry No. 53. The question that arose for consideration before the Privy Council was whether the Debt Adjustment Act, the main purpose of which was to relieve persons from an enforceable liability to pay debts and, in many cases, to compel the creditors to accept compositions, was ultra vires the Provincial Legislature. The Act purported to preclude persons from any access to the Courts to enforce their rights without the permission of the Board. It is on that account that it was held that, in so far as the access to Courts was barred, the Provincial enactment was, in pith and substance, a legislation in relation to insolvency and as a whole constitutes a substantial invasion of the exclusive legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada. It is also held that it obstructs and interferes with the actual legislation of the Dominion Parliament on those matters. It is on these grounds that the invasion by the Provincial Legislature was treated as a serious and substantial invasion so as to make it ultra vires. It must be remembered that by applying the doctrine of pith and substance, their Lordships came to the conclusion that it constituted a substantial and serious invasion over the right of the Parliament to legislate in respect of bankruptcy and insolvency. Furthermore, there was another enactment passed by the Parliament on the topic with which it came with serious clash. The observations of the Privy Council which were made in this context are of no assistance to Mr. Ganatra on the facts of the present case in determining the question on hand.

We do not think that the question of colourable legislation falls to be considered in the present case. The doctrine of colourable legislation is based on the well-recognized principle that the Legislatures cannot do indirectly what they have been prohibited from doing directly. As has been pointed out by Mukherjea J. in K. C. Gajapati Narayan Deo v. The State of Orissa:²⁶

"...The whole doctrine resolves itself into the question of competency of a particular legislature to enact a particular law. If the legislature is competent to pass a particular law, the motives which impelled it to act are really irrelevant... Such transgression may be patent, manifest or direct, but it may also be disguised, covert and indirect and it is to this latter class of cases that the expression 'colourable legislation' has been applied in certain judicial pronouncements. The idea conveyed by the expression is that although apparently a legislature in passing a statute purported to act within the limits of its powers, yet in substance and in reality it transgressed these powers, the transgression being veiled by what appears, on proper examination, to be a mere pretence or disguise."

We have discussed all the aspects that were urged by Mr. Ganatra in support of his proposition that the provisions of the impugned legislation and those of the Central Legislature are repugnant and that there is a collision between the two, and also the question as to whether and how far the field of storing petrol has been occupied by the Legislature, and, we feel no hesitation in holding that there is no repugnancy or inconsistency between the two. The two legislations operate in different fields, and there is no clash, much less, a collision between the two.

The learned Government Pleader referred us to a decision of the Calcutta High Court reported in Caltex (India) Ltd. v. Director, W. B. F. Services,²⁷ where the questions raised by Mr. Ganatra were directly brought in issue and answered. In that case, the petitioner was a company which had installations on certain roads in Calcutta for the storage of petroleum, petroleum products and kerosene. The company stored petroleum by virtue of licences issued under the Petroleum Act. In May 1952, the Corporation of Calcutta demanded licence-fees from the petitioner-company for 1950-51 for storage of petroleum at the same place. The licence was demanded under the West Bengal Fire Services Act, 1950, and the question that was canvassed before the Court was whether the provisions of the West Bengal Fire Services Act were repugnant to the provisions of the Petroleum Act. In the course of the judgment, a reference was made to the earlier decisions of the Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court in which the same question had come up for consideration and decided. It was held that the Fire Services Act is in pith and substance an Act which comes within the subject-matter of items 5 and 6, certainly item 6 in list II, 7th Schedule of the Constitution. It was further held that the Petroleum Act, 1934, if it comes under the Union List can only come under item 53 and the subject-matter thereof is not identical with items 5 and 6 in the State List. It was, therefore, decided that even if the State Act made an incidental encroachment upon the Central Act, it was not rendered invalid thereby. The subject-matter of the two legislations are not the same although some of the provisions overlap. It is also held that, even if the provisions overlap, there is no repugnancy, between the two Acts, because by its own premises the Petroleum Act, 1934, is not meant to be exclusive but is supplementary to, and contemplates the existence of, State Acts relating to the storage of petroleum. Therefore, there is no repugnancy. For the same reasons, the argument of the 'occupied field' also fails. A reference was made to s. 31 as also the notification issued thereunder. We respectfully agree with the view taken by the Calcutta High Court and hold that the impugned provision is intra vires.

Mr. Ganatra contended that the provisions of s. 394 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act must be read subject to the notification issued under s. 31 of the Petroleum Act. We have already pointed out that the question as to whether the Parliament continues to have the power of limiting the operations of the State enactment after the promulgation of the Constitution by issuing a notification is a moot one. Assuming, however, that such a notification can be issued so as to limit the operation of the State enactments, still, we are unable to understand how the notification comes in the way of the requirement of a licence as laid down by s. 394 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act. The notification expressly states that the Government is pleased to limit the operation of the enactments specified in the Schedule in so far as the said enactments relate to the storage or transport of petroleum other than petroleum which has its flashing point not below 200°F. In other words, the operation of the enactments set out in the Schedule are limited only in respect of petroleum which has its flashing point below 200°F. In the present case, the flashing point of the article stored is 360°F, that is, above 200°F. That being the case, the question of limitation of the operation of provision in s. 394 by reason of the notification does not arise at all.

Mr. Ganatra finally contended that the impugned provision violates the accused's fundamental right guaranteed by art. 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution of India. Article 19(1)(f) provides that, all citizens shall have the right to acquire, hold and dispose of property, and art. 19(1)(g) provides that they shall have the right to practise any profession, or to carry on any occupation, trade or business. The Government Pleader referred to art. 358 of the Constitution and argued that since the proclamation of emergency is still in force, the operation of art. 19 is suspended, and it is not open to any citizen to invoke that article in aid of the rights guaranteed thereby. We are not disposed to pronounce any verdict on this aspect of the matter, because we find that the question can be answered by reference to cls. (5) and (6) of art. 19 relating to reasonable restrictions in the interest of general public. The requirement of securing a licence from the Municipal Commissioner appears to us clearly a reasonable restriction in the interest of general public. It is necessary to remember that the quantity of gallons stored by the accused is 7290 gallons. If Mr. Ganatra's contention is accepted, it means that he will be free to store even thousands of gallons or millions of gallons of heavy oil without a licence in any part of the Bombay City irrespective of the local situation prevailing therein. In our view, the restriction imposed by s. 394 is not only not unreasonable but is also called for in the interest of general public to safeguard their lives and property.

In the result, the appeal fails and is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SUPREME COURT.

Present: The Hon'ble Mr. P. B. Gajendragadkar, Chief Justice, Mr. Justice K. N. Wanchoo, Mr. Justice M. Hidayatullah, Mr. Justice J. C. Shah and Mr. Justice N. Rajagopala Ayyangar.

RANJIT D. UDESHI v. THE STATE OF MAHARASHTRA.*

Indian Penal Code (XLV of 1860), Sec. 292—Constitution of India, Arts. 19(1)(a), 19(2)—Whether s. 292 void by reason of art. 19(1)(a)—Whether knowledge of obscenity ingredient of offence under s. 292(a)—Mens rea whether required before offence of selling or keeping for sale obscene object completed—Obscenity and pornography, difference between—Test of obscenity in India—Whether test laid down in Hicklin's case to be discarded—Obscenity and art.

Section 292 of the Indian Penal Code, 1860, is not invalid in view of art. 19(2) of the Constitution of India.

Section 292 of the Code embodies a reasonable restriction in the interest of the general public because the law against obscenity seeks no more than to promote public decency and morality.

Section 292(a) of the Code does not make knowledge of obscenity an ingredient of the offence but absence of such knowledge may be taken in mitigation.

Mens rea will be required before the offence of selling or keeping for sale of an obscene object can be said to be complete. The offender must have actually sold or kept for sale, the offending article. The circumstances of the case will then determine the criminal intent and it will be a matter of a proper inference from them.

*Manual Enterprises v. Day*¹ and Nico Jacobellis v. State of Ohio,² referred to

There is some difference between obscenity and pornography in that the latter denotes writings, pictures etc. intended to arouse sexual desire while the former may include writings etc. not intended to do so but which have that tendency. Both offend against public decency and morals but pornography is obscenity in a more aggravated form.

*Decided, August 19, 1964. Criminal Appeal No. 178 of 1962.

1 (1962) 370 U.S. 478, 8 Law ed. 2nd, 639.

2 Decided on June 22, 1964.

The test of obscenity to adopt in India (regard being had to community mores) is that obscenity without a preponderating social purpose or profit cannot have the constitutional protection of free speech and expression and obscenity is treating sex in a manner appealing to the carnal side of human nature, or having that tendency. Such a treating with sex is offensive to modesty and decency but the extent of such appeal in a particular book etc. are matters for consideration in each individual case.

The test of obscenity laid down by Cockburn C. J. in *The Queen v. Hicklin*³ should not be discarded. It makes the Court the judge of obscenity in relation to an impugned book etc. and lays emphasis on the potentiality of the impugned object to deprave and corrupt by immoral influences. It will always remain a question to decide in each case and it does not compel an adverse decision in all cases.

An overall view of the obscene matter in the setting of the whole work would be necessary, but the obscene matter must be considered by itself and separately to find out whether it is so gross and its obscenity so decided that it is likely to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to influences of this sort and into whose hands the book is likely to fall. In this connection the interests of our contemporary society and particularly the influence of the book etc. on it must not be overlooked.

Where obscenity and art are mixed, art must be so preponderating as to throw the obscenity into a shadow or the obscenity so trivial and insignificant that it can have no effect and may be overlooked. In other words, treating with sex in a manner offensive to public decency and morality, judged of by the national standards and considered likely to pander to lascivious, prurient or sexually precocious minds, must determine the result. A balance should be maintained between freedom of speech and expression and public decency and morality but when the latter is substantially transgressed the former must give way.

THE facts appear at 64 Bombay Law Reporter 356.

R. K. Garg, S. C. Agarwal, D. P. Singh, M. K. Ramamurthi, and B. A. Desai, for the appellant.

C. K. Daphtary, Attorney General for India, with O. P. Rana and R. H. Dhebar, for the respondent.

HIDAYATULLAH J. The appellant is one of four partners of a firm which owns a book-stall in Bombay. He was prosecuted along with the other partners under s. 292, Indian Penal Code. All the facts necessary for our purpose appear from the simple charge with two counts which was framed against them. It reads:

"That you accused Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 on or about the 12th day of December, 1959 at Bombay being the partners of a bookstall named Happy Book Stall were found in possession for the purpose of sale copies of an obscene book called Lady Chatterley's Lover (unexpurgated edition) which inter alia contained, obscene matter as detailed separately and attached herewith and thereby committed an offence punishable u/s 292 of the I.P. Code.

And

That you Gokuldas Shamji on or about the 12th day of December 1959 at Bombay did sell to Bogus Customer Ali Raza Sayeed Hasan a copy of an obscene book called Lady Chatterley's Lover (unexpurgated edition) which inter alia contained obscene matter as detailed separately and attached herewith and thereby committed an offence punishable u/s.292 of the I.P. Code."

The first count applied to the appellant who was accused No. 2 in the case. The Additional Chief Presidency Magistrate, III Court, Esplanade, Bombay convicted all the partners on the first count and fined each of them Rs. 20 with one week's simple imprisonment in default. Gokuldas Shamji was additionally convicted on the second count and was sentenced to a further fine of Rs. 20 or like imprisonment in default. The Magistrate held that the offending book was obscene for purposes of the section. This present appellant filed a revision in the High Court of Bombay. The decision of the High Court was against him. He has now appealed to this Court by special leave and has raised the issue of freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by art. 19. Before the High Court he had questioned the finding of the Magistrate regarding the novel.

It is convenient to set out s. 292 of the Indian Penal Code at this stage:

"292. Sale, etc., of obscene books, etc.—Whoever—

(a) sells, lets to hire, distributes, publicly exhibits or in any manner puts into circulation, or for purposes of sale, hire, distribution, public exhibition or circulation, makes, produces or has in his possession any obscene book, pamphlet, paper, drawing, painting, representation or figure or any other obscene object whatsoever, or

(b) imports, exports or conveys any obscene object for any of the purposes aforesaid, or knowing or having reason to believe that such object will be sold, let to hire, distributed or publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation, or

(c) takes part in or receives profits from any business in the course of which he knows or has reason to believe that any such obscene objects are, for any of the purposes aforesaid, made, produced, purchased, kept, imported, exported, conveyed, publicly exhibited or in any manner put into circulation, or

(d) advertises or makes known by any means whatsoever that any person is engaged or is ready to engage in any act which is an offence under this section, or that any such obscene object can be procured from or through any person, or

(e) offers or attempts to do any act which is an offence under this section, shall be punished with imprisonment of either description for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine, or with both.

Exception.—This section does not extend to any book, pamphlet, writing, drawing or painting kept or used bona fide for religious purposes or any representation sculptured, engraved, painted or otherwise represented on or in any temple, or on any car used for the conveyance of idols, or kept or used for any religious purpose."

To prove the requirements of the section the prosecution examined two witnesses. One was the test purchaser named in the charge and the other an Inspector of the Vigilance Department. These witnesses proved possession and sale of the book which facts are not denied. The Inspector in his testimony also offered his reasons for considering the book to be obscene. On behalf of the accused Mr. Mulkraj Anand, a writer and art critic gave evidence, and in a detailed analysis of the novel, he sought to establish that in spite of its apparent indelicate theme and the candidness of its delineation and diction, the novel was a work of considerable literary merit and a classic and not obscene. The question does not altogether depend on oral evidence because the offending novel and the portions which are the subject of the charge must be judged of by the Court, in the light of s. 292, Indian Penal Code, and the provisions of the Constitution. This raises two broad and independent issues of law—the validity of s. 292, Indian Penal Code, and the proper interpretation of the section and its application to the offending novel.

Mr. Garg, who argued the case with ability, raised these two issues. He bases his argument on three legal grounds which briefly are:

(i) that s. 292 of the Indian Penal Code is void as being an impermissible and vague restriction on the freedom of speech and expression guaranteed by art. 19(1)(a) and is not saved by cl. (2) of the same article;

(ii) that even if s. 292, Indian Penal Code, be valid, the book is not obscene if the section is properly construed and the book as a whole is considered; and

(iii) that the possession or sale to be punishable under the section must be with the intention to corrupt the public in general and the purchasers in particular.

On the subject of obscenity his general submission is that a work of art is not necessarily obscene if it treats with sex even with nudity and he submits that a work of art or a book of literary merit should not be destroyed if the interest of society requires that it be preserved. He submits that it should be viewed as a whole, and its artistic or literary merits should be weighed against the so-called obscenity, the context in which the obscenity occurs and the purpose it seeks to serve. If on a fair consideration of these opposite aspects, he submits, the interest of society prevails, then the work of art or the book must be preserved, for then the obscenity is overborne. In no case, he submits, can stray passage or passages serve to stamp an adverse verdict on the book. He submits that the standard should not be that of an immature teenager or a person who is abnormal but of one who is normal, that is to say, with a mens sana in corpore sano. He also contends that the test adopted in the High Court and the Court below from *The Queen v. Hicklin*¹ is out of date and needs to be modified and he commends for our acceptance the views expressed recently by the Courts in England and the United States.

Article 19 of the Constitution which is the main plank to support these arguments reads:

"19.(1) All citizens shall have the right—

(a) to freedom of speech and expression;...

(2) Nothing in sub-clause (a) of clause (1) shall affect the operation of any existing law, or prevent the State from making any law, in so far as such law imposes reasonable restrictions on the exercise of the right conferred by the said sub-clause in the interests of... public... decency or morality..."

No doubt this article guarantees complete freedom of speech and expression but it also makes an exception in favour of existing laws which impose restrictions on the exercise of the right in the interests of public decency or morality. The section of the Penal Code in dispute was introduced by the Obscene Publications Act, 1925 (VII of 1925) to give effect [to Article] I of the International Convention for the suppression of or traffic in obscene publications signed by India in 1923 at Geneva. It does not go beyond obscenity which falls directly within the words "public decency and morality" of the second clause of the article. The word, as the dictionaries tell us, denotes the quality of being obscene which means offensive to modesty or decency; lewd, filthy and repulsive. It cannot be denied that it is an important interest of society to suppress obscenity. There is, of course, some difference between obscenity and pornography in that the latter denotes writings, pictures etc. intended to arouse sexual desire while the former may include writings etc. not intended to do so but which have that tendency. Both, of course, offend against public decency and morals but pornography is obscenity in a more aggravated form. Mr. Garg seeks to limit action to cases of intentional lewdness which he describes as dirt for dirt's sake and which has now received the appellation of hardcore pornography by which term is meant libidinous writings of high erotic effect unredeemed by anything literary or artistic and intended to arouse sexual feelings.

Speaking in terms of the Constitution it can hardly be claimed that obscenity which is offensive to modesty or decency is within the constitutional protection given to free speech or expression, because the article dealing with the right itself excludes it. That cherished right on which our democracy rests is meant for the expression of free opinions to change political or social conditions or for the advancement of human knowledge. This freedom is subject to reasonable restrictions which may be thought necessary in the interest of the general public and one such is the interest of public decency and morality. Section 292, Indian Penal Code, manifestly embodies such a restriction because the law against obscenity, of course, correctly understood and applied, seeks no more than to promote public decency and morality. The word obscenity is really not vague because it is a word which is well-understood even if persons differ in their attitude to what is obscene and what is not. Lawrence thought James Joyce's Ulysses to be an obscene book deserving suppression but it was legalised and he considered Jane Eyre to be pornographic but very few people will agree with him.

The former he thought so because it dealt with the excretory functions and the latter because it dealt with sex repression. (See Sex, Literature, Censorship pp. 26, 201). Condemnation of obscenity depends as much upon the mores of the people as upon the individual. It is always a question of degree or as the lawyers are accustomed to say, of where the line is to be drawn. It is, however, clear that obscenity by itself has extremely poor value in the propagation of ideas, opinions and informations of public interest or profit. When there is propagation of ideas, opinions and photographs collected in book form without the medical text would may become different because then the interest of society may tilt the scales in favour of free speech and expression [sic.] It is thus that books on medical science with intimate illustrations and photographs, though in a sense immodest, are not considered to be obscene but the same illustrations and photographs collected in book form without the medical text would certainly be considered to be obscene. Section 292, Indian Penal Code, deals with obscenity in this sense and cannot thus be said to be invalid in view of the second clause of art. 19. The next question is when can an object be said to be obscene?

Before dealing with that problem we wish to dispose of Mr. Garg's third argument that the prosecution must prove that the person who sells or keeps for sale any obscene object knows that it is obscene, before he can be adjudged guilty. We do not accept this argument. The first sub-section of s. 292 (unlike some others which open with the words "whoever knowingly or negligently etc.") does not make knowledge of obscenity an ingredient of the offence. The prosecution need not prove something which the law does not burden it with. If knowledge were made a part of the guilty act (Actus reus), and required the prosecution to prove it, it would place an almost impenetrable defence in the hands of offenders. Something much less than actual knowledge must, therefore, suffice. It is argued that the number of books these days is so large and their contents so varied that the question whether there is mens rea or not must be based on definite knowledge of the existence of obscenity. We can only interpret the law as we find it and if any exception is to be made it is for Parliament to enact a law. As we have pointed out, the difficulty of obtaining legal evidence of the offender's knowledge of the obscenity of the book etc., has made the liability strict. Under our law absence of such knowledge, may be taken in mitigation but it does not take the case out of the sub-section.

Next to consider is the second part of the guilty act (Actus reus), namely, the selling or keeping for sale of an object which is found to be obscene. Here, of course, the ordinary guilty intention (mens rea) will be required before the offence can be said to be complete. The offender must have actually sold or kept for sale, the offending article. The circumstances of the case will then determine the criminal intent and it will be a matter of a proper inference from them. The argument that the prosecution must give positive evidence to establish a guilty intention involves a supposition that mens rea must always be established by the prosecution through positive evidence. In criminal prosecution mens rea must necessarily be proved by circumstantial evidence alone unless the accused confesses. The sub-section makes sale and possession for sale one of the elements of the offence. As sale has taken place and the appellant is a book-seller the necessary inference is readily drawn at least in this case. Difficulties may, however, arise in cases close to the border. To escape liability the appellant can prove his lack of knowledge unless the circumstances are such that he must be held guilty for the acts of another. The Court will presume that he is guilty if the book is sold on his behalf and is later found to be obscene unless he can establish that the sale was without his knowledge or consent. The law against obscenity has always imposed a strict responsibility. When Wilkes printed a dozen copies of his Essay on Woman for private circulation, the printer took on certain copy for himself. That copy was purchased from the printer and it brought Wilkes to grief before Lord Mansfield. The gist of the offence was taken to be publication-circulation and Wilkes was presumed to have circulated it. Of course, Wilkes published numerous other obscene and libellous writings in different ways and when Madame Pompadour asked him: "How far does the liberty of the Press extend in England?" he gave the characteristic answer: "I do not know. I am trying to find out:" (See 52 Har. L. Rev. 40).

The problem of scienter (knowingly doing of an act) has caused anxious thought in the United States under the Comstock Law [19 U.S.C. S. 1461 (1958)] which deals with the non-mailability of obscene matter. We were cited *Manual Enterprises v. Day*² but there was so little concurrence in the Court that it has often been said, and perhaps rightly, that the case has little opinion value. The same is perhaps true of the latest case *Nico Jacobellis v. State of Ohio*³ of which a copy of the judgment was produced for our perusal.

It may, however, be pointed out that one may have to consider a plea that the publication was for public good. This bears on the question whether the book etc. can in those circumstances be regarded as obscene. It is necessary to bear in mind that this may raise nice points of the claims of society to suppress obscenity and the claims of society to allow free speech. No such plea has been raised in this case but we mention it to draw attention to the fact that this may lead to different results in different cases. When Savage published his Progress of a Divine and was prosecuted for it, his plea was that he had "introduced obscene ideas with a view of exposing them to detestation, and of amending the age by showing the depravity of wickedness" and the plea was accepted (See Dr. Johnson's life of Savage in his Lives of the Poets). In Hicklin's case Blackburn J. did not accept a similar plea in respect of the pamphlet before him observing that it would "justify the publication of anything however indecent, however obscene, and however mischievous". We are not called upon to decide this issue in this case but we have found it necessary to mention it because ideas having social importance will prima facie be protected unless obscenity is so gross and decided that the interest of the public dictates the other way. We shall now consider what is meant by the word 'obscene' in s. 292, Indian Penal Code.

The Indian Penal Code borrowed the word from the English statute. As the word "obscene" has been interpreted by English Courts something may be said of that interpretation first. The Common Law offence of obscenity was established in England three hundred years ago when Sir Charles Sedley exposed his person to the public gaze on the balcony of a tavern. Obscenity in books, however, was punishable only before the spiritual courts because it was so held down to 1708 in which year *Queen v. Read*⁴ was decided. In 1727 in the case against one Curl it was ruled for the first time that it was a Common Law offence (*Dominus Rex v. Curl*⁵). In 1857 Lord Campbell enacted the first legislative measure against obscene books etc. and his successor in the office of Chief Justice interpreted his statute (20 & 21 Viet. C. 83) in Hicklin's case. The section of the English Act is long (they were so in those days), but it used the word 'obscene' and provided for search, seizure and destruction of obscene books etc. and made their sale, possession for sale, distribution etc. a misdemeanour. The section may thus be regarded as substantially in pari materia with s. 292, Indian Penal Code, in spite of some differences in language. In Hicklin's case the Queen's Bench was called upon to consider a pamphlet, the nature of which can be gathered from the title and the colophon which read: "The Confession Unmasked, showing the depravity of Romish priesthood, the iniquity of the confessional, and the questions, put to females in confession." It was bilingual with Latin and English texts on opposite pages and the latter half of the pamphlet according to the report was 'grossly obscene, as relating to impure and filthy acts, words or ideas'. Cockburn C. J. laid down the test of obscenity in these words (p. 371):

"...I think the test of obscenity is this, whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences, and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall... it is quite certain that it would suggest to the minds of the young of either sex, or even to persons of more advanced years, thoughts of a most impure and libidinous character."

This test has been uniformly applied in India.

The important question is whether this test of obscenity squares with the freedom of speech and expression guaranteed under our Constitution, or it needs to be modified and, if so, in what respects. The first of these questions invites the Court to reach a decision on a constitutional issue of a most far reaching character and we must beware that we may not lean too far away from the guaranteed freedom. The laying down of the true test is not rendered any the easier because art has such varied facets and such individualistic appeals that in the same object the insensitive sees only obscenity because his attention is arrested, not by the general or artistic appeal or message which he cannot comprehend, but by what he can see, and the intellectual sees beauty and art but nothing gross. The Indian Penal Code does not define the word 'obscene' and this delicate task of how to distinguish between that which is artistic and that which is obscene has to be performed by Courts, and in the last resort by us. The test which we evolve must obviously be of a general character but it must admit of a just application from case to case by indicating a line of demarcation not necessarily sharp but sufficiently distinct to distinguish between that which is obscene and that which is not. None has so far attempted a definition of obscenity because the meaning can be laid bare without attempting a definition by describing what must be looked for. It may, however, be said at once that treating with sex and nudity in art and literature cannot be regarded as evidence of obscenity without something more. It is not necessary that the angels and saints of Michaelangelo should be made to wear breeches before they can be viewed. If the rigid test of treating with sex as the minimum ingredient were accepted hardly any writer of fiction to-day would escape the fate Lawrence had in his days. Half the book-shops would close and the other half would deal in nothing but moral and religious books which Lord Campbell boasted was the effect of his Act.

The question is now narrowed to what is obscenity as distinguished from a permissible treating with sex? Mr. Garg relies on some passages from the opinions expressed in the Supreme Court of the United States in *Roth v. United States*⁶ and from the charge to the jury by Stable J. in *Regina v. Martin Secker & Warburg Ltd.*⁷ and invites us to adopt the test of 'hardcore pornography' for the interpretation of the word 'obscene' in the Indian Penal Code. He points out that the latest statute in England now makes exceptions leading to the same result. He has also referred to some books and literary and artistic publications which have not been considered objectionable.

It may be admitted that the world has certainly moved far away from the times when Pamela, Moll Flanders, Mrs. Warren's Profession, and even Mill on the Floss were considered immodest. Today all these and authors from Aristophanes to Zola are widely read and in most of them one hardly notices obscenity. If our attitude to art versus obscenity had not undergone a radical change, books like Caldwell's God's Little Acre and Andre Gide's If it Die [Si le grain ne meurt] would not have survived the strict test. The English novel has come out of the drawing room and it is a far cry from the days when Thomas Hardy described the seduction of Tess by speaking of her guardian angels. Thomas Hardy himself put in his last two novels situations which "were strongly disapproved of under the conventions of the age", but they were extremely mild compared with books today. The world is now able to tolerate much more than formerly, having become indurated by literature of different sorts. The attitude is not yet settled. Curiously, varying results are noticeable in respect of the same book and in the United States the same book is held to be obscene in one State but not in another (See A Suggested Solution to the Riddle of Obscenity—1964, 112 Penn. L. Rev. 834).

But even if we agree thus far, the question remains still whether the Hicklin test is to be discarded? We do not think that it should be discarded. It makes the Court the judge of obscenity in relation to an impugned book etc. and lays emphasis on the potentiality of the impugned object to deprave and corrupt by immoral influences. It will always remain a question to decide in each case and it does not compel an adverse decision in all cases. Mr. Garg, however, urges that the test must be modified in two respects. He wants us to say that a book is not necessarily obscene because there is a word here or a word there, or a passage here and a passage there which may be offensive to particularly sensitive persons. He says that the overall effect of the book should be the test and, secondly, that the book should only be condemned if it has no redeeming merit at all, for then it is "dirt for dirt's sake", or as Mr. Justice Frankfurter put it in his inimitable way "dirt for money's sake". His contention is that judged of in this light the impugned novel passes the Hicklin test if it is reasonably modified.

Mr. Garg is not right in saying that the Hicklin case emphasised the importance of a few words or a stray passage. The words of the Chief Justice were that "the matter charged" must have "a tendency to deprave and corrupt". The observation does not suggest that even a stray word or an insignificant passage would suffice. And observation to that effect in the ruling must be read secundum subjectum materiam, that is to say, applicable to the pamphlet there considered. Nor is it necessary to compare one book with another to find the extent of permissible action. It is useful to bear in mind the words of Lord Goddard Chief Justice in the Regina v. Reiter.⁸

"...The character of other books is a collateral issue, the exploration of which would be endless and futile. If the books produced by the prosecution are indecent or obscene, their quality in that respect cannot be made any better by examining other books..."

The Court must, therefore, apply itself to consider each work at a time. This should not, of course, be done in the spirit of the lady who charged Dr. Johnson with putting improper words in his Dictionary and was rebuked by him: "Madam, you must have been looking for them." To adopt such an attitude towards art and literature would make the Courts a Board of Censors. An overall view of the obscene matter in the setting of the whole work would, of course, be necessary, but the obscene matter must be considered by itself and separately to find out whether it is so gross and its obscenity so decided that it is likely to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to influences of this sort and into whose hands the book is likely to fall. In this connection the interests of our contemporary society and particularly the influence of the book etc. on it must not be overlooked. A number of considerations may here enter which it is not necessary to enumerate, but we must draw attention to one fact. Today our national and regional languages are strengthening themselves by new literary standards after a deadening period under the impact of English. Emulation by our writers of an obscene book under the aegis of this Court's determination is likely to pervert our entire literature because obscenity pays and true art finds little popular support. Only an obscurant will deny the need for such caution. This consideration marches with all law and precedent on this subject and so considered we can only say that where obscenity and art are mixed, art must be so preponderating as to throw the obscenity into a shadow or the obscenity so trivial and insignificant that it can have no effect and may be overlooked. In other words, treating with sex in a manner offensive to public decency and morality (and these are the words of our Fundamental Law), judged of by our national standards and considered likely to pander to lascivious, prurient or sexually precocious minds, must determine the result. We need not attempt to bowdlerize all literature and thus rob speech and expression of freedom. A balance should be maintained between freedom of speech and expression and public decency and morality but when the latter is substantially transgressed the former must give way.

We may now refer to Roth's case to which a reference has been made. Mr. Justice Brennan, who delivered the majority opinion in that case, observed that if obscenity is to be judged of by the effect of an isolated passage or two upon particularly susceptible persons, it might well encompass material legitimately treating with sex and might become unduly restrictive and so the offending book must be considered in its entirety. Chief Justice Warren on the other hand made "substantial tendency to corrupt by arousing lustful desires" as the test. Mr. Justice Harlan regarded as the test that it must "tend to sexually impure thoughts". In our opinion, the test to adopt in our country (regard being had to our community mores) is that obscenity without a preponderating social purpose or profit cannot have the constitutional protection of free speech and expression and obscenity is treating with sex in a manner appealing to the carnal side of human nature, or having that tendency. Such a treating with sex is offensive to modesty and decency but the extent of such appeal in a particular book etc. are matters, for consideration in each individual case.

It now remains to consider the book Lady Chatterley's Lover. The story is simple. A baronet, wounded in the war is paralysed from the waist downwards. He married Constance (Lady Chatterley) a little before he joined up and they had a very brief honey-moon. Sensing the sexual frustration of his wife and their failure to have an heir he leaves his wife free to associate with other men. She first experiences with one Michaelis and later with a game-keeper Mellors in charge of the grounds. The first lover was selfish sexually, the other was something of an artist. He explains to Constance the entire mystery of eroticism and they put it into practice. There are over a dozen descriptions of their sexual intimacies. The game-keeper's speech and vocabulary were not genteel. He knew no Latin (which could be used to appease the censors) and the human puddenda and other erogenous parts are freely discussed by him and also named by the author in the descriptions. The sexual congress each time is described with great candidness and in prose as tense as it is intense and of which Lawrence was always a consummate master. The rest of the story is a mundane one. There is some criticism of the modern machine civilization and its enervating effects and the production of sexually inefficient men and women and this, according to Lawrence, is the cause of maladjustment of sexes and their unhappiness.

Lawrence had a dual purpose in writing the book. The first was to shock the genteel society of the country of his birth which had hounded him and the second was to portray his ideal of sexual relations which was never absent from any of his books. His life was a long battle with the censor-morans, as he called them. Even before he became an author he was in clash with conventions. He had a very repressive mother who could not reconcile herself to the thought that her son had written the White Peacock. His sisters were extremely prim and correct. In his letters he said that he would not like them to read Lady Chatterley's Lover. His school teacher would not let him use the word 'stallion' in an essay and his first love Jessie could not read aloud Ibsen as she considered him immodest. This was a bad beginning for a hyper-sensitive man of "wild and untamed masculinity". Then came the publishers and last of all the censors. From 1910 the publishers asked him to prune and to prune his writings and he wrote and rewrote his novels to satisfy them. Aldous Huxley tells us that Lady Chatterley's Lover was rewritten three times: Essays (Dent). Aldington has seen in it a desire to avoid being pornographic but the fact is that Lawrence hated to be bowdlerized. His first publisher Heinemann refused his Sons and Lovers and he went over to Duckworths. They refused Rainbow and he went to Secker. They brought out his Lost Girl and it won a prize but after the Rainbow he was a banned author whose name could not be mentioned in genteel society. He became bitter and decided to produce a "taboo-shattering bomb". At the same time he started writing in defence of his fight for sexual liberation in English writing. This was Lawrence's first reason for writing the book under our review.

Lawrence viewed sex with indifference and also with passion. He was indifferent to it because he saw in it nothing to hide and he saw it with passion because to him it was the only "motivating power of life" and the culmination of all human strength and happiness. His thesis in his own words was—"I want men and women to be able to think sex fully, completely, honestly and cleanly" and not to make of it "a dirty little secret". The taboo on sex in art and literature which was more strict thirty-five years ago, seemed to him to corrode domestic and social life and his definite view was that a candid discussion of sex through art was the only catharsis for purifying and relieving the congested emotions. This is the view he expounded through his writings and sex is never absent from his novels, his poems and his critical writings. As he was inclined freely to use words which Swift had used before him and many more, he never considered his writings obscene. He used them in this book with profusion and they occur in conversation between Mellors and Constance and in the descriptions of the sexual congresses and the erotic love play. The realism is staggering and outpaces the French Realists. But he says of himself:

"I am abused most of all for using the so called 'obscene words'. Nobody quite knows what the word 'obscene' itself means, or what it is intended to mean: but gradually all the old words that belong to the body below the navel, have come to be judged obscene." (Introduction to Pansies).

This was the second motivating factor in the book.

One cannot doubt the sincerity of Lawrence's belief and his missionary zeal. Boccaccio seemed fresh and wholesome to him and Dante was obscene. He prepared a theme which would lend itself to treating with sex on the most erotic plane and one from which the genteel society would get the greatest shock and introduced a game-keeper in whose mouth he could put all the taboo words and then he wrote of sex, of the sex organs and sex actions with brutal candidness. With the magic of words he made the characters live and what might even have passed for allegory and symbolism became extreme realism. He went too far. While trying to edit the book so that it could be published in England he could not excise the prurient parts. He admitted defeat and wrote to Seekers that he "got colour-blind and did not know any more what was supposed to be proper and what not." Perhaps he got colour-blind when he wrote it. He wanted to shock genteel society, a society which had cast him out and banned him. He wrote a book which in his own words was "a revolution—a bit of a bomb". No doubt he wrote a flowering book with pistil and stamens standing but it was to quote his own words again 'a phallic novel' 'a shocking novel'. He admitted it was too good for the public. He was a courageous writer but his zeal was misplaced because it was born of hate and his novel was "too phallic for the gross public."

This is where the law comes in. The law seeks to protect not those who can protect themselves but those whose prurient minds take delight and secret sexual pleasure from erotic writings. No doubt this is treating with sex by an artist and hence there is some poetry even in the ugliness of sex. But as Judge Hand said obscenity is a function of many variables. If by a series of descriptions of sexual encounters described in language which cannot be more candid, some social good might result to us there would be room for considering the book. But there is no other attraction in the book. As J.B. Priestley said, "Very foolishly he tried to philosophize upon instead of merely describing these orgiastic impulses: he is the poet of a world in rut, and lately he has become its prophet, with unfortunate results in his fiction." [The English Novel, p. 142 (Nelson)]. The expurgated copy is available but the people who would buy the unexpurgated copy do not care for it. Perhaps the reason is as was summed up by Middleton Murray:

"Regarded objectively, it is a wearisome and oppressive book; the work of a weary and hopeless man. It is remarkable, indeed notorious for its deliberate use of unprintable words...."

"The whole book really consists of detailed descriptions of their sexual fulfilment. They are not offensive, sometimes very beautiful, but on the whole strangely wearisome. The sexual atmosphere is suffocating. Beyond this sexual atmosphere there is nothing, nothing." [Son of Woman (Jonathan Cape)].

No doubt Murray says that in a very little while and on repeated readings the mind becomes accustomed to them but he says that the value of the book then diminishes and it leaves no permanent impression. The poetry and music which Lawrence attempted to put into sex apparently cannot sustain it long and without them the book is nothing. The promptings of the unconscious particularly in the region of sex is suggested as the message in the book. But it is not easy for the ordinary reader to find it. The Machine Age and its impact on social life which is its secondary theme does not interest the reader for whose protection, as we said, the law has been framed.

We have dealt with the question at some length because this is the first case before this Court invoking the constitutional guarantee against the operation of the law regarding obscenity and the book is one from an author of repute and the centre of many controversies. The book is probably an unfolding of his philosophy of life and of the urges of the unconscious but these are unfolded in his other books also and have been fully set out in his Psychoanalysis and the Unconscious and finally in the Fantasia of the Unconscious. There is no loss to society if there was a message in the book. The divagations with sex are not a legitimate embroidery but they are the only attractions to the common man. When everything is said in its favour we find that in treating with sex the impugned portions viewed separately and also in the setting of the whole book pass the permissible limits judged of from our community standards and as there is no social gain to us which can be said to preponderate, we must hold the book to satisfy the test we have indicated above.

In the conclusion we are of the opinion that the High Court was right in dismissing the revision petition. The appeal fails and is dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

FULL BENCH.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Chandrachud and Mr. Justice Gokhale.

CHAITRAM DAGADU SONAVANE v. THE MALEGAON PANCHAYAT SAMITI.*

Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act (Mah. V of 1962), Sec. 72(2) before its amendment by Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis (Second Amendment) Act (Mah. 43 of 1964)—Notice summoning meeting in respect of which requisition received under s. 72(1)—Whether necessary to hold meeting within ten days of receipt of notice of no-confidence motion—Construction of statute—Provision in Act to be so construed as to make it and other provisions workable—Draftsman using word in sense not ordinarily used and whether such user to be permitted to defeat intention of Legislature.

Section 72(2) of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act, 1961, [as it stood before its amendment by the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis (Second Amendment) Act, 1964] required that the notice summoning the meeting for consideration of the motion of no-confidence, in respect of which a requisition had been received under s. 72(1) of the Act, must be issued within ten days from the date of the receipt of the requisition and it was not necessary to hold the meeting within ten days of the receipt of the notice of no-confidence motion.

The word "convene" in s. 49(2) and sub-ss. (2) and (4) of s. 72 of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act before their amendment, meant call or summon.

Popat Ragho v. Damu Shankar,¹ overruled.

Bhimrao Narayan Deshmukh v. Chief Executive Officer, Zilla Parishad, Yeotmal,² approved.

Haribhau v. State,³ referred to.

The Court should, if possible, so construe a provision in an Act as will make it and the other provisions of the Act workable and as will not render any of them ineffective or incapable of being carried out. The intention of the Legislature must not be allowed to be defeated merely because the draftsman has used a word in a sense in which it is not ordinarily used.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

G. N. Vaidya, for the petitioner.

N. S. Shastri, for opponents Nos. 2 and 5.

R. W. Adik, with A. V. Savant, for opponents Nos. 3 and 4.

M. N. Phadke, intervenes and appears with leave of the Court.

CHAIKANI C. J. The petitioner and respondents Nos. 2 to 4 are the members of the Panchayat Samiti of Malegaon. Respondent No. 2 was the Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti. On May 7, 1964, respondents Nos. 3 and 4 and 12 other members of the Panchayat Samiti gave a notice of a motion of no-confidence in respondent No. 2 under sub-s. (1) of s. 72 of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act. This notice was received by respondent No. 2 on May 7, 1964. On May 16, 1964, he issued a notice calling a meeting of the Samiti for the purpose of considering the motion of no-confidence on June 27, 1964. A meeting was accordingly held on June 27, 1964, in which the motion of no-confidence in respondent No. 2 was carried by a majority of 14 to 9. The petitioner thereafter filed the present special civil application, in which he has contended that the meeting, which was held on June 27, 1964, at which the motion of no-confidence was passed, was illegal, as it was not held within ten days from the date on which the notice of no-confidence motion was received by respondent No. 2. The petitioner has, therefore, prayed for a writ of mandamus or any other suitable writ or direction to be issued to the Panchayat Samiti respondent No. 1 not to give effect to the motion of no-confidence passed in the meeting held on June 27, 1964. The Division Bench before which the application came up for hearing decided to refer it to a larger Bench in view of what it regarded to be conflicting decisions in Haribhau v. State,¹ and Popat Ragho v. Damu Shankar.²

The question, which arises for our consideration, may be formulated as under:

"Whether under sub-section (2) of section 72 of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act, as this section stood before it was amended by the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis (Second Amendment) Act, 1964, it was necessary to hold a meeting of the Panchayat Samiti for the consideration of a motion of no-confidence of which notice had been given under sub-section (1), within ten days of the receipt of the notice or whether this sub-section only required that a notice calling a meeting of the Panchayat Samiti should be issued within ten days of the receipt of the notice of no-confidence motion?"

In order to consider this question, it is necessary to refer to the relevant provisions of the Act. Sub-section (1) of s. 72 stated that a motion of no-confidence in the Chairman of a Panchayat Samiti should be made by a requisition from not less than one-fourth of the total number of the members after giving a notice thereof in such manner as might be prescribed. Sub-section (2) of this section provided that the Chairman of a Panchayat Samiti shall convene a special meeting of the Panchayat Samiti to consider such motion within ten days of the receipt of the notice. Sub-section (4) provided that if no such meeting was convened by the Chairman of a Panchayat Samiti within the period specified in sub-s. (2), all or any of the members who have given notice of motion of no-confidence, might forward to the Commissioner a copy of the notice and request him to convene a special meeting of the Panchayat Samiti and that the Commissioner shall notwithstanding anything contained in s. 118 read with sub-s. (3) of s. 111 within ten days of the receipt of such communication by him convene the special meeting of the Panchayat Samiti for the consideration of the motion. The words "a special meeting" and "the special meeting" were substituted for the words "a meeting" and "the meeting" in sub-ss. (2) and (4) by Maharashtra Act XXXV of 1963. Sub-section (5) lays down that the meeting convened for the purpose of considering a motion under this section shall not, for any reason, be adjourned. Sub-section (4) of s. 111 provides that fifteen clear days' notice of an ordinary meeting, and ten clear days' notice of a special meeting, specifying the time and place at which such meeting is to be held and the business to be transacted thereat, shall be circulated to the Councillors. Under this sub-section, therefore, fifteen clear days' notice for an ordinary meeting and ten clear days' notice for a special meeting must be given. The provisions of s. 111 apply to Zilla Parishads, but they have been made applicable with some modifications to meetings of a Panchayat Samiti by s. 118. Originally sub-s. (4) of s. 111 applied without any modification to the meetings of a Panchayat Samiti and the period of notice required for calling an ordinary or a special meeting was the same. But by Maharashtra Act XXXV of 1963 the period for an ordinary meeting of a Samiti was reduced from fifteen days to ten days and for a special meeting of a Samiti from ten days to seven days. Section 49 prescribes the procedure to be followed when notice of no-confidence motion in the President of a Zilla Parishad is given. Sub-section (2) of s. 49 provided that the President shall convene a special meeting of the Zilla Parishad to consider the motion within ten days of the receipt of notice.

In Haribhan v. State, a Division Bench of this Court held that a meeting of the Panchayat Samiti convened by the Commissioner under sub-s. (4) of s. 72 of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act is either an ordinary meeting or a special meeting and that notice of such meeting must, therefore, be given in accordance with the provisions of sub-s. (4) of s. 111 of the Act. In that case the Commissioner had convened a meeting of the Samiti after two days' notice. It was held that the notice was bad and that the meeting held in pursuance of it was illegal. This decision led to the amendment of sub-s. (2) of s. 49, sub-ss. (2) and (4) of s. 72 and s. 118 by Maharashtra Act XXXV of 1963, as mentioned above. In the meantime another Division Bench of this Court at Nagpur in *Bhimrao Narayan Deshmukh v. Chief Executive Officer, Zilla Parishad, Yeotmal*³ held that the word "convene" in sub-s. (2) of s. 72 only meant "call", that what was required by sub-s. (2) was that the Chairman shall call a meeting or issue a notice of the meeting for consideration of the no-confidence motion within ten days of the receipt of the requisition and that it did not require that the meeting shall be held within ten days of the receipt of the motion of no-confidence. A contrary view has, however, been taken in Popat Ragho v. Damu Shankar, in which it has been held that the expression "convene a special meeting of the Panchayat Samiti" in sub-ss. (2) and (4) of s. 72 of the Act implied that the Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti should have called the body together and held the meeting before the expiry of ten days from the receipt of the notice. Evidently on account of these decisions the Legislature has again amended the above sections by Maharashtra Act XLIII of 1964 and the word "convene" has been replaced by the word "call" in ss. 49 and 72.

We have, however, to construe sub-s. (2) of s. 72 as it stood before the Act was amended in 1964. The word "convene" according to the Oxford English Dictionary means, to come together; to assemble or meet for a common purpose or for united action; to cause to come together; to summon (a person) before a tribunal. As the word has more than one meaning, the question as to what meaning it bears in a particular provision must be decided by reference to the context in which it has been used.

Sub-section (2) of s. 49 was almost in the same terms as sub-s. (2) of s. 72. This required the President to convene a special meeting of the Zilla Parishad to consider the motion of no-confidence within ten days of its receipt. Under sub-s. (4) of s. 111, ten days' notice of a special meeting has to be given. If, therefore, the word "convene" implied that the meeting must be held within ten days, then it would have not been possible to hold any meeting for considering a motion of no-confidence, for if the meeting was to be held within ten days, ten clear days' notice of it could not have been given and if notice of a shorter period was given, the meeting would have been illegal, see Haribhau v. State. The above meaning did not, therefore, fit in the context, for it would have made s. 49(2) ineffective and nugatory. On the other hand, if "convene" in this provision meant call or summon, then it was possible to hold the special meeting after giving the requisite notice. The Legislature could not have used this word in a sense in which it would have made the section unworkable. It follows that in s. 49(2) "convene" meant call or summon; and it must bear the same meaning in sub-ss. (2) and (4) of s. 72, because the same word cannot have two different meanings in two provisions of the same Act almost identical in terms and enacted for the same purpose. Moreover, before the Act was amended in 1963, ten clear days' notice was also necessary for a special meeting of a Panchayat Samiti. The word "convene" was, therefore, used in s. 72 in the sense indicated above before the Act was amended in 1963. It cannot change its meaning merely because by the amendment the period of notice for a special meeting was subsequently reduced.

Mr. Adik has pointed out the other provisions of the Act, which indicate that the same words have not always been employed to express the same intention. The proviso to sub-s. (4) of s. 111 refers to a meeting being "called". Sub-section (14) of s. 111 states that a Minister who desires to discuss with the Zilla Parishad any matter relating to the work of the Parishad may request the President to call a meeting of the Zilla Parishad and that the President shall summon the meeting accordingly. Sub-section (1) of s. 113 states that a President may convene a meeting of the Zilla Parishad to enable such dignitaries as the State Government may specify to address the Councillors. The word "convene" in this sub-section, therefore, appears to have been used in the same sense in which the words "call" and "summon" have been used in sub-s. (14) of s. 111. Section 122 provides that when a Minister requests the President of a Zilla Parishad to arrange a meeting with the Standing Committee or any Subjects Committee, the President shall take steps to summon such meeting. The words used in this section are "arrange" and "summon". It will, therefore, be seen that different words have been used in the same sense in different provisions of the Act. Mr. Phadke has urged that as another word "convene" has been employed in sub-ss. (2) and (4) of s. 72 it should be given a different meaning of "call together or assemble together". This word "convene" is also used in other provisions of the Act, such as ss. 76(1)(a), 111(8), 113(1) and 115(1). As stated above, in s. 113(1) it appears to have been used in the sense of call or summon. Sub-section (8) of s. 111 states that except with the permission of the presiding authority, no business shall be transacted and no proposition shall be discussed at any ordinary meeting, unless it has been entered in the notice convening such meeting. The meaning of the word "convene" in this sub-section obviously is "call" or "summon". It is, therefore, clear that this word has not always been used in the Act in the sense of assembling or bringing together.

It has been contended that the object of the Legislature in specifying a time-limit within which a meeting has to be convened is that a motion of no-confidence should be treated as a matter of urgency and should be disposed of within a short time after notice of it has been given. If it is held that sub-s. (2) of s. 72 only required that a notice calling a meeting should be issued within ten days, the Chairman, who had lost the confidence of the majority of the members of the Samiti, might have complied with the requirements of sub-s. (2) by issuing a notice summoning the meeting within ten days, but might actually have called the meeting at a very much later date, so as to enable him to continue in office for a long period against the desire of the majority of the members. There is some force in this argument. But on the other hand, we must not so interpret the provisions of the Act as to defeat the intention of the Legislature that a person who had lost the confidence of the members should not continue in office. As I have pointed out, unless the word "convene" is held to mean "call or summon", no meeting of the Zilla Parishad could lawfully have been held for consideration of the motion of no-confidence in the President or Vice-President. Ten clear days' notice of such a meeting had to be given and the meeting could not, therefore, have been held within ten days of the receipt of the notice of motion of no confidence. It would, therefore, have been impossible to carry out the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 49. Similarly, before the Act was amended in 1963, it would not have been possible to hold any lawful meeting of the Panchayat Samiti for consideration of the no-confidence motion against its Chairman or Deputy Chairman. Since one of the dictionary meanings of the word "convene" is summon, it seems to us that the word "convene" in ss. 49 and 72 must be held to have this meaning, for otherwise sub-s. (2) of s. 49 and sub-ss. (2) and (4) of s. 72 before the Act was amended in 1963 could not have been given effect to and would have become unworkable.

Mr Phadke has relied on the decision in Popat Ragho v. Damu Shankar. The judgment shows that the learned Judges were aware of the difficulties which have been pointed out above. At p. 733 it has been observed:

"...It may be that when making the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 49 the legislative draftsman overlooked the difficulty that would arise, but for the reason that difficulties would arise in the implementation of the other provisions of the Act, we cannot give to the expression used in s. 72 'convene a special meeting' any meaning other than what the plain English requires and merely to obviate difficulties."

With respect, it seems to us that the Court should, if possible, so construe a provision in an Act as will make it and the other provisions of the Act workable and as will not render any of them ineffective or incapable of being carried out. The intention of the Legislature should not be allowed to be defeated merely because the draftsman has used a word in a sense in which it is not ordinarily used. With respect, we do not, therefore, agree with the view taken in Popat Ragho v. Damu Shankar. We agree with the view taken in Special Civil Application No. 4 of 1963. In our opinion, all that sub-s. (2) of s. 72 required was that the notice summoning the meeting for consideration of the motion of no confidence, in respect of which a requisition had been received under sub-s. (1), should be issued within ten days from the date of the receipt of the requisition and that it was not necessary to hold the meeting within ten days of the receipt of the notice. The reply to the first part of the question formulated for our consideration is, therefore, in the negative and to the second part in the affirmative.

In this view the present application must fail.

DATTATRAYA SADASHIV DHOND v. GANPATI RAGHU GAOLI.*

Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act (Hyd. VIII of 1955), Secs. 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 33—Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act (Hyd. XXI of 1950), Secs. 44, 32, 19, 28—Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Rules, 1958. Rule 28—Inam abolished from July 20, 1955 under Act in respect of land leased to tenant before that date—Subsistence of relationship of landlord and tenant after such date—Tenancy under Hyderabad Tenancy Act when terminates—Conditions under which Inamdar or other person entitled to rights of occupant under s. 5 or 6 of Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act.

In cases in which the inam was abolished with effect from July 20, 1955, under the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954, and in which the inam land had been leased to a tenant before that date, the relationship of landlord and tenant continued to subsist between July 20, 1955 and July 1, 1960, and the provisions of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950 applied thereto.

Fruit & Vegetable Merchants Union v. Delhi Improvement Trust,¹ Ramjivan Birdichand v. Pandu,² *Deolal Bulakhi v. Kadu Tolaram*³ and Nama Handrale v. Shambhaji Rao,⁴ referred to.

Under the provisions of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950, the tenancy of a land terminates on the date on which the landholder makes an application for possession of the land to the Tehsildar as provided in s. 44(2) of the Act.

*Ganpati Appa v. Maruti Bala*⁵ and Ramchandra Anant v. Janardan,⁶ referred to.

In order to be entitled to the rights of an occupant under s. 5 or 6 of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954, as the case may be, the inamdar or other person should have been in lawful possession of the land on July 1, 1960.

The inamdar is entitled to the rights of an occupant under s. 5 or 6 of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954, as the case may be, if in the application for possession made by him under the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950, a final order for possession had been made in his favour before July 1, 1960. He would also be so entitled if an order for possession was made before July 1, 1960 and if such order is not set aside in appeal or revision or other proceeding by a superior Court. Where, however, no order for restoration of the possession to the landholder had been made before July 1, 1960, or if the order for possession was subsequently set aside, the tenant would become the occupant with effect from July 1, 1960.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

CHAINANI C.J. These three applications raise questions relating to the interpretation of the provisions of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954, hereinafter referred to as the Act. The petitioner in Special Civil Application No. 1174 of 1963 was the holder of two Madad Mash Inam (Personal Inam) lands. Opponent No. 1 was the tenant of the lands. As the lands were not service inam lands, the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950 (hereinafter referred to as the Tenancy Act) applied to them. On July 20, 1955, the Inam was abolished by the Inams Abolition Act. All the provisions of the Act did not however come into force on that date. On December 16, 1958, the petitioner gave a notice to opponent No. 1 terminating his tenancy under sub-s. (1) of s. 44 on the ground that he required the lands bona fide for cultivating them personally. On March 31, 1959, he made an application to the Tehsildar for obtaining possession of the lands. On July 1, 1960, all the remaining provisions of the Act came into force. On December 15, 1960, the Tehsildar made an order allowing the petitioner to resume the lands. This order was confirmed in appeal by the Deputy Collector. It was set aside in revision by a Full Bench of the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal. The Tribunal took the view that after the abolition of the Inam with effect from July 20, 1955, the petitioner had no rights left in the lands and that consequently the application made by him under s. 44 of the Tenancy Act was not maintainable. Against the order made by the Revenue Tribunal the petitioner has filed the present special civil application.

In Special Civil Application No. 1435 of 1963 the petitioners are the holders of a land, which is said to be Deshmukh Inam. Such inams were abolished with effect from July 1, 1960, under sub-s. (2A) of s. 1 read with sub-s. (1) of s. 3 of the Act. On March 26, 1959, the petitioners made an application for possession of the land under s. 32 read with s. 44 of the Act. This application has been rejected by the Revenue Tribunal on the ground that after the abolition of the inam, the petitioners had no rights left in the land and that consequently they could not resume the land under s. 44.

The petitioner in Special Civil Application No. 697 of 1964 was the holder of three inam lands. The inam was abolished with effect from July 20, 1955. In 1956 the tenant opponent No. 1 surrendered all his tenancy rights and in pursuance of the order made by the Tehsildar the possession of the lands was delivered to the petitioner. The petitioner was, therefore, in possession of the lands on July 1, 1960. After ss. 5 and 6 of the Act came into force, the Tehsildar held that as the tenant was in possession of the lands on July 20, 1955, the occupancy rights should be granted to him. This order was confirmed in appeal by Government and is being challenged in this application.

As the questions involved in these applications arise in many other cases, they have been referred to a Full Bench.

The questions, which arise for consideration by the Full Bench, may be formulated as under:

(1) Whether in cases, in which the inam was abolished with effect from July 20, 1955, under the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954, and in which the inam land had been leased to a tenant before that date, the relationship of landlord and tenant continued to subsist between July 20, 1955, and July 1, 1960, and whether the provisions of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act applied thereto?

(2) Whether under the provisions of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, the tenancy of a land terminates on the date on which the land holder makes an application for possession of the land to the Tehsildar, as provided in sub-s. (2) of s. 44 of the Act or on the date on which the Tehsildar makes an order for possession of the land being restored to the landlord?

(3) Whether in order to be entitled to the rights of an occupant under ss. 5 or 6 of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, as the case may be, the inamdar or other person should have been in possession of the land on July 20, 1955, or July 1, 1960?

(4) Whether the inamdar is entitled to the rights of an occupant under ss. 5 or 6 of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954, as the case may be, if in the application for possession made by him under the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act—

(a) a final order for possession had been made in his favour before July 1, 1960,

(b) an order for possession had been made before July 1, 1960, but against which an appeal or revision or other proceeding in a superior Court was pending on that date, or

(c) no order for possession was made in favour of the inamdar before July 1, 1960?

In order to answer these questions, it is necessary to refer to the relevant provisions of the Act. The Act was published on July 20, 1955. It was amended with retrospective effect by the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams (Amendment) Act, 1956. Sub-section (2) of s. 1 of the amending Act states that it shall be deemed to have come into force on July 20, 1955, that is, on the same date on which the parent Act had been published in the Official Gazette. The Act was further amended in 1959 by the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams (Amendment) Act, 1959. Sub-section (2) of s. 1 of the Act states that it shall be applicable to all inams except—

(i) inams held by or for the benefit of charitable and religious institutions;

(ii) inams held for rendering village service useful to the Government or to the village community including sethsendhi, neeradi and balutha inams.

Sub-section (2A) provides that on the coming into force of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams (Amendment) Act, 1959, this Act shall apply also to cash grants and inams of the nature of community service inams and watans. Sub-section (3) of s. 1 is in the following terms:

“(3) (a) This section, section 2, section 3 except clauses (d), (g), (h) and (i) of sub-section (2), sections 30 to 34 (both inclusive), section 35 to the extent to which it enables rules to be made for the purposes of the aforesaid sections, section 36 and section 37, shall come into force on the date of publication of this Act in the Official Gazette;

(b) the rest of this Act shall come into force on such date as the Government may by notification in the Official Gazette, appoint in this behalf.”

The Act was published on July 20, 1955. The date appointed by the State Government under cl. (b) is July 1, 1960. Consequently the provisions referred to in cl. (a) of sub-s. (3) came into force on July 20, 1955, while the remaining provisions came into force on July 1, 1960.

Clause (b) in sub-s. (1) of s. 2 defines the expression “date of vesting” as meaning when used—

(i) in sub-section (1), sub-section (2) with reference to clauses (a), (b), (c), (e) and (f), and sub-section (3) of section 3 and section 34, means,—

(A) in the case of inams other than those specified in clauses (i) and (ii) of sub-section (2A) of section 1, the date of the publication of this Act in the Official Gazette, and

(B) in the case of inams and cash grants to which this Act shall apply under sub-section (2A) of section 1, the date of the coming into force of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams (Amendment) Act, 1959;

(ii) elsewhere in this Act the date appointed by the Government under clause (b) of sub-section (3) of section 1;

There are no clauses (i) and (ii) in sub-s. (2A) of s. 1. The reference to sub-s. (2A) of s. 1 in sub-cl. (A) of cl. (i) in the definition is, therefore, a mistake. The reference obviously is to sub-s. (2) of s. 1. The State Government has issued a notification under cl. (ii) appointing July 1, 1960 as the relevant date. It will be seen that the date of vesting is not the same in the case of all inams. In respect of inams abolished by the amending Act of 1959, to which sub-s. (2A) of s. 1 applies, the date of vesting is July 1, 1960. In respect of the other inams the date of vesting is July 20, 1955, with reference to the provisions referred to in cl. (i) of the definition of "date of vesting" and July 1, 1960 with reference to the remaining provisions of the Act. Section 2A states that if any question arises whether any land is an inam, whether any inam is held with or without conditions of service, whether any person is a kabiz-e-kadim, permanent tenant or tenant, or in regard to other matters mentioned in this section, the State Government or the officer authorised by that Government shall decide the question. Sub-section (2) of this section provides for an appeal to the State Government where any question is decided by an officer authorised by the State Government.

Sub-section (1) of s. 3 is in the following terms:

"(1) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in any usage, settlement, contract, grant, sanad, order or other instrument, Act, regulation, rules or order having the force of law and notwithstanding any judgment, decree or order of a Civil, Revenue or Atiyat Court, and with effect from the date of vesting, all inams to which this Act is made applicable under sub-section (2) or sub-section (2A) of section 1 of this Act shall be deemed to have been abolished and shall vest in the State."

Sub-section (2) of this section provides:

"Save as expressly provided by or under the provisions of this Act and with effect from the date of vesting, the following consequences shall ensue, namely:—

(a) the provisions of the Land Revenue Act, 1317 Fasli relating to inams, and the provisions of the Hyderabad Atiyat Enquiries Act, 1952 and other enactments, rules, regulations and circulars in force in respect of Atiyat grants shall, to the extent they are repugnant to the provisions of this Act, not apply and the provisions of the Land Revenue Act, 1317 Fasli, relating to unalienated lands for purposes of land revenue, shall apply to the said inams;

(b) all rights, title and interest vesting in the inamdar, Kabiz-e-Kadim, permanent tenant and tenant in respect of the inam land, other than the interests expressly saved by or under provisions of this Act and including those in all communal lands, cultivated and uncultivated lands (whether assessed or not), waste lands, pasture lands, forests, mines and minerals, quarries, rivers and streams, tanks and irrigation works, fisheries and ferries, shall cease and be vested absolutely in the State free from all encumbrances;

(c) all such inam lands shall be liable to payment of land revenue;

Explanation.—In the case of an inam land in respect of which the settlement of assessment has not been made under the Land Revenue Act, 1317 Fasli, the amount of land revenue thereon shall be assessed under section 52 of that Act with effect from the date of vesting under this section.

(d) all rents and land revenue including cesses and royalties, accruing in respect of such inam lands, on or after the date of vesting, shall be payable to the State and not to the inamdar, and any payment made in contravention of this clause shall not be valid;...

(h) the relationship with regard to inam land as between the inamdar and Kabiz-e-kadim, permanent tenant or tenant shall be extinguished;

(i) the Inamdar, Kabiz-e-kadim, permanent tenant and a tenant of inam lands and any person holding under them and holder of an inam, shall, as against the Government be entitled only to such rights and privileges and be subject to such conditions as are provided for under this Act and any other rights and privileges which may have accrued to any of them in the inam before the date of vesting against the inamdar shall cease and shall not be enforceable against the Government or the inamdar...."

Out of these, cls. (a), (b) and (c) came into force on July 20, 1955, while the remaining clauses did not come into force until July 1, 1960. Sections 5 and 6 provide for the grant of occupancy rights to the persons in possession. Subsection (1) of s. 5 is as under:

"(1) In the case of an occupied land comprised in an inam including a community service inam or watan, which under the terms of the grant or commutation settlement was to continue in perpetuity and was alienable without the permission of any competent authority—

(i) if it is in the possession of a Kabiz-e-kadim, or of a permanent tenant or tenant holding from the inamdar, such Kabiz-e-kadim, permanent tenant or tenant, and

(ii) in other cases, the inamdar shall be primarily liable to the State Government for the payment of land revenue due in respect of the land held by him and shall, subject to the provisions of sub-sections (2), (3), (4) and (5), be entitled to all the rights and be liable to all the obligations in respect of such land as an occupant under the Land Revenue Act, 1317 Fasli, and the rules made thereunder."

Sub-section (1) of s. 6 similarly provides for the grant of occupancy rights to the person in possession of an occupied land comprised in an inam other than land to which the provisions of s. 5 apply. Section 33 provides for the continuing application of the Tenancy Act. This section runs as under:

"Nothing in this Act shall in any way be deemed to affect the application of the provisions of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950, to any inam or the mutual rights and obligations of an inamdar and his tenants, save in so far as the said provisions are in any way inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act."

I may here also refer to s. 4 of the amending Act of 1956, which provides that with effect from the date of the publication of the principal Act in the Official Gazette, that is, July 20, 1955, and till the commencement of the provisions mentioned in cl. (b) of sub-s. (3) of s. 1, that is, July 1, 1960, the full land revenue payable in respect of every inam abolished and vesting in the State shall be recovered from the inamdar of such inam as if he were the occupant of such land.

Before we deal with the questions, which arise for our determination, we consider it necessary to observe that this Act and the subsequent amendments made to it have not been drafted with that care which may reasonably be expected having regard to the fact that the Act affects the vested rights in property of inamdars and several other persons. The Act contains conflicting provisions with the result that it is difficult to find out what exactly the Legislature intended. There are also grammatical and spelling mistakes. If, therefore, we have given to some of the provisions of the Act a meaning which the language used may not strictly justify, it is due to the fact that that is the only way in which we can resolve the conflict between the different provisions of the Act and find a solution for the Chinese puzzle which they have posed.

Mr. Adik has contended, and the same argument has been adopted by Mr. Deshmukh, that the vesting of an inam in the State under sub-s. (1) of s. 3 with effect from July 20, 1955, that is, the date from which the inam was abolished, was absolute and unqualified, that all rights, title and interest vesting in the inamdar and other persons in the inam land ceased and that, therefore, the relationship previously existing between the inamdar and his tenant came to an end on the same date. It has been urged that sub-s. (2) mentions only some consequences of abolition of inams. The language used in sub-s. (1) supports this argument, because under this sub-section the whole grant was cancelled and whatever was granted or held in inam was to vest in the State. If, therefore, the grant was of the land, the land was to vest in the State. If, however, this was to be the result of the vesting; then it is not easy to understand why cl. (b) in sub-s. (2) refers to interests expressly saved by or under the provisions of the Act. Also in that case it would not have been necessary to include s. 33 in the Act. If all the rights of the inamdar and his tenant vested in the State on July 20, 1955, the relationship of landlord and tenant also ceased on that date and the Tenancy Act could no longer govern that relationship. Section 33 must have been enacted with some purpose and must, therefore, be given some meaning. Section 4 of the amending Act of 1956 imposes a liability on the inamdar to pay land revenue of the inam land for the period from July 20, 1955 to July 1, 1960. This liability would not have been imposed upon him if he had been deprived of all his rights in the inam land. The word "vest" does not have a fixed connotation, meaning in all cases that the property is owned by the person or authority in whom it vests. It may vest in title, or it may vest in possession or it may vest in a limited sense, see Fruit & Vegetable Merchants Union v. Delhi Improvement Trust.¹ Having regard to the provisions, to which I have just referred, it seems to us that sub-s. (2) of s. 3 explains what vesting under sub-s. (1) means and specifies the rights, title and interest, which vest in the State by reason of the abolition of the inam.

Clause (b) in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 provides that all rights, title and interest vesting in the inamdar, permanent tenant and tenant in respect of inam land, other than the interests expressly saved by or under the provisions of this Act, shall cease and be vested absolutely in the State free from all encumbrances, with effect from the date of vesting, July 20, 1955. This clause, therefore, saves from vesting in the State the interests expressly saved by or under the provisions of the Act. The only provisions of the Act, which save any interest, are those contained in s. 33. This section provides for two things:

(1) The continued application of the Tenancy Act and

(2) it saves the mutual rights and obligations of an inamdar and his tenant. In the context "mutual rights and obligations" can only mean the mutual rights and obligations under the Tenancy Act. It may be noted that s. 33 itself contains a saving clause that the provisions of the Tenancy Act shall apply, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act. Section 33 read with cl. (b), therefore, saved from vesting in the State the mutual rights and obligations of an inamdar and his tenant, which were not inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act. These rights and obligations were the right of the inamdar to receive rent and recover possession of the inam land subject to the restrictions contained in the Tenancy Act and the right of the tenant to continue in possession of the land and to enjoy its income subject to his liability to pay rent and to restore possession to the inamdar in accordance with the provisions of the Tenancy Act. Clauses (d), (h) and (i) also show that the mutual rights and obligations of an inamdar and his tenant were intended to be saved and did not vest in the State on July 20, 1955. It is true that these clauses did not come into force till July 1, 1960. But they were part of the Act even on July 20, 1955 and can, therefore, be looked at for the purpose of ascertaining the true intention of the Legislature. Under cl. (d) all rents became payable to the State after July 1, 1960, which was the date of vesting for the purpose of this clause. The necessary inference, therefore, is that till that date the rent was payable by the tenant to the inamdar. Clause (h) states that on the date of vesting, that is, July 1, 1960, the relationship with regard to inam land as between the inamdar and his tenant shall be extinguished. The relationship, therefore, continued till that date. Clause (i) provides that with effect from the date of vesting, which for the purposes of this clause was July 1, 1960, any rights and privileges which may have accrued to any person in the inam before the date of vesting against the inamdar shall cease and shall not be enforceable against the Government or the inamdar. The rights in respect of the inam land, therefore, became unenforceable against the inamdar from July 1, 1960.

It is clear from these provisions that the Legislature intended to save mutual rights and obligations of an inamdar and his tenant and to continue the mutual relationship between them during the period from July 20, 1955 to July 1, 1960. This is also suggested by s. 4 of the amending Act of 1956. As the inamdar was made liable to pay land revenue to Government, he was also given a right to recover rent from his tenant. There has been some argument before us in regard to the words "as if he were the occupant of such land" in s. 4 of the amending Act of 1956. These words were used because ss. 5 and 6 relating to the grant of occupancy rights did not come into force till July 1, 1960. The intention, therefore, appears to have been that till that date the inamdar's right to the possession of the inam land and his liability to pay land revenue should continue as if he was an occupant.

This view also appears to be in accordance with the object and scheme of the Act. The object of the Act as stated in the preamble was to provide for the abolition of inams and cash grants. The various provisions of the Act show that it was not intended to disturb the possession of the person, who was actually in possession, or to take possession from him. The Act has, therefore, provided for the grant of occupancy rights to the person in possession of the inam land. These occupancy rights could not be granted before July 1, 1960, when ss. 5 and 6 came into force. Till then the relationship between the inamdar and his tenant was allowed to continue and they could enforce mutual rights and obligations. The land holder could, therefore, make an application for possession to the Tehsildar and the tenant was competent to surrender his tenancy rights.

The mutual rights and obligations were governed by the Tenancy Act before July 20, 1955. There is no dispute that this Act applied to inam lands other than service inam lands. Section 102 of the Tenancy Act, as it stood on July 20, 1955, provided that nothing in the preceding sections of the Act shall apply to lands leased by Government. It is not disputed before us that even after the inam was abolished, the inam land cannot be said to have been leased by Government to the inamdar's tenant, who was allowed to continue in possession. The Tenancy Act, therefore, continued to apply. With effect from June 8, 1958, s. 102 was replaced by s. 102A and some other sections. Clause (a) in s. 102A provides that nothing in the preceding provisions of the Act shall apply to lands leased or held by Government. The corresponding words in s. 88 of the Bombay Tenancy Act are "lands belonging to or leased by Government." The word "hold" is not defined in the Tenancy Act. Clause (z) in sub-s. (1) of s. 2 of the Tenancy Act states that words and expressions used in this Act but not defined therein shall have the meaning assigned to them in the Hyderabad Land Revenue Act. The expression "to hold" is defined in s. 2(vi) of the Land Revenue Act to mean to be lawfully in possession of land, whether such possession is actual or not. In many cases this Court has, therefore, taken the view that the word "held" implied possession of the person concerned, see *Ramjivan Birdichand v. Pandu*² and Deolal Bulakhi v. Kadu Tolaram.³ It has been contended by the learned Government Pleader that after the inam was abolished, the title to the inam land vested in Government and that consequently Government was in constructive possession of it with effect from July 20, 1955. The mutual rights and obligations of an inamdar and his tenant, which were saved by cl. (b) in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 read with s. 33, included a right to possession. After the abolition of the inam, the tenant, therefore, continued in possession not by reason of any authority or permission granted by Government, but because this right and the inamdar's right to recover possession in accordance with law did not vest in Government until July 1, 1960. The tenant was also liable to pay rent to the inamdar and not to Government, which was only entitled to receive land revenue. The scheme of the Act also shows that while the Act abolishes the inams, it does not provide for resumption of possession of the inam land. There is no provision in the Act empowering Government to resume possession or to evict the person in possession (except when occupancy price is not paid). Government cannot, therefore, be said to have been even in constructive possession of the inam land after July 20, 1955, when the inam was abolished. The land cannot, therefore, be said to have been held by Government within the meaning of cl. (a) in s. 102A of the Tenancy Act. The operation of this Act was, therefore, not excluded with effect from June 8, 1958. The Act continued to apply till July 1, 1960, when under cl. (h) in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 the relationship between the inamdar and his tenant was extinguished. The provisions of the Tenancy Act, under which a tenancy cannot be terminated except as provided in this Act, became inconsistent with the express provisions contained in cl. (h) of the Act, which extinguished the relationship between the inamdar and his tenant. The mutual rights and obligations of the inamdar and his tenant were no longer saved by cl. (b) in sub-s. (2) of s. 3 read with s. 33 of the Act and all rights, title and interest of both the inamdar and his tenant in the inam land thereafter vested in Government. From the same date the person in possession of the land became entitled to all the rights of an occupant under the Land Revenue Act.

The position, therefore, is that on July 20, 1955, all rights, title and interest in the inam land vesting in the inamdar and his tenant ceased and became vested in Government free from all encumbrances, except the mutual rights and obligations of the inamdar and his tenant under the Tenancy Act, which were saved for a limited period upto July 1, 1960. The inam land lost its inam character and ceased to be governed by the special laws relating to inam lands previously applicable to it. The Land Revenue Act became applicable and the land became liable to payment of land revenue. The State acquired title to and proprietary rights in the land, but possession of the land was to continue with the tenant subject to his liability to pay rent to the inamdar and to the right of the inamdar to recover possession from him in accordance with law. This relationship between the inamdar and his tenant came to an end on July 1, 1960, when the person in possession became entitled to the rights of an occupant under the Land Revenue Act.

Mr. Deshmukh has relied on the decision of a Division Bench of this Court in Nama Handrale v. Shambhajirao.⁴ In these applications it was held that after an inam was abolished, the ownership of the inam land did not stand transferred to and vest in the tenant under s. 38E of the Tenancy Act. That decision is correct, because s. 38E provides for the transfer of the ownership rights of the landholder to the protected tenant. As after July 20, 1955, the title to the land vested in the State, the landholder had no ownership rights left which the tenant could purchase under s. 38 and which could be transferred to him under s. 38E. The judgment contains observations that the rights of the tenant had come to an end with effect from July 20, 1955. For the reasons, which we have given, those observations do not appear to be quite correct.

In regard to the second question, sub-s. (1) of s. 44 of the Tenancy Act provides that a landholder may after giving notice to the tenant and making an application for possession as provided in sub-s. (2), terminate the tenancy of any land, if the landholder bona fide requires the land for cultivating it personally. Sub-section (2) states that the notice required to be given under sub-s. (1) shall be in writing and shall state the purpose for which the land holder requires the land and that an application for possession under s. 32 shall be made to the Tehsildar. Two things are, therefore, necessary for terminating a tenancy under sub-s. (1) :

(1) A notice must be given to the tenant stating that the landholder requires the land for cultivating it personally, and

(2) the landholder must make an application for possession to the Tehsildar under s. 32 of the Act.

If these requirements are complied with, the tenancy stands terminated. Sub-section (2) of s. 32 provides that no landholder shall obtain possession of any land or dwelling house held by a tenant, except under an order of the Tehsildar, for which he shall apply in the prescribed form. A tenant is, therefore, entitled to continue in possession of the land until the Tehsildar has made an order for possession being restored to the landholder. It has, therefore, been urged that he continues to be a tenant until the Tehsildar has made his order. The manner in which a tenancy is to be terminated is, however, laid down in s. 44. Under this section the tenancy terminates when after giving the requisite notice the landholder makes an application for possession to the Tehsildar. Thereafter the tenant's possession is not unlawful, but it is not held by him as a tenant. He has an estate in possession, which he will lose if the Tehsildar makes an order in favour of the landholder. If, however, the Tehsildar rejects the application of the landholder, the termination of tenancy by the landholder will become ineffective. The tenancy will revive and the tenant will continue in possession as if his tenancy had not been terminated. In this connection reference may be made to ss. 19 and 28. Section 19 provides for termination of a tenancy on other grounds, one of which is failure to pay rent within the prescribed time. The first proviso in sub-s. (2) states that no tenancy of any land held by a tenant shall be terminated on any of the grounds mentioned in this sub-section, unless the landholder gives six months' notice in writing intimating his intention to terminate the tenancy and the grounds for such termination. Six months' notice as provided in this sub-section is, therefore, required for terminating a tenancy. Sub-section (1) of s. 28 is in the following terms:

"(1) Where a tenancy of any land held by a tenant is terminated for non-payment of rent and the landholder files any proceeding to eject the tenant, the Tehsildar shall call upon the tenant to tender to the landholder the rent in arrears together with the cost of proceeding within ninety days from the date of the order, and, if the tenant complies with such order, the Tehsildar shall, in lieu of making an order of ejectment, pass an order directing that the tenancy has not been terminated, and thereupon the tenant shall hold the land as if the tenancy had not been terminated."

The opening words of this sub-section make it clear that a proceeding to eject a tenant can be instituted after the tenancy has been terminated, that is to say, an application for possession can be made to the Tehsildar under s. 32 only after the tenancy has been terminated. A tenancy is, therefore, terminated by the notice given under sub-s. (2) of s. 19 and an order of the Tehsildar is not required for this purpose. In fact until the tenancy is terminated, the landholder does not get a right to possession of the land. The words "as if the tenancy had not been terminated" at the end of the sub-section also imply that the tenancy had previously been terminated. Section 28, therefore, also shows that a tenancy is terminated by giving a notice to the tenant and that it does not continue until the Tehsildar has made an order for possession of the land.

Sub-section (10) of s. 44 states that the State Government shall provide by rules for—

(iv) the time when the termination of tenancy will take effect.

Rule 28 of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Rules prescribes the manner of conducting inquiries into applications for possession of lands made under s. 44. Sub-rule (5) of this rule states that if the Tehsildar grants the application, the termination of the tenancy of the land, in respect of which the application is granted, shall take effect from the commencement of the year following the year in which the application is granted. It has been contended by Mr. Deshmukh that as under these provisions the termination of the tenancy does not take effect until the commencement of the revenue year following that in which the application is granted, the tenancy continues upto that time. These provisions must, however, be read along with sub-s. (1) of s. 44, which lays down the manner in which a landholder may terminate a tenancy. Under this sub-section a tenancy is terminated when after giving the prescribed notice the landholder makes an application for possession. The words used in sub-s. (10) (iv) are not "when the tenancy will be deemed to have been terminated", but "when the termination of tenancy will take effect." These words imply that the tenancy had terminated earlier and that the rules may provide for the time when effect is to be given to the termination of the tenancy, i.e. when the consequences of the termination of the tenancy will issue. It seems to us, therefore, that sub-r. (5) of r. 28 only provides for the time when the consequences, which arise from the termination of the tenancy, will take effect, that is, when the landholder will be entitled to obtain actual possession of the land.

The view, which we are taking, is in accordance with that taken by a Full Bench of this Court in Ganpati Appa v. Maruti Bala.⁵ That decision was given under corresponding provisions of the Bombay Tenancy Act. It was held that a tenancy terminates on the expiry of the period of notice given by the landlord to his tenant terminating his tenancy. A distinction was drawn between the right to terminate a tenancy and the right to obtain possession and it was held that the right to possession accrues on the termination of the tenancy, that is, on the expiry of the period of notice given by the landlord to the tenant. Similar view was taken in Ramchandra Anant v. Janardan,⁶ where at p. 641 it was observed:

"...Under the ordinary law, if a tenant continues in possession after his tenancy has been determined, his possession is protected by law and he cannot be ousted except in due course of law, but he has no right to possession after the termination of tenancy. Under the Tenancy Act, however, even after his tenancy has been determined by a notice given by his landlord, the tenant has a legal right to continue in possession, until the Mamlatdar has made an order for possession being restored to the landlord. During the intervening period, the tenant has an estate in possession, of which he can only be deprived by an order of the Mamlatdar."

In our opinion, therefore, the tenancy terminates when the landholder makes an application for possession of the land to the Tehsildar as provided in sub-s. (2) of s. 44.

The next question which arises for consideration is about the date, possession on which would entitle the inamdar, Kabiz-e-kadim, permanent tenant or tenant holding from the inamdar to the rights of an occupant under s. 5 or 6, as the case may be. These sections provide for grant of occupancy rights in occupied land, which is defined in cl. (g) of s. 2 to mean inam land, which is not uncultivated land, waste land, pasture land or forest land or not comprising a mine, quarry, tank, irrigation works, stream or river and which is in the actual or constructive possession of an inamdar. These sections came into force on July 1, 1960. The position as on this date should, therefore, be considered. Consequently possession, which would entitle a person to claim the rights of an occupant, would be possession on July 1, 1960. The date of vesting has no bearing on this question. This is also clear from the fact that for the period from July 20, 1955, to July 1, 1960, the inamdar was made liable for payment of land revenue. He would not have been made so liable, if it was intended that the tenant in possession on the date of vesting July 20, 1955, should become the occupant. Possession as on July 1, 1960, should, therefore, be considered for deciding the question who was entitled to become an occupant under ss. 5 and 6.

The possession which would entitle a person to be recognised as an occupant must also be lawful possession. If, therefore, a person had unlawfully taken possession of a land, he could not claim occupancy rights unless the right to recover possession from him had become barred by limitation before July 1, 1960. In cases in which the land had been leased to a tenant, the sections specifically provide for occupancy rights being granted to the tenant, even though the constructive possession was with the inamdar. The possession, which will determine the question of occupancy rights as between an inamdar and his tenant must, therefore, be actual possession. If, therefore, the inamdar had obtained the actual possession of the land before July 1, 1960, or if a final order for possession had been made in his favour before this date, which entitled him to actual possession on or before July 1, 1960, then the inamdar would be entitled to the rights of an occupant.

The next question to be considered is about proceedings for possession which were pending on July 1, 1960. There is no provision in the Act, which saves pending proceedings. The answer to the question will, therefore, depend upon who was entitled to actual possession on July 1, 1960. It has been urged that as in such cases the tenancy had been terminated before July 1, 1960, the person against whom the application had been made was no longer a tenant and that consequently he could not be recognised as an occupant. The word "inamdar" in ss. 5 and 6 includes a person who had ceased to be an inamdar by reason of the inam having been abolished on July 20, 1955. The word "tenant" in these sections must, therefore, also be held to include a person whose tenancy had been terminated and against whom an application for possession was pending. An inamdar like any other landholder acquires a right to apply for possession when the tenancy is terminated. Under s. 32 he cannot, however, take actual possession of the land except under an order of the Tehsildar. Until, therefore, an order for possession is made in favour of a landholder, he has no right to and cannot take actual possession of the land. He cannot be deemed to be in possession because he has terminated the tenancy or made an application for possession. Where, therefore, no order for possession had been made before July 1, 1960, then as the landholder was not entitled to actual possession on July 1, 1960, the tenant and not the landholder would become the occupant. Where, however, an order for possession had been made in favour of the landholder before July 1, 1960, but that order was the subject-matter of appeal or revision or other proceeding in a superior Court, then the final order made in that proceeding would determine the question of occupancy rights. If the order for possession made in favour of the landholder before July 1, 1960, is finally upheld, then he would be entitled to the rights of an occupant. If, on the other hand, the final order is in favour of the tenant, then he would become an occupant under the above provisions.

Our reply to the first question is, therefore, in the affirmative. The reply to the second question is that the tenancy terminates on the date on which the landholder makes an application for possession of the land to the Tehsildar as provided in sub-s. (2) of s. 44 of the Act. The reply to the third question is that possession as on July 1, 1960, should be considered for deciding who is entitled to the rights of an occupant. The reply to the fourth question is that the inamdar would be entitled to the rights of an occupant if a final order for possession had been made in his favour before July 1, 1960. He would also be so entitled if an order for possession was made before July 1, 1960, and if such order is not set aside in appeal or revision or other proceeding by a superior Court. Where, however, no order for restoration of the possession to the landholder had been made before July 1, 1960, or if the order for possession was subsequently set aside, the tenant would become the occupant with effect from July 1, 1960.

Answers accordingly.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Kotval.

ABDUS SHUKOOR SHAIKH DAWOOD v. A. M. CHATTERJEA.*

Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (VII of 1947), Secs. 2(d), 4(1), 5(1)(b), 23, 5(1)(f) & (e)—Defence of India Rules. Rule 91(1)—Cheque drawn in Indian currency payable in Indian as well as foreign currency—Whether such cheque foreign exchange within s. 2(d)—Construction of statute—Two views reasonably possible of provisions of penal statute—Court should prefer which.

A cheque or a bill of exchange expressed or drawn in Indian currency, which is payable in Indian as well as in foreign currency, is not foreign exchange within the meaning of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947.

Where two views are reasonably possible about the provisions of a penal statute, the Court must prefer the one which imposes a lesser restriction and a lesser obligation on a citizen and which does not make a citizen liable to a penalty in a doubtful case.

L. N. E. R. v. Berriman,¹ referred to.

Sharad Manohar, with H. J. Aranka, for the petitioner.

V. H. Gumaste, Additional Government Pleader, with A. A. Choudhury, for the respondent.

CHAINANI C. J. The petitioner was formerly employed in Arabian American Oil Company at Dhahran in Saudi Arabia. Some time about September 1959 his services came to an end. The petitioner was then given two cheques, one of which he encashed in Saudi Arabia. The second cheque, which has given rise to the present proceeding, was drawn by the American Oil Company in Indian currency on September 29, 1959. It was drawn on the "Netherlands Trading Society, Al Khobar through the Netherlands Trading Society, Bombay". Al Khobar is in Saudi Arabia. The cheque bore the endorsement "Pay to the order of Abdus Shukoor (the petitioner) Rs. 16504.31". The petitioner brought this cheque to India and gave it to one Badshah & Co., Bombay, who according to the petitioner, paid him the amount due on it. It appears that Badshah & Co. then sent this cheque by post to Bhatkal Provision Stores, Al Khobar. The cheque was intercepted in transmission and was sent to the Enforcement Directorate. An enquiry was started. Notice was issued to the petitioner and he was asked to show cause why adjudication proceedings as contemplated by s. 23D of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, should not be held against him for his having contravened the provisions of s. 4(1) of the Act. In reply the petitioner stated that he did not know that the cheque was foreign exchange or that the Act applied to it. He admitted that he had encashed the same with Badshah & Co., Bombay, but he stated that he had done so in ignorance of law. Respondent No. 1 held that the petitioner was guilty of contravening the provisions of s. 4(1) of the Act and imposed upon him a penalty of Rs. 2,000. That order is being challenged in the present petition.

Sub-section (1) of s. 4 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act states that except with the previous general or special permission of the Reserve Bank, no person other than an authorised dealer shall buy, sell or exchange with, any person not being an authorised dealer, any foreign exchange. It is not in dispute that Badshah & Co. were not authorised dealers. Consequently, if the cheque which the petitioner had given to Badshah & Co. was foreign exchange, then the petitioner will be held to have contravened the provisions of this section. The main question to be decided in this application, therefore, is whether this cheque was foreign exchange within the meaning of the Act.

“Foreign exchange” is defined in cl. (d) of s. 2 as under:

“‘foreign exchange’ means foreign currency, and includes all deposits, credits and balances payable in any foreign currency, and any drafts, traveller’s cheques, letters of credit and bills of exchange, expressed or drawn in Indian currency but payable in any foreign currency.”

At our instance enquiries on certain points were made by the Reserve Bank from the branches of the Netherlands Trading Society (now called Algemene Bank Nederland N. V.) at Al Khobar and Bombay and the replies which have been received have been filed along with the affidavits of the Superintendent of the Enforcement Directorate. The cheque was drawn on the Al Khobar branch of the Bank, evidently because the American Oil Company had an account with that branch. If the cheque had been presented at this branch, the amount would have been paid in Saudi Arabian Riyals, as Indian Rupees are not legal tender in Saudi Arabia, though Saudi Arabian Riyals so obtained could thereafter have been exchanged for Indian Rupees. The information now made available also shows that under an agreement between the Bank and the Oil Company, cheques marked “Through Netherlands Trading Society, Bombay”, if presented at the Bombay branch of the Bank, are paid by that branch without reference to its Al Khobar office. The petitioner could, therefore, have presented the cheque for payment at the Netherlands Trading Society, Bombay, and received from it the amount payable on the cheque. Although, therefore, the cheque was expressed and drawn in Indian currency, it could have been paid both in Indian currency if it was presented for payment in Bombay and in foreign currency (Saudi Arabian Riyals) if it had been presented at Al Khobar.

The learned Additional Government Pleader has urged that the word “payable” necessarily implies that it must be payable according to law. He has, however, conceded that the arrangement arrived at between the American Oil Company and the two branches of the Netherlands Trading Society was a lawful arrangement. Consequently the cheque could lawfully have been paid in India.

The learned Additional Government Pleader has urged that as the cheque was also payable in foreign currency (Saudi Arabian Riyals), it was foreign exchange as defined in the Act. Mr. Sharad Manohar has, on the other hand, contended that the word “but” implies that in order to be foreign exchange, the cheque must be payable only in foreign currency. According to the dictionary the word “but” is used in more than one sense. It is frequently used in the sense of “only”, as for instance, in the sentence, “He is but a child”. It also means “nevertheless; however; yet”. As to in what sense it is used in a particular provision must, therefore, be decided by reference to the context.

Our attention has been invited to sub-rule (1) of Rule 91 of the Defence of India Rules made under the Defence of India Act, 1939, in which the expression “foreign exchange” was defined to mean any bill or promissory note, payable otherwise than in rupees and any credit or balance otherwise than in rupees. For the words “payable otherwise than in rupees” the words “payable in foreign currency” have been used in the present definition. The difference in the language does not, however, seem to be material, because if the bill of exchange was payable otherwise than in rupees, then it was necessarily payable in foreign currency.

One of the objects of the Act is to regulate and control dealings in foreign exchange. The provisions of the Act, therefore, require that such dealings should take place through authorised dealers. It has been urged that if we were to accept the argument, which has been advanced on behalf of the petitioner, a person will be able to acquire foreign exchange otherwise than through an authorised dealer. For instance, if in the present case the cheque had not been intercepted in transmission, Badshah & Co. would have been able to acquire foreign exchange against this cheque through the person to whom they had despatched it. They could, however, not have done so lawfully. Sub-section (1)(b) of s. 5 read with s. 23 makes it an offence to negotiate any bill of exchange, so that a right to receive a payment is created in favour of any person outside India. Similarly, s. 5(1)(f) read with cl. (e) makes it punishable to negotiate any bill of exchange, so that a right to receive a payment is created in favour of any person as consideration for the acquisition by any person of property outside India. No foreign exchange could, therefore, have been lawfully acquired against the above cheque.

As the cheque in the present case was payable both in rupees and in foreign currency, in order to hold it to be foreign exchange, we will have to add the word "also" before the words "in any foreign currency". In any case, as two views are reasonably possible, we must prefer the one which imposes a lesser restriction and a lesser obligation on a citizen and which does not make a citizen liable to a penalty in a doubtful case. As was observed by Lord Simonds in *L. N. E. R. v. Berriman*¹ "a man is not to be put in peril upon an ambiguity".

We are, therefore, of the opinion that a cheque or a bill of exchange expressed or drawn in Indian currency, which is payable in Indian as well as in foreign currency, is not foreign exchange within the meaning of the Act. We, therefore, set aside the order made by the Director of Enforcement on November 22, 1963, imposing upon the petitioner a penalty of Rs. 2,000. As the point on which the petitioner has succeeded does not appear to have been raised previously, we make no order as to costs.

Order set aside.

Indian Electricity Act (X of 1910), Secs. 33, 36A, 37—Indian Electricity (Amendment) Act (XXXII of 1959), Sec. 24—General Clauses Act (X of 1897), Sec. 24—Constitution of India, Art. 20—Notification issued under s. 33 prior to its amendment whether actually and factually in force at date of its amendment—Notice required to be given under notification whether must be in writing—Meaning of expression "unless it is otherwise expressly provided" in s. 24, General Clauses Act.

The notification issued by the Government of Bombay on February 9, 1953, under s. 33 of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, before its amendment, was actually and factually in force on the date on which s. 33 as amended by the Indian Electricity (Amendment) Act, 1959, came into force.

M/s. W.R.E.D. Co. Ltd. v. State of Madras,¹ explained.

*In re Lingareddi*² and Chief Inspector of Mines v. K. C. Thapar,³ referred to.

The notification to the extent that it requires notice to be given regarding the particulars mentioned therein must be considered to be an absolute requirement which must be complied with. But to the extent to which it says that it must be in writing, it must be treated to be directory and not absolute. Substantial compliance with the requirement of notice, if proved, must be treated as sufficient compliance for the purpose of s. 33 of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910.

The expression "unless it is otherwise expressly provided" in s. 24 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, means that the notifications, rules, etc. under the repealed Act shall continue in force provided they are not inconsistent with the re-enacted provision, unless there is an express provision in the re-enacted legislation to the effect that they shall not so continue in force.

GOKHALE J. Some interesting questions of law arise for decision in this revision application which is filed by two of the three accused, who were convicted by the learned Judicial Magistrate, First Class, Court No. 5, Poona, in a prosecution for having committed certain offences under the Indian Electricity Act, 1910. Petitioner No. 1 is a company registered under the Indian Companies Act and owns the electric supply lines in the city of Poona and its surroundings. Petitioner No. 2 is the general manager and was responsible for the conduct of the business of the company at the material time. Accused No. 3, who was the Superintendent of the Ganeshkhind Receiving Station and as such was in charge of that station, having been acquitted, is not a party to this revision application.

There was a major accident in the Ganeshkhind Receiving Station of the Poona Electric Supply Company on May 15, 1961, at about 3 p.m. The prosecution case was that the oil circuit breaker of one of the two incoming feeders burst and affected the supply of electricity, resulting in the cutting of the supply to the city of Poona and its surroundings. As a result of the burst, nine persons, including original accused No. 3, received injuries and two of them succumbed to their injuries. The complaint was filed by one Yeshwant Gajanan Penkar, who was the Electrical Inspector for the city of Poona, on June 12, 1962, alleging, firstly that the company was bound to inform him about the accident within 24 hours of its occurrence and that not having been done, the company and accused No. 2, who was its General Manager, had committed an offence under s. 33 of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910. The other allegation was that in the inquiry which was made after the accident relating to the causes of the accident it had transpired that the accident was due to the fact that the apparatus of receiving electric supply was not maintained in accordance with the standards of Indian Standards Institution. It was also alleged that the company had not changed the oil since September 3, 1958, and had thus acted in contravention of the Code of practice for maintenance of insulating oil set down by the Indian Standards Institution. On these and other allegations it was stated that accused Nos. 2 and 3 who were in charge of the works of the company were required to maintain the apparatus of receiving electric supply in accordance with the standards of the Indian Standards Institution as required by Rule 29 of the Indian Electricity Rules, 1956, and they having failed to do so had committed an offence under r. 29 read with r. 141 of the Indian Electricity Rules. The learned Magistrate acquitted accused No. 3 on all the counts. He acquitted accused Nos. 1 and 2 of the offence under r. 29 read with r. 141 of the Indian Electricity Rules. He, however, convicted them for having committed the offence under s. 33 read with s. 47 of the Indian Electricity Act and sentenced both the accused to pay a fine of Rs. 170 each and directed that in the event of accused No. 2 not paying the fine he should suffer S.I. for one month. As regards accused No. 1, i.e. the Company, he directed that the fine should be recovered from the property of the company. There was an appeal against this order of the learned Magistrate to the learned Sessions Judge and the learned Additional Sessions Judge, Poona, who heard the appeal, confirmed the convictions and the sentences imposed on the accused and dismissed the appeal. That is why the present revision application has been filed by the two accused against the order of the learned Additional Sessions Judge.

It was not disputed that a written notice relating to the accident, as required by the Electricity Act, was not given on May 15, 1961. The defence of the accused was that although a written notice was not given within 24 hours of the accident, they had not committed any offence under s. 33 of the Indian Electricity Act read with the relevant rules made thereunder, inasmuch as intimation of all the particulars required to be communicated in a written notice had already been communicated to the Electrical Inspector within 24 hours of the accident and that was enough compliance with the requirements of s. 33 of the Indian Electricity Act.

Before discussing the evidence on the question whether intimation relating to all particulars was given or not, it would be convenient to refer to the relevant provisions of the Act and the rules so that the contentions made before me by the learned counsel on behalf of the petitioners can be properly appreciated. The Indian Electricity Act first came on the statute book in March 1910, but it has undergone many changes since then and one of the changes with which we are concerned in this application was the amendment effected by the amending Act No. XXXII of 1959, called the Indian Electricity (Amendment) Act, 1959. By s. 24 of this Act s. 33 was substituted. Before the substitution, sub-s. (1) of s. 33, to the extent relevant, was as follows:—

“33. (1) If any accident occurs in connection with the generation, transmission, supply or use of energy... and the accident results or is likely to have resulted in loss of life or personal injury, such persons shall give notice of the occurrence and of any loss of life or personal injury, actually occurred by the accident, in such form and within such time and to such authority as the State Government may by general or special order direct.”

Under this section, prior to the amendment, a notice of the accident had to be given to such authority as the State Government may by general or special order direct. This notice had to be given in such form and within such time and to such authority as the State Government may by general or special order direct. Therefore, the time within which the notice was to be given, the form in which it was to be given and the authority to which it was to be given were to be determined by the State Government. Before the substitution of this section by Act No. XXXII of 1959, a notification had been issued by the Government of Bombay on February 9, 1953, prescribing the requirements of the notice contemplated by s. 33 and the authority to which the notice was required to be given. Under this notification the notice had to be given within 24 hours of the occurrence of the accident and it had to be addressed to the Electric Inspector, in writing. It was also required to be given to the District Magistrate if the accident occurred outside the limits of Greater Bombay, or to the Commissioner of Police, if the accident occurred within Greater Bombay. The particulars required to be communicated by such notice to these authorities were also indicated in this notification and it would be necessary to reproduce that part of the notification. It is as follows:

“...every such notice shall contain full particulars of the time, place and nature of the accident and of any loss of life or personal injury actually occasioned by the accident and information as regards the cause or the probable cause of such accident.”

The Schedule mentions the Electric Inspector, Poona, as the authority to whom the notice is required to be addressed for accidents occurring within the areas comprising the district of Poona. In this context, it would now be convenient to refer to the amended s. 33(1) which was substituted by Act No. XXXII of 1959. Sub-section (1) of s. 33 is as follows:

“33. (1) If any accident occurs in connection with the generation, transmission, supply or use of energy in or in connection with, any part of the electric supply-lines or other works of any person and the accident results or is likely to have resulted in loss of human or animal life or in any injury to a human being or an animal, such person shall give notice of the occurrence and of any such loss or injury actually caused by the accident, in such form and within such time as may be prescribed, to the Electrical Inspector and to such other authorities as the appropriate Government may by general or special order direct."

It is evident that after the substitution of the said section the notice of the occurrence of any such loss or injury actually caused by the accident is required to be given in such form and within such time as may be prescribed. Under s. 2(j) of the Act "prescribed" means prescribed by rules made under the Act. The notice, therefore, would have to be given in such form and within such time as may be prescribed under the rules framed under the Act. Under the section as it stood prior to the amendment, the notice had to be in such form and within such time and to such authority as directed by the State Government by a general or special order. Similarly, under the amended section it is provided that the notice in the form and within the time prescribed under the rules must be given to the Electrical Inspector and in addition to such other authorities as the appropriate Government may by general or special order direct. Section 36A of the Act constitutes a Board called the Central Electricity Board to exercise the powers conferred by s. 37. Section 37 provides for the power of the Board to make rules, and one of the items in respect of which the Board can make rules is, under cl. (1) of s. 37, "to provide for any matter which is to be or may be prescribed". After the amendment, therefore, the form in which and the time within which the notice has to be given would have to be provided in the rules framed by the Board under s. 37 of the Act.

Now, it is common ground that the rules which have been framed by the Board do not provide for the form in which and the time within which the notice required to be given under s. 33(1) has to be given. The prosecution, therefore, relied on the notification issued by the Government of Bombay on February 9, 1953, under the section as it stood prior to the amendment of the Act by Act No. XXXII of 1959. The contention was that the notification issued under the section before its substitution in 1959 continued in force and it was obligatory on the company and the General Manager to have given notice in writing to the Electrical Inspector, Poona, within 24 hours of the occurrence, and since admittedly no written notice was given till May 22, 1961, the accused had committed an offence under s. 33 read with s. 47 of the Act.

It was the defence of the accused that the notification was no longer in force and the rules framed by the Board under s. 37 of the Act not having provided for the form in which and the time within which the notice under s. 33(1) was required to be given, there was no obligation to give any such notice. In the alternative, it was contended that even if a notice was required to be given within 24 hours there was substantial compliance of that requirement inasmuch as such material particulars as were required to be communicated to the Electrical Inspector under the notification had in fact been communicated and the accused had, therefore, committed no offence.

The learned Magistrate took the view that by virtue of s. 24 of the General Clauses Act the notification has continued in force and it shall be deemed to have been made or issued under the provision re-enacted, i.e., in this case, the section which was substituted by Act No. XXXII of 1959. He also negatived the argument that the notification, after the re-enactment of the section, was not law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence. Before dealing with the alternative argument as to substantial compliance of the notification, it would be convenient to refer to the two contentions raised on behalf of the defence which, if accepted, will go to the root of the matter and will render the consideration of the other question unnecessary.

The first contention of Mr. Nariman, the learned counsel appearing for the petitioners, was that the notification which was issued under s. 33(1) prior to its substitution by Act No. XXXII of 1959 was not the law actually and factually in existence at the relevant time and, therefore, the accused could not be convicted for the offence charged against them. Reliance was placed on art. 20 of the Constitution in support of this argument. Article 20, to the extent it is relevant, is as follows:

"No person shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of a law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence..."

Mr. Nariman says that even assuming that s. 24 of the General Clauses Act attracted the notification issued under s. 33, before its re-enactment, it cannot be said to be law actually and factually in force. It would be necessary to refer to s. 24 of the General Clauses Act to appreciate this argument. Section 24, to the extent it is relevant for this petition, is as follows:

"24. Where any Central Act or Regulation is, after the commencement of this Act, repealed and re-enacted with or without modification, then, unless it is otherwise expressly provided, any appointment, notification, order, scheme, rule, form or bye-law, made or issued under the repealed Act or Regulation shall, so far as it is not inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted, continue in force, and be deemed to have been made or issued under the provisions so re-enacted, unless and until it is superseded by any appointment, notification, order..."

Under this section, where any Central Act is repealed and re-enacted, a notification issued under the repealed Act (1) shall continue in force and (2) shall be deemed to have been made or issued under the provisions so re-enacted. This would be so unless the re-enacted law expressly provides otherwise and the notification so continued or deemed to have been issued under the re-enacted law is not inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted. Mr. Nariman says that this section creates a fiction. It is a deeming provision under which a notification made or issued under the repealed provision is deemed to have been made or issued under the provision re-enacted. Such a notification, according to his contention, may be law by a fiction, but it was not law actually and factually in existence on the date of the re-enactment. He points out that the accident occurred on May 15, 1961, on which date the law in force was s. 33(I), as substituted by the Amendment Act No. XXXII of 1959 and this was the only section which could be said to be in force factually. The notification, according to his contention, may be in force by a legal fiction, namely, the deeming provision contained in s. 24 of the General Clauses Act, but that notification cannot be said to be the law in fact in force on the date on which the accident occurred. In his submission, art. 20 of the Constitution contemplates that no person shall be convicted except for violation of a law in force and the law in force must be law actually and factually in force. The contention put that way is no doubt attractive, but if the provisions of s. 24 of the General Clauses Act are considered, it is difficult to accept it and hold that the notification issued under the provision prior to its re-enactment was not law in fact in force on the material date. Of course, this assumes that s. 24 is applicable and there is no express contrary provision showing that the notification is superseded or that it is not inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted. Section 24 itself continues in force a notification which is not inconsistent. The only fiction is that the notification which is so continued in force shall also be deemed to have been made or issued under the provisions re-enacted.

Reference was made to the decision of the Supreme Court in M/s. W. R. E. D. Co. Ltd. v. State of Madras.¹ By an earlier decision the Madras Electricity Supply Undertakings (Acquisition) Act (XLIII of 1949) was declared ultra vires by the Supreme Court on the ground that the Act was beyond the legislative competence of the Madras Legislature. Thereafter the Madras Electricity Supply Undertakings Acquisition Act (XXIX of 1954) was passed. Some of its provisions had retrospective operation and in particular s. 24 of the Act validated orders made, decisions or directions given, notifications issued, proceedings taken and acts or things done under the former Act. It was contended that these notifications which were issued under the earlier Act contravened art. 31(I) of the Constitution which provided that "no person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law". The expression "law", it was contended, postulates the existence of an antecedent law before a citizen is deprived of his property and since the notification was issued on the assumption that there was an antecedent law, viz., the earlier Act of 1949, it was not valid under art. 31 of the Constitution. In the context of this argument, the Supreme Court construed art. 20(1) of the Constitution. Emphasis was placed on the expression "law in force" used in art. 20(1). It is necessary to bear in mind that s. 24 of the validating Act was retrospective in the sense that it validated actions taken under the provisions of the earlier Act. In this context the Supreme Court held that it must be assumed that before the notification is issued the relevant provisions of the Act were in existence and so art. 31(1) must be held to have been complied with in that sense. That is why reference was made to the difference in the expressions "law" and "law in force". It was observed (p. 1760):

"...By using the expression 'law in force' in both the parts of Art. 20(1), the Constitution has clearly indicated that even if a criminal law was enacted by any legislature retrospectively, its retrospective operation would be controlled by Art. 20(1). A law in force at the time postulates actual factual existence of the law at the relevant time and that excludes the retrospective application of any subsequent law. Art. 31(1), on the other hand, does not use the expression 'law in force at the time'; it merely says 'by authority of law' and so, if a subsequent law passed by the legislature is retrospective in its operation, it would satisfy the requirement of Art. 31(1) and would validate the impugned notification in the present case."

The reference, therefore, was to legislation which validated ex post facto certain notifications etc. by making the validating Act retrospective in its operation. In that sense the Supreme Court referred to actual, factual existence of the law at the relevant time. The actual existence of the law by a fiction because of the retrospective validation by a validating statute would not make the law, which was otherwise invalid, factually in existence at the time when the alleged offence was committed. That is why the observations relate to validating legislation which has retrospective effect and which validates ex post facto certain notifications issued under the former Act. In this case the notifications issued under s. 33, as it was prior to its re-enactment, were not validated retrospectively by a subsequent validating legislation. On the contrary, s. 24 of the General Clauses Act provides that such notifications etc. shall continue in force and shall be deemed to have been made or issued under the provisions re-enacted. Therefore, simultaneously with the re-enactment of s. 33 the notifications issued under the repealed provision continued in force. They would be so continued if it were shown that there was no express provision otherwise or that they were not inconsistent with the provisions re-enacted.

Mr. Nariman then invited my attention to the decision of a Division Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in In re Lingareddi.² Mr. Justice Bhimasankaram considered the meaning of the expression "law in force" in art. 20 of the Constitution. A similar argument in which reliance was placed on s. 24 of the General Clauses Act was advanced and it was contended that although the rules, etc. framed under the repealed Act may continue in force under the new Act for other purposes, still no punishment as provided under the new Act can be made for violation of the rules made under the earlier Act, because they are not rules really in force, but they are rules which are, under the General Clauses Act, only deemed to be in force. Dealing with this argument the learned Judge concluded as follows (p. 25):

"...The rules and regulations made under the old Act, it is true, continue in force, but, for the purpose of a criminal prosecution, they cannot be properly described as being 'laws in force' because they are not rules made under the new Act, but are only to be deemed to be made thereunder."

It is true that on this view taken by the Division Bench of the Andhra Pradesh High Court, laws which are deemed to be in force because of the application of s. 24 of the General Clauses Act cannot be held to be laws in force for the purpose of a conviction in a criminal prosecution for violation of rules or notifications under the old Act. But in view of what the Supreme Court has observed in M/s. W. R. E. D. Co. Ltd. v. State of Madras, to which I have just referred, it is clear that they were only referring to ex post facto legislation which validates retrospectively certain notifications or rules issued under an earlier Act.

The question which arose for decision by the Supreme Court in *Chief Inspector of Mines v. K. C. Thapar*³ was an identical question as to whether rules, notifications etc. which continue in force because of s. 24 of the General Clauses Act were laws in force, so that any violation of those rules or notifications could result in a conviction. It was held as follows (p. 845):

"Equally untenable is Mr. Pathak's next contention that the contravention of the Indian Coal Mines Regulations, 1926, which were at the date of contravention 'deemed' to be regulations under the 1952 Act, was not a violation of a law in force on such date, so that Art. 20(1) is a bar to the conviction of his clients. The relevant portion of Art. 20(1) lays down that no person shall be convicted of any offence except for violation of a law in force at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence. The result of this is that if at the date of the commission of an act, such commission was not prohibited by a law then in force, no future legislation prohibiting that act with retrospective effect will justify a conviction for such commission. In other words, if an act is not an offence at the date of commission, no future law can make it an offence. But how, on the facts of this case the accused can claim benefit of this principle embodied in Art. 20(1) it is difficult to see. They are being charged under s. 73 and s. 74 of the Mines Act, 1952, for the contravention of some regulations. Were these regulations in force on the alleged date of contravention? Certainly, they were, in consequence of the provisions of s. 24 of the General Clauses Act. The fact that these regulations were deemed to be regulations made under the 1952 Act does not in any way affect the position that they were laws in force on the alleged date of contravention. The argument that as they were 'regulations' under the 1952 Act in consequence of a deeming provision, they were not laws in force on the alleged date of contravention is entirely misconceived."

The Supreme Court has thus made a distinction between laws which are continued in force and laws deemed to be in force by a future legislation, which prohibited certain acts with retrospective effect. The moment s. 33(1) was re-enacted, all notifications issued under the earlier s. 33 were continued in force by virtue of s. 24 of the General Clauses Act and there is no question of any legislation in future making them effective from an antecedent date, so as to give them retrospective effect. The notification must, therefore, be said to be actually and factually in force on the date on which the re-enacted provision came into force. It is true that the decision in Chief Inspector of Mines v. K. C. Thapar was not referred to in the later decision, viz., M/s. W. R. E. D. Co. Ltd. v. State of Madras. But that must be presumably because the question which arose in the later case was only regarding a validating legislation which retrospectively validated certain notifications issued under the earlier Act. In this view of the matter, it is not possible to agree with the contention that the notifications, for the breach of which the petitioners have been convicted, were not actually and factually in force on the date of the offence.

The next argument of Mr. Nariman is that s. 24 of the General Clauses Act will not protect the notifications in question, firstly, because the re-enacted s. 33(1) of the Act makes express provisions for laying down the form in which and the time within which the notice of the occurrence is required to be given. He also says that under the re-enacted provision notice has to be given to the Electrical Inspector and to such other authorities as the appropriate Government may by general or special order direct. Under the repealed s. 33(1) the notice had to be given to such authority as the State Government may by general or special order direct. In his submission the re-enacted s. 33(1) expressly provides that the notice must be given to the Electrical Inspector, and, only in addition, to such other authorities as the appropriate Government may by general or special order direct. Similarly, under the repealed s. 33(1) the form in which and the time within which the notice was to be given was to be determined by the State Government. But under the re-enacted s. 33(1) the form in which and the time within which the notice is to be given is as may be prescribed, i.e. as prescribed in the rules framed by the Central Electricity Board. This, according to Mr. Nariman, is an express provision and since there is an express provision the old notification issued under the repealed s. 33(1) cannot be said to have continued in force. Now, it is not possible to accept this argument because, in my view, it does not correctly appreciate the expression "unless it is otherwise expressly provided" in s. 24 of the General Clauses Act. All that the expression in that section means is that the notifications, rules, etc. under the repealed Act shall continue in force provided they are not inconsistent with the re-enacted provision, unless there is an express provision in the re-enacted legislation to the effect that they shall not so continue in force. There is no doubt that after the amendment of the Act by Act No. XXXII of 1959 there is no express provision to the effect that the notifications, rules, etc. under the repealed provisions shall not continue in force. The result is that such rules and notifications shall continue in force unless, of course, it is shown that they are inconsistent with the provisions of the re-enacted section. Mr. Nariman, therefore, also contends that the notifications are inconsistent with the re-enacted provision. According to him, the very fact that the power of making rules for prescribing the form in which and the time within which the notice is to be given is now of the Board, instead of the Government, the provision must be deemed to be inconsistent with the repealed provision. I do not think that this contention has any force. All that the re-enacted provision has done is that it has indicated a different manner prescribing the conditions of giving notice, but in substance it is a provision which is consistent with the earlier provision because it deals substantially with the requirement to give notice of the occurrence in a form prescribed and within the time prescribed. If any authority were needed, one may refer to Chumilal v. State,⁴ in which a similar contention was raised and negatived. The argument of Mr. Nariman, therefore, that s. 24 of the General Clauses Act will not protect notifications issued under the repealed s. 33(1) must fail.

The next argument is that even if the notification was in force and there was an obligation to give a notice of the occurrence, on the facts of this case it must be held that the requirement had been substantially complied with and the accused, therefore, cannot be held to be guilty of any offence. Mr. Nariman says that what is mandatory under the section and the notification is that a notice shall be given intimating to the Electrical Inspector full particulars of the time, place and nature of the accident and of any loss of life or personal injury actually occasioned by the accident and information as regards the cause or the probable cause of such accident. He contends that even though the notification of February 9, 1953, requires a notice in writing to be given within 24 hours, if, in fact, within that period, a notice intimating all the particulars required to be intimated under the notification has been given to the Electrical Inspector it must be held that such notice was in substantial compliance with the requirements of the notification and the provision that it must be in writing must be deemed to be a directory provision. In his submission, the enactment, namely, s. 33(1), imposed a duty on conditions, but these, not being conditions precedent to the exercise of jurisdiction, are subject to the maxim 'lex non cogit ad impossibilia aut inutilia'. He argued that if all the particulars are shown to have been intimated to the Electrical Inspector, the insistence of a written notice would not be justified because the performance of the condition that it should be a notice in writing would be idle and superfluous. He points out that there was clear evidence to show that the accused had within 24 hours of the occurrence given intimation of all the particulars referred to in the notification of February 9, 1953, to the extent to which it was possible to be done, and the mere fact that the notice was given on May 22, 1961, instead of within 24 hours, would not make any difference since the provision has been substantially complied with. It is a very interesting argument, but in order to appreciate it it would be convenient to refer to certain facts which have been brought out in the evidence. The accident occurred on May 15, 1961. A complaint had been filed by one Penkar, who was at the relevant time the Electrical Inspector. He has given evidence. One Deshpande, who was at the relevant time Assistant Electrical Inspector, has also given evidence. Penkar has stated that he first got the information of the accident at about 4.15 p.m. on that day from his sectional officer, one Kulkarni, on a telephone. Kulkarni's office is in the compound of Rajbhavan at Poona, which is near the Ganeshkhind Receiving Station where the accident occurred. When he got this information he called Deshpande and both went to the Ganeshkhind Receiving Station to find out what had happened. He saw there some ordinary persons and one Coyajee, who was a supervisor at that station. He found at that time that the circuit breaker of the incoming feeder No. 2 had burst and his conclusion was that oil had spread out. He, therefore, left Deshpande to make necessary inquiries and left for Rajbhavan to see that the supply of electricity there was not cut off. He admits that he himself did not make any investigation at the Ganeshkhind Receiving Station, because he left the matter of investigation to Deshpande. He also admits that he had ascertained the time of the accident from Coyajee and the probable cause of the accident had been ascertained by his assistant Deshpande. He also admits that further enquiries as to the cause of the accident could not be made since he could not obtain the statements of the injured who were in the hospital and Deshpande could not take those statements because of their condition. Then the following statements made by Penkar are material:

"I know that the persons who would be in a position to give more detailed information were lying in the hospital then. Up to 23-5-1961 none of the persons working in the switch room were able to give any statement. The first statement which we were able to get from any of the injured was on 31st May 1961. I know that the officers of the company were making efforts and were engaged in restoration of electricity supply to Poona on 15-5-1961."

From the evidence of Penkar it would be clear that even though he did not make any detailed enquiries he had obtained such information as he could, such as the time when the accident occurred, and he could not make any further enquiries because the persons who were injured in the accident were lying in the hospital and their statements could not have been obtained till May 31, 1961, till which time they remained in the hospital. It is also clear that detailed enquiries were left to be made by his assistant Deshpande who remained at the Ganeshkhind Receiving Station after Penkar left. It would, therefore, appear that Penkar in effect deputed Deshpande to continue the enquiry on that day. Deshpande also admits that he was left at the Receiving Station for further inquiry and Penkar left for Rajbhavan. He had in fact visited the injured persons within 2 to 4 days in the hospital and had attempted to obtain information from them, but their condition was such that they could not make any statement. He also admits that he was told by Shah, accused No. 2, that information could not be given because his staff members were engrossed with the work of restoring supply and that he would be in a position to give information after a few days. It is very material to refer to the following statements made by Deshpande in his cross-examination:

"On the date of accident when I had been to the spot of accident I was informed that number of employees were injured. So also I was shown the damaged O.C.B. of incoming feeder No. 2. I was told as to what had happened and how the serious fire had squirted out. I had not got full details or the causes of accident but approximately I find that the cause of accident might be due to O.C.B. not functioning properly under fault conditions. I was there on spot from 4.30 to 5 p.m. I also looked to the various connections made to the switch-board panel. I found that those persons who could give more detailed information were already in hospital for treatment. When I have mentioned in examination-in-chief that I tried to get additional information it only means that the more detailed information regarding the accident. No further information was necessary apart from the details referred to above."

On this evidence there could be no doubt that excepting the exact cause of the accident, there was no information which Deshpande had not received during his visit to the Ganeshkhind Receiving Station on the date of the accident. The admission of Deshpande shows that he had notice of the time, the place and the nature of the accident. He had notice as to whether there was any loss of life or personal injury occasioned by the accident. He had information about the probable cause of the accident, although he had no information relating to the actual cause of the accident. He has admitted that such information could not be had because the employees who were injured were in the hospital and it was not possible to obtain their statements. He has fairly admitted that all the information which he wanted had become available to him on that day and no further information was necessary.

If this is the position, Mr. Nariman contends—and in my view rightly—that the requirements of the notification issued under the repealed s. 33 which was in force at that time had been substantially complied with. It is well-known that when a condition is impossible of performance, the condition must be treated as dispensed with and it is in such cases that the maxim 'lex non cogit ad impossibilia aut inutilia' applies. In English the maxim means, "The law does not compel the impossible". To the same effect are two other maxims: "Impotentia excusat legem", which means "Inability is an excuse in law" and "Argumentum ab impossibili plurimum valet in lege" which means "An argument deduced from an impossibility greatly avails in law". On Mr. Deshpande's admission it was impossible to give the exact cause of the accident because the persons from whom that information could be obtained had been injured and were incapable of making a statement for a number of days after the accident. Therefore, the requirement of the notification that the cause of the accident must be intimated was impossible of performance within 24 hours of the accident. So far as the probable cause was concerned, Deshpande himself admits that it had been known to him. The other particulars required to be intimated had also been admittedly known to Deshpande on the day of the accident. Mr. Nariman, therefore, relies on this maxim and on the observation in Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, Eleventh edn., at p. 373, which are as follows:

"Enactments which impose duties on conditions are, when these are not conditions precedent to the exercise of a jurisdiction, subject to the maxim lex non cogit ad impossibilia aut inutilia. They are understood as dispensing with the performance of what is prescribed when performance of it is idle or impossible".

If the non-compliance had arisen out of an excusable mistake, the Courts will sometimes exercise a discretion in extending the time when it does not affect the question of jurisdiction. The notification, to the extent that it requires notice to be given regarding the particulars mentioned therein, must be considered to be an absolute requirement which must be complied with. But to the extent to which it says that it must be in writing, it must be treated to be directory and not absolute. Substantial compliance with the requirement of notice, if proved, must be treated as sufficient compliance for the purposes of s. 33 of the Act. It is well settled that an absolute enactment must be obeyed or fulfilled exactly, but it is sufficient if a directive enactment is obeyed or fulfilled substantially. It is clear on the facts of this case that insistence on a written notice, when in fact a full notice of all the particulars had been given, was insistence on an idle performance of a directory requirement. So far as the particulars relating to the cause of the accident are concerned, it is clear from Deshpande's evidence that that condition was impossible of performance. Mr. Gambhirwala, who appeared for the State, contended that although all the particulars had been known to Deshpande on the date of the accident, the requirement of the notification that the notice must be in writing must be treated to be a mandatory provision since the notification is under a provision of a statute which provides for safety of the public and the workmen employed in an electrical undertaking and strict interpretation of that notification is necessary with a view to seeing that the very object and purpose of the notification is not defeated. There is no doubt that the object and purpose of requiring that notice of all these particulars must be given would be defeated if there is no compliance with the requirement of notice. But, if in fact there is substantial compliance with the notice and if all the particulars are found in fact to have been communicated to the Electrical Inspector, it is a case in which there is only a technical non-compliance which cannot defeat the object and purpose of the notification. I am satisfied on the evidence led on behalf of the prosecution itself in this case that the requirement of notice had been substantially complied with, although it was a technical non-compliance in the sense that the notice was not in writing. I would, therefore, accept the contention of Mr. Nariman that the accused in this case had not committed an offence for breach of the notification issued under the repealed s. 33(1) of the Act. I may mention that the maxim that 'law condones the impossible' has been applied by this Court in *Emperor v. Ganpat*⁵ in a criminal case. The Division Bench in its judgment observed as follows:

"In construing the provisions of a statute, regard must be had to the express terms of any limitation contained therein. If in the interpretation of a statute the Court finds a duty enjoined by it either impossible of performance and beyond the normal capacity of a reasonable or prudent man, or when performance in the strictest language of the enactment is either idle or impossible, then the enactment must be understood as dispensing with the strict performance of that duty."

I would, therefore, set aside the conviction and sentence imposed on the accused by the learned Magistrate and confirmed by the learned Additional Sessions Judge for the offence under s. 33 read with s. 47 of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, and acquit them. Fine, if paid, be refunded.

Conviction and sentence set aside.

CHOITHRAM VERHOMAL JETHWANI v. A. G. KAZI.*

Indian Passport Act (XXXIV of 1920)—Indian Passport Rules, 1950. Rule 3—Constitution of India. Arts. 14, 21, 19(1)(d) & (e), 73, 12; Seventh Schedule, List I, Item 19—Whether Government of India has absolute and unfettered discretion to grant or refuse passport to Indian citizen—Citizen of India whether has no right to get passport from Government of India—Right to go abroad whether part of "personal liberty" guaranteed to Indian citizen.

In the absence of any legislative provision to guide the exercise of the discretion in the matter of issuing passports, the Government of India must issue passports to all Indian citizens who apply for them.

Article 14 of the Constitution of India is expressly directed to the "State" (which includes the Government of India) and its effect is that, in the absence of any regulations in regard to the issue of passports, the Government of India must issue passports to all Indian citizens who ask for them, or to none at all.

Moreover, art. 21 of the Constitution recognises and protects the right of every person to "personal liberty" of which he cannot be deprived, "except according to procedure established by law." An Indian citizen has, therefore, the right, in the absence of any law to the contrary, to obtain a passport which is necessary for the exercise of his right to go abroad, which right is clearly a part of the "personal liberty" guaranteed to him.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

S. J. Sorabjee, with Rana, for the petitioner.

S. Baptista, for the respondents.

TARKUNDE J. This writ petition raises a question of considerable importance. The question can be given two alternative formulations: Do the Government of India have an absolute and unfettered discretion to grant or refuse a passport to a citizen of India? Alternatively, does a citizen of India have no right to get a passport from the Government of India?

It is common ground that the petitioner is a citizen of India. He says that he is a partner of a firm in Bombay which carries on the business of Bankers, Exporters and Importers, and also of a firm in Dubai, in the Persian Gulf, which carries on the business of Indent Agents and Importers. I am told that Dubai is part of a British Protectorate. The petitioner claims, and this is not disputed, that passports were granted to him during the period from October 1952 and October 1962 to enable him to make trips to Dubai and certain ports in the Persian Gulf. The last passport issued in favour of the petitioner expired on October 28, 1962. On January 10, 1963, the petitioner applied to the Regional Passport Officer, who is respondent No. 2 to this petition, for the grant of a new passport for a period of three years. That application was rejected by respondent No. 2 on May 24, 1963. The petitioner made some further efforts, but was informed by the Assistant Passport Officer, who is respondent No. 1 to this petition, by a letter dated June 27, 1963, that his office had nothing to add to the previous letter of May 24, 1963, and that the petitioner may appeal for a re-consideration of his case to the Chief Passport Officer, New Delhi. No reasons were communicated to the petitioner for the rejection of his application for a fresh passport. On these facts the petitioner filed this petition under art. 226 of the Constitution for an appropriate writ or direction to quash the order refusing to grant him a passport, and for a direction against the respondents requiring them to grant and issue to him a passport as applied for.

The petition is supported on three main grounds. It is alleged, firstly, that it is absolutely necessary for the petitioner to go abroad and to return to India for the purpose of his business, and that the refusal of the passport by the respondents amounts to a contravention of his fundamental right guaranteed by art. 21 of the Constitution. In this connection the petitioner says that it is not possible for him to leave India without a passport, because the Government of India have issued instructions to the shipping and air companies not to take on board passengers leaving India without a valid passport, and also because, even if the petitioner were to go abroad without a passport, the entry into India without a passport is forbidden by law and involves penal consequences. The second ground of the petition is that the respondents' refusal to grant a passport to the petitioner amounts to an infringement of his right to enter India and to reside, settle and move freely in any part of India, and is, therefore, violative of the fundamental rights declared under art. 19(1) (d) and (e) of the Constitution. The petitioner claims, thirdly, that the refusal of a passport without assigning any reasons and without giving the petitioner any opportunity of being heard or of showing cause is arbitrary, that a number of passports have been given to various persons who are similarly situated as the petitioner, and that the refusal of a passport to the petitioner is a contravention of art. 14 of the Constitution, as it amounts to a discrimination against the petitioner.

An affidavit in reply to the petition was filed by respondent No. 2. He submits that by reason of the proclamation of Emergency, the petitioner is precluded by art. 358 of the Constitution from approaching the Court for an alleged breach of art. 19. He further says that the petitioner's application for a fresh passport was rejected because he (respondent No. 2) received a communication from the Government of India, Ministry of External Affairs, dated May 1, 1963, whereby he was directed to refuse passport facilities to the petitioner and to black-list his name for two years. He further says that the grant of a passport is within the absolute discretion of the Union of India, that there is no right in the petitioner to have a passport issued to him, and that there is no statutory obligation on the Union of India to issue a passport to the petitioner.

In view of the contents of this affidavit, the Union of India were added as respondents No. 3 to the petition. On behalf of respondents No. 3 an affidavit in reply to the petition has been filed by the Under Secretary to the Government of India in the Ministry of External Affairs. The affidavit says that there is no legal prohibition which prevents a citizen of India from going out of India without a passport, and that "the instructions of the Government of India to the Carriers and Travel Agencies which have been issued from time to time that they should not take on board passengers leaving India without valid passports, do not constitute any legal bar to a Citizen leaving India without a passport".

The affidavit further says that the grant of a passport is within the absolute discretion of the Central Government, that there is no right in the petitioner to have a passport issued to him, and that which is not subject to judicial review. The affidavit further says that as the refusal to grant a passport was an administrative act, no show-cause notice was required to be issued to the petitioner.

"the refusal to grant the passport to the Petitioner is a non-statutory administrative action"

It is not disputed on behalf of the petitioner that the order rejecting his application for a passport was made when the Proclamation of Emergency by the President was in operation, and that the provisions of art. 358 of the Constitution preclude him from having recourse to art. 19 for the purpose of impugning that order. Mr. Sorabjee, who appeared on behalf of the petitioner, confined his arguments to the alleged contravention of art. 21 and art. 14.

A passport is an official document issued in the name of the head of a State to a traveller for his safe passage to and protection in a foreign country, and is intended to be presented to a foreign Government for this purpose. (Rex v. Brailsford).¹ It is clear that a passport is issued to a traveller by the Government of his own country. In India, a passport is now issued in the following form:

"These are to request and require in the name of the President of the Republic of India all those whom it may concern to allow the bearer to pass freely without let or hindrance, and to afford him or her every assistance and protection of which he or she may stand in need".

(Basu's Commentary on the Constitution of India, 4th edn., Vol. 5, p. 371).

It is crucial to notice that the issue of a passport by the Government of India to a citizen of India is not regulated by any statute. However, the subject of passports and visas is included in Item 19 of List I (Union List) of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution. Item 19 of List I reads:—

"Admission into, and emigration and expulsion from, India; passports and visas."

Article 73 of the Constitution defines the extent of the executive power of the Indian Union and provides, inter alia, that the executive power of the Union shall extend "to the matters with respect to which Parliament has power to make laws". It follows that, although the issue of passports by the Union Government is not regulated by any statute, the function of issuing passports is vested in the Indian Union.

A reference may next be made to the Indian Passport Act, 1920, and the Indian Passport Rules, 1950, issued thereunder. It is evident from the preamble of the Act that its purpose was to provide a statutory requirement that persons desiring to enter India shall be in possession of valid passports. Section 3 of the Act empowers the Central Government to make rules requiring that persons entering India shall be in possession of passports, and for all matters ancillary or incidental to that purpose. Section 5 of the Act empowers the Central Government to direct the removal of any person from India who, in contravention of any rule made under s. 3 prohibiting entry into India without passport, has entered therein. Rule 3 of the Indian Passport Rules, 1950, lays down that save as provided in r. 4, no person proceeding from any place outside India shall enter, or attempt to enter, India by water, land or air unless he is in possession of a valid passport conforming to the conditions prescribed in r. 5. Rule 4 provides for classes of persons who are exempted from the necessity of having a passport. We are not concerned with those exemptions in the present case. In Abdul Rahim v. State of Bombay,² the Supreme Court held that s. 3 of the Indian Passport Act, 1920, and rr. 3 and 4 of the Indian Passport Rules, 1950, applied to all persons including Indian citizens. The result is that an Indian citizen cannot enter India from abroad unless he is in possession of a valid passport.

With the background of this legal position, I will first consider the petitioner's contention that the claim made on behalf of the Government of India of absolute discretion to grant or refuse passports to Indian citizens is inconsistent with the fundamental right guaranteed by art. 14 of the Constitution. Article 14 lays down that the State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India. This and the subsequent four articles have been placed in the Constitution under the heading "Right to Equality". The word "State" as defined by art. 12 includes the Government and Parliament of India, the Government and the Legislature of each of the States, and all local or other authorities within the territory of India or under the control of the Government of India. It follows that the right to equality which is guaranteed by art. 14 is designed to protect all persons against discriminatory treatment, irrespective of whether it results from legislative or from executive action. The claim of absolute and unfettered discretion to grant or to refuse passports is ex facie discriminatory, and, therefore, violative of art. 14 of the Constitution.

On behalf of the Government of India Mr. Baptista argued that the grant or the refusal of a passport was a purely administrative act, and that such an act does not fall within the ambit of art. 14. The argument implies that a purely administrative act has greater validity than a legislative act, a view which is clearly untenable. In Bidi Supply Co. v. Union of India,³ the Supreme Court considered the validity of an order by which the assessment records of the petitioner in that case, which was a registered firm, were transferred from Calcutta where the head office of the firm was situated to the office of the Income-Tax Officer, Special Circle, Ranchi, with whom the petitioner was required to correspond in future regarding its assessment proceedings. The Supreme Court held that the order was not contemplated or sanctioned by the particular provision of the Income-tax Act under which it purported to have been made. Treating the order as a purely executive order, the Supreme Court observed (p. 484):—

"In the circumstances this substantial discrimination has been inflicted on the petitioner by an executive fiat which is not founded on any law and no question of reasonable classification for purposes of legislation can arise. Here 'the State' which includes its Income-tax department has by an illegal order denied to the petitioner, as compared with other Bidi merchants who are similarly situate, equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws and the petitioner can legitimately complain of an infraction of his fundamental right under Art. 14 of the Constitution."

It is thus clear that the protection given by art. 14 extends to all discriminatory action, whether executive or legislative. If any doubt existed on this question, it was removed by the judgment of S. R. Das C. J. in *Basheshar Nath v. I.-T. Commr.*⁴ His Lordship observed (p. 157):—

"...The underlying object of this Article is undoubtedly to secure to all persons, citizens or non-citizens, the equality of status and of opportunity referred to in the glorious preamble of our Constitution. It combines the English doctrine of the rule of law and the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the American Federal Constitution which enjoins that no State shall 'deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws'. There can, therefore, be no doubt or dispute that this Article is founded on a sound public policy recognised and valued in all civilised States".

After referring to the definition of "the State" in art. 12, his Lordship said (p. 158):—

"...Article 14, therefore, is an injunction to both the legislative as well as the executive organs of the State and the other subordinate authorities... It is not necessary, for the purpose of this appeal to consider whether an executive order is a 'law' within the meaning of Art. 13, for even without the aid of Art. 13, our right to the equal protection of the law is protected against the vagaries, if any, of the executive Government also... Thus Art. 14 protects us from both legislative and executive tyranny by way of discrimination".

In view of these observations of the Supreme Court, it is not necessary to refer to the American decisions which were cited by Mr. Sorabjee to show that the equal protection clause of the 14th Amendment to the American Constitution gave protection against legislative as well as executive discrimination.

As stated above, the function of issuing passports vests with the Government of India by virtue of art. 73 read with List I, Item 19 of the Seventh Schedule of the Constitution. Article 14 requires that that function shall be discharged by the Government of India without discrimination. The Legislature has not provided any guidance for the discharge of that function. I asked Mr. Baptista whether the Government of India have framed any administrative rules for the regulation of its function of issuing passports, and Mr. Baptista told me that no such rules have been framed. Under these circumstances, it must logically follow from the fundamental right to equality guaranteed by art. 14 of the Constitution that the Government of India can adopt either of two courses: they can refuse passports to all Indian citizens or grant passports to all Indian citizens. To grant passports to some and not to others involves the exercise of arbitrary and unregulated discretion which is repugnant to art. 14. Out of these two alternatives, one is clearly excluded, for it is obvious that the Government of India cannot dispense with issuing passports altogether. It is true that the right to equality guaranteed by art. 14 is available to all persons, whether Indian citizens or not; but no persons other than Indian citizens require a passport from the Government of India. The petitioner has given in exh. D to the petition the names of six other Indians to whom passport facilities for going to Dubai were granted by the Government of India. It was not denied on behalf of the Government of India that passport facilities were granted to these persons. Since the Government of India have granted passports to some persons and since they must continue to grant passports to others, it must follow that, in the absence of any regulations which would justify a classification between those who are and those who are not entitled to passport facilities, the Government of India must grant passports to all Indian citizens who apply for them.

The Government of India's claim to an absolute and unfettered discretion of granting or refusing passport facilities appears to be founded on the fact that the Legislature has not made any law or regulation for the grant of those facilities. What is guaranteed by art. 14, however, is the rule of law and not equal subjection to lawless rule. Supposing the Legislature had passed a law bestowing upon the executive an absolute and unfettered discretion in issuing passports, the law would have been invalid by virtue of art. 14 of the Constitution (The State of West Bengal v. Anwar Ali Sarkar,⁵ *State of Orissa v. Dhirendranath Das*⁶). The fact that no such discriminatory law has been passed by the Legislature cannot possibly enable the executive to claim an absolute and unfettered discretion in the matter of issuing passports.

A different view was expressed by a Division Bench of the Madras High Court in V. G. Row v. State of Madras.⁷ The petitioner in that case had applied for the issue of a passport for travelling to various countries, including the Soviet Union. A passport was issued to the petitioner, but his request to have it endorsed for certain countries including the Soviet Union was refused. He applied for appropriate writ or direction requiring the respondents to endorse his passport for the remaining countries including the Soviet Union. His petition was rejected by the Madras High Court. The decision of the Madras High Court is for the most part based on the view that there was no statutory provision which prevented a person from leaving India without a passport or which prevented an Indian citizen from entering India without a passport. The subsequent decision of the Supreme Court in Abdul Rahim v. State of Bombay, which I have already referred to, shows that the view that there was no provision preventing an Indian citizen from entering India without a passport was incorrect. After stating that an Indian citizen was not precluded by any legal provision from leaving India or entering India without a passport, the Madras High Court observed (p. 244):—

"In this view, we do not see much substance in the contentions of the petitioner's learned counsel. Article 14 guarantees equality before the law and equal protection of the laws. Equal protection of the laws has been construed to mean the protection of equal laws. It is this Article which prohibits discriminatory legislation and arbitrary classification. But this Article can have no application to a matter like the issue of passports which consists in the exercise of a purely political function".

With great respect, I do not find it easy to understand what is meant by the exercise of "a purely political function" in this context, and why action taken in the exercise of a political function should be outside the ambit of art. 14 of the Constitution. Even supposing that a passport was unnecessary to an Indian citizen for either going abroad or for entering India, the fact remains that certain facilities in respect of foreign travel are available to persons who are in possession of passports. The Government cannot grant these facilities to some persons and deny them to others at their sweet will without violating art. 14 of the Constitution.

I must, accordingly, uphold the contention of the petitioner that the order refusing his application for a passport was made in contravention of art. 14 of the Constitution.

The other contention of the petitioner is that the rejection of his application for a passport amounts to a contravention of art. 21 of the Constitution. That article lays down that no person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law.

The first question which arises in this connection is whether the expression "personal liberty" in art. 21 includes the freedom to go abroad. The meaning of that expression was considered by the Supreme Court in A. K. Gopalan v. The State.⁸ There was some difference in that case between Fazl Ali J. and the other learned Judges on whether the right to freedom from arrest and detention was or was not guaranteed by art. 19(1)(d), but there was no difference between them on the scope of the expression "personal liberty" as used in art. 21. They all agreed that the expression "personal liberty" in art. 21 was not confined to the mere freedom from arrest and detention. Mr. Dās J. observed in his judgment that besides the rights mentioned in the several sub-clauses of art. 19(1), there are many other personal liberties which a free man may exercise, and these personal liberties are included in the expression "personal liberty" used in art. 21. He quoted with approval a passage from a Full Bench decision of the Calcutta High Court (Kshitindra v. Chief Secretary of West Bengal)⁹ in which it was stated (p. 296):—

"...For example, a free man can eat what he likes subject to rationing laws, work as much as he likes or idle as much as he likes. He can drink anything he likes subject to the licensing laws and smoke and do a hundred and one things which are not included in Art. 19. If freedom of person was the result of Art. 19, then a free man would only have the seven rights mentioned in that article; but obviously the free man in India has far greater rights".

His Lordship added (p. 296):—

"...Indeed, I regard it as a merit of our Constitution that it does not attempt to enumerate exhaustively all the personal rights but uses the compendious expression 'personal liberty' in Art. 21, and protects all of them".

His Lordship observed that the expression "personal liberty" did not mean only liberty of the person, but meant liberty or the rights attached to the person, i.e., jus personarum, and went on to say (p. 299):—

"...In my judgment, Art. 19 protects some of the important attributes of personal liberty as independent rights and the expression 'personal liberty' has been used in Art. 21 as a compendious term including within its meaning all the varieties of rights which go to make up the personal liberties of men".

The scope of the expression "personal liberty" in art. 21 was again considered by the Supreme Court in *Kharak Singh v. The State of U. P.*¹⁰ The petitioner in that case had challenged the constitutional validity of a certain police regulation in Uttar Pradesh which provided for five kinds of surveillance by the police over persons suspected of offences. The Supreme Court found that the impugned police regulation did not have any statutory basis and consisted of executive or departmental instructions framed for the guidance of police officers. One mode of surveillance provided by the impugned police regulation was to pay domiciliary visits on the suspect, and this involved the knocking at his door at night and the consequent disturbance to his sleep and rest. The majority of the Judges held that the part of the police regulation which allowed domiciliary visits was violative of art. 21, while the minority was of the view that the whole regulation inclusive of all the five kinds of surveillance violated that article. In the course of his judgment for the majority, Ayyangar J. observed (p. 347):—

“We shall now proceed with the examination of the width, scope and content of the expression ‘personal liberty’ in Art. 21. Having regard to the terms of Art. 19(1)(d), we must take it that [the] expression is used as not to include the right to move about or rather of locomotion. The right to move about being excluded its narrowest interpretation would be that it comprehends nothing more than freedom from physical restraint or freedom from confinement within the bounds of a prison; in other words, freedom from arrest and detention, from false imprisonment or wrongful confinement. We feel unable to hold that the term was intended to bear only this narrow interpretation but on the other hand consider that ‘personal liberty’ is used in the Article as a compendious term to include within itself all the varieties of rights which go to make up the ‘personal liberties’ of man other than those dealt with in the several clauses of Art. 19(1). In other words, while Art. 19(1) deals with particular species or attributes of that freedom, ‘personal liberty’ in Art. 21 takes in and comprises the residue”.

His Lordship further said (pp. 347-348):—

“...Is then the word ‘personal liberty’ to be construed as excluding from its purview an invasion on the part of the police of the sanctity of a man’s home and an intrusion into his personal security and his right to sleep which is the normal comfort and a dire necessity for human existence even as an animal? It might not be inappropriate to refer here to the words of the preamble to the Constitution that it is designed to ‘assure the dignity of the individual’ and therefore of those cherished human value[s] as the means of ensuring his full development and evolution. We are referring to these objectives of the framers merely to draw attention to the concepts underlying the constitution which would point to such vital words as ‘personal liberty’ having to be construed in a reasonable manner and to be attributed that sense which would promote and achieve those objectives and by no means to stretch the meaning of the phrase to square with any preconceived notions or doctrinaire constitutional theories”.

The minority view in that case did not attach to the expression “‘personal liberty’” a less comprehensive connotation. They were of the view, however, that the expression “‘personal liberty’” in art. 21 did not exclude those aspects of personal liberty which have received a separate treatment in art. 19. Subba Rao, J., who delivered the judgment of the minority, said (pp. 356-357):—

“At this stage it will be convenient to ascertain the scope of the said two provisions and their relation inter se in the context of the question raised. Both of them are distinct fundamental rights. No doubt the expression ‘personal liberty’ is a comprehensive one and the right to move freely is an attribute of personal liberty. It is said that the freedom to move freely is carved out of personal liberty and, therefore, the expression ‘personal liberty’ in Art. 21 excludes that attribute. In our view, this is not a correct approach. Both are independent fundamental rights, though there is overlapping. There is no question of one being carved out of another. The fundamental right of life and personal liberty have many attributes and some of them are found in Art. 19. If a person’s fundamental right under Art. 21 is infringed, the State can rely upon a law to sustain the action; but that cannot be a complete answer unless the said law satisfies the test laid down in Art. 19(2) so far as the attributes covered by Art. 19(1) are concerned. In other words, the State must satisfy that both the fundamental rights are not infringed by showing that there is a law and that it does amount to a reasonable restriction within the meaning of Art. 19(2) of the Constitution”.

It must follow that the compendious expression “‘personal liberty’” used in art. 21 includes in its ambit the right to go abroad, and that a person cannot be deprived of this right “except according to procedure established by law” as laid down in art. 21. Mr. Baptista, however, argued that it can be gathered from the majority judgment in the above case that the right to go abroad was excluded from the expression “‘personal liberty’” used in art. 21. For this argument Mr. Baptista relied on the following sentence which occurs in a part of the majority judgment of Ayyangar J. quoted above (p. 347):—

“...Having regard to the terms of Art. 19(1)(d), we must take it that [the] expression is used as not to include the right to move about or rather of locomotion”.

According to Mr. Baptista, this sentence implies that the right to go abroad is not part of the “personal liberty” guaranteed in art. 21. The argument is clearly untenable, because what the majority judgment has done is to exclude from the ambit of “personal liberty”, as the expression occurs in art. 21, the right which is specified in art. 19(1)(d), namely, the right “to move freely throughout the territory of India”. The right to go abroad, being not covered by art. 19(1)(d), is not excluded from art. 21.

It was then urged by Mr. Baptista that the Constitution can be deemed to have protected only such rights as can be exercised within the territory of India, that the right to go abroad is not such a right, and that, therefore, it cannot be deemed to have been included in the “personal liberty” protected by art. 21. This argument also has no substance, because the right to go abroad as claimed by the petitioner consists of his right to cross the Indian border, and it is the petitioner’s case that, although this right is protected by art. 21, the respondents have deprived him of this right without resort to any procedure established by law.

The right to go abroad has always been regarded as an important aspect of “personal liberty”. The right was recognised as early as the Magna Carta. Article 42 of the Magna Carta says:—

“It shall be lawful to any person, for the future, to go out of our kingdom, and to return, safely and securely, by land or by water, saving his allegiance to us, unless it be in time of war, for some short space, for the common good of the kingdom: excepting prisoners and outlaws, according to the laws of the land, and of the people of the nation at war against us, and Merchants who shall be treated as it is said above”.

In recent times, the right was recognised and included in the Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations. Article 13, para. 2 of the Declaration runs thus:—

“Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country”.

There is no reason why this important right of personal freedom should be held to have been excluded from the expression “personal liberty” in art. 21 of the Constitution.

Considerable support for this view can be derived from a recent decision of the Federal Supreme Court of the United States in Kent v. Dulles.¹¹ A federal statute of the United States of 1952 provides that it is “unlawful for any citizen of the United States to depart from or enter, or attempt to depart from or enter, the United States unless he bears a valid passport”.

The petitioners in the above case had applied for passports, but they were called upon to file affidavits concerning their membership in the communist party, and on their failure to file such affidavits, passport facilities were denied to them. The Supreme Court held by a majority vote that the petitioners were entitled to passports, and that the pertinent statutes did not authorise the Secretary of State to withhold passports for the reasons stated above. In delivering the opinion of the Court, Douglas J. observed (p. 1207):—

“A passport not only is of great value—indeed necessary—abroad; it is also an aid in establishing citizenship for purposes of re-entry into the United States”.

With reference to the Fifth Amendment to the American Federal Constitution which provides, in so far as it is relevant for the present purpose, that no person shall “be deprived of... liberty... without due process of law”, the learned Judge observed (p. 1210):

“The right to travel is a part of the ‘liberty’ of which the citizen cannot be deprived without due process of law under the Fifth Amendment. So much is conceded by the Solicitor General... Freedom of movement across frontiers in either direction, and inside frontiers as well, was a part of our heritage. Travel abroad, like travel within the country, may be necessary for a livelihood. It may be as close to the heart of the individual as the choice of what he eats, or wears, or reads. Freedom of movement is basic in our scheme of values”.

It must be added that the minority in that case did not take a different view from the majority with regard to the scope of the “liberty” guaranteed by the Fifth Amendment.

If the petitioner’s right to go abroad, being part of his personal liberty, is protected by art. 21, it follows that he is entitled, as of right, to a passport provided, firstly, that a passport is necessary for going abroad, and secondly, he is not deprived of that right by some procedure established by law. It is the case of the respondents that there is no legal prohibition which prevents the petitioner from going out of India without a passport. The respondents admit that the Government of India have issued instructions to Carriers and Travel Agencies that they should not take on board passengers leaving India without valid passports, but the respondents claim that these instructions do not constitute a legal bar to a citizen leaving the country without a passport. Even supposing, however, that the petitioner can leave India without a passport, it is clear that he has no right to re-enter India without a passport. That is the result of r. 3 of the Indian Passport Rules, 1950, made under the Indian Passport Act, 1920. Now, it is obvious that an Indian citizen, unless he intends to give up his nationality, can exercise the right of going abroad only if he does not lose thereby the right to return to his country. It is clear, therefore, that the restriction on the right to re-enter which has been imposed by r. 3 of the Indian Passport Rules operates at the same time as a restriction on the right to go abroad. It must follow that, in the absence of any law to the contrary, the right to go abroad which is protected by art. 21 carries with it the right to receive a passport which is essential for the enjoyment of that right.

It is the case of the respondents that the Government of India are not subject to any lawful obligation to issue a passport to an Indian citizen. This contention implies, in the last analysis, that the Government of India’s right to issue passports is not coupled with any responsibility—a view which I find very difficult to accept. The better view is that the right is coupled with an obligation, and the obligation is to issue passports to those who have a right to receive them. As shown above, in the absence of a law to the contrary, all Indian citizens have that right.

Whether such a right and such an obligation do or do not exist can be tested by raising the question whether an Indian citizen, who happens to be abroad without a passport, is not entitled to get a passport from the Government of India in order to enter the country. Can the Government of India in such a case claim an absolute discretion to grant or refuse a passport to the Indian citizen? Article 19(1)(e) guarantees to all Indian citizens the right “to reside and settle in any part of the territory of India”, and this right necessarily carries with it the right to receive a passport in order that an Indian citizen, who happens to be abroad without a passport, may be able to enter the country and reside and settle in its territory. Such a question did in fact arise in two cases decided by the Supreme Court, and both the cases were decided on the assumption that an Indian citizen in such circumstances was entitled as of right to get a permit or a passport to enter India.

In *Ebrahim Vazir Mavani v. The State of Bombay*¹² the Supreme Court dealt with the case of several persons who were assumed to be Indian citizens and who had entered India in contravention of s. 3 of the Influx from Pakistan (Control) Act, being Act XXIII of 1949. Section 3 of that Act provided, in so far as it is relevant, that no person shall enter India from any place in Pakistan, whether directly or indirectly, unless he was in possession of a permit or a valid passport. Section 4 of the Act empowered the Central Government to make rules in regard to the manner in which permits may be applied for and obtained. Section 5 provided, inter alia, that whoever entered India in contravention of the provisions of s. 3 shall be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to one year, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both. Section 7 of the Act was material to the case before the Supreme Court, and it empowered the Central Government to direct the removal from India of any person who had committed, or against whom a reasonable suspicion existed that he had committed, an offence under the Act. The question before the Supreme Court was whether s. 7 of the Act, in so far as it authorised the removal from India of Indian citizens who had committed an offence under the Act or were reasonably suspected of having committed such an offence, was in the nature of a reasonable restriction on the citizens' right to reside and settle in any part of the territory of India guaranteed by art. 19 (1) (e) of the Constitution. The Supreme Court held by majority that s. 7 of that Act contravened the said fundamental right, and not being a reasonable restriction thereof, was void. In coming to that conclusion, Ghulam Hasan J., who delivered the majority judgment, observed, in the first place, that the provision in s. 3 of the Act requiring an Indian citizen to have a permit or a passport to be able to enter India from Pakistan could be regarded as a reasonable restriction upon his right to enter the country. His Lordship observed (p. 937) :—

"...That an Indian citizen visiting Pakistan for any purpose whatsoever and returning to India may be required to produce a permit or passport as the case may be before he can be allowed to enter the country, may well be regarded as a proper restriction upon entry but to say that if he enters the country without a permit or on an invalid permit or commits a breach of any of the conditions of the permit he may, on conviction for such offence, be ordered to be removed from the country is tantamount to taking away his fundamental right guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(e), 'to reside and settle in any part of the territory of India'."

In a later part of the judgment, his Lordship observed with reference to s. 7 of the Act (p. 938) :—

"...A law which subjects a citizen to the extreme penalty of a virtual forfeiture of his citizenship upon conviction for a mere breach of the permit Regulations or upon a reasonable suspicion of having committed such a breach can hardly be justified upon the ground that it imposes a reasonable restriction upon the fundamental right to reside and settle in the country in the interest of the public."

It is clear from these observations that, according to the Supreme Court, it was permissible to prevent an Indian citizen from entering the country unless he produced a permit or passport, but that it was not permissible, if he did enter the country without such a permit or passport, to remove him from the country for the breach committed by him. In this connection the Supreme Court considered what the duty would be of the sentry on guard at the check-post on the frontier, in case an Indian citizen tried to enter the country without having secured a permit or passport. On this point, Ghulam Hasan J. said in his judgment (p. 939) :—

"...If any person claims to have the right to enter, the sentry's duty would be to hand him over to the Commander of the Guard and normally it would be the duty of that Commander to hand him over to the proper authority empowered to determine the right which he claims".

It is obvious from these remarks that, according to the Supreme Court, an Indian citizen had a "right" to get a permit to enter India, that his failure to get such a permit was "a mere breach of the permit Regulations", and that, therefore, although such a citizen could be prevented from entering the country unless he had secured a permit, he could not be lawfully expelled from the country if he effected an entry in breach of the permit regulations.

It must be observed that normally an Indian citizen wanting to enter India from Pakistan would have required a permit issued under s. 4 of the Influx from Pakistan (Control) Act and not a passport, and that, therefore, the above case related rather to the right of an Indian citizen to get a permit under s. 4 of that Act than to his right to get a passport from the Government of India. The latter question, however, was more clearly involved in the subsequent decision of the Supreme Court in Abdul Rahim v. State of Bombay, which I have already referred to in another connection. The appellant in that case was an Indian citizen and he had admittedly entered India without a passport, and thereby committed a breach of r. 3 of the Indian Passport Rules, 1950. For that breach, he was convicted under r. 6(a) and was sentenced to a nominal fine. He challenged the order of conviction and sentence, and one of the grounds of the challenge was that r. 3 of the Indian Passport Rules and s. 3 of the Indian Passport Act were ultra vires of the Constitution in so far as they purported to affect the right of an Indian citizen to enter India without a passport. After observing that the fundamental right "to reside and settle in any part of the territory of India" was subject to reasonable restrictions under cl. (5) of art. 19, Imam J., who delivered the judgment of the Court, said (p. 1316):—

"...In the case of Ebrahim Vazir Mavani v. The State of Bombay, referred to above, the majority judgment of this Court held that an Indian citizen visiting Pakistan for any purpose whatsoever and returning to India may be required to produce a permit or a passport as the case may be before he can be allowed to enter India, and this requirement may well be regarded as a proper restriction upon entry. This Court, however, held that it was quite a different matter to say that if he enters India without a permit he may on conviction for such offence be ordered to be removed from India. It was the order directing his removal from India which was held by this Court to be tantamount to taking away his fundamental right guaranteed under Art. 19(1)(e), 'to reside and settle in any part of the territory of India.' It is clear, therefore, that so far as this Court is concerned it has already decided that to require an Indian citizen to produce a passport before he can be allowed to enter India may be regarded as a proper restriction upon entering India. This decision is binding on us and we must follow the decision of this Court in the case referred to".

The Supreme Court have thus held that the provision which requires an Indian citizen to produce a passport before he can be allowed to enter India is reasonable restriction on his right to enter India. No such view could possibly have been taken if an Indian citizen wanting to enter India from abroad had no right to obtain a passport and if his application for a passport could be rejected at the absolute discretion of the Government of India. The above decision necessarily implies that an Indian citizen, having his right to enter India guaranteed in the Constitution, has also the right to receive from his Government a passport which is necessary for the exercise of that right. On what is essentially the same ground, I hold that the petitioner, having the right to go abroad as provided by art. 21 of the Constitution, which includes the right to return to his country, has also the right to receive from his Government the passport necessary for the exercise of his right to go abroad.

Mr. Baptista argued that the above decision of the Supreme Court, (Abdul Rahim v. The State of Bombay), is not inconsistent with the absolute discretion claimed by the Government of India in the matter of issuing passports to Indian citizens. According to Mr. Baptista, the above decision means that, if an Indian citizen succeeds in entering India without a passport, he can be lawfully punished under r. 6(a) of the Indian Passport Rules but cannot be deported as provided in s. 5 of the Indian Passport Act. In my view, Mr. Baptista's argument amounts to putting a premium on the ability of an Indian citizen to hoodwink the sentries whose duty is to prevent any person from entering India without a passport. Under r. 3 of the Indian Passport Rules, an Indian citizen can be lawfully prevented from entering India, if he is unable to produce a passport, and the constitutional validity of that provision is based on the assumption that an Indian citizen wishing to enter India is entitled to a passport. The further conclusion that he cannot be deported if he enters India without a passport, which receives support from the earlier decision of the Supreme Court in Ebrahim Vazir Mavani v. The State of Bombay, goes to re-inforce the view that the Government of India do not have an absolute and unfettered discretion to refuse a passport to an Indian citizen.

I have already referred to a decision of the Madras High Court in V. G. Row v. The State of Madras. It was there held that no contravention of the right under art. 19(1)(d) occurs when passport facilities are denied to an Indian citizen. That conclusion was based on the view, which was subsequently held to be incorrect by the Supreme Court in the case of Abdul Rahim, that the refusal of a passport does not amount to a restriction of an Indian citizen's right to leave and re-enter India.

My conclusion that an Indian citizen is entitled to a passport, in the absence of any statutory provision which disables him from obtaining it, finds support in certain observations of Mr. Justice Shelat in his judgment in L. C. Bhatia v. K. S. Dilipsinghji, Asst. Collector of Customs, Bombay.¹³ A passport of the petitioner in that case was taken charge of by the Customs Authorities. The Customs Authorities handed over the passport to the Regional Passport Officer on demand made by the Police, and the Regional Passport Officer detained the passport pending orders from the Government of India. Mr. Justice Shelat held that the Regional Passport Officer was not entitled to detain the passport, and directed that the passport be returned to the petitioner. After observing that the term "personal liberty" in art. 21 includes freedom of movement, the learned Judge said:—

"That being so, prima facie a citizen of this country is entitled to a passport unless there is some statutory provision disabling him to obtain it... Now, assuming that there is no law debarring exit without a passport, as I have already pointed out, there are rules made under the Passport Act which debar a person from making his re-entry into this country unless he is equipped with a passport. Even if he were to be able to go abroad without a passport, there can be no doubt that it would be depriving him of his freedom of movement if he is not allowed to come back to his own country".

The learned Judge, however, went on to say that it was not necessary for the purpose of the case before him to go into the question whether the Government have the right to refuse a passport on the ground of its absolute discretion. It is clear that the learned Judge himself treated the observations quoted above as obiter dicta.

A contrary view is found expressed by Mr. Justice K. K. Desai in his judgment in Ismail Karmali Pirbhoy v. R. C. Chawan.¹⁴ The petitioner in that case had a passport which was valid up to May 15, 1959. He applied for the extension of the validity of the passport for a further period of one year (i.e. till May 15, 1960). But the Regional Passport Officer rejected his application and returned his passport after cancelling the same. The petitioner applied to this Court under art. 226 of the Constitution, and prayed that the cancellation of his passport should be quashed, and further that the respondent should be directed to replace the old passport wrongfully cancelled by a fresh one, or, in the alternative, to issue a new passport. In dismissing this application, the learned Judge pointed out that, by the time of his judgment, the period for which the petitioner had asked for the extension of his passport had already expired. The learned Judge said:—

"The complaint is that the respondent has not acceded to his (Petitioner's) application for renewal of passport for one year which period of course has expired on May 16, 1960. Having regard to the fact that the period of the application for renewal is now not outstanding and cannot be ordered to be considered once again, the cancellation of his exhausted passport cannot create any rights in the petitioner to issue of a new passport”.

It was thus held by the learned Judge that in view of the expiry of one year's period mentioned in the petitioner's application, it was not possible to grant him any relief, irrespective of the merits of the case, and that the petition under art. 226 of the Constitution had become infructuous. The learned Judge, however, went on to deal with the various arguments which were advanced before him during the hearing of the petition. It was urged before him that in view of the fundamental rights guaranteed by art. 21 as well as by art. 19(1)(d) and (e) of the Constitution, there was an obligation on the President (the Government of India) to issue a passport to the petitioner. With reference to that article, the learned Judge said:—

“To me it is obvious that the Arts. 21 and 19(1)(d) and (e) have no relation to statutory obligation making it incumbent on the President to issue a passport. The argument appears to me to be prima facie not sustainable.”

Towards the end of the judgment, the learned Judge quoted some passages from the judgment in V. G. Row v. The State of Madras, including a passage where it was stated that no person had any legal right to obtain a passport to any particular country, and after these quotations, the learned Judge said:—

Having carefully gone through the judgment of the learned Judge, I have come to the conclusion that his observations on arts. 21 and 19(1)(d) and (e) of the Constitution and his statement that there is no statutory obligation making it incumbent on the President to issue a passport are in the nature of obiter dicta. Before he made these observations, the learned Judge had already held that the petition had become infructuous on the expiry of the one year's period mentioned by the petitioner in his application for renewal of his passport. Moreover, the learned Judge himself has described his view as being “prima facie”. Mr. Baptista pointed out that at one place in the judgment the learned Judge has stated that he had “already held” that it did not appear to him that there was any statutory obligation cast on the President to issue a passport in favour of the petitioner. This is, however, followed by the observations quoted from the Madras case and the final statement of the learned Judge that he found it unnecessary to discuss those observations. One of the observations which he found it unnecessary to discuss was that “no person has any legal right to obtain a passport to any particular country”. It appears to me that the learned Judge dismissed the application as it had become infructuous, and since he was the Court of first instance, he also dealt with the arguments which were addressed to him on the merits.

Treating the views of the learned Judge as obiter dicta, I must further observe, with great respect, that I cannot accept his view that the Government of India have no obligation to issue a passport in favour of an Indian citizen. In the first place, art. 14 of the Constitution is expressly directed to the “State” (which includes the Government of India) and its effect is that, in the absence of any regulations in regard to the issue of passports, the Government of India must issue passports to all Indian citizens who ask for them, or to none at all. Secondly, art. 21 recognises and protects the right of every person to “personal liberty” of which he cannot be deprived, “except according to procedure established by law”. An Indian citizen has, therefore, the right, in the absence of any law to the contrary, to obtain a passport which is necessary for the exercise of his right to go abroad, which right is clearly a part of the “personal liberty” guaranteed to him.

Mr. Baptista drew my attention to the following statement which is contained in the affidavit in reply, which was filed by the Under Secretary, Ministry of External Affairs, on behalf of the Government of India:—

“I say that on the basis of the communications received in official confidence and for which reasons, it is considered, should not be disclosed in the public interest, the Government of India decided that in the interest of the State and the Public, the Petitioner should not be granted further passport facilities".

This statement does not even touch the contention of the petitioner that by virtue of art. 21, he is entitled to a passport, in the absence of any legal provision to the contrary. The statement does not also affect the petitioner's contention under art. 14 of the Constitution. So long as no rules have been formulated for guiding the exercise of discretion in the matter of issuing passports, any refusal of a passport to an Indian citizen, when passports are granted to other Indian citizens, must be held to be discriminatory.

The conclusion to which I have reached does not imply that every Indian citizen must have an absolute and unrestricted right to receive a passport. It implies that, in the absence of any legislative provision to guide the exercise of the discretion in the matter of issuing passports, the Government of India have no alternative but to issue passports to all Indian citizens who apply for them.

Accordingly, the order of respondent No. 1 dated May 24, 1963, refusing passport facilities to the petitioner is set aside, and the respondents are directed to grant and issue to the petitioner a passport as applied for by him by his application dated January 10, 1963. The passport to be issued within two weeks from to-day. The respondents will pay the petitioner the costs of this petition as taxed.

Order accordingly.

One of the presumptions in law is that the Legislature does not intend to make any substantial alteration in the law beyond what it explicitly declares, either in express terms or by clear implication, or, in other words, beyond the immediate scope and object of the statute. In all general matters outside those limits the law remains undisturbed. General words and phrases, therefore, however wide and comprehensive they may be in their literal sense, must usually be construed as being limited to the actual objects of the Act.

Sp. C. A. No. 1449 of 1964:

N. D. Hombalkar, for the petitioner.

S. C. Pratap, for opponent No. 1.

CHAINANI C. J. These two applications have been heard together as they raise a common question of law. The first application No. 1199 of 1964 relates to two lands, which originally belonged to one Pandurang and his two brothers Waman and Vinayak. In 1931 they mortgaged these lands by an ostensible sale-deed to Maruti Sawant alias Rede. The petitioners are the heirs and successors of Maruti. In 1951 Pandurang filed a suit for a declaration that the transaction of 1931 was really a mortgage and for taking accounts under the Deccan Agriculturists Relief Act. A declaration was made in that suit in 1951 that the transaction was a mortgage and that the amount due on the mortgage was Rs. 2,800. This decision was confirmed in appeal by the District Judge. In 1956 Pandurang filed a suit for redemption of the mortgage and for obtaining possession of the lands. The petitioners contended in that suit that as they were lawfully cultivating the lands, under s. 2A of the Bombay Tenancy Act of 1939 they were deemed to be tenants, that they had become protected tenants under s. 3A of that Act, that they continued to be protected tenants under old s. 31 and present s. 4A of the Bombay Tenancy Act of 1948 and that with effect from April 1, 1957, they had become the owners of the lands under s. 32 of the Tenancy Act. The learned trial Judge, therefore, referred to the Mamlatdar for his decision the question whether the petitioners as mortgagees-in-possession are protected tenants and whether they had become the owners of the lands since April 1, 1957. The Mamlatdar answered this question in the negative. In appeal the Deputy Collector took a somewhat different view. According to him the petitioners had acquired the rights of tenants and protected tenants, but these rights were in abeyance during the subsistence of the mortgage and that these would revive when the mortgage was redeemed or when it was extinguished. Against the order made by him both the parties, the petitioners and opponents Nos. 1 to 3, applied in revision to the Bombay Revenue Tribunal.

The facts of application No. 1449 of 1964 are that the three lands in dispute originally belonged to the husband of opponent No. 1. These lands were mortgaged with possession in 1928 to the petitioner. In 1959 opponent No. 1 filed a suit for redemption of the mortgage. The petitioner contended in that suit that he was a protected tenant of the lands. The Civil Court, therefore, made a reference to the Mamlatdar for deciding the issue whether the petitioner proved that as a mortgagee he had become the tenant of the lands and as such become the owner thereof. The Tenancy Aval Karkun held that the petitioner had acquired the rights of a tenant. This finding was confirmed in appeal by the Deputy Collector. Opponent No. 1 then applied in revision to the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. The matter came up for hearing before a single member of the Revenue Tribunal. As the questions involved were of considerable importance, he referred the matter to a larger Bench.

These two applications along with some other applications were then heard by a Full Bench of the Bombay Revenue Tribunal. The Full Bench has in a well considered and able judgment held that a mortgagee-in-possession could not be deemed to be a tenant under s. 2A of the Bombay Tenancy Act of 1939. In the first application the Revenue Tribunal accordingly held that the petitioners had not acquired the rights of tenants, which could revive or survive after the redemption of the mortgage. In the second application the petitioner was held not to have acquired the rights of a tenant. The orders made by the Tenancy Aval Karkun and the Deputy Collector were set aside. The correctness of the view taken by the Full Bench of the Revenue Tribunal is being challenged before us in these two applications.

The Bombay Tenancy Act of 1939 as originally enacted gave protection to persons who were tenants under the ordinary law, that is, those who had acquired their tenancy rights under an agreement or contract with their landlords. In fact the Act contained no definition of the word "tenant". In 1946 the Act was amended in order to extend its protection to certain classes of persons, who were cultivating the lands lawfully, but who were not tenants under the ordinary law. New ss. 2A and 3A were inserted in the Act. Section 2A was in the following terms:

"(1) A person lawfully cultivating any land belonging to another person shall be deemed to be a tenant if such land is not cultivated personally by the owner and if such person is not—

(a) a member of the owner's family, or

(b) a servant on wages payable in cash or kind but not in crop share or a hired labourer cultivating the land under the personal supervision of the owner or any member of the owner's family, unless the owner has within one year of the coming into force of the Bombay Tenancy (Amendment) Act, 1946, made an application to the Mamlatdar within whose jurisdiction the land is situated for a declaration that the person is not a tenant.

(2) Where an application under sub-section (1) has been made and the Mamlatdar refuses to make such declaration and the Mamlatdar's decision is not set aside by the Collector in appeal under sub-section (3) of section 13 or by the Provincial Government under section 28, the person shall be deemed to be a tenant for the purposes of this Act."

Sub-section (1) of s. 3A provided:

"(1) Every tenant shall, on the expiry of one year from the date of the coming into force of the Bombay Tenancy (Amendment) Act, 1946, be deemed to be a protected tenant for the purposes of this Act and his rights as such protected tenant shall be recorded in the Records of Rights, unless his landlord has within the said period made an application to the Mamlatdar within whose jurisdiction the land is situated for a declaration that the tenant is not a protected tenant.

Sub-section (2) of s. 3A was on the same lines as sub-s. (2) of s. 2A.

These sections came into force on November 8, 1946. Section 2A, therefore, created a class of statutory or deemed tenants. It made every person lawfully cultivating another person's land a tenant, unless he fell in one of the two excepted categories mentioned in cls. (a) and (b). This section gave one year's time to the landlord to obtain a declaration that such person was not a tenant. If no application was made by the landlord, then such person became a tenant under s. 2A and a protected tenant under s. 3A.

The Tenancy Act of 1939, except ss. 3, 3A and 4 as modified, was repealed by the Bombay Tenancy Act of 1948, which came into force on December 28, 1948. Section 31 of this Act, as it originally stood, stated that for the purposes of this Act a person shall be recognised to be a protected tenant if such person had been deemed to be a protected tenant under ss. 3, 3A and 4 of the Bombay Tenancy Act, 1939. The corresponding section now is s. 4A. Section 4 of this Act is in the following terms:

"A person lawfully cultivating any land belonging to another person shall be deemed to be a tenant if such land is not cultivated personally by the owner and if such person is not—

(a) a member of the owner's family, or

(b) a servant on wages payable in cash or kind but not in crop share or a hired labourer cultivating the land under the personal supervision of the owner or any member of the owner's family, or

(c) a mortgagee in possession."

This section specifically excludes a mortgagee in possession from the category of deemed tenants.

In both the applications before us the lands had been mortgaged before November 8, 1946, when s. 2A of the 1939 Act came into force. The mortgagees were, therefore, lawfully in possession of the lands. They were also cultivating these lands. No application had also been made by the mortgagors to the Mamlatdar for a declaration that the petitioners, who were in possession of the lands as mortgagees, were not tenants. It has, therefore, been contended that as s. 2A did not exclude a mortgagee in possession, the petitioners became tenants under s. 2A and protected tenants under s. 3A and that they continued to be protected tenants under s. 31 of the Act of 1948 as it originally stood and under s. 4A of this Act as it now stands. It has been urged that the inclusion of cl. (c) in s. 4 of the Act of 1948 shows that the intention was to exclude persons who otherwise would have been within the scope of the section. On behalf of the mortgagees on the other hand it has been contended that s. 2A did not apply to any person whose position was incompatible with that of a tenant, that a mortgagee in possession possesses many rights of ownership, that the land in his possession cannot, therefore, be said not to belong to him, that he cannot, therefore, be said to be a person cultivating the land belonging to another person and that consequently he could not be deemed to be a tenant under s. 2A of the Act.

Before we deal with the arguments, which have been advanced before us, it may be mentioned that apart from the decision of a single Judge in Laxman Bandu Patil v. Dhavaji Yesu Babar,¹ that a mortgagee in possession could under the Tenancy Act of 1939 acquire the rights of a tenant, there does not appear to be any other decision on this point. There are casual observations in some cases, but the question does not appear to have been decided in any other case. The decision of the single Judge in Laxman Patil's case was set aside on some other ground in Laxman Bandu Patil v. Dhavaji Yesu Babar.² The learned Judges who decided this appeal did not consider it necessary to decide whether a mortgagee in possession can be deemed to be a tenant. In their judgment they observed:

"There has been no case where a mortgagee even under the old Act has been held to be a tenant as a person lawfully in cultivation of the same... We do not find in this case that this is absolutely necessary to decide as to whether or not a mortgagee must be held to be a tenant under the Tenancy Act of 1939. There are difficulties in the way of such a conclusion... It is argued and there is substance in the argument that a mortgagee who has got an interest in the property or owns a subordinate interest as such when in possession cannot also be held to be a tenant inasmuch as the words 'lawfully in cultivation' have obvious limitations."

Section 3 of the Tenancy Act of 1948 provides that the provisions of Chap. V of the Transfer of Property Act shall, in so far as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, apply to the tenancies and leases of land to which this Act applies. There was no similar provision in the Act of 1939. Section 2A of the Act of 1939 does not also begin with a non-obstante clause or words such as "notwithstanding any law, agreement, etc." There are many other sections in this Act which contain this clause. For instance, s. 14 begins with the words "Notwithstanding any agreement, usage or law." The opening words in sub-s. (2) of s. 5 are: "Notwithstanding any agreement, usage, decree or order of a Court of law." It is, therefore, reasonable to assume that the Legislature did not intend to override the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act in regard to mortgages. The words used in s. 2A are undoubtedly wide. One of the presumptions in law is that the Legislature does not intend to make any substantial alteration in the law beyond what it explicitly declares, either in express terms or by clear implication, or, in other words, beyond the immediate scope and object of the statute. In all general matters outside these limits the law remains undisturbed. General words and phrases, therefore, however wide and comprehensive they may be in their literal sense, must usually be construed as being limited to the actual objects of the Act; See Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, 1962 edn., pp. 78-79. If, therefore, it is possible, we must so construe s. 2A as to avoid repugnancy and as not to make ineffective the general provisions of law in regard to mortgages.

It has been contended that the position in law of a mortgagee in possession is inconsistent with his being a tenant of the same property. A tenancy of an agricultural land is created when the owner is unable or does not wish to cultivate the land himself. The purpose and object of a mortgage, on the other hand, is to secure a debt and the mortgagee is not entitled to retain possession of the land after his debt has been satisfied. A mortgagor has a right to redeem the land and after redemption to hold and enjoy it as he was entitled to hold and enjoy it before it was mortgaged. This right is recognised in s. 60 of the Transfer of Property Act, which provides that at any time after the principal money has become due, the mortgagor has a right, on tender of the mortgage-money, to require the mortgagee, where the mortgagee is in possession of the mortgaged property, to deliver possession thereof to the mortgagor and either to retransfer the mortgaged property to him or to such third person as he may direct. This is a statutory right which, in the words of Lord Macnaghten in Noakes & Co., Limited v. Rice,³ is of "the very nature and essence of a mortgage and inherent to the thing itself". This right cannot be fettered or restricted by any condition, which impedes, hampers or prevents redemption and any such condition would be void. This statutory right of a mortgagor would be materially affected if a mortgagee is held to be a tenant, for in that case he cannot get back possession of the land except on the very limited grounds specified in the Tenancy Act. It seems to us very doubtful whether this was intended by the Legislature.

That this was not so intended is also suggested by the provisions of the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act. The first Agricultural Debtors Relief Act was enacted in 1939 about the same time when the Tenancy Act of 1939 was placed on the statute book. Section 45 of this Act provided that notwithstanding anything contained in any law, custom or contract, the Board shall declare any transaction purporting to be a sale of land belonging to a debtor to be in the nature of a mortgage, if the Board was satisfied that the circumstances connected with the sale-deed showed it to be in the nature of a mortgage. Clause (4) in sub-s. (2) of s. 54 provided that the award shall be in the prescribed form and shall include the conditions subject to which the immoveable property, if any, in the possession of the creditor shall be delivered to the debtor. This Act was repealed by the Bombay Agricultural Debtors Relief Act, 1947. This new Act came into force on May 27, 1947, about six months after ss. 2A and 3A of the Tenancy Act of 1939 had been inserted in that Act. The provisions of s. 24 of the Agricultural Debtors Relief Act of 1947 are similar to those of s. 45 of the old Act. Clause (v) in sub-s. (2) of s. 32 provides that the Court may pass an order for the delivery of possession of any property notwithstanding any law or contract to the contrary. These provisions express a clear intention on the part of the Legislature that possession of agricultural land, which had been mortgaged, should be restored to the mortgagor-debtor. It is, therefore, improbable that s. 2A was intended to apply to mortgagees.

In Jaswantrai Tricumlal v. Bai Jiwi,⁴ a Full Bench of this Court held that a sub-tenant of a tenant, who had been let into possession of the land at the time when sub-letting was not invalid, became, on the termination of the contractual tenancy, a tenant under s. 2A of the Act of 1939 and that he could, therefore, be said to be lawfully cultivating the land within the meaning of s. 4 of the Act of 1948. In the same case it was observed that under the old Act a tenant of a mortgagee in possession became, on the redemption of the mortgage, a statutory tenant. If, therefore, a mortgagee has introduced a tenant on the land, the mortgagor would not be entitled to obtain possession of the land from him. It has, therefore, been urged that if a tenant of a mortgagee can be deemed to be a tenant under s. 2A of the Act of 1939, there is no reason why a mortgagee should not also be so held. There is, however, a clear distinction between the position of a mortgagee and that of a tenant brought on the land by the mortgagee. This has been pointed out by the Supreme Court in Dahya Lala v. Rasul,⁵ where it has been observed (p. 330):

"...Nor has the contention that the expression 'mortgagee in possession' (in clause (c) of section 4 of the Act of 1948) includes a tenant from such a mortgagee any force. A mortgagee in possession is excluded from the class of deemed tenants on grounds of public policy: to confer that status upon a mortgagee in possession would be to invest him with rights inconsistent with his fiduciary character. A transferee of the totality of the rights of a mortgagee in possession may also be deemed to be a mortgagee in possession. But a tenant of the mortgagee, in possession is inducted on the land in the ordinary course of management under authority derived from the mortgagor and so long as the mortgage subsists, even under the ordinary law he is not liable to be evicted by the mortgagor."

A mortgagee, therefore, occupies a fiduciary character and even though he is not a trustee for the mortgagor, his duties are akin to those of a trustee: see p. 480, Mulla's Transfer of Property Act, 1956 edn.

There are other difficulties in holding a mortgagee to be a tenant. A tenant is liable to pay only rent. A mortgagee, on the other hand, is subject to several liabilities specified in s. 76 of the Transfer of Property Act. He must manage the property as a person of ordinary prudence would manage it, if it were his own. He must use his best endeavours to collect the rents and profits thereof. He must keep full and accurate accounts of all sums received and spent by him as mortgagee and give the mortgagor at his request true copies of such accounts. He must debit the receipts from the mortgaged property in reduction of the amounts due to him on account of interest and so far as such receipts exceed any interest due, in reduction or discharge of the mortgage-money. If, therefore, a mortgagee is held to be a tenant, a heavier burden would be imposed on the mortgagor making redemption more difficult, for the mortgagee would then be liable to appropriate towards the amount due to him only the rent payable under the Tenancy Act, which has been reduced from time to time and is now equal to only five times the assessment. Moreover, under s. 7 of the Tenancy Act of 1939 and under old s. 34 and under present s. 31 of the Act of 1948, a landlord can terminate the tenancy and apply for possession of the land on the ground that he requires it bona fide for personal cultivation. Can a mortgagor obtain possession on this ground even during the pendency of the mortgage? Under sub-s. (2) of s. 5 of the Tenancy Act of 1939 and under s. 14 of the Act of 1948 a tenancy can be terminated on the ground of sub-letting. If, therefore, a mortgagee after cultivating the land personally, introduces a tenant on the land, can the mortgagor evict him on the ground that he has sub-let the land? It is difficult to imagine that the Legislature by merely inserting s. 2A in the Tenancy Act of 1939 intended to so radically alter the legal relationship between a mortgagor and a mortgagee.

The object of the Tenancy Act of 1939, was, as stated in its preamble, to provide for the protection of tenants of agricultural lands. The provisions of the Act show that this object was sought to be achieved in two ways, firstly, by giving to the tenants security of tenancy by providing that they shall not be evicted except on the grounds specified in the Act and in the manner provided therein. Provision was also made for determination of reasonable rent and also for fixation of maximum rent. A mortgagee in possession enters upon possession of the land not for the purpose of personally cultivating it, but with the object and purpose of paying himself wholly or partially out of the income from the land. He is entitled to retain possession of the land until he has recovered the full amount due to him. He is also not liable to pay any rent. He does not, therefore, stand in need of protection of the Act either in respect of his right to possession or liability to pay rent. Consequently, it was not necessary to confer the status of a tenant upon him. This evidently is the reason why he has been specifically excluded by cl. (c) in s. 4 of the Tenancy Act of 1948. As pointed out by the Supreme Court in Dahya Lala v. Rasul, at p. 330, a mortgagee in possession has been excluded from the class of deemed tenants on grounds of public policy. Public policy must have been the same two years previously when s. 2A was inserted in the Tenancy Act of 1939. It does not, therefore, appear that the Legislature intended to include a mortgagee in possession in the class of deemed tenants under s. 2A of the Act. A tenant of a mortgagee, however, stands on a different footing. He is introduced on the land in the ordinary course of management by the mortgagee in exercise of authority derived from the mortgagor. He needs as much protection as any other tenant.

Section 2A gave an opportunity to a landlord to apply to the Mamlatdar and obtain a declaration that the person lawfully cultivating his land was not his tenant. It has, therefore, been urged that full effect must be given to the wide words used in s. 2A. The opportunity given to landlords by s. 2A was, however, a limited one and could only be exercised in respect of persons who were on the land on November 8, 1947, or earlier. This provision does not, therefore, by itself suggest that a mortgagee in possession was intended to be covered by s. 2A.

On behalf of the petitioners reliance has been placed on the observation of Chagla C.J. in Jaswantrai Tricumlal v. Bai Jiwi, at p. 175, that under the old Act all persons lawfully on the land were intended to be protected. Reliance was also placed on the following observations of the Supreme Court in Dahya Lala v. Rasul (p. 329) :

"...A person who is deemed a tenant by s. 4 is manifestly in a class apart from the tenant who holds lands on lease from the owner. Such a person would be invested with the status of a tenant if three conditions are fulfilled—(a) that he is cultivating land lawfully, (b) that the land belongs to another person, and (c) that he is not within the excepted categories."

These observations must be read in their context. In the first case the question which arose for consideration was whether a sub-tenant could be deemed to be a tenant. In the case before the Supreme Court the dispute was about a tenant brought on the land by the mortgagee. Moreover, as pointed out above, the Supreme Court has itself made a distinction between a mortgagee and a mortgagee's tenant.

Reliance has also been placed on the following observations in the judgment of the Full Bench in Jaswantrai Tricumlal v. Bai Jiwi (p. 175) :

"...It may be pointed out that the Legislature in the Act of 1948 in cl. (c) of s. 4 has taken mortgagees in possession out of the categories of statutory tenants. Therefore, whatever lacuna there was in the old Act has now been made good. The learned Judge (Bavdekar J.) relies on this fact for strengthening his view that mortgagees in possession were never intended to be treated as statutory tenants, and if the tenants of mortgagees in possession were not intended to be treated as statutory tenants, then on a parity of reason sub-tenants could not also be considered as statutory tenants. In our opinion, the amendment effected by s. 4(c) of the Tenancy Act strongly supports the view which we are inclined to take that under the old Act all persons lawfully on the land were intended to be protected, but the Legislature realising the difficult position in which the mortgagor would find himself if the tenancy created by the mortgagee in possession were to be protected and on redemption the mortgagor was prevented from getting possession of the land, made the necessary amendment by enacting s. 4(c)."

Stress has been laid on the fact that in the opinion of the Full Bench the amendment had not been made to clarify the law. Apart from the fact that these observations must be read in the context of the case, which arose for consideration before the Full Bench, the last sentence shows that according to the learned Judges the amendment in s. 4 had been made so that there may be no difficulty in the way of a mortgagor's obtaining possession of the land not because of the mortgagee's claiming to be a tenant, but because of the tenancy created by the mortgagee. It is, therefore, obvious that the Full Bench was not considering the question of a mortgagee in possession being deemed to be a tenant. In fact there is no discussion in the judgment on this point.

In Salman Raje v. Madhavsang,⁶ the Gujarat High Court has held that a tenant of a mortgagee can be deemed to be a tenant under s. 2A of the Tenancy Act of 1939. The judgment shows that the learned Judges were aware of the difficulties, which would consequently result. At p. 826 it has been observed:

"...We may observe that these very difficulties were urged in support of the limited construction of sec. 2A before the Full Bench in Jaswantrai Tricumlal v. Bai Jiwi. At page 174 of the Report the learned Chief Justice, though he was there dealing with the case of a sub-tenant, refuted this very argument by observing that questions of statutory protection can only arise when the contractual relations come to an end, that is, in the case of a sub-tenant which he was dealing when the contractual tenancy of a tenant would be determined. Similar would be the position in the case of a mortgagee in possession when his mortgage gets extinguished. A further answer to Mr. Chhatrapati would be that the same difficulties must also arise in the case of a mortgagee's tenant and yet such a tenant was held to be entitled to the status of a protected tenant in Jaswantrai Tricumlal v. Bai Jiwi. The question whether a mortgagee has to pay fair rent to his statutory landlord, the mortgagor, would be best answered by stating, as was done in Jaswantrai Tricumlal v. Bai Jiwi, that no such question would arise so long as the mortgage subsists."

With respect, it may be pointed out that if s. 2A is held to include a mortgagee in possession, he would be a deemed tenant not only after the redemption of the mortgage but also during the subsistence of the mortgage. The learned Judges appear to have relied on the following observations of Chagla C. J. (p. 175):

"...Therefore, with very great respect, we must hold that the view taken by the learned Judge with regard to the position of the tenants of the mortgagees in possession under the old Act of 1939 is not the correct position, and that as far as the old Act is concerned the position of the tenants of the mortgagees in possession and the position of sub-tenants was identical; they both became statutory tenants, one on the redemption of the mortgage and the other on the termination of the contractual tenancy."

If we may say with respect, these observations are correct, because a tenant of a mortgagee can only be deemed to be a tenant of the mortgagor after the redemption of the mortgage. A sub-tenant would also be deemed to be a tenant of the landlord after the contractual tenancy has been terminated. A mortgagee, on the other hand, will become a tenant as soon as he enters upon the possession of the land. With respect, therefore, we are unable to agree with the view taken by the Gujarat High Court.

It has been urged on behalf of the mortgagors that the consequence of a mortgage with possession is that the ownership rights are split up, that all the rights except the right to redeem vest in the mortgagee, that the mortgagee acquires a heritable and transferable interest in the property and that, consequently, it cannot be said that the mortgaged land does not belong to him or that he is cultivating the land which belongs to another person. In support of this argument reliance is placed on the decision of Tendolkar J. in Laxmipat Singhania v. Larsen & Toubro Ltd.,⁷ in which it was held that the words "belonging to" in s. 4(I) of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, mean very much the same thing as "of the ownership of", though not necessarily "of the absolute ownership of". At p. 693 the learned

Judge has observed that there may be in relation to property a dual ownership for a limited period of time and that the tests as to whether for a limited period of time a temporary ownership has been created are:

- (1) whether there is a demise of the property,
- (2) whether there is full dominion and control over the property in the demisee, and

(3) whether the risk of the property falls on the demisee, or the absolute owner. On the strength of the decision it has been urged that during the period of mortgage with possession there is dual ownership and that the property can be said to belong to both the mortgagor and the mortgagee. It is not necessary for us to decide this point in these applications, because for the other reasons which I have given above, it seems to us that the mortgagee in possession was not intended to be brought within the scope of s. 2A of the Tenancy Act of 1939.

We are accordingly of the opinion that a mortgagee in possession could not be deemed to be a tenant under s. 2A of the Bombay Tenancy Act of 1939. The view taken by the Full Bench of the Revenue Tribunal is, in our opinion, correct.

PATEL J. These two references are made by the District Judge, Sholapur, under s. 438 of the Criminal Procedure Code recommending that the conviction and sentences recorded in both the cases should be set aside. The convictions are—one under s. 66(I)(b) and s. 92 read with ss. 63 and 66(I)(d) of the Factories Act.

The accused in the case is the owner of what is known as Munshi Bidi Works, which is a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act and is situated at 57/60, Guruwar Peth, Sholapur. He owned similar factories at several other places bearing the same name, while he himself stayed in Poona. The Factory Inspector visited the factory on October 9, 1963, at about 8.10 p.m. and found only six women workers out of many working in the factory and doing the work of tying Bidis into bundles. Now, the period of work, as stated on the painted board displayed in the factory, was between 10.30 a.m. to 2.30 p.m. and 3.00 p.m. to 7.00 p.m. These six women workers were found to be working at 8.10 p.m. The accused was prosecuted in all the six cases, viz., cases Nos. 56, 57 and 59 of 1964 under s. 66(1)(b) and 58, 60 and 61 of 1964 under s. 63 read with s. 92. Within three days of the date of hearing fixed for the case, the accused gave notice in terms of s. 101 of the Factories Act stating that the manager was in charge of the Factory at Sholapur, that the accused was residing at Poona and that he had instructed the manager to observe all the provisions of the Factories Act, and, therefore, it was the manager, who was guilty of the offence, and not himself. In fact, this is the complaint to be made to the Court by the accused three days before the hearing so as to enable the Court to get the manager before it. The accused then also gave evidence in support of his contention that it was the manager who was guilty of the charge and not himself. The learned Magistrate refused to accept the plea of the accused and held that it was an after-thought. One does not know whether the manager was summoned before the Court in terms of the section. The accused filed an application in revision before the learned District and Sessions Judge, who has held that the evidence of the accused that it was the manager of the factory, who was responsible for the breach of the provisions of the Act ought to have been accepted and that in terms of s. 101 the factory manager ought to have been convicted and not the accused. In accordance with his findings, he has recommended that the conviction of the accused be set aside.

Mr. S. B. Sukthankar, who appears on behalf of the accused, has supported the reference, while Mr. Bhasme, learned Assistant Government Pleader, has opposed the reference very strongly. Mr. Bhasme contends in the first instance that under the Factories Act the liability of the manager and the occupier is concurrent and it is not open under s. 101 for either of them to allege and prove that it was the other who was guilty of the offence and get himself acquitted. In other words, that the liability of the manager and the occupier is absolute and they have no defence even under s. 101 of the Act, if any breach of the Rules or the Act is committed. Mr. Bhasme relies for this purpose upon the definition of "occupier" in cl. (n) of the Factories Act.

Section 7 requires an occupier to give notice within 15 days of the occupation of the factory to the Chief Inspector containing the particulars mentioned in the sub-clauses thereunder. By cl. (b) the name and the address of the occupier has to be given and by cl. (f) the name of the manager of the factory has to be given. Sub-section (5) provides that during such period for which no person has been designated as manager of a factory or during which the person designated does not manage the factory, any person found acting as manager, or if no such person is found, the occupier himself shall be deemed to be the manager of the factory for the purposes of the Act. Section 92 provides that save as otherwise provided in the Act and subject to the provisions of s. 93, if in, or in respect of, any factory there is any contravention of any of the provisions of the Act or of any rule made thereunder... the occupier and manager of the factory shall each be guilty of an offence and be punishable... Section 93 has no application, as it concerns the owner of the premises. Section 101 is headed "Exemption of occupier or manager from liability in certain cases". It reads:

"Where the occupier or manager of a factory is charged with an offence punishable under this Act, he shall be entitled, upon complaint duly made by him and on giving to the prosecutor not less than three clear days' notice in writing of his intention so to do, to have any other person whom he charges as the actual offender brought before the Court at the time appointed for hearing the charge; and if, after the commission of the offence has been proved, the occupier or manager of the factory, as the case may be, proves to the satisfaction of the Court—

(a) that he has used due diligence to enforce the execution of this Act, and

(b) that the said other person committed the offence in question without his knowledge, consent or connivance,— that other person shall be convicted of the offence and shall be liable to the like punishment as if he were the occupier or manager of the factory, and the occupier or manager, as the case may be, shall be discharged from any liability under this Act in respect of such offence;"

The two provisos are procedural and do not deal with the question of liability. The first proviso enables the occupier or the manager who has raised the defence and complained to examine himself on oath and also any witnesses he may bring in support of his case. The second proviso requires the Court to adjourn the matter from time to time for a period not exceeding three months, if the occupier or the manager, as the case may be, cannot be brought before the Court. It also further provides that if the actual offender cannot be brought before the Court, the Court must proceed to hear the charge against the person actually charged and if the offence is proved then convict him.

Mr. Bhasme contends that the Factories Act is an Act enacted for improving the working conditions of the workmen and therefore the same must be construed liberally so as to advance the purpose of the Act. He says that this can be achieved only if it is held that both the occupant and the manager are liable. There is nothing in the definition of "occupier" which can possibly advance the contention. He says s. 101 ought to be confined to a plea where either of them contend that some person other than the occupier and manager is guilty of the offence. In my view, it is not possible to accept the contention. Even though this is a beneficent provision and ought to be liberally construed, in my view it has to be construed sensibly and reasonably. One cannot lose sight of the fact that s. 92 which provides the penalty for breach of the Act and the Rules itself creates the exception, for it says "Save as is otherwise expressly provided in this Act", which includes s. 101 following it. The section assumes the possibility of prosecution of either the manager or the occupier alone and it gives an option to either of them to prove that some one else other than the one charged is guilty of the offence. The purpose of construction of a statute is to get at the intention of the maker. In doing so the Court must be guided primarily by the words of the statute. It may be that the meaning of words may be modified to some extent by the context in which they are used. For arriving at the correct meaning the Court must read the statute as a whole and give effect to all the words thereof. If the argument advanced is accepted, I will have to omit much from consideration which I have no right to do.

It is also contended that in a prosecution under the Factories Act there is no scope for the application of the doctrine of mens rea and, therefore, want of intention, even if any, is no bar to conviction. I agree that that is so but the exception created by s. 101 has no relation to mens rea. It requires much more than mere want of mens rea to take shelter under s. 101. It requires that the accused has used due diligence for the enforcement of the execution of the Act and has not either the knowledge of the offence being committed or has not consented to its commission or connived at it. It is not, therefore, that s. 101 creates an exception by the way of providing mens rea as an ingredient of the offence. The accused is expected to prove something much more than that.

I am supported in this view by the judgment of a Division Bench of this Court in *State v. L. S. Dabholkar*¹ where the Courts below had applied s. 101 and upheld the contention of the occupier that it was the manager who was the guilty party and not the occupier. The High Court refused to accept a similar contention as now made by the Assistant Government Pleader. This contention, therefore, must fail.

Mr. Bhasme then contended that the accused has not proved that any written instructions were given to the manager of the factory and oral instructions cannot be effective to sustain the defence under s. 101. No absolute rule can be laid down in that respect. Everything must depend ultimately upon the nature of the evidence brought before the Court and it is for the Court to accept or reject the same. There is nothing in the Factories Act which requires that there should be written instructions.

Mr. Bhasme then contended that in any event the learned Sessions Judge cannot be right when he says that the accused has made out his defence under s. 101 of the Act. He refers me to exh. 7, which is a letter written by the accused himself from Poona on October 24, 1963, wherein he conveyed to the Factory Inspector that he approved the statement made by his manager at the time when he visited the factory on October 9, 1963, and that the incident had occurred because the electric light had failed and only six workers were then working at the Factory. In my view, the approval by the accused of the statement made by the manager cannot conflict with his defence, which he has now raised. The learned Sessions Judge has considered all the circumstances connected with the matter and has expressed the opinion that the defence of the accused was true. I have also had the advantage of referring to the learned Magistrate's judgment and it appears to me that his approach is erroneous. I agree that the defence of the accused is true.

Having regard to all these facts, I accept the reference. I accordingly set aside the order of conviction and sentence passed by the learned Magistrate in both the cases and make the rule absolute.

Rule made absolute.

STATE v. ISMAIL ALLISAHEB AWATE.*

Motor Vehicles Act (IV of 1939), Secs. 2(25) & (33), 42, 123—Private motor car used for carrying passengers for hire or reward—Whether such vehicle a "public service vehicle"—Length of user whether a relevant factor in determining whether vehicle a public service vehicle.

A private motor car used for carrying passengers for reward or hire is a "public service vehicle" within the meaning of s. 2(25) of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1939, and as such a "transport vehicle" as defined in s. 2(33) of the Act. Such user need not be habitual for if at a particular moment it is being used for carrying passengers on hire or reward then the vehicle becomes a public service vehicle and it cannot without any permit or licence for the purpose carry passengers.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. A. Rane, Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

PATEL J. This reference is made by the II Additional Sessions Judge, Sholapur, recommending that the conviction of the accused under s. 123, read with s. 42(1) of the Motor Vehicles Act, and sentence of fine imposed upon him be set aside.

The accused was in charge of a private motor car bearing No. BYE 2717. On August 30, 1963, he was driving it from Sholapur to Pandharpur with passengers on hire. There were eight passengers in the motor car at the time and the evidence showed that they were charged Rs. 2.20 per head per trip. He was, therefore, prosecuted under s. 123 read with s. 42(1) of the Motor Vehicles Act. The learned trial Magistrate convicted him and the learned Additional Sessions Judge recommends that his conviction and sentence be set aside.

*Decided, March 9, 1965. Criminal Reference No. 14 of 1965.

Two points were urged before the learned trial Magistrate; one was that it was only the owner of the vehicle who was liable and not the driver, and, secondly, in any event as the motor car in question was a private car, no permit was necessary as it was not a transport vehicle and therefore no offence was committed under ss. 42 and 123 read together. Both these contentions were negatived by the learned Magistrate. The accused went in revision to the Sessions Court which was heard by the II Additional Sessions Judge. He accepted the second of the contentions made by the accused relying upon the decision of the Mysore High Court in Jayaram v. State of Mysore,¹ which case indeed is in favour of the accused. The learned Additional Sessions Judge did not accept the first contention which was urged in support of the revisional application. I agree that there is no substance in the first contention.

As to the second contention, it is not enough to read merely one definition clause in the Motor Vehicles Act. Section 42 is as follows:

"(1) No owner of a transport vehicle shall use or permit the use of the vehicle in any public place, save in accordance with the conditions of a permit granted or countersigned by a Regional or State Transport Authority or the Commission authorising the use of the vehicle in that place in the manner in which the vehicle is being used:"

Ordinarily in common parlance a transport vehicle is one which transports either goods or passengers from one place to another. But then the Act has itself framed definitions which apply unless there is context to the contrary. The relevant definitions are those of "light motor vehicle", "motor cab", "motor car", "public service vehicle" and "transport vehicle". "Light motor vehicle" means a transport vehicle or omnibus the registered laden weight of which, or a motor car or tractor the unladen weight of which, does not exceed 3,000 kilograms. "Motor cab" means any motor vehicle constructed, adapted or used to carry not more than six passengers excluding the driver, for hire or reward. "Motor car" means any motor vehicle other than a transport vehicle, omnibus, road-roller, tractor, motor cycle or invalid carriage. "Public service vehicle" means any motor vehicle used or adapted to be used for the carriage of passengers for hire or reward, and includes a motor car, contract carriage, and stage carriage. "Transport vehicle" means a public service vehicle or a goods vehicle.

In order, therefore, to find out the meaning of the words "transport vehicle" as contained in s. 42, one must go to the definition of "public service vehicle" contained in cl. (25) of s. 2 which is as stated above. It must be noticed that by the definition, in order that a motor vehicle should become a "public service vehicle," it need not be habitually used nor is it required that it should be specially adapted for that purpose; even if the vehicle is used for that purpose it becomes a public service vehicle for the time being. The absence of the word "habitual" must suggest that if at a particular moment it is being used for carrying passengers on hire or reward, then the vehicle becomes public service vehicle. In connection with s. 42 one must also have regard to the other provisions of the Motor Vehicles Act before concluding that a private car can without any permit or licence for the purpose, carry passengers. The Act contains several provisions with regard to transport vehicles, and, the rules framed under the Act by the Government, contain elaborate provisions for different kinds of licences and permits for different kinds of vehicles. There are stringent restrictions on the drivers of passenger vehicles intended for public service such as motor cabs and transport buses in the interest of public safety and convenience. It is in the general interest of the public that such distinction should have been made between different kinds of vehicles. In order to give effect to the intention of the framers of the Act, it is impossible to qualify in any way the words "transport vehicle" and "public service vehicle" by words which are not to be found in the statute. Once the Court comes to the conclusion that a private motor car was being used for carrying passengers for reward or hire, it becomes a "public service vehicle" within the meaning of cl. (25) and as such a "transport vehicle" as defined in cl. (33) of s. 2 of the Act. Admittedly the accused had no licence for plying the same in that manner and he would, therefore, fall within the mischief of s. 42 read with s. 123 of the Motor Vehicles Act.

In Manager, Indian Express, In re², a similar construction was placed on these clauses by the Madras High Court. In that case the accused who was the Manager of the Indian Express carried bundles of newspapers from the office of the Indian Express to the Railway Station on two occasions and having regard to the definition of "goods vehicle" in cl. 2(8) it was held that even if the goods were carried in a private motor car only on two occasions, it was "goods vehicle" within the meaning of the clause and, therefore, it contravened the provisions of s. 42(1) of the Act.

Having regard to what is stated above, it is impossible with great deference to agree with the decision of the Mysore High Court.

In the result the reference cannot be accepted. I, therefore, reject the same.

Reference rejected.

Presidency Small Cause Courts Act (XV of 1882), Sec. 41—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O.XXII, rr. 1, 4—Indian Succession Act (XXXIX of 1925), Secs. 305, 306—Ejectment proceedings against licensee under s. 41, Presidency Small Cause Courts Act—Whether such proceedings can be continued after licensee's death against his legal representatives.

Ejectment proceedings against a licensee under s. 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, 1882, do not expire with his death but are liable to be continued upon death of the licensee against his legal representatives.

The ejectment application proceedings against persons mentioned in s. 41 of the Act are proceedings relating to property rights and/or recovery of properties and are not proceedings which are relating to personal causes of action. These proceedings do not die with the death of a party to the proceedings whether he may be applicant and/or opponent but are such as could be continued against legal representatives of a deceased party to the proceedings.

from the premises mentioned in the application. The licensee died intestate at Bombay on May 31, 1962, leaving him surviving as his only heirs and legal representatives the petitioners in this revisional application. By his application dated November 12, 1962, the licensor applied to the Court of Small Causes to set aside the abatement of his application and to condone delay in the making of the application and to bring on the record of the ejectment application the names of the above petitioners as defendants Nos. 1 to 8 as legal representatives of the licensee.

The petitioners in this revisional application contend that the Court of Small Causes ought not to have made the order dated February 21, 1963, granting the application of the licensor. Their case is that the Court below ought to have held that since the licensor's case against the deceased licensee was that he was a licensee and his licence had been revoked, the ejectment application came to an end (altogether) upon the death of the licensee on May 31, 1962. The proceedings for ejectment under s. 41 of the Act are such as cannot be continued against the legal representatives of the licensee. The reason for this, according to the petitioners, is that a licence is not heritable. The proceedings under s. 41 could only lie against a licensee. These proceedings filed against any particular person are not liable to be continued against his legal representatives, because a licence is not heritable and does not create any rights in the legal representatives of the original opponent in the ejectment application.

In this connection, the petitioners rely upon the decision of a single Judge of the High Court at Madras in the case of Ranganatham Pillai v. Govindarajulu Naidu.¹ In the above case, a landlord had filed an ejectment application under s. 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act against two defendants. Defendant No. 1 to whom the licence had been granted (licensee) died pending the hearing of the ejectment application. The applicant applied to the trial Court for having defendant No. 2 brought on record as legal representative of defendant No. 1 in the ejectment application. The trial Court granted that application. In the revisional petition before the High Court of Madras, on behalf of defendant No. 2, it was contended that "the cause of action contemplated by section 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act, where a licensee happens to be the person against whom a proceeding is sought to be taken in the first instance is something which necessarily expires with the death of the licensee".

The contention urged was that with the death of defendant No. 1 there was no proceeding to be continued against defendant No. 2 as "holding under or by assignment from" defendant No. 1 within the language of s. 41 of the Act. The contention was accepted by the Court. In that connection, the Court disapproved of the observations made by the High Court of Calcutta in the case of Hirendra Bhusan v. Purna Chandra.² The Court referred to the decision of the High Court of Madras in the case of Chinnan v. Ranjithammal.³ It is necessary to point out that the first part of the observations in the case of Chinnan v. Ranjithammal quoted in the case of Ranganatham Pillai v. Govindarajulu Naidu relates to the position of a licensee whose licensor sells away the immovable property in question. It is observed that upon transfer and sale of the property the licensee ceases to have any rights altogether and the licence stands revoked upon transfer and sale of the property. The Court further observed (p. 556):

"...A license is not annexed to the property in respect of which it is enjoyed, nor is it a transferable or heritable right, but is a right purely personal between grantor and licensee. Unless a different intention appears, it cannot even be exercised by the licensee's servants or agents (section 56). Accordingly in their occupation of the plot, and especially so since the death of Ponjolai, the defendants have been mere trespassers.... We need not look further for authority than to Vadapalli Narasimham v.

1 [1950] II Mad. L.J. 280.

3 (1930) I.L.R. 54 Mad. 554.

Dronamraju Seetharamamurthy,⁴ for the proposition that the representatives of a tenant on sufferance are mere trespassers, since they cannot be regarded as succeeding to any interest in the tenancy; and what is true of a tenant on sufferance would seem to be true also of a licensee."

Now, in connection with the above observations of the High Court of Madras in case of Chinnan v. Ramjithammal, we respectfully agree that a licence is not annexed to the property, nor is it transferable or heritable. We further agree that a tenant on sufferance is a mere trespasser and what is true of a tenant on sufferance would seem to be true also of a licensee. The total result of the above position is that upon revocation of a licence the licensee ceases to have any lawful right to enter upon and/or to continue in occupation of the property in question. The character of his possession and occupation subsequent to the valid revocation of the licence is that of a trespasser.

In this very connection and in connection with the contents of s. 41 of the Act, in the case of Hirendra Bhushan v. Purna Chandra, the Calcutta High Court, inter alia, observed (p. 848):

"...According to sec. 41, 'occupant' comprises a 'tenant or occupier or any person holding under or by assignment from him', and the first paragraph of the section suggests that by 'occupier' is meant a person occupying the property by permission of the applicant or any person through whom the applicant claims, that is to say, a licensee. The effect of the section, generally stated, therefore, is that the landlord may demand possession of a tenant or a licensee or a person holding under or by assignment from such tenant or licensee, as the case may be, and if the demand be not complied with, he may apply for summons against the person who failed to deliver possession on such demand".

Raghava Rao J., in deciding the case of Ranganatham Pillai v. Govindarajulu Naidu, dissented from the views expressed by the High Court of Calcutta as quoted above. As we will presently point out, it appears to us that the construction of s. 41 of the Act as decided by the High Court of Calcutta in the manner mentioned above is correct. With respect, we do not agree with Raghava Rao J. that the opinion expressed by the High Court of Calcutta is erroneous.

Now, in this connection, we will first refer to the relevant provisions in s. 41 of the Act which run as follows:

"41. Summons against person occupying property without leave.—When any person has had possession of any immoveable property... as the tenant, or by permission, of another person, or of some person through whom such other person claims, and such tenancy or permission has determined or been withdrawn, and such tenant or occupier or any person holding under or by assignment from him (hereinafter called the occupant) refuses to deliver up such property in compliance with a request made to him in this behalf by such other person, such other person (hereinafter called the applicant) may apply to the Small Cause Court..."

Apparently, the provisions in s. 41 provide for a summary application for ejectment of parties who by consent may have been enjoying rights of occupation of properties. These parties have been mentioned in the section as (i) tenants, (ii) occupants by permission of another person and (iii) occupants to whom permission may have been granted by the parties who had permission. Against all such parties, ejectment proceedings are liable to be instituted under s. 41. The only condition for institution of such application is that the tenancy or permission must be determined or must have been withdrawn. According to the licensor, the original licensee Damji Lavji Damani was given a licence to be on the premises mentioned in the application. His licence had been revoked by the licensor prior to the institution of the ejectment application. The obvious result of that revocation was as already discussed above that the licensee was from the date of revocation of the licence a trespasser in occupation of the premises mentioned in the application. He thereafter had no right whatsoever according to the licensor to continue to occupy the premises. The question is as to how the proceedings by way of ejectment application were affected by reason of licensee's death on May 31, 1962. Now, in this connection the provisions which became applicable were the provisions in O. XXII, rr. 1 and 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The relevant parts of these rules provide:

"1. The death of a ... defendant shall not cause the suit to abate if the right to sue survives."

"2. (1) Where ... a sole defendant or sole surviving defendant dies and the right to sue survives, the Court, on an application made in that behalf, shall cause the legal representative of the deceased defendant to be made a party and shall proceed with the suit..."

In connection with the question of the right to sue surviving upon death of a person, the relevant statutory provisions are contained in ss. 305 and 306 of the Indian Succession Act. These sections provide as follows:

"305. An executor or administrator has the same power to sue in respect of all causes of action that survive the deceased, and may exercise the same power for the recovery of debts as the deceased had when living.

306. All demands whatsoever and all rights to prosecute or defend any action or special proceeding existing in favour of or against a person at the time of his decease, survive to and against his executors or administrators; except causes of action for defamation, assault, as defined in the Indian Penal Code, or other personal injuries not causing the death of the party; and except also cases where, after the death of the party, the relief sought could not be enjoyed or granting it would be nugatory."

The maxim of law in this connection is actio personalis moritur cum persona (the right of personal action dies with the person). The converse of this has been accepted as correct by all Courts throughout. The converse is that property rights in favour of and/or against any person continue to exist in favour of or against legal representatives of a deceased party-litigant. It is for this reason that one finds the above provisions in the Code of Civil Procedure and the Indian Succession Act. The question in connection with bringing legal representatives on record (in the language of s. 306 of the Indian Succession Act) would be:— whether the cause and/or the suit relates to defamation, assault, as defined in the Indian Penal Code, or it relates to other personal injuries not causing the death of the party and whether it is such as after the death of the party the relief sought could not be enjoyed or granting it would be nugatory. In this connection, reference may be made to the provisions in the Fatal Accidents Act and similar statutes. In our view, it is not possible for us to form the opinion that the ejectment application proceedings against persons mentioned in s. 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act are proceedings not relating to property rights and/or recovery of properties. These are not proceedings which are relating to personal causes of action. These proceedings do not die with the death of a party to the proceedings whether he may be applicant and/or opponent. On the contrary, these being proceedings for recovery of properties and for enforcing rights to properties, are such as could always be continued against legal representatives of a deceased party to the proceedings.

Having regard to the above discussion, with respect, we are unable to accept as correct the ratio of the decision in the case of Ranganatham Pillai v. Govindarajulu Naidu mentioned above. We respectfully disagree with the observation in that case that the ejectment proceedings under s. 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act are something which necessarily expire with the death of the licensee. In our view, these are proceedings which are liable to be continued upon death of the opponent in the proceedings against his legal representatives.

In this connection, it is necessary to mention that by the written statement filed by the licensee, it was, inter alia, contended that he was not a licensee as alleged in the application. In fact, he was a sub-tenant. Having regard to his position as a sub-tenant, he also contended that by the notice mentioned in the application the applicant was not entitled to terminate his rights as a sub-tenant. He had acquired rights of a tenant. He was not liable to be ejected from the premises. Now, these were contentions relating to exercise and enforcement of proprietary rights on behalf of the licensee. It is difficult to see how the legal representatives of the licensee were not entitled to adopt these contentions and if they were right how they were liable to be ejected in the ejectment application proceedings. We have referred to the above contentions made in the written statement only because these go to show that contentions of various kinds relating to proprietary rights would generally arise in ejectment applications filed under s. 41 of the Act. In connection with the licensor's contention that the licensee had become a trespasser having regard to revocation of his licence and the contentions of the licensee of the nature mentioned above, it is clear that the proceedings were liable to be continued upon death of the licensee against his legal representatives.

In the result, the revisional application is dismissed. Rule discharged with costs.

SUBBA RAO J. These two appeals are directed against the judgment and decree of the High Court of Judicature at Bombay modifying those of the Civil Judge, Senior Division, Thana, in a reference arising out of land acquisition proceedings.

*Decided, October 5, 1964. Civil Appeals 1 [1964] S.C.R. 558.
Nos. 775 and 776 of 1962.

On May 28, 1948, the Government of Bombay issued a notification under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, notifying that certain lands belonging to the appellant, along with lands belonging to others, were likely to be needed for the Government Housing Scheme, a public purpose. Notifications under s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act were issued on July 14, 1949, August 1, 1949, and August 11, 1949. On December 31, 1949, possession of the lands so notified was taken under s. 17 of the Land Acquisition Act. The Land Acquisition Officer classified the said lands into six groups based upon certain criteria. Some of the lands of the appellant fell in group Nos. 4 and 5, and his khajan lands fell in group No. 6. He valued the khajan lands at Rs. 500 per acre, i.e., at anna 1 pies $7\frac{1}{2}$ per sq. yard, and the lands in group No. 4 at Rs. 1-6-0 per sq. yard, and those in group No. 5 at Rs. 1-4-0 per sq. yard. Though the appellant claimed before the Land Acquisition Officer Rs. 44,02,858-8-0 as compensation for the land and Rs. 10,696-14-0 as loss of assessment, the said Officer awarded a total amount of Rs. 1,31,096-4-0 as compensation. The appellant filed an application under s. 18 of the Land Acquisition Act for a reference to the District Court questioning the correctness of the compensation awarded to him by the Land Acquisition Officer. His reference was numbered as Reference No. 55 of 1953. The learned Civil Judge, Senior Division, Thana, heard that reference along with others made at the instance of different claimants and gave his award on November 30, 1953. The learned Civil Judge increased the compensation in respect of the khajan lands from 1 anna and $7\frac{1}{2}$ pies per sq. yard to annas 8 per sq. yard, and in respect of lands in groups 4 and 5 he increased the compensation by annas 2 per sq. yard: in the result, he awarded compensation in the sum of Rs. 2,97,676-15-0 instead of Rs. 1,31,096-4-0 awarded by the Land Acquisition Officer. The point to be noticed is that the learned Civil Judge valued the lands as on January 1, 1948, though the notification under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act was issued on May 28, 1948, as under the provisions of the Land Acquisition (Bombay Amendment) Act, 1948 (Bombay Act IV of 1948), hereinafter called the Amending Act, the former date was the crucial date for awarding compensation. He further did not award the additional 15 per cent. of the market value of the lands as solatium for compulsory acquisition, as under the Amending Act, unlike under the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, no solatium was provided for. Both the appellant and the respondent preferred appeals to the High Court against the said award, the appeal filed by the appellant being First Appeal No. 611 of 1954 and that filed by the respondent being First Appeal No. 318 of 1954. The High Court heard the said appeals along with the appeals filed by other claimants and delivered a common judgment on March 26, 1958. The High Court held that though the Act was hit by art. 14 of the Constitution, it was saved by art. 31-A thereof and that under s. 229 of the Government of India Act, 1935, which governed the statute, the compensation for compulsory acquisition did not necessarily mean equivalent in value to the owner of what he had been deprived and, therefore, the Amending Act was valid. In the result, it allowed the appeal filed by the respondent by restoring the award of the Land Acquisition Officer in respect of the khajan lands and dismissed the appeal filed by the appellant. Hence the appeals.

We have heard the arguments of Mr. Bhat for the appellant, Mr. Palkhivala for the interveners, the Attorney-General for the respondents and the counsel representing the Advocates-General of some of the States to whom notices were issued by the Court.

Mr. Bhat, appearing for the appellant, raised before us the following points: (1) The Amending Act, being a pre-Constitution Act, was governed by s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, and as it did not provide for payment of compensation for property acquired in the sense the said expression was interpreted by this Court, the said Act was void. (2) The Act infringed art. 14 of the Constitution. And (3) it was not saved under art. 31-A of the Constitution, as, though the land acquired was an "estate" within the meaning of the said provision, the acquisition had no concern with agrarian reforms or even with the regulation of village economy as laid down by the decisions of this Court.

Learned Attorney-General appearing for the respondent contended that the said Act was covered by art. 31-A of the Constitution and, therefore, its validity could not be questioned on the ground that it contravened either art. 14 or art. 31 of the Constitution. Assuming that his contention was wrong, he proceeded to argue that the Amending Act was saved by art. 31 (5)(a) of the Constitution and, therefore, the question of the adequacy of the compensation could not be questioned in Court. He further sought to ward off the attack based on art. 14 of the Constitution on the foot of the doctrine of classification.

The first question is whether the Amending Act was void on the ground that it did not comply with the provisions of s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935. To appreciate the contentions of the parties it would be convenient to notice at the outset the provisions of the Amending Act. The impugned Act was passed for the purpose of acquiring lands for Housing Schemes. It is a short Act consisting of 3 sections. It extends to the whole of the State of Bombay. At the time of enactment its life was fixed at 5 years, but later on extended to 10 years, and by Bombay Act XXIV of 1958 it was extended further to 20 years. Under the Amending Act, "housing scheme" is defined to mean "any housing scheme which the Government may from time to time undertake for the purpose of increasing accommodation for housing persons and shall include any such scheme undertaken from time to time with the previous sanction of the State Government by a local authority or company."

Section 3 makes some changes in the Land Acquisition Act. The expression "public purpose" in s. 3(f) of the Land Acquisition Act includes a housing scheme as defined in the Amending Act. By s. 3(1)(c) of the Act in first clause of sub-section (1) of s. 23 of the Land Acquisition Act, after the words, brackets and figures "section 4, sub-section (1)" the words "or at the relevant date, whichever is less" have been inserted. "Relevant date" is defined to mean January 1, 1948; and sub-s. (2) of s. 23 has been omitted. The result is that under the Amending Act if a land is acquired for a housing scheme, the person whose land is acquired will not be entitled to the market value of the land at the date of the publication of the notification but only to the market value of the land at the date of the said notification or on January 1, 1948, whichever is less and he will not be entitled to a sum of 15 per cent. on the market value as solatium in consideration of the compulsory nature of the acquisition. In short, the Amending Act provides for acquiring lands for housing schemes on the payment of compensation which is likely to be less than that payable if the land is acquired under the Land Acquisition Act.

The Amending Act, being a pre-Constitution Act, was governed by s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935. Sub-section (2) of s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, read as follows:

"Neither the Dominion Legislature nor a Provincial Legislature shall have power to make any law authorising the compulsory acquisition for public purposes of any land, or any commercial or industrial undertaking, or any interest in, or in any company owning, any commercial or industrial undertaking, unless the law provides for the payment of compensation for the property acquired and either fixes the amount of the compensation, or specifies the principles on which, and the manner in which, it is to be determined."

Under this sub-section the power to make any law by an appropriate Legislature was subject to the conditions laid down therein. The power thereunder could not be exercised unless the conditions were complied with. They were fetters on the legislative power. Section 299 of the Government of India Act in express terms said that the appropriate Legislature had no power to make any law authorising the compulsory acquisition for public purposes of any land etc. unless the law provided for the payment of compensation for the property acquired. If "compensation" was not so provided, it affected the competency of the appropriate Legislature to make the said law. If it did not have power, the law so made was a nullity. It is as if it did not exist on the statute book.

The question is whether the Act provides for compensation within the meaning of s. 299(2) of the Government of India Act, 1935. This Court had the occasion to construe the meaning of that expression in art. 31(2) of the Constitution before it was amended by the Constitution (Fourth Amendment) Act, 1955. Under cl. (2) of art. 31, no property shall be taken possession of or acquired for a public purpose unless the law provides for compensation for the property taken possession of or acquired and either fixes the amount of compensation or specifies the principles on which and the manner in which the compensation is to be determined and given. Both under s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, and art. 31(2) of the Constitution, fixation of the amount of compensation or specification of the principles on which and the manner in which it is to be determined are necessary conditions for a valid acquisition. Indeed, the relevant parts of the said two provisions are pari materia with each other. The scope of the said conditions fell to be considered in *The State of West Bengal v. Bela Banerjee*¹. That case was dealing with the West Bengal Land Development and Planning Act, 1948, which was passed primarily for the settlement of immigrants who had migrated into West Bengal due to communal disturbances in East Bengal, and which provided for the acquisition and development of land for public purposes including the said purpose. Under that Act it was provided that the amount of compensation paid thereunder should not exceed the market value of the land on December 31, 1946; that is to say, even if the notification under s. 4 or under s. 6 of the Land Acquisition Act was issued long after the said date, the market value of the land acquired could only be the market value of the said land on the said date. After reading the relevant articles of the Constitution, this Court proceeded to state:

"...While it is true that the legislature is given the discretionary power of laying down the principles which should govern the determination of the amount to be given to the owner for the property appropriated, such principles must ensure that what is determined as payable must be compensation, that is, a just equivalent of what the owner has been deprived of. Within the limits of this basic requirement of full indemnification of the expropriated owner, the Constitution allows free play to the legislative judgment as to what principles should guide the determination of the amount payable. Whether such principles take into account all the elements which make up the true value of the property appropriated and exclude matters which are to be neglected, is a justiciable issue to be adjudicated by the court."

Applying the said principles to the facts of the case before it, this Court held thus:

"...Considering that the impugned Act is a permanent enactment and lands may be acquired under it many years after it came into force, the fixing of the market value on December 31, 1946, as the ceiling on compensation, without reference to the value of the land at the time of the acquisition is arbitrary and cannot be regarded as due compliance in letter and spirit with the requirement of article 31(2). The fixing of an anterior date for the ascertainment of value may not, in certain circumstances, be a violation of the constitutional requirement as, for instance, when the proposed scheme of acquisition becomes known before it is launched and prices rise sharply in anticipation of the benefits to be derived under it, but the fixing of an anterior date which might have no relation to the value of the land when it is acquired, may be, many years later, cannot but be regarded as arbitrary."

This decision lays down the following principles: (1) The expression "compensation" in art. 31(2) of the Constitution means "just equivalent" of what the owner has been deprived of; (2) the principles laid down by the Legislature shall be only for the determination of the compensation so defined; (3) whether the principles have taken into account the relevant elements to ascertain the true value of the property acquired is a justiciable issue; and (4) the fixation of an anterior date for the ascertainment of the value of the property acquired without reference to any relevant circumstances which necessitated the fixing of an earlier date for the purpose of ascertaining the real value is arbitrary. In our view, the principles laid down in this judgment directly govern the situation arising under s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935. In the context of the payment of compensation and prescribing of principles for ascertaining the amount of compensation, we cannot discover any relevant distinction between the two provisions so as to compel us to give a meaning to the expression "compensation" under s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, different from that given to that expression in art. 31(2) of the Constitution by this Court. The High Court refused to rely upon the said decision in construing s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, for the following reasons†:

"...But the context in which art. 31 of the Constitution occurs is entirely different from the context in which s. 299 of the Government of India Act occurred. Even if the two provisions have been made with the same object, the Court cannot ignore the circumstance that under s. 299 of the Government of India Act there was a restriction imposed upon the sovereign right of the Legislature to enact legislation in matters of compulsory acquisition of land and that provision had to be strictly construed, whereas art. 31 of the Constitution, which has undergone various changes during the last eight years, is, in form and substance, a declaration of a right to property in favour of all persons and of the incidents of that right."

We do not see how the said distinction between the two provisions would make any difference in the matter of construing the meaning of similar words and expressions used in both the provisions. It must also be remembered that the wording in the last part of s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, was bodily lifted and introduced in art. 31(2) of the Constitution and, therefore, it is reasonable to assume that at any rate when the Constitution was originally framed the intention was not to give a different meaning to the said wording. If the intention of the Constitution-makers was to give a different meaning, they would have used appropriate words like "price", "consideration", etc. to indicate that they were departing from the framework of s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935. We cannot, therefore, share the opinion of the High Court that the expression "compensation" in s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, should be given a meaning more restricted than that given by this Court to the said expression in art. 31(2) of the Constitution. Both must bear the same meaning. If so, the expression "compensation" in s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, means a "just equivalent" of what the owner has been deprived of. Learned Attorney-General contends that the said decision has relevance only to a permanent enactment and that, as the Amending Act, when enacted, was only for 5 years, the said decision is not applicable. It is true that this Court was considering an enactment which was permanent in character; but that only represented the factual position and this Court did not base its decision on that circumstance. On principle, in the context of ascertainment of compensation there cannot be any justification for drawing a line solely based on the distinction between a permanent Act and a temporary one. Suppose a temporary law passed for 15 years in the year 1948 prescribed that the compensation in respect of the land acquired thereunder should be ascertained on the basis of its market value in the year 1930. Can it be said that the circumstance that the Act was temporary would make the compensation fixed any the less arbitrary? It is true that an earlier date may be fixed for ascertaining the value of the property acquired if it falls within the process of acquisition or for any other relevant reason. But these are all special circumstances which are not present in the instant case. That apart, the Amending Act though initially was only for 5 years, the life of the Act was being extended from time to time and the latest extension was for 20 years and it may have a further lease of life. In effect and substance the Amending Act has turned out to be as good as a permanent one.

The Amending Act in the matter of fixing compensation demonstrably contravened the provisions of s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935. Under the Amending Act, as we have already noticed, though a land may be acquired subsequent to the said Act, the compensation payable in respect thereof will be the value of it as on January 1, 1948. Under the Amending Act the said dating back has no relevance to the matter of fixing the compensation for the land. It is not a "just equivalent" of what the owner has been deprived of, for the value of the land on that date may be far less than that obtaining on the date of the notification under s. 4 of the Land Acquisition Act. We, therefore, hold that the Amending Act was void as the Legislature made it in contravention of the express provisions of s. 299 of the Government of India Act. It was a still-born law.

The attempt to save the Amending Act under art. 31(5)(a) of the Constitution, in our view, cannot also succeed. The material part of art. 31(5)(a) reads:

"Nothing in clause (2) shall affect—

(a). the provisions of any existing law other than a law to which the provisions of clause (6) apply".

Clause (6) of art. 31 reads:

"Any law of the State enacted not more than eighteen months before the commencement of this Constitution may within three months from such commencement be submitted to the President for his certification; and thereupon, if the President by public notification so certifies, it shall not be called in question in any court on the ground that it contravenes the provisions of clause (2) of this article or has contravened the provisions of sub-section (2) of section 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935."

A combined reading of these two provisions discloses that cl. (2) of art. 31 of the Constitution shall not affect any existing law except a law of a State enacted not more than 18 months before the commencement of the Constitution unless such law was submitted within three months from such commencement to the President for his certification and the President certified it in the manner prescribed therein. The Amending Act does not fall under the exception. So, the only question is whether the Act was an existing law at the commencement of the Constitution. Learned Attorney-General contends that the expression "existing law" does not mean valid law and that if a law was factually made before the Constitution, it would be an existing law under the Constitution notwithstanding that it infringed cl. (2) of art. 31 of the Constitution. Before cl. (5) of art. 31 can be invoked there must be an existing law. "Existing law" under art. 366(10) means "any law, Ordinance, order, bye-law, rule or regulation passed or made before the commencement of this Constitution by any Legislature, authority or person having power to make such a law, Ordinance, order, bye-law, rule or regulation." To have the status of an existing law, the law should have been made by a Legislature having power to make such law. We have held that the Amending Act was still-born and it was void at the inception. Therefore, it was not an "existing law" within the meaning of art. 31(5) of the Constitution. Further, a comparison of the provisions of cls. (5) and (6) shows that in the latter the non-compliance of the provisions of s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, was expressly saved, if the conditions laid down therein were satisfied, while in the former no such express protection was given and, therefore, no resuscitation of a dead law was possible thereunder.

This argument was repelled by a Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court in *H. P. Khandewal v. State of U. P.*²; by the Bombay High Court in *Assistant Collector, Thana v. Jannadas Gokuldas*³ and by the Calcutta High Court in *State of W. B. v. Bon Behari*⁴. For the reasons aforesaid we hold that art. 31(5) of the Constitution also does not save the amending Act.

Nor can we hold that art. 31-A of the Constitution saves the Act. The argument of the learned Attorney-General is that s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, declared a fundamental right of a citizen, that it was bodily lifted and introduced by the Constitution in art. 31(2) thereof and that if art. 31-A saved an attack against the Amending Act on the ground that it infringed art. 31(2) thereof, it would equally save the attack based on the infringement of s. 299(2) of the Government of India Act, 1935. The argument is far-fetched. Article 31-A says that no law providing for the acquisition by the State of any estate or of any rights therein or the extinguishment or modification of any such rights shall be deemed to be void on the ground that it is inconsistent with, or takes away or abridges any of the rights conferred by art. 14, art. 19 or art. 31. If a particular statute attracts art. 31-A(1) (a), it cannot be invalidated on the ground that it does not comply with the provisions of art. 31(2) of the Constitution, namely, that the Act has not fixed the amount of compensation. But art. 31-A cannot have any bearing in the context of an Act which had no legal existence at the time the Constitution came into force. It does not purport to revive laws which were void at the time they were made. The analogy drawn between a fundamental right under art. 31(2) and the conditions laid down in s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935, if it has any justification, is irrelevant in the context of a pre-Constitution void law. In this view, art. 31-A does not come into the picture at all. The learned Attorney-General relied upon two decisions of this Court, namely, *Dhirubha Devisingh Gohil v. The State of Bombay*⁵ and *The State of U. P. v. H. H. Maharaja Brijendra Singh*⁶. In the first case the validity of the Bombay Taluqdari Tenure Abolition Act, 1949 (Bombay Act LXII of 1949) was impugned on the ground that it took away or abridged the fundamental rights conferred by the Constitution. The said Act was passed in the year 1949. It received the assent of the Governor-General on January 18, 1950, and was gazetted on January 24, 1950. It was contended that, as the conditions laid down in cl. (6) of art. 31 of the Constitution were not complied with, the Act was void inasmuch as it was made in violation of the provisions of s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935. But as the Act was one of the Acts specified in the Ninth Schedule to the Constitution, being item 4 thereof, this Court held that on the language used in art. 31-B of the Constitution the validity of the Act could not be questioned on the ground of infringement of s. 299 of the Government of India Act, 1935. In that context, this Court observed:

"This is clearly a case where the concerned right which was secured under section 299 of the Government of India Act in the form of a fetter on the competency of the Legislature and which in substance was a fundamental right, was lifted into the formal category of a fundamental right along with other fundamental rights recognised in the present Constitution. There is therefore nothing inappropriate in referring to this right which was pre-existing, along with the other fundamental rights for the first time secured by this Constitution, when grouping them together, as fundamental rights 'conferred' by the Constitution. What is important to notice in the phraseology of article 31-B is that the protection is not merely against the contravention of certain provisions but an attack on the ground of unconstitutional abridgement of certain rights. It will be illogical to construe article 31-B as affording protection only so far as these rights are taken away by an Act in violation of the provisions of the new Constitution but not when they are taken away by an Act in violation of section 299 of the Government of India Act which has been repealed. The intention of the Constitution to protect each and every one of the Acts specified in the Ninth Schedule from any challenge on the ground of violation of any of the fundamental rights secured under Part III of the Constitution, irrespective of whether they are pre-existing or new rights, is placed beyond any doubt or question by the very emphatic language of article 31-B which declares that none of the provisions of the specified Acts shall be deemed to be void or ever to have become void on the ground of the alleged violation of the rights indicated and 'notwithstanding any judgment, decree or order of any court or tribunal.'

This judgment was followed by this Court in the second decision cited above. The said decisions turned upon the express provisions of art. 31-B of the Constitution. Though the observations therein appear to be wide, they have no bearing on the question whether the Act was void before the Constitution came into force. The question whether a particular Act was void before the Constitution came into force would not arise if the Constitution itself included the said Act in the Ninth Schedule and declared that the said Act should not be deemed to be void or even to have become void. It was possible to construe the expression "any rights conferred by any provisions of this Part" so as to include similar pre-existing rights under the Government of India Act, 1935, but such a construction would be quite out of place in the context of the question whether the Legislature had the legislative competency to make the law before the Constitution came into force. The learned Attorney-General contended that art. 31-A and art. 31-B should be read together and that if so read art. 31-B would only illustrate cases that would otherwise fall under art. 31-A and, therefore, the same construction as put upon art. 31-B should also apply to art. 31-A of the Constitution. This construction was sought to be based upon the opening words of art. 31-B, namely "without prejudice to the generality of the provisions contained in article 31-A". We find it difficult to accept this argument. The words, "without prejudice to the generality of the provisions", indicate that the Acts and regulations specified in the Ninth Schedule would have the immunity even if they did not attract art. 31-A of the Constitution. If every Act in the Ninth Schedule would be covered by art. 31-A, this article would become redundant. Indeed, some of the Acts mentioned therein, namely, items 14 to 20 and many other Acts added to the Ninth Schedule, do not appear to relate to estates as defined in art. 31-A(2) of the Constitution. We, therefore, hold that art. 31-B is not governed by art. 31-A and that art. 31-B is a constitutional device to place the specified statutes beyond any attack on the ground that they infringe Part III of the Constitution. We, therefore, hold that, as the Amending Act was void from its inception, art. 31-A could not save it.

As we have held that the Amending Act is void, it is not necessary to express our opinion on the question whether it infringes the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution.

We, therefore, hold that the Amending Act was void at its inception and that the lands acquired should be valued in accordance with the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act, 1894. In the result, the decree of the High Court is set aside and the appeals are remanded to the District Court with the direction that it should dispose them of in accordance with law. The respondents will pay to the appellants the costs of this Court and costs of the High Court. The costs of the District Court will abide the result.

THE STATE OF MAHARASHTRA v. MAYER HANS GEORGE.*

Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (VII of 1947), Secs. 8(1), 24(1), 23(1-A)—Defence of India Rules 1962. Rule 141—Mens rea whether an essential ingredient in respect of offence under s. 23(1-A)—Publication of rules of statute, what constitutes—Whether necessary for Indian law to be published outside country to operate in Indian territory—"Cargo", term used in Reserve Bank notification of November 8, 1962, connotation of.

Under s. 8(1) read with s. 24(1) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, there is no scope for the invocation of the rule (of mens rea) that besides the mere act of voluntarily bringing gold into India any further mental condition is postulated as necessary to constitute an offence of the contravention referred to in s. 23(1-A) of the Act.

Lim Chin Aik v. The Queen,¹ explained and distinguished.

The Queen v. Tolson,² Bruhn v. Rex,³ *Regina v. St. Margarets Trust Ltd.*⁴ and The Indo-China Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Jasjit Singh, Addl. Collector of Customs, Calcutta,⁵ referred to.

The very concept of "bringing" or "sending" would exclude an involuntary bringing or an involuntary sending. Thus, if without the knowledge of a person a packet of gold is slipped into his pocket it is possible to accept the contention that such a person did not "bring" the gold into India within the meaning of s. 8(1) of the Act. Similar considerations would apply to a case where the aircraft on a through flight which did not include any landing in India has to make a forced landing in India—owing say to engine trouble.

Where there is a statutory requirement as to the mode or form of publication and they are such that, in the circumstances, the Court holds to be mandatory, a failure to comply with those requirements might result in there being no effective order the contravention of which could be the subject of prosecution but where there is no statutory requirement the rule is that it is necessary that it should be published in the usual form i.e., by publication within the country in such media as is generally adopted to notify to all the persons concerned the making of the rules.

In most of the Indian statutes, including the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, there is provision for the rules made being published in the Official Gazette. Therefore, publication in the Gazette of India is the ordinary mode of bringing a rule or subordinate legislation to the notice of the persons concerned.

For an Indian law to operate and be effective in the territory where it operates viz., the territory of India, it is not necessary that it should either be published or be made known outside the country.

Lim Chin Aik v. The Queen,⁶ distinguished

*Johnson v. Sargent & Sons*⁷ and Imperator v. Leslie Gwilt,⁸ referred to.

The knowledge of the existence or content of a law by an individual will not always be relevant, save on the question of the sentence to be imposed for its violation.

The term "cargo" occurring in the notification of the Reserve Bank of India published on November 8, 1962, is used as contra-distinguished from personal luggage in the law relating to the carriage of goods, the latter meaning as whatever a passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience, either with reference to his immediate necessities or for his personal needs at the end of his journey.

Per Subba Rao J. It is a well settled principle of common law that mens rea is an essential ingredient of a criminal offence. A statute can exclude that element, but it is a sound rule of construction adopted in England and also accepted in India to construe a statutory provision creating an offence in conformity with the common law rather than against it unless the statute expressly or by necessary implication excluded mens rea. There is a presumption that mens rea is an essential ingredient of a statutory offence; but this may be rebutted by the express words of a statute creating the offence or by necessary implication. But the mere fact that the object of a statute is to promote welfare activities or to eradicate grave social evils is in itself not decisive of the question whether the element of guilty mind is excluded from the ingredients of the offence. It is also necessary to enquire whether a statute by putting a person under strict liability help him to assist the State in the enforcement of the law; can he do anything to promote the observance of the law? A person who does not know that gold cannot be brought into India without a licence or is not bringing into India any gold at all cannot possibly do anything to promote the observance of the law. Mens rea by necessary implication can be excluded from a statute only where it is absolutely clear that the implementation of the object of a statute would otherwise be defeated and its exclusion enables those put under strict liability by their act or omission to assist the promotion of the law. The nature of mens rea that will be implied in a statute creating an offence depends upon the object of the Act and the provisions thereof.

THE facts are stated in 66 Bombay Law Reporter p. 262.

ORDER.

By majority, the appeal is allowed and the conviction of the respondent is restored: but the sentence imposed on him is reduced to the period already undergone. The respondent shall forthwith be released and the bail bond, if any, cancelled. Reasons will be given in due course.

AYYANGAR J. (J. R. Mudholkar J., concurring; Subba Rao J., dissenting). This appeal by special leave is directed against the judgment and order of the High Court of Bombay setting aside the conviction of the respondent under s. 8(I) of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act (VII of 1947), 1947 hereinafter called the "Act" read with a notification of the Reserve Bank of India dated November 8, 1962, and directing his acquittal. The appeal was heard by us at the end of April last and on May 8, which was the last working day of the Court before it adjourned for the summer vacation, the Court pronounced the following order:

"By majority, the appeal is allowed and the conviction of the respondent is restored; but the sentence imposed on him is reduced to the period already undergone. The respondent shall forthwith be released and the bail bond, if any, cancelled. Reasons will be given in due course."

We now proceed to state our reasons. The material facts of the case are not in controversy. The respondent who is a German national by birth is stated to be a sailor by profession. In the statement that he made to the Customs authorities, when he was apprehended the respondent stated that some person not named by him met him in Hamburg and engaged him on certain terms of remuneration, to clandestinely transport gold from Geneva to places in the Far East. His first assignment was stated by him to be to fly to Tokyo wearing a jacket which concealed in its specially designed pockets 34 bars of gold each weighing a kilo. He claimed he had accomplished this assignment and that he handed over the gold he carried to the person who contacted him at Tokyo. From there he returned to Geneva where he was paid his agreed remuneration. He made other trips subsequently being engaged in like adventures in all of which he stated he had succeeded, each time carrying 34 kilos of gold bars which on every occasion was carried concealed in a jacket which he wore, but we are now concerned with the one which he undertook at the instance of this international gang of gold smugglers carrying, similarly, 34 kilo bars of gold concealed in a jacket which he wore on his person. This trip started at Zurich on November 27, 1962, and according to the respondent his destination was Manila where he was to deliver the gold to a contact there. The plane arrived in Bombay on the morning of the 28th. The Customs authorities who had evidently advance information of gold being attempted to be smuggled by the respondent travelling by that plane, first examined the manifest of the aircraft to see if any gold had been consigned by any passenger. Not finding any entry there, after ascertaining that the respondent had not come out of the plane as usual to the airport lounge, entered the plane and found him there seated. They then asked him if he had any gold with him. The answer of the respondent was "what gold" with a shrug indicating that he did not have any. The Customs Inspector thereupon felt the respondent's back and shoulders and found that he had some metal blocks on his person. He was then asked to come out of the plane and his baggage and person were searched. On removing the jacket he wore it was found to have 28 specially made compartments 9 of which were empty and from the remaining 19, 34 bars of gold each weighing approximately one kilo were recovered. The respondent, when questioned, disclaimed ownership of the gold and stated that he had no interest in these goods and gave the story of his several trips which we have narrated earlier. It was common ground that the gold which the respondent carried was not entered in the manifest of the aircraft or other documents carried by it.

The respondent was thereafter prosecuted and charged with having committed an offence under s. 8(I) of the Act and also of certain provisions of the Sea Customs Act, in the Court of the Presidency Magistrate, Bombay. The Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, took the complaint on file. The facts stated earlier were not in dispute but the point raised by the respondent before the Magistrate was one of law based on his having been ignorant of the law prohibiting the carrying of the gold in the manner that he did. In other words, the plea was that mens rea was an ingredient of the offence with which he was charged and, as it was not disputed by the prosecution that he was not actually aware of the notification of the Reserve Bank of India which rendered the carriage of gold in the manner that he did an offence, he could not be held guilty. The learned Magistrate rejected this defence and convicted the respondent and sentenced him to imprisonment for one year. On appeal by the respondent the learned Judges of the High Court have allowed the appeal and acquitted the respondent upholding the legal defence which he raised. It is the correctness of this conclusion that calls for consideration in this appeal.

Before considering the arguments advanced by either side before us it would be necessary to set out the legal provisions on the basis of which this appeal has to be decided. The Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947, was enacted in order to conserve foreign exchange, the conservation of which is of the utmost essentiality for the economic survival and advance of every country, and very much more so in the case of a developing country like India. Section 8 of the Act enacts the restrictions on the import and export inter alia of bullion. This section enacts, to read only that portion which relates to the import with which this appeal is concerned:

"8. (1) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, order that, subject to such exemptions, if any, as may be contained in the notification, no person shall, except with the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank and on payment of the fee, if any, prescribed, bring or send into India any gold or silver or any currency notes or bank notes or coin whether Indian or foreign.

Explanation.—The bringing or sending into any port or place in India, of any such article as aforesaid intended to be taken out of India without being removed from the ship or conveyance in which it is being carried shall nonetheless be deemed to be a bringing or as the case may be, sending into India of that article for the purpose of this section."

Section 8 has to be read in conjunction with s. 23 which imposes penalties on persons contravening the provisions of the Act. Sub-section (1) penalises the contravention of the provisions of certain named sections of the Act which do not include s. 8, and this is followed by sub-s. (1-A) which is residuary and is directly relevant in the present context and it reads:

"23. (1-A) Whoever contravenes—

(a) any of the provisions of this Act or of any rule, direction or order made thereunder, other than those referred to in sub-section (1) of this section and section 19 shall, upon conviction by a Court, be punishable with imprisonment for a term which may extend to two years, or with fine, or with both;

(b) any direction or order made under section 19 shall, upon conviction by a Court, be punishable with fine which may extend to two thousand rupees."

These have to be read in conjunction with the rule as to onus of proof laid down in s. 24(1) which enacts:

"24. (1) Where any person is prosecuted or proceeded against for contravening any provisions of this Act or of any rule, direction or order made thereunder which prohibits him from doing an act without permission, the burden of proving that he had the requisite permission shall be on him."

Very soon after the enactment of the Act the Central Government took action under s. 8(1), and by a notification published in the Official Gazette dated August 25, 1948, the Central Government directed that "except with the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank no person shall bring or send into India from any place out of India any gold bullion", to refer only to the item relevant in the present context. The Reserve Bank by a notification of even date (August 25, 1948) granted a general permission in these terms:

"The Reserve Bank of India is hereby pleased to give general permission to the bringing or sending of any gold or any such silver by sea or air into any port in India:

Provided that the gold or silver

(a) is on through transit to a place which is outside both

(i) the territory of India,

(ii) the Portuguese territories which are adjacent to or surrounded by the territory of India, and

(b) is not removed from the carrying ship or aircraft except for the purpose of transhipment".

On November 8, 1962, however, the Reserve Bank of India in supersession of the notification just now read, published a notification (and this is the one which was in force at the date relevant to this case) giving general permission to the bringing or sending of gold, gold-coin etc.

"into any port or place in India when such article is, on through transit to a place which is outside the territory of India:

Provided that such article is not removed from the ship or conveyance in which it is being carried except for the purpose of transhipment:

Provided further that it is declared in the manifest for transit as same bottom cargo or transhipment cargo".

This notification was published in the Gazette of India on November 24, 1962.

It was not disputed by Mr. Sorabjee—learned counsel for the respondent, subject to an argument based on the construction of the newly added second proviso to which we shall refer later, that if the second notification of the Reserve Bank restricting the range of the exemption applied to the respondent, he was clearly guilty of an offence under s. 8(1) of the Act read with the Explanation to the sub-section. On the other hand, it was not also disputed by the learned Solicitor-General for the appellant-State that if the exemption notification which applied to the present case was that contained in the notification of the Reserve Bank dated August 25, 1948, the respondent had not committed any offence since (a) he was a through passenger from Geneva to Manila as shown by the ticket which he had and the manifest of the aircraft, and besides, (b) he had not even got down from the plane.

Two principal questions have been raised by Mr. Sorabjee in support of the proposition that the notification dated November 8, 1962, restricting the scope of the permission or exemption granted by the Reserve Bank did not apply to the case. The first was that mens rea was an essential ingredient of an offence under s. 23(I-A) of the Act and that the prosecution had not established that the respondent knowingly contravened the law in relation to the carriage of the contraband article; (2) The second head of learned counsel's argument was that the notification dated November 8, 1962, being merely subordinate or delegated legislation, could be deemed to be in force not from the date of its issue or publication in the Gazette but only when it was brought to the notice of persons who would be affected by it and that as the same was published in the Gazette of India only on November 24, 1962 whereas the respondent left Zurich on November 27 he could not possibly have had any knowledge there of new restrictions imposed by the Indian authorities and that, in these circumstances, the respondent could not be held guilty of an offence under s. 8(I) or s. 23(I-A) of the Act. He also raised a subsidiary point that the notification of the Reserve Bank could not be attracted to the present case because the second proviso which made provision for a declaration in the manifest "for transit as bottom cargo or transshipment cargo" could only apply to gold handed over to the aircraft for being carried as cargo and was inapplicable to cases where the gold was carried on the person of a passenger.

We shall deal with these points in that order. First as to whether mens rea is an essential ingredient in respect of an offence under s. 23(I-A) of the Act. The argument under this head was broadly as follows: It is a principle of the Common law that mens rea is an essential element in the commission of any criminal offence against the Common law. This presumption that mens rea is an essential ingredient of an offence equally applies to an offence created by statute though the presumption is liable to be displaced by the words of the statute creating the offence, or by the subject-matter dealt with by it (Wright, J. in Sherras v. De Rutzen).¹ But unless the statute clearly or by fair implication rules out mens rea, a man should not be convicted unless he has a guilty mind. In other words, absolute liability is not to be presumed, but ought to be established. For the purpose of finding out if the presumption is displaced, reference has to be made to the language of the enactment, the object and subject-matter of the statute and the nature and character of the act sought to be punished. In this connection learned counsel for the respondent strongly relied on a decision of the Judicial Committee in Srinivas Mall Bairoliya v. King-Emperor.² The Board was, there, dealing with the correctness of a conviction under the Defence of India Rules, 1939, relating to the control of prices. The appellant before the Board was a dealer in wholesale who had employed a servant to whom he had entrusted the duty of allotting salt to retail dealers and noting on the buyer's licence the quantity which the latter had bought and received all of which were required to be done under the rules. For the contravention by the servant of the Regulations for the sale of salt prescribed by the Defence of India Rules the appellant was prosecuted and convicted as being vicariously liable for the act of his servant in having made illegal exactions contrary to the Rules. The High Court took the view that even if the appellant had not been proved to have known the unlawful acts of his servant, he would still be liable on the ground that "where there is an absolute prohibition and no question of mens rea arises, the master is criminally liable for the acts of his servant". On appeal to the Privy Council Lord Du Pareq who delivered the judgment of the Board dissented from this view of the High Court and stated (p. 468):

"...They see no ground for saying that offences against those of the Defence of India Rules here in question are within the limited and exceptional class of offences which can be held to be committed without a guilty mind. See the judgment of Wright,

1 [1895] 1 Q.B. 918.

J. in Sherras v. De Rutzen. Offences which are within that class are usually of a comparatively minor character, and it would be a surprising result of this delegated legislation if a person who was morally innocent of blame could be held vicariously liable for a servant's crime and so punishable 'with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years'."

The learned Lord then quoted with approval the view expressed by the Lord Chief Justice in Brend v. Wood:³

"It is... of the utmost importance for the protection of the liberty of the subject that a court should always bear in mind that, unless the statute, either clearly or by necessary implication rules out mens rea as a constituent part of a crime, a defendant should not be found guilty of an offence against the criminal law unless he has got a guilty mind".

Mr. Sorabjee is justified in referring us to these rules regarding presumption and construction and it may be pointed out that this Court has, in *Ravula Hariprasada Rao v. The State*⁴ approved of this passage in the judgment of Lord Du Pareq and the principle of construction underlying it. We, therefore, agree that absolute liability is not to be lightly presumed but has to be clearly established. Besides, learned counsel for the respondent strongly urged that on this point the exposition by Lord Evershed in Lim Chin Aik v. The Queen,⁵ had clarified the principles applicable in this branch of the law, and that in the light of the criteria there laid down we should hold that on a proper construction of the relevant provisions of the Act, mens rea or a guilty mind must be held to be an essential ingredient of the offence and that as it was conceded by the prosecution in the present case that the respondent was not aware of the notification by the Reserve Bank of India dated November 8, he could not be held guilty of the offence. We might incidentally state that that decision was also relied on in connection with the second of the submissions made to us as regards the time when delegated legislation could be deemed to come into operation, but to that aspect we shall advert later.

In order to appreciate the scope and effect of the decision and of the observations and reasoning to which we shall presently advert it is necessary to explain in some detail the facts involved in it. Section 6(2) of the Immigration Ordinance, 1952, of the State of Singapore enacted:

"6(2). It shall not be lawful for any person other than a citizen of Singapore to enter the colony from the Federation... if such person has been prohibited by order made under section 9 of this Ordinance from entering the colony."

By sub-s. (3) it was provided that:

"Any person who contravenes the provisions of sub-section (2) of this section shall be guilty of an offence against this ordinance."

Section 9 which is referred to in s. 6(2) reads, to quote the material words of sub-section (1):

"The minister may by order... (1) prohibit either for a stated period or permanently the entry or re-entry into the colony of any person or class of persons."

Its sub-s. (3) provided:

"Every order made under sub-section (1) of this section shall unless it be otherwise provided in such order take effect and come into operation on the date on which it was made."

While provision was made by the succeeding portion of the sub-section for the publication in the Gazette of orders which related to a class of persons, there was no provision in the sub-section for the publication of an order in relation to named individuals or otherwise for bringing it to the attention of such persons. The appellant before the Privy Council had been charged with and convicted by the Courts in Singapore of contravening s. 6(2) of the Ordinance by remaining in Singapore when by an order made by the Minister under s. 9(1)

he had been, by name, prohibited from entering the island. At the trial there was no evidence from which it could be inferred that the order had in fact come to the notice or attention of the accused. On the other hand, the facts disclosed that he could not have known of the order. On appeal by the accused, the conviction was set aside by the Privy Council. The judgment of the Judicial Committee in so far as it was in favour of the appellant, was based on two lines of reasoning. The first was that in order to constitute a contravention of s. 6(2) of the Ordinance mens rea was essential. The second was that even if the order of the Minister under s. 9 were regarded as an exercise of legislative power, the maxim 'ignorance of law is no excuse' could not apply because there was not, in Singapore, any provision for the publication, in any form, of an order of the kind made in the case or any other provision to enable a man, by appropriate enquiry, to find out what the law was.

Lord Evershed who delivered the judgment of the Board referred with approval to the formulation of the principle as regards mens rea to be found in the judgment of Wright, J. in Sherras v. De Rutzen, already referred to. His Lordship also accepted as correct the enunciation of the rule in Srinivas Mall Bairolhya v. King-Emperor (supra) in the passage we have extracted earlier. Referring next to the argument that where the statute was one for the regulation for the public welfare of a particular activity it had frequently been inferred that strict liability was the object sought to be enforced by the Legislature, it was pointed out (p. 174):

"...The presumption is that the statute or statutory instrument can be effectively enforced only if those in charge of the relevant activities are made responsible for seeing that they are complied with. When such a presumption is to be inferred, it displaces the ordinary presumption of mens rea."

Reference was then made to legislation regulating sale of food and drink and he then proceeded to state (p. 174):

"...it is not enough... merely to label the statute as one dealing with a grave social evil and from that to infer that strict liability was intended. It is pertinent also to inquire whether putting the defendant under strict liability will assist in the enforcement of the regulations. That means that there must be something he can do, directly or indirectly, by supervision or inspection, by improvement of his business methods or by exhorting those whom he may be expected to influence or control, which will promote the observance of the regulations. Unless this is so, there is no reason in penalising him, and it cannot be inferred that the legislature imposed strict liability merely in order to find a luckless victim."

As learned counsel has laid great stress on the above passages, it is necessary to analyse in some detail the provisions in the Singapore Ordinance in relation to which this approach was made and compare them with the case on hand. Let us first consider the frame of s. 6(2) of the Singapore Ordinance the relevant portion of which we have set out earlier. It prohibits the entry of non-citizens into the colony from the Federation, only in the event of that entry being banned by a general or particular order made by the Minister under s. 9. In other words, in the absence of an order made under s. 9, there was freedom of entry or rather absence of any legal prohibition against entry of persons from the Federation. In the light of this situation, the construction adopted was that persons who normally could lawfully enter the colony, had to be proved to have a guilty mind i.e., actual or constructive knowledge of the existence of the prohibition against their entry before they could be held to have violated the terms of s. 6(2). It is in this context that the reference to "the luckless victim" has to be understood. The position under ss. 8 and 23 of the Act is, if we say so, just the reverse. Apart from the public policy and other matters underlying the legislation before us to which we shall advert later, s. 8(1) of the Act empowers the Central Government to impose a complete ban on the bringing of any gold into India, the act of "bringing" being understood in the sense indicated in the Explanation. When such a ban is imposed, the import or the bringing of gold into India could be effected only subject to the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank. Added to this, and this is of some significance, there is the provision in s. 24(1) of the Act which throws on the accused in a prosecution the burden of proving that he had the requisite permission, emphasising as it were that in the absence of a factual and existent permission to which he can refer, his act would be a violation of the law. In pursuance of the provision in s. 8(1), Central Government published a notification on August 25, 1948, in which the terms of s. 8(1) regarding the necessity of permission of the Reserve Bank to bring gold into India were repeated. On the issue of this notification the position was that everyone who "brought" gold into India, in the sense of the Explanation to s. 8(1), was guilty of an offence, unless he was able to rely for his act on permission granted by the Reserve Bank. We, therefore start with this: The bringing of gold into India is unlawful unless permitted by the Reserve Bank,—unlike as under the Singapore Ordinance, where an entry was not unlawful unless it was prohibited by an order made by the Minister. In the circumstances, therefore, mens rea, which was held to be an essential ingredient of the offence of a contravention of a Minister's order under the Ordinance, cannot obviously be deduced in the context of the reverse position obtaining under the Act.

There was one further circumstance to which it is necessary to advert to appreciate the setting in which the question arose before the Privy Council. The charge against the appellant was that having entered Singapore on or about May 17, 1959, he remained there while prohibited by an order of the Minister under s. 9 and thereby contravened s. 6(2) of the Immigration Ordinance. At the trial it was proved that the order of the Minister was made on May 28, 1959, i.e., over 10 days after the appellant had entered the colony. It was proved that the Minister's order which prohibited the appellant, who was named in it, from entering Singapore was received by the Deputy Assistant Controller of Immigration on the day on which it was made and it was retained by that Official with himself. The question of the materiality of the knowledge of the accused of the order prohibiting him from entering the colony came up for consideration in such a context. The further question as to when the order would, in law, become effective, relates to the second of the submissions made to us by the respondent and will be considered later.

Reverting now to the question whether mens rea—in the sense of actual knowledge that the act done by the accused was contrary to the law—is requisite in respect of a contravention of s. 8(1), starting with an initial prescription in favour of the need for mens rea, we have to ascertain whether the presumption is overborne by the language of the enactment, read in the light of the objects and purposes of the Act, and particularly whether the enforcement of the law and the attainment of its purpose would not be rendered futile in the event of such an ingredient being considered necessary.

We shall, therefore, first address ourselves to the language of the relevant provisions. Section 23 (1-A) of the Act which has already been set out merely refers to contravention of the provisions of the Act or the rule etc. So that it might be termed neutral in the present context, in that it neither refers to the state of the mind of the contravener by the use of the expression such as 'wilfully, knowingly' etc., nor does it, in terms, create an absolute liability. Where the statute does not contain the word 'knowingly', the first thing to do is to examine the statute to see whether the ordinary presumption that mens rea is required applies or not. When one turns to the main provision whose contravention is the subject of the penalty imposed by s. 23(1-A) viz., s. 8(1) in the present context, one reaches the conclusion that there is no scope for the invocation of the rule mens rea. It lays an absolute embargo upon persons who without the special or general permission of the Reserve Bank and after satisfying the conditions, if any, prescribed by the Bank bring or send into India any gold etc., the absoluteness being emphasised, as we have already pointed out, by the terms of s. 24(1) of the Act. No doubt, the very concept of “bringing” or “sending” would exclude an involuntary bringing or an involuntary sending. Thus, for instance, if without the knowledge of the person a packet of gold was slipped into his pocket it is possible to accept the contention that such a person did not “bring” the gold into India within the meaning of s. 8(1). Similar considerations would apply to a case where the aircraft on a through flight which did not include any landing in India has to make a forced landing in India—owing say to engine trouble. But if the bringing into India was a conscious act and was done with the intention of bringing it into India the mere “bringing” constitutes the offence and there is no other ingredient that is necessary in order to constitute a contravention of s. 8(1) than that conscious physical act of bringing. If then under s. 8(1) the conscious physical act of “bringing” constitutes the offence, s. 23(1-A) does not import any further condition for the imposition of liability than what is provided for in s. 8(1). On the language, therefore, of s. 8(1) read with s. 24(1) we are clearly of the opinion that there is no scope for the invocation of the rule that besides the mere act of voluntarily bringing gold into India any further mental condition is postulated as necessary to constitute an offence of the contravention referred to in s. 23(1-A).

Next we have to have regard to the subject-matter of the legislation. For, as pointed out by Wills, J. in *The Queen v. Tolson*⁶:

“Although prima facie and as a general rule there must be a mind at fault before there can be a crime, it is not an inflexible rule, and a statute may relate to such a subject-matter and may be so framed as to make an act criminal whether there has been any intention to break the law or otherwise to do wrong or not”.

The Act is designed to safeguarding and conserving foreign exchange which is essential to the economic life of a developing country. The provisions have, therefore, to be stringent and so framed as to prevent unauthorised and unregulated transactions which might upset the scheme underlying the controls; and in a larger context, the penal provisions are aimed at eliminating smuggling which is a concomitant of controls over the free movement of goods or currencies. In this connection we consider it useful to refer to two decisions—the first a decision of the Privy Council and the other of the Court of Criminal Appeal. The decision of the Privy Council is that reported as *Bruden v. Rex*⁷ where the plea of mens rea was raised as a defence to a prosecution for importation of opium in contravention of the Straits Settlements Opium Ordinance, 1960. Lord Atkinson speaking for the Board, referring to the plea as to mens rea, observed (p. 324):

“The other point relied upon on behalf of the appellant was that there should be proof, express or implied, of a mens rea in the accused person before he could be convicted of a criminal offence. But that depends upon the terms of the statute or Ordinance creating the offence. In many cases connected with the revenue certain things are prohibited unless done by certain persons, or under certain conditions. Unless the person who does one of these things can establish that he is one of the privileged class, or that the prescribed conditions have been fulfilled, he will be adjudged guilty of the offence, though in fact he knew nothing of the prohibition.”

The criteria for the construction of statutes of the type we have before us laid down by the Court of Criminal Appeal in *Regina v. St. Margarets Trust Ltd.*⁸ is perhaps even nearer to the point. The offence with which the appellants were there charged was a violation of the Hire Purchase and Credit Sale Agreements (Control) Order, 1956 which, having been enacted to effectuate a credit-squeeze, as being necessary for the maintenance of British-economy, required by the rules made under it that every Hire Purchase agreement should state the price of the article and fix the maximum proportion thereof which a hirer might be paid by a Financing Company. The appellant-company advanced to the hirer of a motor-car more than the permissible percentage but did so as it was misled by the company which sold the motor-car as regards the price it charged to the customer. The plea raised in defence was that the Finance Company were unaware of the true price and that not having guilty knowledge, they could not be convicted of the offence. Donovan, J. who spoke for the Court said (p. 526):

"The language of article 1 of the Order expressly prohibits what was done by St. Margarets Trust Ltd., and if that company is to be held to have committed no offence some judicial modification of the actual terms of the article is essential. The appellants contend that the article should be construed so as not to apply where the prohibited act was done innocently. In other words, that mens rea should be regarded as essential to the commission of the offence. The appellants rely on the presumption that mens rea is essential for the commission of any statutory offence unless the language of the statute, expressly or by necessary implication, negatives such presumption."

The learned Judge then referred to the various decisions in which the question as to when the Court would hold the liability to be absolute was discussed and proceeded (p. 527):

"The words of the Order themselves are an express and unqualified prohibition of the acts done in this case by St. Margarets Trust Ltd. The object of the Order was to help to defend the currency against the peril of inflation which, if unchecked, would bring disaster upon the country. There is no need to elaborate this. The present generation has witnessed the collapse of the currency in other countries and the consequent chaos, misery and widespread ruin. It would not be at all surprising if Parliament, determined to prevent similar calamities here, enacted measures which it intended to be absolute prohibition of acts which might increase the risk in however small a degree. Indeed, that would be the natural expectation. There would be little point in enacting that no one should breach the defences against a flood, and at the same time excusing anyone who did it innocently. For these reasons we think that article 1 of the Order should receive a literal construction, and that the ruling of Diplock J. was correct.

It is true that Parliament has prescribed imprisonment as one of the punishments that may be inflicted for a breach of the Order, and this circumstance is urged in support of the appellants' argument that Parliament intended to punish only the guilty. We think it is the better view that, having regard to the gravity of the issues, Parliament intended the prohibition to be absolute, leaving the court to use its powers to inflict nominal punishment or none at all in appropriate cases."

We consider these observations apposite to the construction of the provision of the Act now before us.

This question as to when the presumption as to the necessity for mens rea is overborne has received elaborate consideration at the hands of this Court when the question of the construction of s. 52-A of the Sea Customs Act came up for consideration in The Indo-China Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Jasjit Singh, Addl. Collector of Customs, Calcutta.⁹ Speaking for the Court, Gajendragadkar, C.J. said:

"The intention of the legislature in providing for the prohibition prescribed by s. 52A is, inter alia, to put an end to illegal smuggling which has the effect of disturbing very rudely the national economy of the country. It is well-known, for example, that smuggling of gold has become a serious problem in this country and operations of smuggling are conducted by operators [sic] who work on an international basis. The persons who actually carry out the physical part of smuggling gold by one means or another are generally no more than agents and presumably, behind them stands a well-knit organisation which, for motives of profit making, undertakes this activity."

This passage, in our opinion, is very apt in the present context and the offences created by ss. 8 and 23(1)(A) of the Act.

In our opinion, the very object and purpose of the Act and its effectiveness as an instrument for the prevention of smuggling would be entirely frustrated if a condition were to be read into s. 8(1) of s. 23(1)(A) of the Act qualifying the plain words of the enactment, that the accused should be proved to have knowledge that he was contravening the law before he could be held to have contravened the provision.

Summarising the position, the result would be this. If the Central Government, by notification in the Official Gazette, imposed a ban on any person bringing gold into India any person who brought such gold in contravention of the notification would be guilty of an offence under this section. This brings us to the notification of the Central Government dated August 25, 1948, whose terms we have set out. By reason of that notification the bringing of gold into India was made an offence. In this connection it is necessary to bear in mind the Explanation to s. 8(1) which we have already set out. By reason of that Explanation it would be seen that even if the gold continued to remain in a ship or aircraft which is within India without its being taken out and was not removed from the ship or aircraft it shall nevertheless be deemed to be a 'bringing' for the purpose of the section. We are referring to this Explanation because if the act of the respondent was an offence under the section—s. 8(1), he gets no advantage by his having remained on the aircraft without disembarking at Bombay, for if the carrying on his person of the gold was "the bringing" of the gold into India, the fact that he did not remove himself from the aircraft but stayed on in it would make no difference and he would nevertheless be guilty of the offence by reason of the Explanation to s. 8(1). We would only add that the learned counsel for the respondent did not dispute this. The position, therefore, was that immediately the Central Government published the notification on August 25, 1948, the bringing of gold into India in the sense covered by the Explanation would have brought it within s. 8(1) of the Act. So much is common ground. But by reason of a notification by the Reserve Bank of even date gold in through-transit from places outside India to places similarly situated which were not removed from the aircraft except for the purpose of transshipment was exempted from the operation of the notification of the Central Government issued under s. 8(1). If this notification had continued in force and had governed the right of persons to transport gold through India the respondent could not be guilty of a contravention of s. 8(1). The respondent would then have had the permission which saved his act of "bringing" from being an offence. However, as stated earlier, on November 8, 1962, the Reserve Bank of India modified the earlier notification and added an additional condition for exemption viz., that the gold must be declared in the manifest of the aircraft as same bottom cargo or transshipment cargo. Therefore when the respondent was in Bombay with the gold, he had not the requisite permission of the Reserve Bank and so he contravened the prohibition under s. 8(1).

The next submission of Mr. Sorabjee was that even assuming that mens rea, which in the present context was equated with knowledge of the existence and contents of the notification of the Reserve Bank dated November 8, 1962, was not necessary to be established to prove a contravention of s. 8(1)(a) of the Act, the notification of the Reserve Bank dated November 8, 1962 could not be deemed to have been in force and operation on November 28, 1962 when the respondent was alleged to have committed the offence of "bringing" gold into India. Accepting the general rule that ignorance of law is no excuse for its contravention and the maxim that everyone is presumed to know the law, learned counsel submitted an elaborate argument as regards the precise point of time when a piece of delegated legislation like the exemption notification by the Reserve Bank would in law take effect. There is no provision in the General Clauses Act as regards the time when subordinate legislation enacted under powers conferred by Acts of the Central Legislature shall come into effect. There is no provision either in the particular Act with which we are concerned determining the point of time at which orders made, or permission granted by virtue of powers conferred by the parent statute would come into operation. In the absence of a statutory provision such as is found in s. 5(1) of the General Clauses Act, learned counsel submitted that such orders or notifications could have effect only from the date on which the person against whom it is sought to be enforced had knowledge of their making. In support of this position he relied strongly on the decision of the Privy Council already referred to—Lim Chin Aik v. The Queen.

We have dealt with that decision in regard to the point about mens rea, and have also pointed out that one of the grounds on which the appeal was allowed was that there had been no publication of the order of the Minister, banning the entry of the appellant, so as to render the appellant's act a contravention of s. 6(2) of the Singapore Ordinance. We have adverted to the circumstance that the order of the Minister there in question was communicated only to the officer in the Immigration department from whose custody it was produced at the trial. In that situation Lord Evershed observed (p. 171):

"...It was said on the respondent's part that the order made by the Minister under the powers conferred by section 9 of the Ordinance was an instance of the exercise of delegated legislation and therefore that the order, once made, became part of the law of Singapore of which ignorance could provide an excuse upon a charge of contravention of the section. Their Lordships are unable to accept this contention. In their Lordships' opinion, even if the making of the order by the Minister be regarded as an exercise of the legislative as distinct from the executive or administrative function (as they do not concede), the maxim cannot apply to such a case as the present where it appears that there is in the State of Singapore no provision, corresponding, for example, to that contained in section 3(2) of the English Statutory Instruments Act of 1946, for the publication in any form of an order of the kind made in the present case or any other provision designed to enable a man by appropriate inquiry to find out what 'the law' is. In this connection it is to be observed that a distinction is drawn in the Ordinance itself between an order directed to a particular individual on the one hand and an order directed to a class of persons on the other; for sub-section (3)(b) of section 9 provides in the latter case both for publication in the Gazette and presentation to the Legislative Assembly."

Based on this passage, it was urged that the notification of the Reserve Bank dated November 8, 1962, could not be deemed to be in force, at least not on November 28, 1962, when the respondent landed in Bombay and that consequently he could not be held guilty of the contravention of s. 8(1). This argument cannot, in our opinion, be accepted. In the first place, the order of the Minister dealt with by the Privy Council was never "published" since admittedly it was transmitted only to the Immigration official who kept it with himself. But in the case on hand, the notification by the Reserve Bank varying the scope of the exemption, was admittedly "published" in the Official Gazette—the usual mode of publication in India, and it was so published long before the respondent landed in Bombay. The question, therefore, is not whether it was published or not, for in truth it was published, but whether it is necessary that the publication should be proved to have been brought to the knowledge of the accused. In the second place, it was the contravention of the order of the Minister that was made criminal by s. 6(2) of the Immigration Ordinance. That is not the position here, because the contravention contemplated by s. 23(1-A) of the Act is, in the present context, of an order of the Central Government issued under s. 8(1) of the Act and published in the Official Gazette on November 25, 1948, and this order was in force during all this period. No doubt, for the period upto November 8, the bringing of gold by through passengers would not be a contravention because of the permission of the Reserve Bank exempting such bringing from the operation of the Central Government's notification. It was really the withdrawal of this exemption by the Reserve Bank that rendered the act of the respondent criminal. It might well be that there is a distinction between the withdrawal of an exemption which saves an act otherwise criminal from being one and the passing of an order whose contravention constitutes the crime. Lastly, the order made by the Minister in the Singapore case, was one with respect to a single individual, not a general order, whereas what we have before us is a general rule applicable to every person who passes through India. In the first case, it would be reasonable to expect that the proper method of acquainting a person with an order which he is directed to obey is to serve it on him, or so publish it that he would certainly know of it, but there would be no question of individual service of a general notification on every member of the public, and all that the subordinate law making body can or need do, would be to publish it in such a manner that persons can, if they are interested, acquaint themselves with its contents. In this connection reference may be made to Rule 141 of the Defence of India Rules, 1962, which runs:

"141. Publication, affixation and defacement of notices.—(1) Save as otherwise expressly provided in these Rules, every authority, officer or person who makes any order in writing in pursuance of any of these Rules shall, in the case of an order of a general nature or affecting a class of persons publish notice of such order in such manner as may, in the opinion of such authority, officer or person be best adapted for informing persons whom the order concerns in the case of an order affecting an individual corporation or firm serve or cause the order to be served in the manner for the service of a summons in rule 2 of Order XXIX or rule 3 of Order XXX, as the case may be, in the First Schedule to the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908 (V of 1908) and in the case of an order affecting an individual person (not being a corporation or firm) serve or cause the order to be served on that person:—

(i) personally, by delivering or tendering to him the order, or

(ii) by post, or

(iii) where the person cannot be found, by leaving, an authentic copy of the order with some adult male member of his family or by affixing such copy to some conspicuous part of the premises in which he is known to have last resided or carried on business or personally worked for gain and thereupon the persons, corporation, firm or person concerned shall be deemed to have been duly informed of the order."

and this which is substantially the same as Rule 119 of the Defence of India Rules, 1939 brings out clearly the distinction between orders which are intended to apply to named individuals and orders of a general nature.

Reliance was also placed by Mr. Sorabjee on the judgment of Bailhache, J. in *Johnson v. Sargant & Sons*¹⁰ where speaking of an order of the Food Controller dated May 16 said to have been contravened on the same day, the learned Judge said (p. 103):

"...I have no reason to suppose that any one in the trade knew about it on May 16... While I agree that the rule is that a statute takes effect on the earliest moment of the day on which it is passed or on which it is declared to come into operation, there is about statutes a publicity even before they come into operation which is absent in the case of many orders such as that with which we are now dealing; indeed, if certain Orders are to be effective at all, it is essential that they should not be known until they are actually published. In the absence of authority upon the point I am unable to hold that this Order came into operation before it was known, and, as I have said, it was not known until the morning of May 17."

Referring to this case Prof. C. K. Allen says:^{10a}

"On the face of it, it would seem reasonable that legislation of any kind should not be binding until it has somehow been 'made known' to the public; but that is not the rule of law, and if it were, the automatic cogency of a statute which has received the royal assent would be seriously and most inconveniently impaired. In a solitary case, however, before the passing of the Act of 1946 (The Statutory Instruments Act) Johnson v. Sargant, Bailhache, J. held that an Order did not take effect until it became known. The reasoning was that statutes at least received the publicity of Parliamentary debate, and that therefore they were, or should be, known, but that this was not true of delegated legislation, which did not necessarily receive any publicity in Parliament or in any other way.

This was a bold example of judgment-made law. There was no precedent for it, and indeed a decision, Jones v. Robson^{10b} which, though not on all fours, militated strongly against the judge's conclusion, was not cited; nor did the judge attempt to define how and when delegated legislation became known. Both arguments and judgment are very brief. The decision has always been regarded as very doubtful, but it never came under review by a higher court."

We see great force in the learned author's comment on the reasoning in Sargant's case. Taking the present case, the question would immediately arise, is it to be made known in India or throughout the world, for the argument on behalf of the respondent was that when the respondent left Geneva on November 27, he was not aware of the change in the content of the exemption granted by the Reserve Bank. In a sense the knowledge of the existence or content of a law by an individual would not always be relevant, save on the question of the sentence to be imposed for its violation. It is obvious that for an Indian law to operate and be effective in the territory where it operates viz., the territory of India it is not necessary that it should either be published or be made known outside the country. Even if, therefore, the view enunciated by Bailhache, J. is taken to be correct, it would be apparent that the test to find out effective publication would be publication in India, not outside India so as to bring it to the notice of everyone who intends to pass through India. It was "published" and made known in India by publication in the Gazette on November 24 and the ignorance of it by the respondent who is a foreigner is, in our opinion, wholly irrelevant. It is, no doubt, admitted on behalf of the prosecution in the present case that the respondent did not have actual notice of the notification of the Reserve Bank dated November 8, 1962 but, for the reasons stated, it makes, in our opinion, no difference to his liability to be proceeded against for the contravention of s. 8(1) of the Act.

Learned counsel for the respondent also referred us to the decision of the Bombay High Court in *Imperator v. Leslie Gwilt*¹¹ where the question of the proper construction and effect of rule 119 of the Defence of India Rules, 1937, came up for consideration. The learned Judges held that there had not been a proper publication or notification of an order, as required by r. 119 and that in consequence the accused could not be prosecuted for a violation of that order. Other decisions of a like nature dealing with the failure to comply with the requirements of r. 119 of the Defence of India Rules or the Essential Supplies Act, or the Essential Commodities Act, were also brought to our notice but we consider that they do not assist us in the present appeal. Where there is a statutory requirement as to the mode or form of publication and they are such that, in the circumstances, the Court holds to be mandatory, a failure to comply with those requirements might result in there being no effective order the contravention of which could be the subject of prosecution but where there is no statutory requirement we conceive the rule to be that it is necessary that it should be published in the usual form i.e., by publication within the country in such media as is generally adopted to notify to all the persons concerned the making of rules. In most of the Indian statutes, including the Act now under consideration, there is provision for the rules made being published in the Official Gazette. It, therefore, stands to reason that publication in the Official Gazette viz., the Gazette of India is the ordinary method of bringing a rule or subordinate legislation to the notice of the persons concerned. As we have stated earlier, the notification by the Reserve Bank was published in the Gazette of India on November 24, 1962, and hence even adopting the view of Bailhache, J. the notification must be deemed to have been published and brought to the notice of the concerned individuals on November 25, 1962. The argument, therefore, that the notification dated November 8, 1962, was not effective, because it was not properly published in the sense of having been brought to the actual notice of the respondent must be rejected.

Before parting from this topic we would desire to make an observation. There is undoubtedly a certain amount of uncertainty in the law except in cases where specific provision in that behalf is made in individual statutes as to (a) when subordinate legislation could be said to have been passed, and (b) when it comes into effect. The position in England has been clarified by the Statutory Instruments Act of 1946, though there is a slight ambiguity in the language employed in it, which has given rise to disputed questions of construction as regards certain expressions used in the Act. We consider that it would be conducive to clarity as well as to the avoidance of unnecessary technical objections giving occasion for litigation if an enactment on the lines of the U.K. Statutory Instruments Act, 1946 were made in India either by an amendment of the General Clauses Act or by independent legislation keeping in mind the difficulties of construction to which the U.K. enactment has given rise. As we have pointed out, so far as the present case is concerned, even on the narrowest view of the law the notification of the Reserve Bank must be deemed to have been published in the sense of having been brought to the notice of the relevant public at least by November 25, 1962, and hence the plea by the respondent that he was ignorant of the law cannot afford him any defence in his prosecution.

The last of the points urged by learned counsel for the respondent was as regards the construction of the new second proviso which had been introduced by the notification of the Reserve Bank dated November 8, 1962. The argument was that the gold that the respondent carried was his personal luggage and not "cargo"—either "bottom cargo" or "transshipment cargo"—and that, therefore, could not, and need not have been entered in the manifest of the aircraft and hence the second proviso could not be attracted to the case. The entire submission on this part of the case was rested on the meaning of the word 'cargo', the point sought to be made being that what a passenger carried with himself or on his person could not be 'cargo', and that cargo was that which was handed over to the carrier for carriage. Reliance was, in this connection placed on the definition of the term 'cargo' in dictionaries where it is said to mean "the merchandise or wares contained or conveyed in a ship". We find ourselves unable to accept this argument. To say that the second proviso refers only to what is handed over to the ship or aircraft for carriage would make the provision practically futile and unmeaning. If all the goods or article retained by a passenger in his own custody or carried by him on his person were outside the 2nd proviso, and the provision were attracted only to cases where the article was handed over to the custody of the carrier, it would have no value at all as a condition of exemption. The goods entrusted to a carrier would be entered in the manifest and if they are not, it must be owing to the fault of the carrier, and it could hardly be that the passenger was being penalised for the default of the carrier. If the carriage of the goods on the person or in the custody of the passenger were exempt, there would be no scope at all for the operation of the second proviso. We, therefore, consider that the proper construction of the term 'cargo' when it occurs in the notification of the Reserve Bank is that it is used as contra-distinguished from personal luggage in the law relating to the carriage of goods. The latter has been defined as whatever a passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience, either with reference to his immediate necessities or for his personal needs at the end of his journey. Obviously, the gold of the quantity and in the form in which it was carried by the respondent would certainly not be "personal luggage" in the sense in which "luggage" is understood, as explained earlier. It was really a case of merchandise not for the use of the passenger either during the journey or thereafter and therefore could not be called personal luggage or baggage. It was, therefore, "cargo" which had to be manifested and its value must have been inserted in the air consignment note. In this connection, reference may usefully be made to certain of the International Air Traffic Association's General Conditions of Carriage not as directly governing the contract between the respondent and the aircraft but as elucidating the general practice of transport by air in the light of which the second proviso has to be understood. Part A entitled "Carriage of Passengers and Baggage" by its Art. 8, para. 1(c) excludes goods which are merchandise from the obligation of carriers to transport as luggage or as baggage, while Art. 3 of Part B dealing with carriage of goods provides that gold is accepted for carriage only if securely packed and its value inserted in the consignment note under the heading "Quantity and nature of goods".

Some point was made of the fact that if the second proviso were applied to the case of gold or articles made of gold carried on the person, a tie-pin or a fountain-pen which had a gold nib carried by a through passenger might attract the prohibition of s. 8(1) read with the exemption by the Reserve Bank as it now stands and that the Indian law would be unnecessarily harsh and unreasonable. We do not consider this correct, for a clear and sharp distinction exists between what is personal baggage and what is not and it is the latter that is 'cargo' and has to be entered in the manifest. If a person chooses to carry on his person what is not personal baggage or luggage as understood in the legal sense but what should properly be declared and entered in the manifest of the aircraft there can be no complaint of the unreasonableness of the Indian law on the topic.

The result, therefore, is that we consider that the learned Judges of the High Court erred in acquitting the respondent. The appeal has, therefore, to be allowed and the conviction of the respondent restored.

Now, coming to the question of sentence to be passed on the appellant, it is undoubtedly the settled rule of this Court that it would not interfere with the sentence passed by the courts below unless there is any illegality in it or the same involves any question of principle. The facts of the case before us have, however, presented some unusual features which had led us to technically interfere with the sentence of one year's imprisonment passed by the Chief Presidency Magistrate. The respondent was sentenced by the Presidency Magistrate on April 24, 1963, and thereupon he started serving the sentence till the judgment of the High Court which was rendered on December 10, 1963. The respondent was released the next day i.e., December 11, 1963. This court granted special leave on December 20, 1963 and thereafter on application made by the appellant-State, this Court directed the arrest of the respondent. The respondent was accordingly arrested and though the Magistrate directed his release on bail pending the disposal of the appeal in this Court, the respondent was unable to furnish the bail required and hence suffered imprisonment, though it would be noticed that such imprisonment was not in pursuance of the conviction and sentence passed on him by the Magistrate. Such imprisonment continued till May 8, 1964, when the decision of this Court was pronounced, so that virtually the respondent had suffered the imprisonment that had been inflicted on him by the order of the Presidency Magistrate. In these circumstances, we directed that though the appeal was allowed, the sentence would be reduced to the period already undergone which was only a technical interference with the sentence passed by the Presidency Magistrate, though in substance it was not.

SUBBA RAO J. I regret my inability to agree. This appeal raises the question of the scope of the ban imposed by the Central Government and the Central Board of Revenue in exercise of the powers conferred on them under s. 8 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947 (VII of 1947), hereinafter called the Act, against persons transporting prohibited articles through India.

In exercise of the powers conferred under s. 8 of the Act the Government of India issued on August 25, 1948, a notification that gold and gold articles, among others, should not be brought into India or sent to India except with the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank of India. On the same date the Reserve Bank of India issued a notification giving a general permission for bringing or sending any such gold provided it was on through transit to a place outside India. On November 24, 1962, the Reserve Bank of India published a notification dated November 8, 1962, in supersession of its earlier notification placing further restrictions on the transit of such gold to a place outside the territory of India, one of them being that such gold should be declared in the "Manifest" for transit in the "same bottom cargo" or "transshipment cargo". The respondent left Zurich by a Swiss air plane on November 27, 1962, which touched Santa Cruz Air Port at 6.05 a.m. on the next day. The Customs Officers, on the basis of previous information, searched for the respondent and found him sitting in the plane. On a search of the person of the respondent it was found that he had put on a jacket containing 28 compartments and in 19 of them he was carrying gold slabs weighing approximately 34 kilos. It was also found that the respondent was a passenger bound for Manila. The other facts are not necessary for this appeal. Till November 24, 1962, there was a general permission for a person to bring or send gold into India, if it was on through transit to a place outside the territory of India; but from that date it could not be so done except on the condition that it was declared in the "Manifest" for transit as "same bottom cargo" or "transshipment cargo". When the respondent boarded the Swiss plane at Zurich on November 27, 1962, he could not have had knowledge of the fact that the said condition had been imposed on the general permission given by the earlier notification. The gold was carried on the person of the respondent and he was only sitting in the plane after it touched the Santa Cruz Airport. The respondent was prosecuted for importing gold into India under s. 8(1) of the Act, read with s. 23(1-A) thereof, and under s. 167(8)(i) of the Sea Customs Act. The learned Presidency Magistrate found the accused "guilty" on the two counts and sentenced him to rigorous imprisonment for one year. On appeal the High Court of Bombay held that the second proviso to the relevant notification issued by the Central Government did not apply to a person carrying gold with him on his body, that even if it applied, the mens rea being a necessary ingredient of the offence, the respondent, who brought gold into India for transit to Manila, did not know that during the crucial period such a condition had been imposed and, therefore, he did not commit any offence. On those findings, it held that the respondent was not guilty under any of the aforesaid sections. In the result the conviction made by the Presidency Magistrate was set aside. This appeal has been preferred by special leave against the said order of the High Court.

Learned Solicitor General, appearing for the State of Maharashtra, contends that the Act was enacted to prevent smuggling of gold in the interests of the economic stability of the country and, therefore, in construing the relevant provisions of such an Act there is no scope for applying the presumption of common law that mens rea is a necessary ingredient of the offence. The object of the statute and the mandatory terms of the relevant provisions, the argument proceeds, rebut any such presumption and indicate that mens rea is not a necessary ingredient of the offence. He further contends that on a reasonable construction of the second proviso of the notification dated November 8, 1962, issued by the Board of Revenue, it should be held that the general permission for bringing gold into India is subject to the condition laid down in the second proviso and that, as in the present case the gold was not disclosed in the Manifest, the respondent contravened the terms thereof and was, therefore, liable to be convicted under the aforesaid sections of the Foreign Exchange Act. No argument was advanced before us under s. 168(8)(i) of the Sea Customs Act and, therefore, nothing need be said about that section.

Learned counsel for the respondent sought to sustain the acquittal of his client practically on the grounds which found favour with the High Court. I shall consider in detail his argument at the appropriate places of the judgment.

The first question turns upon the relevant provisions of the Act and the notifications issued thereunder. At the outset it would be convenient to read relevant parts of the said provisions and the notifications, for the answer to the question raised depends upon them.

Section 8. (1) The Central Government may, by notification in the Official Gazette, order that subject to such exemptions, if any, as may be contained in the notification, no person shall, except with the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank and on payment of the fee, if any, prescribed bring or send into India any gold...

Explanation.—The bringing or sending into any port or place in India of any such article as aforesaid intended to be taken out of India without being removed from the ship or conveyance in which it is being carried shall nonetheless be deemed to be bringing, or as the case may be, sending into India of that article for the purposes of this section.

In exercise of the power conferred by the said section on the Central Government, it had issued the following notification dated August 25, 1948 (as amended upto July 31, 1958) :

"In exercise of the powers conferred by sub-section (1) of section 8 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, 1947 (VII of 1947) and in supersession of the Notification of the Government of India... the Central Government is pleased to direct that, except with the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank no person shall bring or send into India from any place out of India:—

(a) any gold coin, gold bullion, gold sheets or gold ingot, whether refined or not;..." The Reserve Bank of India issued a notification dated August 25, 1948, giving a general permission in the following terms:

"...the Reserve Bank of India is hereby pleased to give general permission to the bringing or sending of any such gold or silver by sea or air into any port in India provided that the gold or silver (a) is on through transit to a place which is outside both (i) the territory of India and (ii) the Portuguese Territories which are adjacent to or surrounded by the territory of India and (b) is not removed from the carrying ship or aircraft, except for the purpose of transshipment."

On November 8, 1962, in supersession of the said notification the Reserve Bank of India issued the following notification which was published in the official Gazette on November 24, 1962:

"...the Reserve Bank of India gives general permission to the bringing or sending of any of the following articles, namely,

(a) any gold coin, gold bullion, gold sheets or gold ingot, whether refined or not,... into any port or place in India when such article is on through transit to a place which is outside the territory of India. Provided that such article is not removed from the ship or conveyance in which it is being carried except for the purpose of transshipment;

Provided further that it is declared in the manifest for transit as same bottom cargo or transshipment cargo."

The combined effect of the terms of the section and the notifications may be stated thus: No gold can be brought in or sent to India though it is on through transit to a place which is outside India except with the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank of India. Till November 24, 1962, under the general permission given by the Reserve Bank of India such gold could be brought in or sent to India if it was not removed from the ship or aircraft except for the purpose of transshipment. But from that date another condition was imposed thereon, namely, that such gold shall be declared in the manifest for transit as "same bottom cargo" or "transshipment cargo."

Pausing here, it will be useful to notice the meaning of some of the technical words used in the second proviso to the notification. The object of maintaining a transit manifest for cargo, as explained by the High Court, is twofold, namely, "to keep a record of goods delivered into the custody of the carrier for safe carriage and to enable the Customs Authorities to check and verify the dutiable goods which arrive by a particular flight." "Cargo" is a shipload or the lading of a ship. No statutory or accepted definition of the word "cargo" has been placed before us. While the appellant contends that all the goods carried in a ship or plane is cargo, the respondent's counsel argues that nothing is cargo unless it is included in the manifest. But what should be included and what need not be included in the manifest is not made clear. It is said that the expressions "same bottom cargo" and "transit cargo" throw some light on the meaning of the word "cargo". Article 606 of the Chapter on "Shipping and Navigation" in Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd ed., Vol. 35, at p. 426, brings out the distinction between the two types of cargo. If the cargo is to be carried to its destination by the same conveyance throughout the voyage or journey it is described as "same bottom cargo." On the other hand, if the cargo is to be transhipped from one conveyance to another during the course of transit, it is called "transshipment cargo." This distinction also does not throw any light on the meaning of the word "cargo". If the expression "cargo" takes in all the goods carried in the plane, whether it is carried under the personal care of the passenger or entrusted to the care of the officer in charge of the cargo, both the categories of cargo can squarely fall under the said two heads. Does the word "manifest" throw any light? Inspector Darias Bejan Bhappu says in his evidence that manifest for transit discloses only such goods as are unaccompanied baggage but on the same flight and that "accompanied baggage is never manifested as Cargo Manifest". In the absence of any material or evidence to the contrary, this statement must be accepted as a correct representation of the actual practice obtaining in such matters. But that practice does not prevent the imposition of a statutory obligation to include accompanied baggage also as an item in the manifest if a passenger seeks to take advantage of the general permission given thereunder. I cannot see any inherent impossibility implicit in the expression "cargo" compelling me to exclude an accompanied baggage from the said expression.

Now let me look at the second proviso of the notification dated November 8, 1962. Under s. 8 of the Act there is ban against bringing or sending into India gold. The notification lifts the ban to some extent. It says that a person can bring into any port or place in India gold when the same is on through transit to a place which is outside the territory of India, provided that it is declared in the manifest for transit as "same bottom cargo or transshipment cargo." It is, therefore, not an absolute permission but one conditioned by the said proviso. If the permission is sought to be availed of, the condition should be complied with. It is a condition precedent for availing of the permission.

Learned counsel for the respondent contends that the said construction of the proviso would preclude a person from carrying small articles of gold on his person if such article could not be declared in the manifest for transit as "same bottom cargo or transshipment cargo" and that could not have been the intention of the Board of Revenue. On that basis, the argument proceeds, the second proviso should be made to apply only to such cargo to which the said proviso applied and the general permission to bring gold into India would apply to all other gold not covered by the second proviso. This argument, if accepted, would enable a passenger to circumvent the proviso by carrying gold on his body by diverse methods. The present case illustrates how such a construction can defeat the purpose of the Act itself. I cannot accept such a construction unless the terms of the notification compel me to do so. I do not see any such compulsion. The alternative construction for which the appellant contends no doubt prevents a passenger from carrying with him small articles of gold. The learned Solicitor General relies upon certain rules permitting a passenger to bring into India on his person small articles of gold, but ex facie those rules do not appear to apply to a person passing through India to a foreign country. No doubt to have international goodwill the appropriate authority may be well advised to give permission for such small articles of gold or any other article for being carried by a person with him on his way through India to foreign countries. But for one reason or other, the general permission in express terms says that gold shall be declared in the manifest and I do not see, nor any provision of law has been placed before us, why gold carried on a person cannot be declared in the manifest if that person seeks to avail himself of the permission. Though I appreciate the inconvenience and irritation that will be caused to passengers bona fide passing through our country to foreign countries for honest purposes, I cannot see my way to interpret the second proviso in such a way as to defeat its purpose. I, therefore, hold that on a fair construction of the notification dated November 8, 1962 that the general permission can be taken advantage of only by a person passing through India to a foreign country if he declares the gold in his possession in the manifest for transit as "same bottom cargo" or "transshipment cargo."

The next argument is that mens rea is an essential ingredient of the offence under s. 8 of the Act, read with s. 23(I-A)(a) thereof. Under s. 8 no person shall, except with the general or special permission of the Reserve Bank of India, bring or send to India any gold. Under the notification dated November 8, 1962, and published on November 24, 1962, as interpreted by me, such gold to earn the permission shall be declared in the manifest. The section, read with the said notification, prohibits bringing or sending to India gold intended to be taken out of India unless it is declared in the manifest. If any person brings into or sends to India any gold without declaring it in such manifest, he will be doing an act in contravention of s. 8 of the Act read with the notification and, therefore, he will be contravening the provisions of the Act. Under s. 23(I-A)(a) of the Act he will be liable to punishment of imprisonment which may extend to two years or with fine or with both. The question is whether the intention of the Legislature is to punish persons who break the said law without a guilty mind. The doctrine of mens rea in the context of statutory crimes has been the subject matter of many decisions in England as well as in our country. I shall briefly consider some of the important standard textbooks and decisions cited at the Bar to ascertain its exact scope.

In "Russell on Crime", 11th edn., Vol. 1, it is stated at p. 64:

"...there is a presumption that in any statutory crime the common law mental element, mens rea, is an essential ingredient."

On the question how to rebut this presumption, the learned author points out that the policy of the courts is unpredictable. I shall notice some of the decisions which appear to substantiate the author's view. In Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd edn., Vol. 10, in para. 508, at p. 273, the following passage appears:

"A statutory crime may or may not contain an express definition of the necessary state of mind. A statute may require a specific intention, malice, knowledge, wilfulness, or recklessness. On the other hand, it may be silent as to any requirement of mens rea, and in such a case in order to determine whether or not mens rea is an essential element of the offence, it is necessary to look at the objects and terms of the statute."

This passage also indicates that the absence of any specific mention of a state of mind as an ingredient of an offence in a statute is not decisive of the question whether mens rea is an ingredient of the offence or not: it depends upon the object and the terms of the statute. So too, Archbold in his book on "Criminal Pleading, Evidence and Practice," 35th edn., says much to the same effect at p. 48 thus:

"It has always been a principle of the common law that mens rea is an essential element in the commission of any criminal offence against the common law... In the case of statutory offences it depends on the effect of the statute... There is a presumption that mens rea is an essential ingredient in a statutory offence, but this presumption is liable to be displaced either by the words of the statute creating the offence or by the subject-matter with which it deals."

The leading case on the subject is Sherras v. De Rutzen.¹ Section 16(2) of the Licensing Act, 1872, prohibited a licensed victualler from supplying liquor to a police constable while on duty. It was held that that section did not apply where a licensed victualler bona fide believed that the police officer was off duty. / Wright J., observed:

"There is a presumption that mens rea, an evil intention, or a knowledge of the wrongfulness of the act, is an essential ingredient in every offence; but that presumption is liable to be displaced either by the words of the statute creating the offence or by the subject-matter with which it deals, and both must be considered."

This sums up the statement of the law that has been practically adopted in later decisions. The Privy Council in *Bruhn v. Rex*² construed s. 73 of the Straits Settlements Opium Ordinance, 1906. Section 73 of the said Ordinance stated that if any ship was used for importation, landing, removal, carriage or conveyance of any opium or chandu contrary to the provisions of the said Ordinance or of the rules made thereunder, the master and owner thereof would be liable to a fine. The section also laid down the rule of evidence that if a particular quantity of opium was found in the ship that was evidence that the ship had been used for importation of opium, unless it was proved to the satisfaction of the court that every reasonable precaution had been taken to prevent such user of such ship and that none of the officers, their servants or the crew or any persons employed on board the ship, were implicated therein. The said provisions are very clear; the offence is defined, the relevant evidence is described and the burden of proof is placed upon the accused. In the context of that section the Judicial Committee observed:

"...By this Ordinance every person other than the opium farmer is prohibited from importing or exporting chandu. If any other person does so, he prima facie commits a crime under the provisions of the Ordinance. If it be provided in the Ordinance, as it is, that certain facts, if established, justify or excuse what is prima facie a crime, then the burden of proving those facts obviously rests on the party accused. In truth, this objection is but the objection in another form, that knowledge is a necessary element in crime, and it is answered by the same reasoning."

It would be seen from the aforesaid observation that in that case mens rea was not really excluded but the burden of proof to negative mens rea was placed upon the accused. In *Peark's Dairies, Lim. v. Tottenham Food Control Committee*³ the Court of Appeal considered the scope of Regulations 3 and 6 of the Margarine (Maximum Prices) Order, 1917. The appellant's assistant, in violation of their instructions, but by an innocent mistake, sold margarine to a customer at the price of 1sh. per lb. giving only 14½ ozs. by weight instead of 16 ozs. The appellants were prosecuted for selling margarine at a price exceeding the maximum price fixed and one of the contentions raised on behalf of the accused was that mens rea on the part of the appellants was not an essential element of the offence. Lord Coleridge, J., cited with approval the following passage of Channell, J., in *Pearks, Gunston & Tee, Lim. v. Ward*⁴:

"But there are exceptions to this rule in the case of quasi-criminal offences, as they may be termed, that is to say, where certain acts are forbidden by law under a penalty, possibly even under a personal penalty, such as imprisonment, at any rate in default of payment of a fine; and the reason for this is, that the Legislature has thought it so important to prevent the particular act from being committed that it absolutely forbids it to be done; and if it is done the offender is liable to a penalty whether he had any mens rea or not, and whether or not he intended to commit a breach of the law. Where the act is of this character then the master, who, in fact, has done the forbidden thing through his servant, is responsible and is liable to a penalty. There is no reason why he should not be, because the very object of the Legislature was to forbid the thing absolutely."

This decision states the same principle in a different form. It also places emphasis on the terms and the object of the statute in the context of the question whether mens rea is excluded or not. The decision in *Rex v. Jacobs*⁵ arose out of an agreement to sell price-controlled goods at excess price. The defence was that the accused was ignorant of the proper price. The Court of Criminal Appeal held that in the summing up the direction given by the Judge to the jury that it was not necessary that the prosecution should prove that the appellants knew what the permitted price was but that they need only show in fact a sale at an excessive price had taken place, was correct in law. This only illustrates that on a construction of the particular statute, having regard to the object of the statute and its terms, the Court may hold that mens rea is not a necessary ingredient of the offence. In *Brend v. Wood*⁶ dealing with an emergency legislation relating to fuel rationing, Goddard, C.J., observed:

"There are statutes and regulations in which Parliament has seen fit to create offences and make people responsible before criminal Courts although there is an absence of mens rea, but it is certainly not the Court's duty to be acute to find that mens rea is not a constituent part of a crime. It is of the utmost importance for the protection of the liberty of the subject that a Court should always bear in mind that, unless a statute, either clearly or by necessary implication, rules out mens rea as a constituent part of a crime, the Court should not find a man guilty of an offence against the criminal law unless he has a guilty mind."

This caution administered by an eminent and experienced judge in the matter of construing such statutes cannot easily be ignored. The Judicial Committee in *Srinivas Mall Bairoliya v. King-Emperor*⁷ was dealing with a case in which one of the appellants was charged with an offence under the rules made by virtue of the Defence of India Act, 1939, of selling salt at prices exceeding those prescribed under the rules, though the sales were made without the appellant's knowledge by one of his servants. Lord du Parcq, speaking for the Board, approved the view expressed by Goddard, C.J., in Brend v. Wood and observed:

"Their Lordships agree with the view which was recently expressed by the Lord Chief Justice of England, when he said: 'It is in my opinion of the utmost importance for the protection of the liberty of the subject that a court should always bear in mind that, unless the statute, either clearly or by necessary implication, rules out mens rea as a constituent part of a crime, a defendant should not be found guilty of an offence against the criminal law unless he has got a guilty mind'."

The acceptance of the principle by the Judicial Committee that mens rea is a constituent part of a crime unless the statute clearly or by necessary implication excludes the same, and the application of the same to a welfare measure is an indication that the Court shall not be astute in construing a statute to ignore mens rea on a slippery ground of a welfare measure unless the statute compels it to do so. Indeed, in that case the Judicial Committee refused to accept the argument that where there is an absolute prohibition, no question of mens rea arises. The Privy Council again in *Lim Chin Aik v. The Queen*⁸ reviewed the entire law on the question in an illuminating judgment and approached the question, if I may say so, from a correct perspective. By s. 6 of the Immigration Ordinance, 1952, of the State of Singapore,

"It shall not be lawful for any person other than a citizen of Singapore to enter the colony from the Federation or having entered the colony from the Federation to remain in the Colony if... such person has been prohibited by order made under section 9 of this Ordinance from entering the colony" and s. 9, in the case of an order directed to a single individual, contained no provision for publishing the order or for otherwise bringing it to the attention of the person named. The Minister made an order prohibiting the appellant from entering the colony and forwarded it to the Immigration Officer. There was no evidence that the order had in fact come to the notice or attention of the appellant. He was prosecuted for contravening s. 6(2) of the Ordinance. Lord Evershed, speaking for the Board, reaffirmed the formulations cited from the judgment of Wright, J., and accepted by Lord du Parcq in Srinivas Mall

Bairoliya's case. On a review of the case law on the subject and the principles enunciated therein, the Judicial Committee came to the following conclusion:

"But it is not enough in their Lordships' opinion merely to label the statute as one dealing with a grave social evil and from that to infer that strict liability was intended. It is pertinent also to inquire whether putting the defendant under strict liability will assist in the enforcement of the regulations. That means that there must be something he can do, directly or indirectly, by supervision or inspection, by improvement of his business methods or by exhorting those whom he may be expected to influence or control, which will promote the observance of the regulations. Unless this is so, there is no reason in penalising him, and it cannot be inferred that the legislature imposed strict liability merely in order to find a luckless victim."

The same idea was repeated thus:

"...Where it can be shown that the imposition of strict liability would result in the prosecution and conviction of a class of persons whose conduct could not in any way affect the observance of the law, their Lordships consider that, even where the statute is dealing with a grave social evil, strict liability is not likely to be intended."

Dealing with the facts of the case before it, the Privy Council proceeded to illustrate the principle thus:

"But Mr. Le Quesne was unable to point to anything that the appellant could possibly have done so as to ensure that he complied with the regulations. It was not, for example, suggested that it would be practicable for him to make continuous inquiry to see whether an order had been made against him. Clearly one of the objects of the Ordinance is the expulsion of prohibited persons from Singapore, but there is nothing that a man can do about it if, before the commission of the offence, there is no practical or sensible way in which he can ascertain whether he is a prohibited person or not."

On that reasoning the Judicial Committee held that the accused was not guilty of the offence with which he was charged. This decision adds a new dimension to the rule of construction of a statute in the context of mens rea accepted by earlier decisions. While it accepts the rule that for the purpose of ascertaining whether a statute excludes mens rea or not, the object of the statute and its wording must be weighed, it lays down that mens rea cannot be excluded unless the person or persons aimed at by the prohibition are in a position to observe the law or to promote the observance of the law. We shall revert to this decision at a later stage in a different context. This Court in Ravula Hariprasada Rao v. The State,⁹ speaking through Fazl Ali, J., accepted the observations made by the Lord Chief Justice of England in Brend v. Wood. The decision of this Court in *The Indo-China Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Jasjit Singh, Additional Collector of Customs, Calcutta*¹⁰ is strongly relied upon by the appellant in support of the contention that mens rea is out of place in construing statutes similar to that under inquiry now. There, this Court was concerned with the interpretation of s. 52-A of the Sea Customs Act, 1878. The Indo-China Steam Navigation Co. Ltd., which carries on the business of carriage of goods and passengers by sea, owns a fleet of ships, and has been carrying on its business for over 80 years. One of the routes plied by its ships is the Calcutta-Japan-Calcutta route. The vessel "Eastern Saga" arrived at Calcutta on October 29, 1957. On a search it was found that a hole was covered with a piece of wood and over-painted and when the hole was opened a large quantity of gold in bars was discovered. After following the prescribed procedure the Customs authorities made an order confiscating the vessel in addition to imposing other penalties. One of the contentions raised was that s. 52-A of the Sea Customs Act the infringement whereof was the occasion for the confiscation could not be invoked unless mens rea was established. Under that section no vessel constructed, adapted, altered or fitted for the purpose of concealing goods shall enter, or be within, the limits of any port in India, or the Indian customs waters. This Court in construing the scheme and object of the Sea Customs Act came to the conclusion that mens rea was not a necessary ingredient of the offence, as, if that was so, the statute would become a dead-letter. That decision was given on the basis of the clear object of the statute and on a construction of the provisions of that statute which implemented the said object. It does not help us in construing the relevant provisions of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act.

The Indian decisions also pursued the same line. A Division Bench of the Bombay High Court in *Emperor v. Isak Solomon Macmull*¹¹ in the context of the Motor Spirit Rationing Order, 1941, made under the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, held that a master is not vicariously liable, in absence of mens rea, for an offence committed by his servant for selling petrol in absence of requisite coupons and at a rate in excess of the controlled rate. Chagla C.J. speaking for the Division Bench, after considering the relevant English and Indian decisions, observed:

"It is not suggested that even in the class of cases where the offence is not a minor offence or not quasi-criminal that the Legislature cannot introduce the principle of vicarious liability and make the master liable for the acts of his servant although the master has no mens rea and was morally innocent. But the Courts must be reluctant to come to such a conclusion unless the clear words of the statute compel them to do so or they are driven to that conclusion by necessary implication."

So too, a Division Bench of the Mysore High Court in *The State of Coorg v. P. K. Assu*¹² held that a driver and a cleaner of a lorry which carried bags of charcoal and also contained bags of paddy and rice underneath without permit as required by a notification issued under the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, were not guilty of any offence in the absence of their knowledge that the lorry contained foodgrains. To the same effect a Division Bench of the Allahabad High Court in *State v. Sheo Prasad*¹³ held that a master was not liable for his servant's act in carrying oilseeds in contravention of the order made under the Essential Supplies (Temporary Powers) Act, 1946, on the ground that he had not the guilty mind. In the same manner a Division Bench of the Calcutta High Court in *C. T. Prim v. State*¹⁴ accepted as settled law that unless a statute clearly or by necessary implication rules out mens rea as a constituent part of the crime, no one should be found guilty of an offence under the criminal law unless he has got a guilty mind.

The law on the subject relevant to the present enquiry may briefly be stated as follows. It is a well settled principle of common law that mens rea is an essential ingredient of a criminal offence. Doubtless a statute can exclude that element, but it is a sound rule of construction adopted in England and also accepted in India to construe a statutory provision creating an offence in conformity with the common law rather than against it unless the statute expressly or by necessary implication excluded mens rea. To put it differently, there is a presumption that mens rea is an essential ingredient of a statutory offence; but this may be rebutted by the express words of a statute creating the offence or by necessary implication. But the mere fact that the object of a statute is to promote welfare activities or to eradicate grave social evils is in itself not decisive of the question whether the element of guilty mind is excluded from the ingredients of the offence. It is also necessary to enquire whether a statute by putting a person under strict liability help him to assist the State in the enforcement of the law: can he do anything to promote the observance of the law? A person who does not know that gold cannot be brought into India without a licence or is not bringing into India any gold at all cannot possibly do anything to promote the observance of the law. Mens rea by necessary implication can be excluded from a statute only where it is absolutely clear that the implementation of the object of a statute would otherwise be defeated and its exclusion enables those put under strict liability by their act or omission to assist the promotion of the law. The nature of mens rea that will be implied in a statute creating an offence depends upon the object of the Act and the provisions thereof.

What is the object of the Act? The object of the Act and the notification issued thereunder is to prevent smuggling of gold and to conserve foreign exchange. Doubtless it is a laudable object. The Act and the notification were conceived and enacted in public interest; but that in itself is not, as I have indicated, decisive of the legislative intention.

The terms of the section and those of the relevant notification issued thereunder do not expressly exclude mens rea. Can we say that mens rea is excluded by necessary implication? Section 8 does not contain an absolute prohibition against bringing or sending into India any gold. It in effect confers a power on the Reserve Bank of India to regulate the import by giving general or special permission; nor the notification dated August 25, 1948, issued by the Government embodies any such absolute prohibition. It again, in substance, leaves the regulation of import of gold to the Reserve Bank of India; in its turn the Reserve Bank of India by a notification of the same date permitted persons to transit gold to a place which is outside the territory of India and the Portuguese territories without any permission. Even the impugned notification does not impose an absolute prohibition against bringing into India gold which is on through transit to a place outside India. It permits such import for such through transit, but only subject to conditions. It is, therefore, manifest that the law of India as embodied in the Act under s. 8 and in the notification issued thereunder does not impose an absolute prohibition against bringing into India gold which is on through transit to a place outside India; and indeed it permits such bringing of gold but subject to certain conditions. The Legislature, therefore, did not think that public interest would irreparably suffer if such transit was permitted, but it was satisfied that with some regulation such interest could be protected. The law does not become nugatory if the element of mens rea was read into it, for there would still be persons who would be bringing into India gold with the knowledge that they would be breaking the law. In such circumstances no question of exclusion of mens rea by necessary implication can arise.

If a person was held to have committed an offence in breach of the provision of s. 8 of the Act and the notification issued thereunder without any knowledge on his part that there was any such notification or that he was bringing any gold at all, many innocent persons would become victims of law. An aeroplane in which a person with gold on his body is travelling may have a forced landing in India, or an enemy of a passenger may surreptitiously and maliciously put some gold trinket in his pocket without his knowledge so as to bring him into trouble; a person may be carrying gold without knowledge or even without the possibility of knowing that a law prohibiting taking of gold through India is in existence. All of them, if the interpretation suggested by the learned Solicitor General be accepted, will have to be convicted and they might be put in jail for a period extending to 2 years. Such an interpretation is neither supported by the provisions of the Act nor is necessary to implement its object. That apart, by imposing such a strict liability as to catch innocent persons in the net of crime, the Act and the notification issued thereunder cannot conceivably enable such a class of persons to assist the implementation of the law: they will be helpless victims of law. Having regard to the object of the Act, I think no person shall be held to be guilty of contravening the provisions of s. 8 of the Act, read with the notification dated November 8, 1962, issued thereunder, unless he has knowingly brought into India gold without complying with the terms of the proviso to the notification.

Even so it is contended that the notification dated November 8, 1962, is law and that the maxim "ignorance of law is no defence" applies to the breach of the said law. To state it differently, the argument is that even the mental condition of knowledge on the part of a person is imported into the notification; the said knowledge is imputed to him by the force of the said maxim. Assuming that the notification dated November 8, 1962, is a delegated legislation, I find it difficult to invoke that maxim as the statute empowering the Reserve Bank of India to give the permission, or the rules made thereunder do not prescribe the mode of publication of the notification. Indeed a similar question arose before the Privy Council in Lim Chin Aik v. The Queen and a similar argument was advanced before it; but the Board rejected it. I have already dealt with this decision in another context. There the Minister under the powers conferred on him by s. 9 of the Immigration Ordinance, 1952, issued an order prohibiting the appellant therein from entering Singapore. He was prosecuted for disobeying that order. Section 9, in the case of an order directed to a single individual, contained no provision for publishing the order or for otherwise bringing it to the knowledge of the person named. The Crown invoked the precept that ignorance of the law was no excuse. In rejecting the contention of the Crown, Lord Evershed, speaking for the Board observed at p. 171 thus:

"Their Lordships are unable to accept the contention. In their Lordships' opinion, even if the making of the order by the Minister be regarded as an exercise of the legislative as distinct from the executive or administrative function (as they do not concede), the maxim cannot apply to such a case as the present where it appears that there is in the State of Singapore no provision, corresponding, for example, to that contained in section 3(2) of the English Statutory Instruments Act of 1946, for the publication in any form of an order of the kind made in the present case or any other provision designed to enable a man by appropriate inquiry to find out what 'the law' is."

Here, as there, it is conceded that there is no provision providing for the publication in any form of an order of the kind made by the Reserve Bank of India imposing conditions on the bringing of gold into India. The fact that the Reserve Bank of India published the order in the Official Gazette does not affect the question for it need not have done so under any express provisions of any statute or rules made thereunder. In such cases the maxim cannot be invoked and the prosecution has to bring home to the accused that he had knowledge or could have had knowledge if he was not negligent or had made proper enquiries before he could be found guilty of infringing the law. In this case the said notification was published on November 24, 1962, and the accused left Zurich on November 27, 1962, and it was not seriously contended that the accused had or could have had with diligence the knowledge of the contents of the said notification before he brought gold into India. I, therefore, hold that the respondent was not guilty of the offence under s. 23(1-A) of the Act as it has not been established that he had with knowledge of the contents of the said notification brought gold into India on his way to Manila and, therefore, he had not committed any offence under the said section. I agree with the High Court in its conclusion though for different reasons.

Though the facts established in the case stamp the respondent as an experienced smuggler of gold and though I am satisfied that the Customs authorities bona fide and with diligence performed their difficult duties, I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that the accused has not committed any offence under s. 23(1-A) of the Act.

In the result, the appeal fails and is dismissed.

PATEL J. Last week these letters patent appeals were before us but as we felt some doubt whether any such appeal could lie we directed that these matters be placed before us for hearing on the question whether an appeal lies under cl. 15 of the Letters Patent against the decision of a Single Judge given in a special civil application filed under art. 227 of the Constitution.

Clause 15 of the Letters Patent of this High Court which is in similar words as that of Calcutta and Madras High Courts, is as follows, so far as is relevant to the present case:—

“And we further ordain that an appeal shall lie to the said High Court of Judicature at Bombay from the judgment (not being a judgment passed in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction in respect of a decree or order made in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction by a Court subject to the superintendence of the said High Court, and not being an order made in the exercise of revisional jurisdiction, and not being a sentence or order passed or made in the exercise of the power of superintendence under the provisions of section 107 of the Government of India Act, or in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction) of one Judge of the said High Court or one Judge of any Division Court, pursuant to section 108 of the Government of India Act,…”

The subsequent portion can have no possible application and, therefore, need not be reproduced. A reading of this clause shows that an appeal is provided by cl. 15 against the judgment of a Single Judge within the Court itself. While providing for this appeal, exceptions have been created and the exceptions are four in number:—(1) a judgment rendered by a Single Judge exercising appellate jurisdiction in respect of a decree which is made in the exercise of appellate jurisdiction by a subordinate Court—in common parlance called the second appellate jurisdiction, (2) an order rendered by a Single Judge in the exercise of revisional jurisdiction of the High Court, (3) an order or sentence rendered by a Single Judge in the exercise of powers of superintendence of the High Court under the provisions of s. 107 of the Government of India Act, 1915, and (4) an order rendered in the exercise of criminal jurisdiction. These are the four exceptions, to an appeal as a matter of right, against the judgment of the Single Judge within the Court. In respect of the first exception, a provision is made for an appeal on condition that the Judge, who decided the matter, gives a certificate that the matter is one fit for an appeal under cl. 15 and that is provided by the second part of the clause which we have omitted.

It is argued by Mr. Kherdekar that whatever may be the position in respect of the decision of a Single Judge given under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, it is impossible to regard exercise of power by a Single Judge under art. 227 of the Constitution as an exercise of revisional jurisdiction. He argues that art. 227 of the Constitution gives far wider power to a High Court to interfere with decisions of subordinate Courts and tribunals than s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, and, therefore, it is impossible to regard the exercise of such powers as exercise of revisional jurisdiction. He argues that exercise of powers of superintendence under art. 227 of the Constitution is not the same as exercise of powers under s. 107 of the Government of India Act, 1915, and hence the latter part of the exception cannot apply.

It is well settled that a right of appeal can only be given by a statute, there being no general right of appeal against the decision of one Court to another Court. It would be much more so in the case where a right of appeal is claimed from the judgment of a Single Judge to a larger Bench within the same Court. Unless, therefore, the right to appeal is discernible from the provisions of the clause itself, no such right can exist.

It is not necessary to trace the history of the statutes giving revisional powers to the High Courts and also the Letters Patent. It is sufficient to say that an order of a Single Judge made in the exercise of revisional jurisdiction was held to be appealable under cl. 15 of the Letters Patent. These came to be amended in 1919 by which the exception as to orders made in the exercise of revisional jurisdiction and of powers of superintendence was created. On a plain reading of clause 15 it is obvious that it is not necessary in order that a decision be not appealable, that the decision of the Single Judge must have been rendered in the exercise of the revisional powers of the High Court. Even if the judgment is given while exercising the powers of superintendence, under the then provisions of s. 107 of the Government of India Act, 1915, an appeal is excluded.

Now, it is true that when the Government of India Act, 1915, was replaced by the Government of India Act, 1935, the corresponding provision, s. 224 of the said Act, did not enable a High Court to exercise powers of superintendence in judicial matters over the decisions of subordinate Courts. To that extent, until the Government of India Act, 1935, continued to be in force, the reference to s. 107 in cl. 15 of the Letters Patent would not have carried much meaning, as the High Court could not have exercised any powers of revising the orders of the subordinate Courts under s. 224 of the Government of India Act, 1935. By the Constitution, the Government of India Act, 1935, was repealed and instead of s. 224 of that Act, art. 227 came to be substituted. It cannot be denied that the power of superintendence given by art. 227 is as wide as was available to the High Court under s. 107 of the Government of India Act, and there can be no doubt that the exercise of power by the High Court, by a Single Judge, under art. 227 is one of superintendence, as has been stated by the article itself, over subordinate Courts and tribunals, unlike the exercise of power under art. 226 which is entirely of a different nature and which probably cannot be resorted to as long as a matter falls under art. 227 which is a special provision relating to Courts and tribunals. Then the only question that arises is whether it is permissible to substitute "Article 227 of the Constitution" for "section 107 of the Government of India Act," 1915 in this clause.

In this connection it must be remembered that by cl. 44 of the Letters Patent, the provisions of the Letters Patent are subject to the legislative powers of the Governor-General in Legislative Council and also of the Governor-General in Council under s. 71 of the Government of India Act, 1915, and also of the Governor-General in cases of emergency under s. 72 of that Act. The provisions being subject to the legislative powers of the Indian Legislature, they would be subject to any rules of interpretation of statutory provisions framed by the Indian Legislature i.e. the General Clauses Act, 1897. Section 8 of the General Clauses Act, 1897, provides that where that Act, or any Central Act or Regulation made after the commencement of that Act, repeals and re-enacts, with or without modification, any provision of a former enactment then references in any other enactment or in any instrument to the provision so repealed shall, unless a different intention appears, be construed as references, to the provision so re-enacted. Now, it is true that the Constitution can hardly be regarded as a Central Act or a Regulation made after the enactment of the General Clauses Act. Article 367, however, of the Constitution provides that the General Clauses Act of 1897 shall apply for the interpretation of the Constitution as it applies for the interpretation of an Act of the Legislature of the Dominion of India. It would seem, therefore, that s. 8 would be applicable in the present case. Apart from this, it has been recognised that the rule stated in s. 8 of the General Clauses Act is not a special rule of interpretation but one generally accepted on fundamental principles and, if that is so, apart from the provisions of that clause, inasmuch as s. 107 of the Government of India Act, 1915, was repealed and s. 224 was re-enacted by the Government of India Act, 1935, and later that section was repealed and was re-enacted in the form of art. 227 of the Constitution, the reference to s. 107 of the Government of India Act must be read as reference to art. 227 of the Constitution. In this view we are supported by the decision of the Supreme Court in N. S. Thread Co. v. James Chadwick & Bros.,¹ where the question was whether the words “pursuant to section 108 of the Government of India Act” in cl. 15 of the Letters Patent could be read as “pursuant to article 225 of the Constitution”. The Court applied the provisions of s. 8 of the General Clauses Act. The Court also observed (p. 360):

“...Assuming however but not conceding, that strictly speaking the provisions of the Interpretation Act and the General Clauses Act do not for any reason apply, we see no jurisdiction for holding that the principles of construction enunciated in those provisions have no application for construing these charters.”

Consequently, the reference to s. 108 of the Government of India Act was read as reference to art. 225 of the Constitution.

There being, therefore, no doubt that the Single Judge deciding writ petitions under art. 227 against the decisions of the Revenue Tribunal exercises the powers of superintendence of the High Court under art. 227 of Constitution and an appeal against such a decision having been expressly barred, the question as to whether it is akin to or wider than the revisional jurisdiction of the High Court does not fall to be considered.

The view which we have taken finds support in the views of the Madras and Calcutta High Courts. The question came to be considered by the Calcutta High Court as early as 1953 in the case of Sukhendu v. Hare Krishna.² The dispute arose under the Rent Restriction Act out of an application for ejectment under s. 41 of the Presidency Small Cause Courts Act against the decision of a Bench. A petition purporting to be one under s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code and art. 227 of the Constitution was filed in the High Court and was eventually dealt with by a Single Judge. Against the decision of the Single Judge a Letters Patent was filed by the defendant. The learned Judges traced the history of the Civil Procedure Code and also the powers vested in the High Court under the various statutes and came to the conclusion that the power exercised by a Single Judge in a writ petition under art. 227 being power of superintendence, the decision in such a matter rendered by him would not be appealable. Similar view has been taken in *In re Tirupuliswamy*³ and Srinivasa Reddiar v. Krishnaswami Reddiar.⁴ It is true that the distinction sought to be made by Mr. Kherdekar between the revisional jurisdiction and the general power of superintendence vested in the High Court under art. 227 of the Constitution was not made in Tirupuli-swamy's case. But, as we have stated above, it is really not necessary to go into that question inasmuch as an appeal against the judgment of a Single Judge rendered in the exercise of the power of superintendence of the High Court is excluded.

In the result, we must hold that the appeals are incompetent. They will, therefore, stand dismissed.

Appeals dismissed.

INDUBAI PANDHARI NAIK

v.

VYANKATI VITHOBA SAWADHA.*

Hindu Succession Act (XXX of 1956), Secs. 14(1), 4(2)—Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code (II of 1955), Secs. 151, 152—Central Provinces and Berar Hindu Women's Rights to Property (Extension to Agricultural Land) Act (C. P. & Berar Act No. VI of 1942)—“Possessed”, meaning of word in s. 14(1) of Hindu Succession Act—Widow getting interest in joint family property on husband's death whether in possession of such property within s. 14(1)—Whether member of joint family loses rights in joint property on his going out for considerable time and not enjoying benefit of property—M. P. Land Revenue Code whether a tenancy legislation—“Subject to his personal law,” meaning of expression in s. 151 of Code.

In s. 14(1) of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, the word “possessed” means the state of “owning and having a disposing power” i.e. a right in the property which is capable of enjoyment whenever the widow wills so to do.

A Hindu widow who has interest in the joint family property which she got on her husband's death can be said to have possession of the property within the meaning of that phrase in s. 14(1) of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956. It is not necessary under that section that she should reduce her share to possession either by actual partition or even by asking for partition.

*Venkayamma v. Veerayya*¹ and Kotturuswami v. Veeravva,² referred to.

In the case of members of a joint family even if a member has gone out for a considerable length of time and has not enjoyed the benefit of the property his rights in the property are not lost. In order that adverse title can be prescribed ouster must be proved.

*Babaji v. Jivaji*³ and Mst. Kirpal Kuar v. Bachan Singh,⁴ explained.

*Nargisbai Acidwala v. Jehangir Mody*⁵ and Sudarsan Das v. Ram Kirpal Das,⁶ referred to.

The Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1954, is not a tenancy legislation and, therefore, the exception in s. 4(2) of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, does not apply to it.

Under s. 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1954, the ordinary law of inheritance, survivorship or bequest operates. If a holder is governed by any special law, customary or statutory, then the devolution is intended to be governed by the same.

The words “subject to his personal law” in s. 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1954, mean personal law by which he was governed when the succession opened.

D. N. Belekar, for opponents Nos. 3, 4 and 6 to 10.

PATEL J. This revisional application arises out of an order made under the provisions of O. XXII, r. 4, of the Code of Civil Procedure in a suit.

The short facts are that one Balaji left two sons Vithoba and Pandurang after his death, who were members of a joint family. Vithoba died in 1912 leaving behind him Vyankati, defendant No. 1 and Gopala, defendant No. 2. Pandurang died in 1941 leaving his widow Sarubai and a daughter Indubai who was married. At the time of his death, the joint family was possessed of the suit properties. In August 1961, Pandurang's widow Sarubai filed a suit claiming partition of her share in the property against the defendants. After issues were framed, Sarubai was examined on commission. Thereafter she died on October 20, 1962. Before her death she had executed a will and bestowed her properties in favour of her daughter Indubai. Indubai then made an application under the provisions of O. XXII, r. 3, for being brought on record in place of her mother as the plaintiff, claiming the properties under the will or, in any event, by reason of s. 15 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956. She claimed, therefore, to be the legal representative of the deceased plaintiff. Further evidence had not been led. The learned trial Judge dismissed the application.

The learned Judge rejected the contention of the petitioner that s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, applied as Sarubai was not in possession of the property at the date of the suit. He relied upon her evidence on commission that after her husband's death she did not live with the defendants, that is, since 1941 she did not stay in the family house saying

"she remained aloof from the family for more than twenty years after her husband's death. Therefore, it could not be inferred that she was in possession as a widow of her husband and her interest became enlarged by reason of section 14 of the Hindu Succession Act."

Then he relied upon *Sudarsan Das v. Ram Kirpal Das*¹ and *Babaji v. Jivaji*² and said

"the doctrine is that possession of a joint estate is adverse to any claim to such an estate as a separate one, and that possession by a joint family may by lapse of time become adverse to a separate estate."

Then while considering the decision in *Kotturuswami v. Veeravva*³ he observed

"Sarubai never showed any concern to the suit property right after 1941. She remained away immediately after Pandurang's death. The defendants' possession therefore became adverse" and held that in such a case rights of her reversionary heirs would of course be barred at the expiration of twelve years from Pandurang's death and relied upon Mst. Kirpal Kuar v. Bachan Singh.⁴ As to agricultural land, he relied upon s. 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1954, and the decision, Sitabai v. Kothulal.⁵

Mr. Manohar relies on s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, in support of the will in favour of the applicant and her right to succeed to Sarubai's interest otherwise than under the will.

Section 14 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, effected a change in the old Hindu law and converted widow's estate into an absolute estate in respect of all "property possessed by her". In *Venkayamma v. Veerayya*⁶ "possession" was construed in its widest sense to mean the state of "owning or having in one's hands or power". Similar view was taken by this High Court. This view has been affirmed by the Supreme Court in Kotturuswami v. Veeravva. The application of this meaning of the phrase was also not left in doubt in this case. In this case A, the husband of B, had died in 1920 and by will authorised her to adopt a son. She adopted a son C in 1942 and he was placed in possession of the property. D alleged that he was the nearest reversioner of A and filed the suit for declaration that the adoption was invalid and not binding on him. He failed in the trial Court and also in the High Court and at the hearing of his appeal to the Supreme Court a preliminary objection was taken under s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, the contention being that inasmuch as the widow had become the full owner of the estate, his suit could not succeed. Their Lordships said that if the adoption was invalid, the widow would become the absolute owner under the section as C's possession must be regarded permissive possession and the appeal was dismissed.

The question is whether Sarubai possessed the property in the above sense. Mr. Khare contends that she did not possess the property at all and so there is no question of s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act applying. His contention is that Sarubai no doubt acquired an interest in the property, but on her death the cause of action did not survive and the suit abated. He relied on the decisions in Shamrao v. Kashibai,⁷ *Subba Rao v. Krishna Prasad*⁸ and Jivanandan Singh v. Sia Ram Prasad Singh.⁹ We must, therefore, consider the nature of her interest in the property when the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, came into force and the effect of her filing the suit.

Under old Hindu law a widow had no right except that of maintenance in the property of the joint family of which her husband died as a member. Even in the case of separate property if her husband left a male issue then her only right was one of maintenance. By Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, substantial change was made in her rights. Section 3, the most important, is divided into four parts. Sub-section (2) gave her on the death of her husband as a member of the joint family "the same interest as her husband had." By sub-s. (1) as to separate property of a coparcener and in the case of those governed by the Dayabhaga school, the widow took equally with the son. However, she got a limited estate known as widow's estate but got the right to claim partition.

The Legislature gave her full right in the property that her husband had without any limitation except that she got the estate as a widow. It is clear that this right is given to her not in lieu of maintenance or only for the purpose of maintenance. It was, therefore, held that she could alienate her interest in the coparcenary property for legal necessity as she could the separate property of her husband which she got as his heir under the same Act: *Harekrishna Das v. Jujesthi Panda*¹⁰ and Pem Mahton v. Bandhu Mahto.¹¹ It was also held by this Court in *Dagadu Balu v. Namdeo Rakhamaji*¹² that she could alienate her own restricted interest to enjoy the property during her life time and that the alienee could also enjoy the property during her life time and for this purpose he could claim partition. The ratio of these decisions is that she had disposing power over the property.

The decisions in Subba Rao v. Krishna Prasad, Shamrao v. Kashibai, Jivanandan Singh v. Sia Ram Prasad Singh and *Alamelu Ammal v. Chellammal*¹³ were given with reference to the position obtaining before the Hindu Succession Act, 1956, came to be enacted. Apart from this, it seems to us with great respect that the scope of s. 14 of the Act which gives the widow rights in the property of her husband is considerably narrowed down by considerations of old law. The decisions in Dagadu's case and *Mahadu Kashiba v. Gajarabai Shankar*¹⁴ do not support this view. There is no justification in our view for saying that the right of the widow in the property ended with the death of the widow. If the husband could put an end to his joint status by declaring his intent to effect partition she also could, as she had the same interest in the property as that of the husband. There can also not be any doubt that the interest in her husband's property which she got under sub-s. (2) was also by devolution, in the same way that she got a share in the separate property of her husband as a son under sub-s. (1), as sub-s. (3) of that Act speaks of both as devolution. The argument sometimes made that because the word "succession" is not used in the Act the widow's rights are personal and end with her death is not justified as the word has been applied in many statutes even to survivorship also. (See In re Hindu Women's Rights To Property Act.)¹⁵ It is not necessary however to pursue the question further as, in our view, s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act has considerable effect on the matter.

As stated earlier "possessed" as used in the section means the state of "owning and having a disposing power". This must mean a right in the property which is capable of enjoyment whenever the widow wills so to do. Having regard to decisions in Harekrishna Das v. Jujesthi Panda, Prem Mahton v. Bandhu Mahto and Dagadu v. Namdeo she had ownership over her interest in the joint family property that she got on her husband's death without even claiming partition and, if that is so, she must be regarded as being in possession of the property. It is not necessary, in our view, that she should reduce her share to possession either by actual partition or even asking for partition. By reason of s. 14 of the Hindu Succession Act her limited estate became transformed into full estate with all its incidents including that of its passing to her heirs in accordance with s. 15 of the Act. It is not necessary for us to decide whether she could will away the property without demanding partition. In the present case, she had demanded partition and she would, therefore, be entitled to make valid bequest by will.

The learned trial Judge held that defendant No. 1 had prescribed adverse joint family title and at another place he has held that he became owner by adverse possession. Without a trial the learned Judge ought not to have gone in these matters. It seems to us that there has been confusion of thought in the reasoning of the learned Judge. It is well settled that in the case of members of a joint family even if a member has gone out for a considerable length of time and has not enjoyed the benefit of the property his rights in the property are not lost. Even in the case of co-owners, possession of one is regarded as that of all. In other words, mere non-enjoyment of the property as a co-owner does not mean that those in possession prescribe adverse title to that of the non-participating owner. In order that adverse title can be prescribed ouster must be proved. (See *Nargisbai Acidwala v. Jehangir Mody*¹⁶ and Sudarsan Das v. Ram Kirpal Das). The learned Judge has also misunderstood the decisions in Babaji v. Jiwaji, as well as the decision in Mst. Kirpal Kuar v. Bachan Singh. In Babaji's case joint family possessed certain property as joint property which a coparcener was claiming as separate property and the Court held that the joint family had prescribed an adverse title. In Mst. Kirpal Kuar's case, a widow who had no right in the property except that of maintenance had been in enjoyment of the property as if she were entitled to it and it was held that she had become owner by adverse possession. The learned Judge was in error in holding that Sarubai's right in the property was lost.

Mr. Khare has contended as a last resort that at least qua the agricultural property, the applicant has no right to come on the record. Mr. Khare has invited our attention to the provisions of s. 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1954, and contended that the section prescribes a special mode of succession and, therefore, its operation is not affected by reason of s. 4(2) of the Hindu Succession Act, 1956. Such a view was taken by Vyas J. in Sitabai v. Kothulal.

Section 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code runs as follows:—

"Subject to his personal law, the interest of a tenure-holder shall on his death pass by inheritance, survivorship or bequest, as the case may be."

Section 4 of the Hindu Succession Act was intended to give overriding effect to the provisions of the Act over all other laws applicable to Hindus except as provided by the Act. Out of this, an exception has been created by sub-s. (2). It says:

"For the removal of doubts it is hereby declared that nothing contained in this Act shall be deemed to affect the provisions of any law for the time being in force providing for the prevention of fragmentation of agricultural holdings or for the fixation of ceilings or for the devolution of tenancy rights in respect of such holdings."

In this case no reliance is placed on any law providing for the prevention of fragmentation of agricultural holdings or for the fixation of ceilings. It is said however that s. 151 provides for the devolution of agricultural lands and, therefore, this sub-section applies. This argument, therefore, must be examined.

In order that the exception created by s. 4(2) of the Hindu Succession Act can apply the legislation must provide for devolution of tenancies. Tenancy legislations were and are well known. It is impossible to regard the Land Revenue Act as tenancy legislation. So far as the four districts of the Central Provinces are concerned the earliest Act is the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act. It speaks of proprietary rights in the land and the tenure of land prevalent seems to be similar to Bhagdari and Narwadari tenures of Gujarat in some respects. As the occupants of land were proprietors they had hereditary and transferable title and, therefore, no express provision seems to exist in this respect. Then came the Central Provinces Land Revenue Act, 1917. As the rights were proprietary rights, again, no specific provision was made since widow's right to inheritance was such as she would get in other property on the death of her husband. In Raiyatwari villages by s. 212 the rights of Raiyats were declared heritable but not transferrable. As to the ceded districts of Berar the Governor General in Council made a law known as the Berar Land Revenue Code, 1928, under the Indian (Foreign Jurisdiction) Order in Council, 1902. Section 56 of the same is in terms similar to s. 151 of the present Land Revenue Code and the marginal note is "Occupant's rights heritable and transferrable". The present Code of 1954 seems to be a sequel to abolition of special tenures and Jamindaris. It has prescribed the condition under which a tenure holder occupies the land. There are two classes of tenure holders, Bhumiswamis and Bhumidharis; but s. 151 applies to both. The holding of the tenure holders are not tenancies. Not being a tenancy legislation, exception in s. 4(2) of the Hindu Succession Act does not apply.

Even apart from this, the contention cannot be accepted. The section occurs in Chapter XII of the Code which defines the classes of tenures, their liabilities and privileges. The tenure holders have permanent rights in the land and the section is intended to make it clear that the right is heritable. No doubt the language is not very happy but having regard to the legislative history it is clear beyond doubt that ordinary law of the holder is intended to apply. It also recognises the right of the holder to pass it on by bequest. If the holder is an individual, it would pass to heirs by inheritance and by bequest if he has left a will. If a joint family held the land, it would go by survivorship according to the ordinary law. It is not as if that a special rule has been laid down in order to preserve the integrity of land and prevent its further sub-divisions or for the convenience of the collection of the revenue or the rent. The ordinary law, therefore, of inheritance, survivorship or bequest operates. If a holder is governed by any special law, customary or statutory, then the devolution is intended to be governed by the same.

What Mr. Khare contends is that the words "subject to his personal law" meant the personal law as it existed when the statute was passed, that is, in 1954. He contends that s. 151 (of Land Revenue Code) is a reproduction of s. 11 of the Central Province Tenancy Act, 1920, as amended in 1941, and the words "subject to his personal law" must be confined only to the law as then obtaining. The history of the legislation does not justify the contention. It may be that the Tenancy Act came to be repealed by the Code but that may be due to the very comprehensive recent tenancy legislations. Does it mean the personal law as in force in 1928, 1941 or the personal law as in force in 1954? The purpose of s. 151 was one of applying the law of succession by which a holder was governed. It can only mean personal law by which he was governed when the succession opened. There are no words in this section to mean personal law as applicable on a particular day. The normal rule of construction is that "the language of a statute is generally extended to new things which are not known and could have been contemplated by the legislation when it was passed." (Maxwell on Interpretation of Statutes, pp. 75 and 262). Until 1956 the personal law of a Hindu was the ordinary law applicable to him. By the enactment of Hindu Succession Act, his personal law was changed in supersession of all his old law and, therefore, on the date when the question arose this became his personal law.

True, the decision in Sitabai v. Kothulal supports Mr. Khare. With respect, we find it very much difficult to agree with the conclusions of the learned Judge. The learned Judge assumes that s. 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code prescribed a particular law of devolution and secondly that it is with respect to tenancies. It only provided that the holding was heritable and his personal law of succession applied. The next s. 152 makes the Bhumiswami-tenure transferable and Bhumidhari-tenure transferable except by mortgage. In view of what we have said there can be no question of s. 4(2) of the Hindu Succession Act saving the rights of survivors.

We may also observe that this does not involve constructing the words "any law for the time being in force", in sub-s. (2) of s. 4 of the Hindu Succession Act to mean "any law which came into force", as has been supposed in the above case, once it is held that s. 151 of the Code merely recognises that the tenure is heritable and will pass according to the law applicable to the tenure holder.

There is a serious difficulty in accepting the ratio in Sitabai's case. Section 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code applies to all land holders from the Government, that is, rural as well as urban and open as well as built upon. We may take the case of land in a city on which huge building has been built. According to the decision in the above case in a case like the present, the land would be taken by the survivor or survivors while the structure would be taken by the heir of the husband of the widow. One has to imagine the chaos resulting in such cases. It is true that if the language of an enactment is clear, then the Court has no concern with the consequences and it must apply the law. Giving a reasonable and natural meaning to the section, as we have done, avoids such a consequence.

The matter may be viewed from another point of view. The law applicable to Pandurang under the Land Revenue Acts was the ordinary Hindu law as amended by Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, as a result of which Sarubai took the property on his death. The limitation of her rights in the property is a limitation on her and that has been removed. This does not affect in any manner anything that is prescribed in s. 151 of the Madhya Pradesh Land Revenue Code, 1954, since the section does not place any restriction on a woman acquiring absolute rights of ownership. This contention, therefore, also fails.

It was lastly contended by Mr. Khare that in any event the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, could not possibly apply to agricultural property. Originally when the Act was passed, it was hardly realised that the Central legislature would have no power to legislate with regard to agricultural lands. It was only after the decision of the Federal Court In the matter of the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, that this position seemed to have been crystallised. Different States, therefore, enacted Acts giving similar rights to widows in respect of agricultural lands. In this area the Central Provinces and Berar Act (No. VI of 1942) being the Central Provinces and Berar Hindu Women's Rights to Property (Extension to Agricultural Land) Act, 1942, received the assent of the Governor on June 6, 1942, and it provided that the term "property" in the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, and the Hindu Women's Rights to Property (Amendment) Act, 1938, as in force in Madhya Pradesh, shall include, and shall be deemed always to have included, agricultural land. The proviso thereof is not material for our present purposes. This proviso creates an exception. It was attempted to be argued that inasmuch as this Act was passed in 1942 and Pandurang died in 1941 the Act will not apply to agricultural land left by Pandurang. The simplest answer is that the Act has been made retrospective expressly by its very language. By now it is well settled so far as this Court is concerned that the words "shall be deemed always to have" gave retrospective operation to a statute. We have, no doubt, therefore, that the Act applied to cases where the owner died even before the local Act was enacted provided that the provisions of the Hindu Women's Rights to Property Act, 1937, and Hindu Women's Rights to Property (Amendment) Act, 1938, were applicable.

In the result, we set aside the order made by the learned trial Judge and direct that the petitioner be shown as the legal representative of Sarubai in her place and the suit be proceeded with forthwith. In view of the fact that the suit is of 1961 and four years have already elapsed, we direct that the trial Judge shall hear the suit from day to day and decide it within three months after the vacation. The petitioner will get her costs from the opponents in this Court and also in the trial Court in respect of this application.

Order set aside.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 337, 494, 169, 170, 204—Sea Customs Act (VIII of 1878), Secs. 167(81), 187A—Person against whom process not issued by Magistrate whether competent witness against his accomplice—Admissibility of such person's evidence—Whether police officer bound to forward to Magistrate every person who might be guilty of commission of offence—Magistrate whether bound to issue process against all persons shown to be accused—Mere admission of guilt or confession during investigation of offence whether amounts to sufficient evidence within s. 170, Criminal Procedure Code—Whether such admission or confession amounts to sufficient ground for proceeding under s. 204 of Code—Magistrate before whom complaint made by Customs Officer under s. 167(8) of Sea Customs Act—Whether Magistrate can proceed against person whose name not mentioned in complaint.

A person becomes an accused person only when a process is issued against him by a Magistrate. It is only such an accused who is incompetent to depose at the trial against his other co-accused in absence of any conditional grant of pardon

*Decided, January 17, 1964. Criminal Appeal No. 961 of 1962 (with Criminal Appeals Nos. 960, 962 to 964 of 1962, Criminal Appeal No. 989 of 1962, and Criminal Revision Application No. 492 of 1962), against the order of conviction and sentence passed by V. M. Gehani, Special Judicial Magistrate and Presidency Magistrate, II Court, Esplanade, Bombay, in Criminal Case No. 1/W of 1962.

under s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, by a competent authority, or withdrawal of the prosecution case against him under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code and after a formal order of discharge or acquittal having been recorded by a Magistrate in that respect. A person over whom the Magistrate does not exercise jurisdiction by issuing a process against him is a competent witness against his accomplice. There is no legal bar to the admissibility of his evidence.

Govinda v. Emperor,¹ Ramsaran v. Emperor,² Reg v. Hanmanta,³ Queen-Empress v. Dala Jiva,⁴ *Paban Singh v. The Emperor*⁵ and Baru Singh v. Emperor,⁶ distinguished.

Emperor v. Keshav Kortikar,⁷ explained.

*Amdumiyar Guljar Patel v. Emperor*⁸ and Queen-Empress v. Mona Puna,⁹ referred to.

It is not obligatory on a police officer to forward to a Magistrate each and every person who might be guilty of having committed an offence. A discretion has been given to him in this matter. Sections 169 and 170 of the Criminal Procedure Code read together make it clear that on completion of the investigation, the investigating officer has to consider whether there is "sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion to justify the forwarding of the accused to a Magistrate to stand his trial." If he comes to the conclusion that there is sufficient evidence or reasonable ground to justify the forwarding of the accused then s. 170 makes it obligatory on him to forward him to a Magistrate and not otherwise.

Similarly, when an accused is forwarded to a Magistrate, and the Magistrate has taken cognizance of an offence, it is not obligatory on the Magistrate to issue process against each and every person, shown to be an accused, and forward him for trial. But, on the other hand, under the provisions of s. 204 the Magistrate, has at that stage, before issuing process, to apply his mind and, it is only if in his opinion there is sufficient ground for proceeding against the person on the material placed before him, he has to issue a process.

A mere admission of guilt or confession during the investigation of an offence does not necessarily amount to sufficient evidence within the meaning of s. 170 of the Criminal Procedure Code, requiring the Police Officer to forward an accused person to a Magistrate; neither such admission or confession necessarily amounts to a sufficient ground for proceeding against him within the meaning of s. 204 of the Code.

When a complaint is made by a Customs Officer under s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, it is open to the Magistrate before whom the complaint is lodged, to proceed against a person against whom in his opinion there is sufficient material on record, even if his name is not mentioned as an accused in the complaint filed by the Customs Officer.

TAMBE J. All the aforesaid appeals and revision applications could be disposed of together as they arise out of the same trial held by the Special Judicial Magistrate and Presidency Magistrate, II Court, Esplanade, Bombay. The first five appeals are by the accused-Laxmipat, accused No. 1; Punamchand, accused No. 2; Balchand, accused No. 3; Kundanmal, accused No. 5; and Sanchital Daga, accused No. 6. The other appeal is by the State of Maharashtra against the order of the Special Magistrate acquitting the accused Hanmantlal Kothari, accused No. 8 at the trial. The revision application is by the State of Maharashtra, praying that the sentences passed against the aforesaid convicted accused be adequately enhanced.

The aforesaid six accused were being prosecuted for an offence under s. 120-B, Indian Penal Code, for being parties to a criminal conspiracy along with one Yau Mokchi Ethyl Wong and others, between February 1, 1959 and February 31, 1959, to acquire possession of and to be concerned in carrying, removing, harbouring, keeping, concealing and dealing with gold and precious and semi-precious stones chargeable with duty knowingly and with intent to defraud Government of duty payable thereon, and with intent to evade the prohibitory restriction for the time being in force with respect to gold and thereby having committed an offence punishable under s. 120-B, Indian Penal Code, read with s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act, 1878. The accused were further charged on four specific counts for having committed an offence under s. 167(81) in pursuance of the aforesaid conspiracy. It is not necessary to refer to all the details. All the aforesaid appellants-accused are convicted under s. 120-B, Indian Penal Code. Further, accused No. 1, Laxmipat, accused No. 2, Punamchand and accused No. 6, Sanchital Daga, are convicted under s. 167(81) on all the four counts, and accused No. 3, Balchand, has been convicted under s. 167(81) on three counts and accused No. 5 has been convicted under s. 167(81) on two counts. They have all been sentenced to various terms of imprisonment and also fine has been imposed on them.

The following facts are now no more in dispute. Laxmipat, Punamchand, Balchand and Kundanmal are brothers, Punamchand being the oldest of all of them. Sanchitlal Daga was their employee. Laxmipat and Punamchand, at the material time, resided at 144, Cotton Street, Calcutta and did business there. Accused No. 1, Laxmipat, also has business in Hong Kong and is doing business there under the name and style of Global Agencies at 28 Hollywood Road, Hong Kong. Accused No. 6 was the manager at Hong Kong, managing the business of Global Agencies since 1957 to March 4, 1959. Accused No. 5, Kundanmal, went to Hong Kong on February 25, 1959, to relieve accused No. 6, Sanchitlal Daga. From March 4, 1959, Kundanmal was the manager of Global Agencies till September 27, 1959. Accused No. 6 again went back to Hong Kong on or about August 19, 1959, and was its sole manager at any rate after September 27, 1959, to the end of the period of conspiracy. At the material time, accused No. 3, Balchand, was in charge of the Bombay branch of the business, and was residing at the top floor of Shalimar Building situate opposite Marine Lines Station. The business premises were situated on the third floor of Hanuman Buildings, Tambakanta Road, Bombay. The telephone numbers and telegraph addresses of these persons as well as the Global Agencies, which were at one time in dispute, are now admitted.

Yau Monkchi resides in Hong Kong and is doing business at his office located at 910 Yu To Sang building, Queens Road, Hong Kong. Yau is referred to in the correspondence as Yau or Yasmin. He is a Chinese citizen.

Sophia Wong P. W. 3, was an Air Hostess on the B.O.A.C. Air Lines, till the end of October 1959, and in course of her duties had to fly on the Hong Kong Calcutta route. In Calcutta, she used to stay at the Great Eastern Hotel. In her first trip to Calcutta, she met Yau Monkchi on being introduced by another Air Hostess Miss Tina Yup. Yau told her that he was in a tea business. During her stay in Calcutta, she met Yau three or four times and they exchanged cards as appears to be the custom among the Chinese. Sometime in September 1959, Yau rang her up and told her that he would like to come to see her at her house. She was not inclined to receive him at her house, and therefore she fixed up an appointment with him at the Grand Hotel Restaurant in Hong Kong. He kept the appointment and met her there. During the course of the conversation, he told her that he was purchasing a boat and invited her to join the cruise. She asked him what was the purpose of his meeting her and he replied that he wanted to do some business with her. She inquired as regards the nature of the business, and he told her that he wanted her to carry gold from Hong Kong to India and hand it over to somebody in Calcutta. He further informed her that she would be carrying gold concealed in a suit case. He also told her that he would pay her 1500 Hong Kong dollars for every trip she carried gold for him to India and further stated that before she carried the gold, he would tell her the name of the person in Calcutta and he would show the photograph of the person to whom the gold was to be delivered in Calcutta and also his telephone number, so that she would be in a position to contact and recognise him. He further promised to provide a suit case in which the gold would be carried. She considered the proposal to be a dangerous one, but Yau assured her that there was no risk involved therein and there was nothing to worry. He further warned her that she should not speak about it to anybody and if she divulged the secret he would get her anywhere. Feeling uneasy in her mind about the talk which she had with Yau, she spoke about it to Miss Curtin, P. W. 10, who was the Supervisor of the Air Hostesses in the B.O.A.C. office in Hong Kong, and told her that in these circumstances she would resign her job as an Air Hostess as she was frightened. Later she also told about the talk she had with Yau to one Olson whom she knew, and who at the material time was the service manager of B.O.A.C. She further told the same story to Mr. Harris, Police Officer in Hong Kong. As a result of her conversation with Mr. Olson and Mr. Harris, she agreed to meet Yau again, and on September 24, 1959, she met him at the Grand Hotel Restaurant by previous arrangement. He asked her to take gold from Hong Kong to Calcutta and to bring American Travellers' cheques from Calcutta. He stated that he had his men at Calcutta as well as at Bombay. Her next trip was to Delhi. He, therefore, proposed that she should carry gold on her next flight to Delhi and from Delhi she should send the gold by postal parcel to Calcutta. Thereafter he put in a telephone call and told her to forget about it and stated that he would contact her again and she should carry gold to Calcutta on her next trip. I should have stated earlier that Sophia at that time was not married, but was engaged to one Shielt, Police Sub-Inspector, whom she married by the time she gave evidence in Court. After the aforesaid conversation with Yau, she straight way went to her fiancée Shielt and told him in detail about the conversation she had with Yau. Shielt recorded on the typewriter what she had told him. She read the typed copy and satisfied herself that Shielt had correctly recorded what she told him. Shielt then called Mr. Harris on telephone and on his arrival at Shielt's flat handed over the statement to him. That statement has been filed on record and it is marked as exh. 9. It bears Sophia's signature. It appears that Mr. Harris informed about these happening to Mr. Buchanan, Senior Security Officer of the B.O.A.C., having his office in London, and in response Mr. Buchanan had come to Hong Kong sometime in October 1959. On October 27, 1959, Yau contacted Sophia and she fixed up an appointment to meet him on October 29, 1959. It appears that a false roster was prepared for her showing that she was to fly to Calcutta on her next flight. On meeting Yau on October 29, she told him that she was prepared to carry gold and showed him the roster. Yau then told her that he would meet her at her flat that evening and bring the suit case and gold with him at that time. That suit case was to be used by her as her own suit case, and she should fill in the suit case with her clothes, so that the suit case should look filled. After this interview, she told Shielt about the arrangement she had made with Yau and it was arranged that Sub-Inspector Yu Tat Ming, P.W. 4, with two detectives should go to her flat before Yau arrived and lay in a trap. Mr. Yu and the two detectives accordingly went to her place and kept themselves hiding in a bed-room which was in use of Sophia's mother. It was arranged between Mr. Yu and her that when Yau showed her gold, she should give him a signal by going into the bath room and slamming its door twice. Yau came to her flat at about 8 p.m. that night with a grey suit case. They sat in the sitting room and she asked him to show gold. He stated that he would not show her gold in the sitting room as they might be seen by others. Both of them then went into the bed-room and she drew up the curtain of the bed-room but did not close the bed-room door, telling that there was nobody in the house. It appears that at the bottom of the bed-room doors both of hers as well as her mother's bed-room there was a small opening in which bars were fixed and by kneeling down one could see through the bars what was happening in the other bed-room. After going into her bed-room, he put the suit case on the bed and showed her where the gold was hidden. He unscrewed the right hand bottom metal corner with a specially made key and when the corner was opened two small pieces of thread became visible. He then removed the corner and pulled two strips of gold from each side of the suit case meeting at that corner. He then similarly took out two more strips of gold from the diagonally opposite corner by removing the metal corner with the same key. He then put back the gold strips and refastened the metal corners and locked it. He then handed over the key to her and asked her to take out the gold. By following the method shown, she then took out the strips and put them back again. They then left the suit case in the bed-room and came back in the sitting room. There he showed her the photograph and gave the visiting card and told her that the photograph was of the man to whom gold was to be handed over and on the visiting card was his name and the address and telephone number. He did not hand over either the photograph or the visiting card, but asked her to copy the name, address and telephone number appearing on the visiting card. She then copied the same and went to the bath-room and gave the agreed signal and locked herself in the bath-room. On getting the signal, Sub-Inspector Yu and the two detectives came out of the other bed-room and on being asked to come out by Mr. Yu she came out of the bath-room after five minutes. She saw Sub-Inspector Yu, two detectives, Police Officers, Mr. Harris and Mr. Buchanan along with Yau standing in the lounge. She then told them where the suit case was and also the place where the gold was concealed in the suit-case. She also gave to the police officer a slip of paper on which she had copied the name, address and the telephone number from the visiting card. She then showed how gold was to be taken out of the suit case and actually took out of the gold in their presence. Sub-Inspector Yu then searched Yau and took out from his pockets some money, a leather wallet and some papers. In the leather wallet were found two photographs, one of accused No. 1 and the other of accused No. 3; three pieces of paper bearing the name, address and telephone number of accused No. 3, and the visiting card of accused No. 1. Besides 26 other visiting cards including one of Ethyl Wong, P.W. 1. and one of Sophia. Mr. Yu also seized the suit case, the gold strips in the suit case on being taken out by Sophia, the key by which Sophia had opened the bottom corners of the suit case, and the paper exh. "Q" on which she had copied the name, address and telephone number of accused No. 1 from the visiting card shown to her by Yau. Yu then arrested Yau.

Mr. Buchanan thereafter went and met the Indian High Commissioner at Hong Kong and asked him to intimate Mr. Shriwastava, P.W. 27, Deputy Director of Revenue Intelligence at Delhi. Information was given to him of the names, addresses and telephone numbers which had come out of the search of Yau. Mr. Yu also on receiving further instructions, took Yau to his office at No. 910 Yu To Sank Building and carried out the search of the premises and there seized some cables, visiting cards, goldsmith bills and a paper-slip containing addresses. He also seized the account books of Yau. Amongst the papers seized included one visiting card of accused No. 6, and five cables including one from Ethyl Wong saying "Happy Birthday Evelyn" dated September 14, 1959, sent to Hong Kong from Bombay. In due course, Yau was put up for trial and was sentenced to six months rigorous imprisonment in connection with the gold seized from Sophia's house for attempting to employ Sophia to get the gold out of Hong Kong.

On October 30, 1959, on receiving instructions, Detective Inspector Williams of the Hong Kong Police, P.W. 6, executed a search warrant in the premises of Global Agencies situate at 28 Hollywood Road, Hong Kong. He entered the premises at 3.30 p.m. At that time, only an office boy and a servant were present. At 4 o'clock, accused No. 6, Sanchitlal came in the premises. Williams disclosed to him the identity and showed him his search warrant and his identity card. Accused No. 6 then told him that he was the person in charge of the premises and a search was then taken of the premises. A large number of documents which consisted of letters, cables, accounts, cheque counter-foils, cheque books, files of gold and documents and other documents were seized and were taken to the police headquarters and kept secured for the night. On the next day, on a request being made by accused No. 6, the current cheque books were returned to him. Accused No. 6 in return passed a receipt in token of having received those cheque books. This receipt is on record and is admitted by accused No. 6 to be the receipt executed by him. The other documents remained in the office of Williams under his lock and key. On November 1, 1959, Mr. Shriwastava, Deputy Director of Revenue Intelligence, New Delhi, came to Hong Kong and examined the documents which had been seized from the premises of Global Agencies. Mr. Shriwastava then asked that some of the documents be photo-stated. Accordingly, those documents were taken in batches to a room and photo-stated by the clerk of the Police Department in charge of photo-stating. After each batch was photo-stated, the originals were compared with the photo-stated copies by Williams as well as the Indian Embassy Official, and a special stamp paper for the purpose was affixed on each document showing that it was a correct photo-stat of the original. Out of the cables seized, only 8 have been photo-stated, and of the rest copies were prepared as the photo-stat paper ran out. On the copies made by hand also, the aforesaid seal has been affixed as they being correct copies of the originals. After this was done, the originals of all the documents were taken back by Williams and kept in office till February 17, 1960, on which date they were returned to accused No. 6 on his request, under instructions of Superintendent Hanais. At the time of returning the documents to him, Mr. Williams took an undertaking from accused No. 6 that he would produce the documents when required and also obtained from him a receipt for having received the documents back. The undertaking executed by accused No. 6 is on record and is exh. Z-4. The photo-stats and other copies of these documents were given to Mr. Shrivastava. On receiving further instructions, Williams went to the premises of Global Agencies on April 29, 1960, and reminding accused No. 6 of his undertaking asked him to produce the documents. Accused No. 6 then handed back the original documents which had been seized from the premises of the Global Agencies to Williams. Later, however, in consequence of the order made by the Supreme Court of Hong Kong, these documents were returned by Mr. Williams to the clerk of the solicitors representing accused No. 6, on obtaining a receipt from him. At the trial, a notice was issued to all the accused to produce the original documents. All the accused except accused No. 6 stated that they did not receive the documents while accused No. 6 stated that the documents were not with him. The learned Magistrate has therefore allowed the prosecution to file the photo-stat copies made of these documents as secondary evidence of the contents of these documents. It may be stated that those documents contained letters written by the accused persons and in particular by accused Nos. 1, 2 and 3 and certain cables which form the material evidence in the case connecting the accused with the commission of the offence.

Now, on receiving the information from the Indian High Commissioner in Hong Kong about the seizure of photographs of accused Nos. 1 and 3, the visiting card of accused No. 1, and slips of paper containing the address of accused No. 3 from the person of Yau, the Director of Revenue Intelligence, Delhi, ordered searches to be carried out at various places both at Bombay and at Calcutta. Accordingly on October 31, 1959, P. W. 31, Basu, a Customs Officer at Calcutta, searched the residence of accused No. 1 at 144, Cotton Street, of which the telephone number was mentioned on the visiting card of accused No. 1 found with Yau. The flat was on the third floor, and consisted of three rooms, an open space, a kitchen, bath-room and a lavatory. Accused No. 2 and the wife and children of accused No. 1 were present in the house. Accused No. 1 also returned to the flat sometime after Basu had entered the flat. He was informed by accused No. 1 that one bed-room and a drawing room were occupied by accused No. 2. Accused No. 2 also confirmed this information. In the search a number of documents were seized including two diaries belonging to accused No. 1. They are Z-54 and Z-74, and some letters addressed to accused Nos. 1 and 2. On the same day, another Customs Officer, Datta, searched the premises of Bhuramal Manekchand at 4, Doyahatta Street, which was the address mentioned in the visiting card of accused No. 1 found with Yau Mok Chi, and in the search, a number of documents were seized including letters addressed to one P. C. Jain, a partnership deed, and an assessment order relating to accused No. 2 in regard to his firm at Mymensingh and some other documents relating to accused Nos. 1 and 2. At Bombay also on the same day, i.e. October 31, 1959, Preventive Officer Shirur of Bombay Customs searched the premises of B. L. Choraria & Co., Hanuman Building, third floor, Tambakanta Street, the address of accused No. 3, found in the papers seized from the person of Yau. At the premises, accused No. 3 was present. Shirur took charge of certain documents including a letter addressed to accused No. 3 from Assam. On February 22, 1960, Chaudhary, an officer of the Calcutta Customs, again searched the premises of Bhuramal at 4, Doyahatta Street, and seized a number of documents including letters addressed to accused Nos. 1 and 2, a dissolution deed of B. L. Choraria & Co., Calcutta, between accused Nos. 1 and 5 and their brother Girdharilal. On the same day, Preventive Officer Shirur of Bombay Customs searched the flat of accused No. 3 in the Shalimar Building, opposite Marine Lines Station, and took charge of a number of documents including an agreement for the purchase of that flat. On the same day, Preventive Officer Kazi of the Calcutta Customs, in the presence of the Assistant Collector, Mehta, searched the premises of B. L. Choraria & Co. in Hanuman Building and seized a number of documents which are Z-103 to Z-109. At this time also, accused No. 3 was present at the premises. On the next day, i.e. February 23, 1960, Basu, Officer from Calcutta Customs, searched the premises of accused No. 1 at 1, Minto Park, which is another residence of accused No. 1. Accused No. 1 was not present then. In the search, 34 visiting cards of accused No. 1 were seized from his cupboard. On the same day, Gupta, another Officer of Calcutta Customs, again searched the premises of Bhuramal at 4, Doyahatta Street, and took charge of a number of documents including 4 greeting cards and one picture card addressed to accused No. 2. We should have mentioned earlier that on November 4, 1959, Preventive Officer Mitter of Calcutta Customs searched the premises of the firm of Balchand in room No. 27 at 4, Doyahatta Street and recovered therefrom a number of letters addressed to accused No. 1, including one from the Ordnance Club, Calcutta. On June 15, 1960, Pande, Inspector of the Central Excise of Rajasthan, searched at Village Bidsar in Rajasthan the ancestral house of accused Laxmipat, Punamchand, Balchand, Kundanmal and Begraj. The documents seized included a diary of accused No. 2, a letter purporting to be written by accused No. 3 to Bhograj, and an insurance certificate of the car of accused No. 3. On January 13, 1961, Preventive Officer Advani of Bombay Customs again searched the premises of Balchand at Tambakanta Street, Bombay.

In September 1959, Williams took charge of a number of cheques from Chu Tai Bank and the Wing Lang Bank of Hong Kong, and they had also been seized and photo-stated. Similarly, in November 1959, under the instructions of Deputy Director Shriwastava, Williams made inquiries from cable and Wireless Hong Kong about the telegraphic addresses "Daga Co." and "Bomcal" to which various cables seized from the Global Agencies appeared to be addressed, and also about another telephonic address "Chorpken". He found that "Bomcal" was the address of Global Agencies, 28 Hollywood Road, Hong Kong, and "Daga Co." the address of S. L. Daga for the same premises, and "Chorpken" the telegraphic address of Yau Mok Chi's office premises. The Calcutta Customs had also taken charge of the originals of some of the cables found at Global Agencies, Hong Kong, and Inspector Sampat took charge of them from Calcutta Customs along with two letters and a receipt admittedly to be of accused No. 1 seized by the Calcutta Customs and lying with them.

A number of all these documents seized from the various premises along with the originals of the cables and diaries were sent to the Handwriting Expert for comparison. So also various letters seized from the office of Global Agencies, Hong Kong, were sent to the Handwriting Expert. The letters seized from the Global Agencies were divided into different series. Those purporting to be written by Laxmipat were marked as LC series; those purporting to be written by Punamchand were marked as PC series; those written by Balchand, BC series; those written by Kundanmal as KC series; and that by Hanmantlal Kothari, as HK series.

In March 1960, Mr. Shriwastava left the Directory, and thereafter he was not directly responsible for the investigation and the investigation appears to have been taken over by Mishra. But before he retired, it appears that Shriwastava had already been making inquiries in Hong Kong about the whereabouts of Ethyl Wong, Air Hostess, a wire "Happy Birthday Evelyn" from whom was seized from the premises of Yau, but he was unable to locate her. That information appears to have been placed by him on record and the investigation in that matter was taken over by Mishra. On April 6, 1960, a complaint was filed in the Court of the Chief Presidency Magistrate by K. S.

Dulipsinghji, Assistant Collector of Customs Preventive Department, Bombay, against the accused Laxmipat, Punamechand, Balchand, Bhuramal, Kundanmal, Sanchitlal Daga, Bhegraj, Hanmantlal Kothari, Ganeshmal, Bhivraj, and Yau Mok Chi, and in this complaint, accused No. 12 was shown as an unknown carrier. Bhegraj, Ganeshmal and Bhivraj were discharged. The trial did not proceed against Bhuramal and Yau Mok Chi, they being outside India, and not being brought into India. The trial, therefore, proceeded only against Laxmipat, Punamechand, Balchand, Kundanmal, Hanmantlal Kothari and Sanchitlal Daga, of whom Hanmantlal Kothari has been acquitted. The prosecution case in brief was that during the period commencing from about the beginning of March 1959 and extending upto October 31, 1959, the aforesaid accused and others unknown, conspired at Calcutta, Bombay and other places, for acquiring and/or causing to be acquired possession of, and/or carrying and/or causing to be carried, and/or removing and/or causing to be removed, and/or harbouring and/or causing to be harboured, and/or depositing and/or causing to be deposited, and/or keeping and/or causing to be kept, and/or concealing and/or causing to be concealed and/or otherwise dealing with and/or for being concerned with one or more of the aforesaid operations connected with contraband gold and precious stones and semi precious stones in large quantities of the total value of Rs. 3,00,000 knowingly and with intent to defraud the Government of the duty payable thereon and to evade the restrictions for the time being in force in respect of the importation of these articles. The said conspiracy between the above mentioned persons was a continuing conspiracy throughout the period March 1959 to October 31, 1959, at various centres including Bombay and Calcutta. The prosecution further alleged that in pursuance of the said conspiracy the aforesaid persons and others unknown from time to time on various occasions during the period mentioned above, acquired and/or caused to be acquired possession of diverse quantities of contraband gold weighing not less than 2900 tolas and contraband precious and semi-precious stones at Bombay, Calcutta and other places, and/or carried and/or caused to be carried in and to Bombay and Calcutta and other places, and/or harboured or deposited the same in Bombay and Calcutta and other places and/or removed and/or caused to be removed the same in or to Bombay and Calcutta and other places, and/or kept and concealed and/or caused to be kept and concealed the same in Bombay, Calcutta and other places, and/or otherwise dealt with, and/or concerned themselves with one or more of the said operations connected with the said contraband gold and precious and semi-precious stones in Bombay, Calcutta and other places. The prosecution further alleged that all the aforesaid contraband gold was illegally imported into India in contravention of the various notifications referred to in the complaint. On these facts, the complainant submitted that the accused were guilty of offences punishable under s. 120B, Indian Penal Code, read with s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act, 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act, and s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act read with s. 109 or 114 of the Indian Penal Code.

The learned Magistrate has found that the prosecution has not been able to establish its case so far as the importation of precious stones is concerned, but the learned Magistrate, as stated above, has found that the prosecution has been able to establish its case so far as the conspiracy to import contraband gold is concerned, and its importation on four occasions in Bombay.

All the accused denied to have been parties to any conspiracy or of being in any way concerned with the deliveries of gold alleged to have been made to them. Accused No. 1 admitted that the firm of Global Agencies is his and that accused No. 6 was its manager from December 1957 to February 1959. He further admitted that accused No. 5, his brother Kundanmal, was the manager of Global Agencies from February 1959 to September 27, 1959, and accused No. 6 who had gone to Hong Kong on August 19, 1959, took charge from his brother Kundanmal. He, however, denied that the Global Agencies had anything to do with gold smuggling business or with Yau Mok Chi.

According to him, his business was export and import business with foreign countries. He denied that the cables and letters found in the Global Agencies, which purported to have been written by him, were written by him, or that he had anything to do with those letters. He also denied that the account books on which the prosecution relied and which were found in the office of Global Agencies were his account books. According to him, these accounts were of Kundanmal and Sanchital Daga, accused Nos. 5 and 6. He denied having any acquaintance with Yau. He denied that he knew Ethyl Wong or had at any time met her or received gold from her. Accused No. 2 similarly denied that the letters and cables found in the office of Global Agencies and which purported to have been written by him were either written or sent by him. According to him, he had nothing to do with that business, as he was doing business in Mymensingh, Pakistan, and was in India for the last two years merely because he was unable to get a visa on his passport. He denied any connection with the firm of Bhuramal at 4, Doyahatta Street, Calcutta. He also denied any connection with B. L. Choraria & Co. at Bombay except that he holds a power-of-attorney for that firm from Kundanmal. Accused No. 3, Balchand, also denied that he received any gold from Ethyl Wong or that he knew her. According to him, he has been falsely implicated. He also denied his connection with the company of B. L. Choraria in Bombay except that he holds a power-of-attorney from Kundanmal, who is the proprietor of that firm. According to him, he has never operated that power-of-attorney. He admits that he was staying at 91, Shalimar. He also denied that the letters found in the office of the Global Agencies and purported to have been written by him were written by him. Accused No. 5 admitted that he was in Hong Kong in charge of Global Agencies and had issued cheques in exhs. Z-12 and Z-13, but, according to him, Daga was doing separate business while at Hong Kong, and before he had left he had told him to do the work of his business and also to make payments to the parties producing slips bearing his code words which he had given. According to him, it was Daga who had opened accounts in his own name in the two banks and he was making payments by cheques only as per the instructions given by Daga. Accused No. 6, Sanchital Daga, admits that he was in charge of Global Agencies upto February 1959 and went again to Hong Kong on August 19, 1959. He, however, states that even though he had gone, accused No. 5 was looking after the business of Global Agencies till his return on September 27, 1958. He admits that he was in charge of the Global Agencies upto February 1959 and also after Kundanmal, accused No. 5, had returned to India. He, however, denies that he was a member of the conspiracy. According to him, he had no inkling of what kind of business was being conducted by the Global Agencies when he went back to Hong Kong. When he was asked about cheques, issued by him on September 28, 1959, he stated that Kundanmal before leaving had instructed him that, in case any instructions about payments regarding Yasmin or 'Lali' were received from Balchand, he was to send the cheque to Yau whose telephone number had been given to him by Kundanmal before leaving. According to him, he had issued that cheque for a foreign exchange transaction at the rate of 97½ as the counterfoil shows. When asked about the entries in the account books for his period in respect of Yasmin and Yau, he explained that these entries were made on the basis of instructions given to him by accused No. 5 before leaving. He admits that the documents, letters, cables, account books, and counter-foils etc., seized from the office of the Global Agencies were of the Global Agencies and he also admits photo-stat copies produced by the prosecution as copies of the documents so seized. He admits all the letters of the period of his stay received by the Global Agencies as having been received by him from the respective accused. He admits that they are in the handwriting of the respective accused as proved by the Handwriting Expert's evidence, except those purporting to have been written by Hanmantlal Kothari.

We have already stated that the complaint was filed on April 6, 1960. At that time, the prosecution had not been able to know the whereabouts of Ethyl Wong, and the material evidence in possession of the prosecution at the time consisted of the photo-stat copies of various letters purported to be written by the accused, and seized from the office of Global Agencies, the account-books of Global Agencies, the counter-foils of cheques, cables and cheques obtained from the bank of Hong Kong and the evidence of Sophia Shieltz and the Police Officers of Hong Kong. Later, during the pendency of the case, the Customs Officer, Mr. Mishra learnt that Ethyl Wong was coming to Bombay during the course of her duties on December 27, 1960. On receiving this information that she was due to arrive in Bombay on December 27, 1960, by Air India International Plane from Hong Kong, he met her at the Air Port when the plane arrived there at about 4 a.m. He then questioned her about her activities in Bombay. She first gave vague answers, but after some time when Mishra confronted her with her visiting card which was found in possession of Yau Mok Chi, exh. A in the case, and the cable sent by her to Yau "Happy Birth Day Evelyn" exh. B in the case, she came out with her story and made a statement admitting her part in the affair, though in that statement she mentioned her Bombay visits as having taken place before the Calcutta visits. She was asked to describe the man to whom she had delivered gold. She actually gave the name of the man as accused No. 1 as the person to whom she had delivered gold at Calcutta. When asked as regards the person to whom she had delivered gold in Bombay, she could not give his full name, but stated that she had delivered gold to one Choraria. She was then asked to describe the two persons to whom she had delivered gold one at Calcutta and one at Bombay, and after she had given the description of these two persons, she was shown two photographs, exhs. T and U, which admittedly are of accused Nos. 1 and 3, respectively, and which had been found with Yau at Hong Kong. After seeing the photos, she identified the photo of accused No. 1 as the person to whom she had delivered gold in Calcutta and the photo of accused No. 3 as the person to whom she had delivered gold in Bombay. When asked about the visiting card of accused No. 1, she gave description of the visiting card as a light blue with red design, and identified exh. "V" as the visiting card of accused No. 1. It may be mentioned that exh. V is the visiting card of accused No. 1 which was found with Yau and seized from his person. She also told Mishra that she would be able to point out the place where accused No. 1 resides. After she had completed her statement, she was allowed to go to the Air Lines Hotel in which accommodation is usually reserved for the Air Hostesses of Air India International.

Subsequently, on going through the statement, Mishra P.W. 69, found a number of discrepancies. He, therefore, sent another Customs Officer, Kazi, P.W. 36. Kazi accordingly went to her on December 29, 1960. She corrected some misstatements which had crept in her first statement, the material correction being that her Calcutta visits were prior to Bombay visits, and not Bombay visits first and Calcutta visits later, as stated by her in her first statement. Kazi then told her to point out the house where she had delivered gold. She then took Kazi to the Marine Lines Station and pointed out the Shalimar Building opposite Marine Lines Station. She further stated that accused No. 3 was residing on the top floor of Shalimar Building. It appears that the case was fixed for evidence on January 2, 1961, and on that day Ethyl Wong was put in the witness box as the first prosecution witness. She was examined on January 2, January 3, January 4, January 5, and January 6, on which date, it appears, her examination-in-chief was concluded, and her cross-examination appears to have been postponed to March 1, 1961.

When Ethyl Wong appeared on March 1, 1961, for being cross-examined, an application was filed on behalf of the accused that the Court should direct that she be joined as a co-accused and tried for the offences mentioned in the charge framed by the Court against the accused. The grounds on which this application was founded were that on her admission she had been a party to the said offence; that she has not been discharged or acquitted by any Court of competent jurisdiction, nor has she secured lawful pardon; that the customs authorities had no right or power to let go an admitted offender merely for the purpose of securing her evidence against others; that the evidence given by the said witness is evidence against her inasmuch as she has not been compelled to answer any incriminating questions and has voluntarily chosen to give evidence in consideration of the Customs Authorities refraining from prosecuting her; that she has also made a confession to the Customs Officers; that the cognizance of the offences having been taken upon a proper complaint filed as required by s. 187A of the Sea Customs Act there is no bar to trying any person who appears to the Court to be concerned therein; and that under the binding authorities of the Bombay High Court, the Court is under an obligation to have her tried for the said offences. This application was opposed on behalf of the prosecution. The learned Magistrate did not feel called upon to consider the question of making her an accused person at that stage. In the order rejecting the application he, however, observed:

"I do not feel called upon to consider the question of making her an accused person at this stage. I will, however, consider the question at the end of this trial when I have full and clear picture of the case and of the criminality or otherwise of the act of various persons involved in it including this witness."

The material incriminating prosecution evidence thus consists, besides the aforesaid pieces of evidence to which we have already made reference, of the evidence of Ethyl Wong also. In view of the corroborative evidence tendered by the prosecution to her evidence, the learned Magistrate has accepted her evidence. Her evidence is direct evidence and clearly establishes that she brought gold given to her by Yau, smuggled it at the Customs barrier and delivered it to accused No. 1 at Calcutta and accused No. 3 at Bombay. Deliveries in Calcutta were made on ten occasions and those in Bombay were made on four occasions. There is no substantive charge in respect of the deliveries made at Calcutta, but the substantive charge is only in respect of the four deliveries made in Bombay.

Turning to the appeals filed by the accused, it is first necessary to consider certain legal contentions raised by Mr. N. C. Chattarjee and Mr. Jethmalani, who appear for accused Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 5, and Mr. Porus Mehta, who adopted their contentions for accused No. 6.

The first point raised by the learned counsel refers to the admissibility of the evidence of Ethyl Wong. The contentions are three-fold. Firstly, it is contended that Ethyl Wong has, in fact, been arraigned as an accused along with other accused. She has not been granted pardon under s. 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code, nor has the prosecution been withdrawn against her under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code. She is, therefore, not a competent witness. In the second instance, it is contended that her evidence has been admitted on record in violation of the provisions of art. 21 of the Constitution, and therefore, her evidence is wholly inadmissible. Lastly, it is contended that the prosecution in putting her up as a prosecution witness, has violated the provisions of art. 14 of the Constitution, and therefore, her evidence is inadmissible. The argument on the first contention is that in the complaint filed, the carrier of gold has been made an accused by showing unknown carrier as accused No. 12. The unknown carrier became a known carrier when Mishra recorded the statement of Ethyl Wong. Her statement recorded by Mishra is self-incriminating and she has condemned herself by her own statement. Her statement being to the Customs Officer is admissible in evidence. She is, therefore, in fact, an accused person at the trial, and an accused person cannot be a competent witness against the co-accused in absence of grant of pardon to her under s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code, or withdrawal of the case against her under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code. As regards the second and third contentions, the argument in short is that there is an obligation on the agency charged with administering criminal laws to send up for trial any person against whom there is sufficient evidence to warrant a conviction or at least warrant a framing of a charge. There is no power vested in the prosecution agencies to pick and choose those whom they would prosecute and whom they would not with a view of securing their evidence. The legitimate methods for securing their evidence are either to put up a person for trial and secure a pardon under s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code, or withdraw the prosecution under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code, or on a plea of guilty of that person, convict and sentence him and then examine him as a witness, or by ordering a separate trial of that person, examine him as a witness as against the other accused. But, in any event, the person, who is found to have committed an offence, must be arraigned as an accused and not examined as a witness without his having first been arraigned as an accused. Securing the evidence of such a person without sending him up for trial is improper and illegal. In a case where the prosecuting agency fails to perform its duty, it is obligatory duty of the Court to proceed against such person under s. 204, Criminal Procedure Code, and make him an accused along with other accused, or start a separate criminal case against him under s. 351, Criminal Procedure Code. In the instant case, there has been a breach of this obligatory duty both on the part of the prosecuting agency as well as the trying Magistrate.

Ethyl Wong has been examined as a witness without following any of the aforesaid courses and without having been made an accused. Prejudice to the other accused is apparent. It has been further alleged that following this improper course of examining her without taking proper steps for securing her evidence has resulted in violation of arts. 21 and 14 of the Constitution, and therefore, the evidence of Ethyl Wong is wholly inadmissible.

In this connection, learned counsel for the accused have referred us to the decisions in *Govinda v. Emperor*¹; *Queen-Empress v. Mona Puna*²; *Emperor v. Keshav Kortikar*³; *Ramsaran v. Emperor*⁴; *Reg v. Hamanta*⁵; *Queen-Empress v. Dala Jiva*⁶; *Paban Singh v. The Emperor*⁷; *Santokhi Beldar v. Emperor*⁸; *Banu Singh v. Emperor*⁹; and in particular to the observations made in Govinda v. Emperor; Emperor v. Keshav Kortikar; and Ramsaran v. Emperor.

Mr. Khandalawala, on the other hand, contends that the whole argument of the learned counsel for the appellants-accused is misconceived. It proceeds on the assumption that Ethyl Wong was an accused person. According to Mr. Khandalawala, she has not been made an accused inasmuch as no process was issued against her by the Magistrate. On the day the complaint was filed, her whereabouts were not known; even her name was not known to the complainant. She had not been forwarded to the Magistrate to stand her trial. She was, therefore, a competent witness on the day she entered the witness box, and in examining her, neither art. 14 nor art. 21 has been infringed. At any rate the matter has been decided by the trying Magistrate and he has refused to join her as an accused. The order may be erroneous, but no infringement of either art. 14 or art. 21 is involved in a judicial order of the Court even if it may be erroneous. In the alternative, Mr. Khandalawala argued that under the Sea Customs Act, there is an absolute right vested in the customs authorities either to forward a person for trial or not, and unless and until a customs officer in a complaint under s. 187A of the Act names a person as an accused, it is not open to the Magistrate to proceed against him treating him as an accused person. Reference was made to some observations in Budhan Choudhry v. State of Bihar.¹⁰

Now, all these rival contentions raised by counsel for the parties relating to the admissibility of evidence of Ethyl Wong could be conveniently disposed of together inasmuch as the arguments are overlapping. The relevant Act relating to the competency of a witness to depose is the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, and when we turn to s. 118, we find that all persons have been considered competent to testify unless the Court considers that they are prevented from understanding the questions put to them, or from giving rational answers to those questions, by tender years, extreme old age, disease, whether of body or mind, or any other cause of the same kind. To this general rule, ss. 121 to 129 are exceptions. Ethyl Wong undoubtedly is a competent witness under s. 118 of the Evidence Act, and her case does not fall under any of the exceptions contained in ss. 121 to 129 of the Act. Further, s. 133 in terms provides that an accomplice shall be a competent witness against an accused person; and the conviction is not illegal merely because it proceeds upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. The rule of prudence, however, has been stated in ill. (b) to s. 114, that an accomplice is unworthy of credit, unless he is corroborated in material particulars. It would thus be seen that under the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act Ethyl Wong, though she might have been an accomplice, was a competent witness to testify against the accused who were charged with having committed offences and were put on trial.

It has next to be seen whether there are any other provisions in any other Act which operate as a bar to the competency of Ethyl Wong to testify, and, as already stated, reliance has been placed on certain provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code. Chapter XIV of the Code deals with the information to the police and their powers to investigate. Section 154 relates to the procedure to be followed in recording information in cognizable cases. Section 155 relates to the procedure to be followed in recording information in non-cognizable cases. A police officer, by virtue of s. 156 is empowered to investigate into cognizable cases. He is not authorised to investigate into non-cognizable cases unless the Magistrate orders him to do so. Powers to investigate include power to summon witnesses, power to examine witnesses, recording their statements, power to search, and the report by the subordinate officer, when the investigation has been made by him, to the police officer in charge of the police station. It may be stated that in the event the investigating officer finds that the investigation could not be completed within 24 hours, s. 167 requires the person arrested or detained in custody to be sent to the nearest Judicial Magistrate and obtain a remand order from him. Section 169 provides that if, upon an investigation made under this Chapter, it appears to the officer in charge of the police station or to the police officer making the investigation that there is not sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion to justify forwarding of the accused to a Magistrate, such officer shall, if such person is in custody release him on his executing a bond, with or without sureties, as such officer may direct, to appear, if and when so required, before a Magistrate empowered to take cognizance of the offence on a police report and to try the accused or commit him for trial. Sub-section (1) of s. 170 provides that if, upon an investigation under this Chapter, it appears to the officer in charge of the police station that there is sufficient evidence or reasonable ground as aforesaid, such officer shall forward the accused under custody to a Magistrate empowered to take cognizance of the offence upon a police report and to try the accused or commit him for trial, or, if the offence is bailable and the accused is able to give security shall take security from him for his appearance before such Magistrate on a day fixed and for his attendance from day to day before such Magistrate, until otherwise directed. The other sub-sections of s. 170 are not material for the purposes of this case. Section 190 relates to cognizance of offences by Magistrates. Section 204(1) provides that if in the opinion of a Magistrate taking cognizance of an offence there is sufficient ground for proceeding, and the case appears to be one in which, according to the fourth column of the second schedule, a summons should issue in the first instance, he shall issue his summons for the attendance of the accused. If the case appears to be one in which, according to that column, a warrant should issue in the first instance, he may issue a warrant, or, if he thinks fit, a summons, for causing the accused to be brought or to appear at a certain time before such Magistrate or if he has no jurisdiction himself, some other Magistrate having jurisdiction. It is not necessary to refer in detail to the provisions relating to examination of witnesses, framing of charges etc., or the different procedure to be followed in a trial of a summons case or a warrant case, or the procedure to be followed in a summary trial. It is, however, necessary to notice certain general provisions as to inquiries and trial contained in Chapter XXIV of the Code. Section 337(1) relates to the tender of pardon to an accomplice, and it provides that in the case of any offence triable exclusively by the High Court or Court of Session, or any offence punishable with imprisonment which may extend to seven years or any offence under any of the following sections of the Indian Penal Code, namely, ss. 161, 165, 165A, 216A, 369, 401, 435 and 477A, the District Magistrate, a Presidency Magistrate, a Sub-Divisional Magistrate or any Magistrate of the first class may, at any stage of the investigation or inquiry into, or the trial of, the offence, with a view to obtaining the evidence of any person supposed to have been directly or indirectly concerned in or privy to the offence, tender a pardon to such person on condition of his making a full and true disclosure of the whole of the circumstances within his knowledge relative to the offence and to every other person concerned, whether as principal or abettor, in the commission thereof. Section 338 provides that at any time after commitment, but before judgment is passed, the Court to which the commitment is made may, with the view of obtaining on the trial the evidence of any person supposed to have been directly or indirectly connected in, or privy to, any such offence, tender, or order the committing Magistrate or the District Magistrate to tender, a pardon on the same condition to such person. Sub-section (1) of s. 342 provides that for the purpose of enabling the accused to explain any circumstances appearing in the evidence against him, the Court may, at any stage of any inquiry or trial without previously warning the accused put such questions to him as the Court considers necessary, and shall, for the purpose aforesaid, question him generally on the case after the witnesses for the prosecution have been examined and before he is called on for his defence. Sub-section (2) of s. 342 provides that the accused shall not render himself liable to punishment by refusing to answer such questions, or by giving false answers to them; but the Court and the jury, if any, may draw such inference from such refusal or answers as it thinks just. Sub-section (3) is not material for the purpose of this case. Sub-section (4) provides that no oath shall be administered to the accused when he is examined under sub-s. (1). Section 342A provides that any person accused of an offence before a Criminal Court, shall be a competent witness for the defence and may give evidence on oath in disproof of the charges made against him or any person charged together with him at the same trial, provided that (a) he shall not be called as a witness except on his own request in writing; or (b) his failure to give evidence shall not be made the subject of any comment by any of the parties or the Court or give rise to any presumption against himself or any person charged together with him at the same trial. Section 343 provides that except as provided in ss. 337 and 338, no influence, by means of any promise or threat or otherwise, shall be used to an accused person to induce him to disclose or withhold any matter within his knowledge.

Nowhere in the Criminal Procedure Code, the term "accused" has been defined. But the word has been used in two senses—first, in the sense of a person against whom an accusation has been made but against whom no process has been issued; secondly, a person over whom a Magistrate is exercising jurisdiction by issuing a process against him. The only sections which operate as a bar on examining an accused person as a witness are ss. 342 and 342A, and there is no other section in the Criminal Procedure Code of which we are aware, or which has been pointed out to us, which enacts a bar preventing an accused person from entering the witness box. In this connection, it may be stated that s. 342 has recently been amended by Amending Act of 1955, and the concluding words "when he is examined under sub-section (1)" have been added by the said Amending Act in sub-s. (4). Prior to the amendment, sub-s. (4) read "No oath shall be administered to the accused." This amendment was necessitated because s. 342A was added by the Amending Act, and this new section enabled the accused to enter the witness box and give evidence on oath "in disproof of the charges made against him or any person charged together with him at the same trial." Having regard to the legislative history of s. 342 and the aforesaid amendments recently effected, it is clear that prior to the amendment, there was a total bar in the matter of administering oath to an accused person. That total bar has to certain extent been relaxed, and the oath is allowed to be administered to an accused person for the limited purpose of rendering him a competent witness in favour of his own defence or for the purpose of defence of his co-accused. The statutory bar thus created prohibiting oath to be administered to the accused and thereby preventing him from being a competent witness in a trial is applicable only to a person who has been an accused in the stricter sense in the trial, namely, a person over whom the Court has exercised jurisdiction by issuing process against him. There is thus no bar in the Criminal Procedure Code anywhere prohibiting a person who has committed a crime from giving evidence, save and except at the trial in which he has been made an accused, the Court having issued process against him. To avail the evidence of such a person in the trial the procedure contemplated by the Criminal Procedure Code is one contained in s. 337, namely, grant of pardon. Consideration of the aforesaid relevant provisions would also show that it has not been rendered obligatory on a police officer to forward to a magistrate each and every person who might be guilty of having committed an offence. A discretion has been given to him in this matter. Sections 169 and 170 when read together make it clear that on completion of the investigation, the investigating officer has to consider whether there is "sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion to justify the forwarding of the accused to a Magistrate to stand his trial." If he comes to the conclusion that there is sufficient evidence or reasonable ground to justify the forwarding of the accused then s. 170 makes it obligatory on him to forward him to a Magistrate, and not otherwise. Similarly, when an accused is forwarded to a Magistrate, and the Magistrate has taken cognizance of an offence, it is not obligatory on the Magistrate to issue process against each and every person, shown to be an accused, and forwarded to him for trial. But, on the other hand, the provisions of s. 204, Criminal Procedure Code, enact that the Magistrate has, at that stage, before issuing process, to apply his mind and, it is only if in his opinion there is sufficient ground for proceeding against the person on the material placed before him, he has to issue a process. It is thus clear that both the investigating officer as well as the Magistrate has a discretion conferred on him in this matter, obviously because the very object of forwarding an accused to a Magistrate or the Magistrate issuing a process against him, is to ascertain his guilt, and unless there be any legal evidence available against the accused, forwarding the person to stand his trial or issuing a process against him would result in waste of public time and money.

Turning to the facts of the case, no process has been issued by the trying Magistrate against Ethyl Wong. She is not, therefore, an accused along with the other accused who were put on trial. The bar created by s. 342 or 342A, Criminal Procedure Code, therefore, did not operate on her, and no question of granting pardon to her under s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code or withdrawing the prosecution against her under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code arose, before she was put in the witness box. As already stated, there is no section in the Evidence Act which renders her an incompetent witness to testify at the trial of the accused. On the other hand, in view of the express provisions of the Evidence Act, she is a competent witness to testify at the trial. The mere fact that the complaint mentioned the unknown carriers as accused does not render the carrier as an accused person unless the Court issues a process against any one of those carriers, to bring their case within the mischief of s. 342 or 342A, Criminal Procedure Code.

It has next to be considered whether it was obligatory on the Customs Officer to send her up for trial along with the other accused after he had recorded her statement, in which she has confessed to the smuggling of gold, and whether it was obligatory on the Magistrate to allow the application of the appellants-accused wherein they had prayed that she be made a co-accused along with them. We have already stated that the provisions of ss. 169 and 170 confer a discretion on the investigating officer in the matter of forwarding a person for trial. He has to make up his mind and consider whether there is sufficient evidence to justify the forwarding of the person, and if there is sufficient evidence, he is required to forward the person to a Magistrate. On the other hand, if there is no sufficient evidence justifying the forwarding of a person, s. 169 requires him to release the person on his executing a bond. Similarly, ss. 202 and 204, Criminal Procedure Code, require a Magistrate to apply his mind to the material on record, and it is only when he comes to the conclusion on an examination of the material on record that there is sufficient evidence that he would be justified in issuing a process against him. Now, when Ethyl Wong's statement was recorded by the Customs Officer at the Air Port on December 27, 1960, or when her second statement was recorded on December 29, 1960, the only material evidence against her which the Customs Officer had before him were these two statements. It has not been urged before us that there was any other material. We have in narrating facts referred to the application made by the accused persons before the Magistrate, and the only material to which reference has been made in the application, which according to the appellants-accused, is evidence against her, is her own evidence. That material can hardly be said to be sufficient evidence justifying forwarding her for trial or issuing a process against her. There is no doubt that had she been put on trial, she would have retracted the statements made by her to the Customs Officer. It is well settled principle of prudence that even a confession duly recorded by a Magistrate is a very weak piece of evidence against the accused, unless it finds corroboration in material particulars. It is true that the statement having been recorded by the Customs Officer, the bar under s. 162, Criminal Procedure Code, may not come into play in respect of its admissibility as a substantive piece of evidence, but the weight that could be attached to it cannot be higher than that to a retracted confession. The statement recorded by the Customs Officer would, therefore, not necessarily amount to a sufficient ground for proceeding against her within the meaning of s. 204, Criminal Procedure Code. It has to be noticed that the trying Magistrate has in his order stated that he would consider the question of proceeding against her after this trial is over when he has a full and clear picture before him. In our opinion, therefore, neither the Customs Officer nor the Magistrate has committed a breach of either s. 170 or s. 204, Criminal Procedure Code, respectively. We may observe that s. 170 is, in terms, applicable only to the police officer and not to the Customs Officer. However, the case having been argued on the footing that the principle underlying the provisions of ss. 169 and 170, Criminal Procedure Code also governed the investigation made by Customs Officer, we are proceeding to consider the case on that footing. As already stated, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, there has been no breach of s. 170 on the part of the Customs Officer, and no breach of s. 204 on the part of the trying Magistrate. It, therefore, also cannot be said that there has been any violation of art. 21 of the Constitution, inasmuch as, in our opinion, in examining Ethyl Wong, there has been no breach of any procedure prescribed by law. On the other hand, in our judgment, the appellants-accused have been convicted in accordance with the procedure prescribed by law.

In our opinion, there has been no breach of art. 14 of the Constitution also. Article 14 has been recently considered by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *Ram Krishna Dalmia v. Justice Tendolkar*¹¹ and the general principle is well summarised in the Head-Note(d) in the following terms:

"It is now well established that while article 14 forbids class legislation, it does not forbid reasonable classification for the purposes of legislation. In order, however, to pass the test of permissible classification two conditions must be fulfilled, namely (i) that the classification must be founded on an intelligible differential which distinguishes persons or things that are grouped together from others left out of the group and (ii) that that differential must have a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the statute in question. The classification may be founded on different bases, namely, geographical, or according to objects or occupations or the like. What is necessary is that there must be a nexus between the basis of classification and the object of the Act under consideration. It is also well established by the decisions of the Supreme Court that article 14 condemns discrimination not only by a substantive law but also by a law of procedure."

In the matter of forwarding a person, who might have committed a crime, ss. 169 and 170, Criminal Procedure Code make a distinction between those against whom there is sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion justifying their forwarding and those against whom there is not sufficient evidence or reasonable ground of suspicion to justify their forwarding. This classification is intelligible having regard to the object of forwarding the accused for trial. The object of forwarding the accused is to ascertain his guilt. If there is no sufficient legal evidence against a person, there can be little doubt that forwarding such a person to a Magistrate to stand his trial would only involve waste of public time and money. Further, the discretion left to the Investigating Officer in the matter is not absolute. The Investigating Officer may not forward a person, and yet it is open to the Magistrate, taking cognizance of the offence, to issue a process against him under s. 204, Criminal Procedure Code, if, in his opinion, there is sufficient ground for proceeding against such a person. Sections 169 and 170, Criminal Procedure Code have not been challenged before us as unconstitutional. On the other hand, what is challenged before us is the action of the Customs Officer in not forwarding Ethyl Wong for trial as being violative of art. 14 of the Constitution. The appellants-accused and Ethyl Wong are not similarly situated. The evidence against the appellants-accused does not consist of confession or admission of guilt made by them during the investigation, while the evidence, if there be any, against Ethyl Wong is only her statement made by her during the investigation. We have already discussed that a mere admission of guilt or confession during the investigation does not necessarily amount to sufficient evidence within the meaning of s. 170, Criminal Procedure Code, requiring the Police Officer to forward an accused person to a Magistrate. That being the position, there has been no violation of art. 14 in not forwarding her to stand her trial along with the accused.

For reasons stated above, in our opinion, the three-fold contentions raised on behalf of the appellants-accused relating to the admissibility of the evidence of Ethyl Wong should fail.

And this brings us to the consideration of the decisions to which reference has been made by the learned counsel for the appellants-accused. In our opinion, these decisions are distinguishable on facts, and hardly assist the case of the appellants-accused.

In Govinda v. Emperor, the facts were that the appellants-accused together with one S were members of a gang and had jointly fabricated a bond. One of the accused had used that bond in a civil suit. It was discovered that the bond, on the basis of which the suit was filed by the accused, was fabricated. Sanction of the civil Court was necessary to prosecute that accused and others for fabricating false documents. The police promised to grant pardon to S, and he was examined as a witness before the civil Court. The civil Court granted sanction. At the trial, however, S was not made an accused, nor was pardon granted to him under s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code. On the other hand, S was examined at the trial as a witness against the appellants-accused, and on the strength of his evidence, they were convicted and sentenced. An objection was raised that S should have been placed before the Magistrate as an accused, and pardon granted to him under s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code; that not having been done, his evidence was inadmissible. It was further contended that his evidence was irrelevant under s. 24 of the Evidence Act, because the police inspector had granted pardon to S. In these circumstances, it was held that S ought to have been tried along with the appellants-accused, and the Magistrate ought to have issued a process against him under s. 204, Criminal Procedure Code, and the failure on the part of the Magistrate to issue process against him had seriously prejudiced the other appellants-accused, and consequently vitiated the whole proceedings. The observations on which particular reliance has been placed are in the following terms (p. 260):

"...It is true that the prosecution is not bound to have a pardon tendered to a person against whom there is evidence and is at liberty to put him up either for a joint or separate trial. But it is evasion of the law not to adopt any of these courses and tender him as witness under an unauthorised promise of pardon by pledging public faith not to prosecute him."

It is contended that such is the case here. The Customs Officer has neither put her up for trial along with the other accused, nor has he put her up to stand a separate trial, but, on the other hand, has granted her unauthorised pardon. We would later consider whether an unauthorised pardon has been granted to her by the Customs Officer. The aforesaid observations have been made in the context of the facts of that case, inasmuch as it appears that in the view of the learned Judge, there was evidence against S besides his own statement which would have justified his being put up for trial, and in these circumstances, it has been observed that he ought to have been put up for trial along with the other accused or separately tried, and that not having been done, it amounted to an evasion of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code. The following observations that precede the aforesaid observations make the position clear (p. 259):

"...An accomplice against whom there is no case apart from his own confession to the police may lawfully be kept back and tendered as a witness, for even a 'reasonable suspicion' cannot be based on what the law declares to be irrelevant. This however is not the position taken up here on behalf of the Crown, and in view of the manner in which the case was presented before the Magistrate it would be difficult to maintain it." Further, the view taken in Govinda v. Emperor has been over-ruled by a Full Bench decision of the Nagpur Judicial Commissioner's Court in Amdumiyar Guljar Patel v. Emperor.¹² Pollock A.J.C. in that case observed (p. 23):

"I agree that S. 337, Criminal P.C., is merely an enabling section that empowers a Magistrate to grant a pardon to any person supposed to be concerned in or privy to the offence and that the word 'accused' in Ss. 342 and 343 must mean a person who is accused in the case that is proceeding before the Magistrate. There was therefore nothing to prevent the administration of an oath to Shrawan and he was therefore a competent witness. The view expressed in Govinda v. Emperor, that in such a case it is imperative for the Magistrate to proceed against Shrawan and that his failure to do so makes the proceedings invalid, seems to me to be quite untenable. It is for the executive authorities to decide who is to be prosecuted, and under S. 204 the Magistrate must issue a summons, if he is of opinion that there is sufficient ground for proceeding, merely against those persons against whom a police report had been sent in under S. 170. I also agree that this method of obtaining evidence is contrary to the spirit of the Code and is strongly to be deprecated. It is not however illegal, but the evidence of a witness in Shrawan's position must ordinarily be of less value than that of a person who has been granted a valid pardon and is no longer under fear of a prosecution."

For the purposes of this case, it is not necessary for us to go to the extent the observations cited take us. It is sufficient to state that, at any rate, there is no illegality in not forwarding a person, against whom there is no evidence except his own statement. There is also no illegality in not issuing a process against such a person. What weight is to be given to his evidence would depend on the circumstances of the case.

In Emperor v. Keshav Kortikar, the facts were that on a complaint having been made to the police, an investigation was made, and a charge-sheet was sent up to the Magistrate in which the names of five persons were shown as accused persons. Two other persons, against whom there was evidence but who were meant to be used as witnesses against the accused persons, were mentioned in the column headed: "names and addresses of accused persons not sent up for trial", and also in the list of witnesses. At the trial of the accused, these two persons were examined as witnesses for the prosecution. A contention was raised on behalf of the accused who were sent for trial that the evidence of these witnesses was inadmissible. The observations of the learned Chief Justice on which strong reliance has been placed are in the following terms (p. 180):

"...As I have said, in my opinion, the proper course for the police to have adopted was to send up as accused persons to the Magistrate all those against whom they had obtained evidence in connection with the alleged offence, and I think that the learned Magistrate, when he found that the two persons described as accused persons not sent up for trial were amongst the witnesses, and must, therefore, be available, ought to have had those two persons arrested and brought before him. The Criminal Procedure Code gives certain powers under which the evidence of an accomplice can be made available. He can be granted a conditional pardon by the Magistrate under s. 337 of the Criminal Procedure Code, or the Public Prosecutor, with the consent of the Magistrate, can withdraw the charge under s. 494 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In my opinion those powers ought to be exercised where the prosecution consider that the evidence of an accomplice is necessary, and the police have no right to take upon themselves not to charge a person against whom they have evidence because they require him as a witness. Where that improper course is adopted, the evidence of the accomplice so obtained is entitled to very little weight."

It is contended that these observations equally apply to the facts of the present case. It is further argued that though such a course when adopted might have been improper prior to the Constitution coming into force, now it amounts to an illegality inasmuch as the procedure prescribed by law is not followed. According to Mr. Jethmalani, the procedure prescribed by law is that all persons who are suspected of having committed a crime must be sent up to the Magistrate by the police and the Magistrate also must in his turn issue a process against such persons even though the police failed to perform their duty. If the prosecution wants to examine any such person as a prosecution witness, the only course available is to have a conditional pardon under s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code, granted to him or withdraw the prosecution against him under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code. It is difficult to accept the argument of Mr. Jethmalani. In our opinion, art. 21 has not the effect of turning what was merely an impropriety or irregularity prior to the coming into force of the Constitution into an illegality after its coming into force. On the other hand, all that is provided by art. 21 is that if a person is to be deprived of his liberty, the procedure prescribed by law has to be followed. The procedure itself is in no manner changed. Apart from it, even assuming that the contention raised has any force, the observations have no application to the facts of the present case. The argument advanced overlooks the material part of the observations: "against whom they (prosecution) had obtained evidence in connection with the alleged offence." This part of the observation clearly indicates that the obligation is to send up for trial all persons against whom the police have obtained evidence during the course of the investigation. 'Evidence' clearly would mean legally admissible evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion that the conviction of the accused could prima facie be reasonably obtained. The observations do not mean that each and every person who might have committed an offence or taken part in the commission of the offence has to be sent up for trial. The learned Chief Justice in considering the question as to the admissibility of the evidence of even these two persons further observed (p. 181):

"...In my opinion, however irregular was the conduct of the police in this case, in point of fact these two persons, Laukar and Limaye, included in the second column of the charge-sheet, never were, properly speaking, accused persons. They certainly were not accused persons within the meaning of s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code. They were never under arrest and they were never sent up before a Magistrate and no process was ever issued against them. That being so, I think there is no provision of law which makes their evidence inadmissible."

The other learned Judge also similarly observed (p. 181):

"...The section which prevents an accused being examined on oath is s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code. That section, however, applies clearly only to a person who is on trial before a Court at the time, and he can be so brought before the Court only after process has been issued by the Magistrate against him under s. 204 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In the present case admittedly no such process had been issued against Laukar and he was, therefore, never before the Court as an accused. The mere inclusion of his name in the charge-sheet could not make him an accused for the purposes of s. 342 of the Criminal Procedure Code... I, therefore, agree that there was no legal objection to Laukar being examined on oath as a witness."

These material observations clearly support the view taken by us and run counter to the contention raised on behalf of the appellants-accused.

The question that arose in Ramsaran v. Emperor, was whether the Magistrate acted properly in allowing the case to be withdrawn against the accused who was put up for trial for having committed a serious offence, and who had confessed to the commission of the crime, so as to enable the prosecution to examine him at the trial. In these circumstances of the case it was held that the Magistrate did not act properly in allowing the prosecution to withdraw the case against such accused under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code. The learned Judge took the view that "...in cases where the prosecution wants to rely on the evidence of a dubious witness and get a man, who on his own confession is guilty, pardoned, then, if the offence falls within certain serious classes, S. 494 is not good enough and the trial should be by a Court of Session. It would be a wrong exercise of discretion to proceed under S. 494 when the provisions of S. 337(1) are available. If it is reprehensible to evade the rigours of S. 337(1) by not prosecuting the man at all, it is much more so after he has been arraigned as an accused and the trial has commenced."

It is to be noticed that this decision is distinguishable on facts. In the case before us, Ethyl Wong had not been sent up for trial, nor was there any evidence against her in the shape of her confession duly recorded by a Magistrate under s. 164, Criminal Procedure Code.

The material facts in Reg v. Hanmanta, were that a number of accused were sent up to stand their trial before a Magistrate for having committed certain frauds. To two of the accused, the Magistrate granted pardon under s. 337 of the then Criminal Procedure Code, on condition of their making a full disclosure of all the circumstances within their knowledge, and then these two accused were examined as witnesses. A question arose as to the admissibility of the evidence of these two witnesses, and it was held that under the provisions of the said section, as it then stood, pardon could only be granted in case of those offences which were specified in the Schedule of the Code as triable exclusively by the Court of Session. The offence of which the accused were charged was not such an offence. In these circumstances, it was held that the pardon granted was not a legal pardon, and therefore, these two accused not having been granted pardon legally, were not competent witnesses, and their evidence must, therefore, be rejected as absolutely inadmissible.

In Queen-Empress v. Dala Jiva, the view taken is similar to the one taken in Hanmanta's case, that pardon cannot be legally granted in a case which is not triable exclusively by a Court of Session.

The facts in Paban Singh v. The Emperor were that after the accused had been forwarded to the Magistrate for trial, the local Government granted a conditional pardon to one of the accused, and the prosecution then examined him as a witness at the trial. It was held that the only competent authority to grant pardon is one mentioned in ss. 337 and 338, Criminal Procedure Code and the local Government had no power to grant pardon. Pardon not having been granted by a competent authority was of no avail and the evidence was, therefore, inadmissible.

In Banu Singh v. Emperor, a number of accused were sent up for trial along with one Mohendra. The Court purporting to act under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code sanctioned withdrawal of the prosecution against Mohendra, but omitted to record a proper order of discharge of Mohendra as required by cl. (a) of s. 494. He was then examined as a witness. A question arose as to the admissibility of his evidence as against the other accused. The view taken was that there having been no order of discharge made by the Magistrate after allowing the withdrawal of the case as required by s. 494, Mohendra still continued to be an accused, and therefore, was an incompetent witness.

It would be seen that the aforesaid decisions in Reg v. Hanmanta, Queen-Empress v. Dala Jiva, Paban Singh v. The Emperor and Banu Singh v. Emperor have no relevance to the facts of the present case.

Similarly, the decision in Queen-Empress v. Mona Puna has no application to the facts of the present case. But, on the other hand, in our opinion, it runs counter to the contentions raised. The facts in that case were that during the course of the police investigation into a case of house breaking and theft several persons were arrested, one of whom named Hari made a certain disclosure to the police and pointed out several houses broken into by his accomplices. Thereupon the police discharged him, and made him a witness. At the trial, he gave evidence against his accomplices, who were all convicted. A question arose as to the admissibility of the evidence of Hari, and it was held that inasmuch as the trying Magistrate did not exercise any jurisdiction over Hari, he was not an accused person within the meaning of s. 342, Criminal Procedure Code. His evidence, therefore, was admissible against his accomplices who were put on trial.

Considering these cases, the propositions that would follow are that a person becomes an accused person only when a process is issued against him by a Magistrate. It is only such an accused who is incompetent to depose at the trial against his other co-accused in absence of any conditional grant of pardon under s. 337, Criminal Procedure Code, by a competent authority, or withdrawal of the prosecution case against him under s. 494, Criminal Procedure Code and after a formal order of discharge or acquittal, having been recorded by a Magistrate in that respect. A person over whom the Magistrate does not exercise jurisdiction by issuing a process against him is a competent witness against his accomplice. There is no legal bar to the admissibility of his evidence. It is not in dispute that no process has been issued against Ethyl Wong, and the trying Magistrate has not exercised any jurisdiction over her. She was, therefore, a competent witness. For the reasons stated, in our opinion, the three fold contentions raised on behalf of the appellants-accused as regards the admissibility of the evidence of Ethyl Wong should fail.

Before we proceed to the next point, it is necessary to refer briefly to one of the contentions raised by Mr. Khandalawala that the trying Magistrate had no jurisdiction to issue process and proceed against Ethyl Wong by virtue of the provisions of s. 187A of the Sea Customs Act. Section 187A reads:

"187A. No Court shall take cognizance of any offence relating to smuggling of goods punishable under item 81 of the Schedule to section 167, except upon complaint in writing, made by the Chief Customs-Officer or any other officer of Customs not lower in rank than an Assistant Collector of Customs authorised in this behalf by the Chief Customs-Officer."

Now, in our opinion all that is prohibited under the said s. 187A, is taking cognizance of any offence relating to smuggling of goods punishable under item 81 of the Schedule to s. 167, in absence of a complaint in writing by the Customs Officer mentioned in the section. But that does not mean that when a complaint has been made by the Customs Officer, it is not open to the Magistrate before whom the complaint has been lodged, to proceed against a person against whom in his opinion there is sufficient material on record, even if his name is not mentioned as an accused in the complaint filed by the Customs Officer. To put such a construction on s. 187A, as contended by Mr. Khandalawala is, on the language of the section itself, in our opinion, not warranted.

It is next urged by Mr. Jethmalani that, at any rate, the circumstances of the case show that the Customs Officer must have granted pardon to Ethyl Wong, and by that inducement to Ethyl Wong, they have obtained her statement and persuaded her to depose in the Court. Grant of pardon by the Customs Officer was an illegality and Ethyl Wong, therefore, is not a duly pardoned accused, and therefore, her evidence is not admissible. The contention raised by Mr. Jethmalani has no foundation in the evidence on record. On the other hand, the evidence of both Ethyl Wong as well as Mishra clearly shows that no promise or inducement was held out to her, nor was any pardon granted to her by Mishra. Ethyl Wong in her evidence states:

"I knew it what I was telling the Customs might be used against me. I knew when I was being taken to the Court that I was not being taken there to be prosecuted. Because they told me that I was being taken to Court to be a witness. They never told me that I was not going to be prosecuted."

and Mishra, P.W. 76 in his evidence has deposed:

"I did not make her give false evidence in the statement, nor did I promise to her that she will retain her job and that she would not be prosecuted and will be allowed to go."

Mr. Jethmalani, however, contends that this evidence should not be accepted. The conduct on the part of Mishra clearly indicates that he must have promised Ethyl Wong that she would not be prosecuted and thus induced her to make a statement and give evidence. The circumstances to which Mr. Jethmalani drew our attention are that Mishra, after recording her statement at the Air Port, allowed her to go to her hotel; next day also he did not take any care to keep a watch on her premises to see that she did not escape; telling her that she is being taken to the Court for giving evidence; and after her examination-in-chief allowing her to go out of India. These circumstances, according to Mr. Jethmalani, clearly indicate that pardon must have been granted to her. We are unable to agree with Mr. Jethmalani that these circumstances indicate that Mishra must have granted pardon to Ethyl Wong. We see no reason to discard the evidence of Ethyl Wong and Mishra in this respect. Some argument also has been advanced by Mr. Jethmalani as regards the weight to be attached to the evidence of Ethyl Wong. We would deal with this contention when we proceed to examine the evidence of Ethyl Wong.

The next contention raised on behalf of the appellants-accused relates to the photo-stat copies of the documents seized during the course of the search of the Global Agencies office by the Hong Kong police on October 30, 1959. It is the contention of Mr. Jethmalani that the photo-stats of incriminating correspondence seized from the office of the Global Agencies must be excluded from evidence, as being violative of art. 20(3) of the Constitution, inasmuch as the accused person has been compelled to testify against himself. Compulsion exercised on Sanchitlal Daga, who was the manager of accused No.1, is compulsion on accused No. 1 himself. Even assuming that compulsion, if any, exercised on Daga would amount to exercise of compulsion on accused No. 1, the question still remains whether, in the circumstances of the case, it can be said that there was any compulsion exercised on Daga at the time of the seizure of documents and if any compulsion was exercised whether the provisions of art. 20(3) have been violated. Article 20(3) is in following terms:

(3) "No person accused of an offence shall be compelled to be a witness against himself."

In order to attract the provisions of this clause, it must first be established that Daga was accused of an offence at the time the documents were seized from him, and, secondly, it must be established that he was compelled to be a witness against himself. Clause (3) of art. 20 has been construed by their Lordships of the Supreme Court in *M. P. Sharma v. Satish Chandra*¹³ and State of Bombay v. Kathi Kalu.¹⁴

In Sharma's case their Lordships observed:

"Analysing the terms in which this fundamental right has been declared in our Constitution, it may be said to consist of the following components: (1) It is a right pertaining to a person 'accused of an offence'; (2) It is a protection against 'compulsion to be a witness' and (3) It is a protection against such compulsion resulting in his giving evidence 'against himself'."

Considering the question whether the seizure of the document in a search and tendering of that document at the trial amounts to a testimonial act of a person who is put on trial, their Lordships observed in para. 18 as follows (p. 306):

"...A notice to produce is addressed to the party concerned and his production in compliance therewith constitutes a testimonial act by him within the meaning of Art. 20(3) as above explained. But a search warrant is addressed to an officer of the Government, generally a police officer. Neither the search nor the seizure are acts of the occupier of the searched premises. They are acts of another to which he is obliged to submit and are, therefore, not his testimonial acts in any sense."

In paragraph (10) of the report, it was observed (p. 304):

"...to be a witness is nothing more than 'to furnish evidence', and such evidence can be furnished through the lips or by production of a thing or of a document or in other modes."

The aforesaid observations gave rise to conflicting decisions by different High Courts. Their Lordships, therefore, reconsidered the whole question again in State of Bombay v. Kathi Kalu, and after elaborately considering the provisions of art. 20(3) of the Constitution, their Lordships came to the following conclusions (pp. 1816-1817):

"(1) An accused person cannot be said to have been compelled to be a witness against himself simply because he made a statement while in police custody, without anything more. In other words, the mere fact of being in police custody at the time when the statement in question was made would not, by itself, as a proposition of law, lend itself to the inference that the accused was compelled to make the statement, though that fact, in conjunction with other circumstances disclosed in evidence in a particular case, would be a relevant consideration in an enquiry whether or not the accused person had been compelled to make the impugned statement.

(2) The mere questioning of an accused person by a police officer, resulting in a voluntary statement, which may ultimately turn out to be incriminatory, is not 'compulsion'.

(3) 'To be a witness' is not equivalent to 'furnishing evidence' in its widest significance; that is to say, as including not merely making of oral or written statements but also production of documents or giving materials which may be relevant at a trial to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused.

(4) Giving thumb impressions or impressions of foot or palm or fingers or specimen writings or showing parts of the body by way of identification are not included in the expression 'to be a witness'.

(5) 'To be a witness' means imparting knowledge in respect of relevant facts by an oral statement or a statement in writing, made or given in Court or otherwise.

(6) 'To be a witness' in its ordinary grammatical sense means giving oral testimony in Court. Case law has gone beyond this strict literal interpretation of the expression which may now bear a wider meaning, namely, bearing testimony in Court or out of Court by a person accused of an offence, orally or in writing.

(7) To bring the statement in question within the prohibition of Art. 20(3), the person accused must have stood in the character of an accused person at the time he made the statement. It is not enough that he should become an accused, any time after the statement has been made."

In the light of these principles, the facts of the present case will have to be scrutinised. The first question that arises is whether at the time of the seizure, either Sanchitlal Daga or Laxmipat were accused within the meaning of art. 20(3) of the Constitution. Now, the search was held on October 30, 1959, in Hong Kong. Nothing has been shown to us to hold that any formal accusation was made against either Laxmipat or Daga at the time the search was made. A reference was made to two applications made by the Customs Officer for issue of a search warrant of the premises of accused No. 1 in Calcutta and accused No. 3 in Bombay, presumably to show that a formal accusation was made against Laxmipat Choraria. These applications are on record. When these applications are read, it becomes clear that they do not contain any formal accusation as such against either Sanchitlal Daga or Laxmipat Choraria or any other accused, but speak of a mere suspicion of an offence having been committed by them. In our opinion, therefore, it has not been established that on the day the search was effected at Hong Kong and the documents were seized, either Laxmipat or Daga were accused persons within the meaning of art. 20(3) of the Constitution.

Turning to the next ingredient, seizure of the documents in the course of the search in Hong Kong also cannot be called a testimonial act of Daga, and therefore, it cannot be said that Daga had been a witness against himself when the documents were seized by the Hong Kong police from the office of the Global Agencies. Lastly, there is no evidence at all that any compulsion has been exercised on Daga at the time. On the other hand, the evidence of the officers concerned clearly shows that Daga had raised no protest or objection at the time the search was made and documents seized, nor was any threat given to Daga. Further, Daga has nowhere stated in his examination that there was any threat given to him or coercion used on him in the matter of seizure of the documents. In our opinion, therefore, not a single ingredient of art. 20(3) has been established in this case.

It is next contended by Mr. Jethmalani that even assuming that the documents from the Global Agencies were legally seized on October 30, 1959, they were illegally detained after the Hong Kong police had completed inspection of these documents and it was found that the contents of those documents did not disclose any offence against the colony law. Mr. Jethmalani then argues that the photo-stat copies of the documents were made after the inspection had been completed by the Hong Kong police. The copies are copies of illegally detained documents, and are therefore, inadmissible in evidence. It is not possible to accept this contention inasmuch as on the evidence on record, it has not been established that the photo-stat copies of these documents were made during the period when the documents were illegally detained. As already stated, the documents were seized on October 30, 1959. They were taken by Williams of the Hong Kong police. The evidence of Shriwastava shows that he did not know anything about the seizure of the documents prior to October 31, 1959. He went to Hong Kong on November 1, 1959 and returned to India by December 1 or 2, 1959. The photo-stat copies and copies made otherwise were all made between the period November 1, 1958, and December 1 or 2, 1959. Nothing has been pointed out by Mr. Jethmalani from the evidence on record to show at what point of time or date the Hong Kong police had completed the inspection of the documents and were satisfied that the documents did not disclose any offence under the colony law. The only piece of evidence which was brought to our notice was the following statement of Williams in the cross-examination:

"It is correct that after inspection of the documents was completed we were satisfied that no offence against the law of the colonies was disclosed from these documents."

The statement, however, does not speak about the point of time when the inspection was completed. On the other hand, the statement of Williams which immediately follows the aforesaid statement on which Mr. Jethmalani relies indicates that the Hong Kong Police had not reached a conclusion even upto February 17, 1960, that the documents did not disclose an offence under the colony law. That statement of Williams is as follows:

"When we returned these documents to accused No. 6 on 17-2-60 we were not completely satisfied that no offence was disclosed against the law of the colony. That is why we asked him to give an undertaking to produce the documents whenever required." The statement of Williams that they were not completely satisfied even when they returned the documents on February 17, 1960, does not appear to be exactly correct as his subsequent cross-examination on the basis of his affidavit would show. That part of the cross-examination indicates that by about February 15, 1960, the Hong Kong police were satisfied that no offence under the law of the colony was disclosed by these documents. We are concerned with the period November 1, 1959, to December 1 or 2, 1959, and there is nothing on the record which would indicate that during that period there was any illegal detention of the documents. In view of our aforesaid conclusion that it has not been established that during the aforesaid period, namely, from November 1, 1959, to December 1 or 2, 1959 there was an illegal detention of the documents, and our finding that the photo-stat copies and other copies were prepared during that period, it is not necessary to deal with the academic contention raised by Mr. Jethmalani that illegal detention of the documents would amount to deprivation of the property within the meaning of art. 31(I) and would also be violative of art. 19(I)(f) of the Constitution.

It is next argued by Mr. Jethmalani that, at any rate, the production of the documents by Daga in pursuance of the undertaking given by him amounted to compulsion within the meaning of art. 20(3) of the Constitution and, therefore, the photo-stat copies of these documents are inadmissible in evidence. This argument overlooks two material facts. Daga has never stated that there was any direct or indirect compulsion either in the matter of taking an undertaking from him or his production of the documents on April 29, 1960, in pursuance of the undertaking. There is, therefore, no foundation for the argument that there was any compulsion when the original documents were again produced by Daga on April 29, 1960, in pursuance of the undertaking. Further the other material fact is that the photo-stat copies were not prepared subsequent to obtaining possession of those documents on April 29, 1960. On the other hand, the photo-stat copies were prepared between the period November 1, 1959 to December 1 or 2, 1959. As already stated, the detention of the documents during this period has not been established to be illegal. This argument of Mr. Jethmalani also must fail.

For the reasons stated above, in our opinion, the photo-stat copies and copies otherwise made of documents seized from the office of Global Agencies are admissible evidence.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report].

APPEAL FROM ORIGINAL CIVIL.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Mody.

Under the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, Court-fee is leviable on a third party notice as an application to the Court to obtain relief specified in the third party notice.

If the application made to the Court is to obtain relief of the nature referred to in art. 7 in Sch. I to the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, this Article and not sub-cl (iii) in cl. (f) of Art. 1 in Sch. II to the Act will apply.

In a suit filed by Ironside Ltd. (plaintiffs) against the State Trading Corporation of India Ltd. (defendants), the latter issued third party notice against Kajaria Traders (India) Ltd. on November 28, 1963. After serving the notice, the defendants took out a chamber summons for direction on February 5, 1964. The summons came up before Mody J. on April 9, 1964, when his Lordship directed a notice to be served on the State Government in connection with the point that the Court-fees had not been paid on the third party notice and in fact the Court-fees are payable on third party notices. The summons was thereafter heard by K. K. Desai J. who held that Court-fees were payable and directed the defendants to pay Court-fees in respect of the third party notice. In his judgment delivered on April 23, 1964, his Lordship observed as follows:—

K. K. DESAI J. The question is as to whether the above third party notice is a document as referred to in s. 5 of the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, and in the Schedule I thereto and liable to payment of Court-fees. The relevant parts of ss. 2(c), 5 and 6 and entries in Schedule I to the Act run as follows:

"2. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires—

(a) ...;

(b) ...;

(c) 'Plaint' includes a written statement pleading a set off or counter claim.

5. (1) No document of any of the kinds specified as chargeable in the first or second schedule to this Act annexed shall be filed, exhibited or recorded in any Court of Justice, ... unless in respect of such document there has been paid a fee of an amount not less than that indicated by either of the said schedules as the proper fee for such document.

(2) to (5) ...

6. The amount of fee payable under this Act in the suits next hereinafter mentioned shall be computed as follows:—

(i) In suits for money (including suits for damages or compensation, or arrears of maintenance, of annuities, or of other sums payable periodically)—according to the amount claimed; ..."

In several other sub-sections of this section the first phrase is "In suits for..." The sub-sections of this section refer to all kinds of suits, such as:—suit for

- (1) Plaint or memorandum of appeal.
- (2) Plaint in a suit for possession.
- (3) Plaint, application or petition to set aside or modify any award. Items (5) and (6) also refer to plaint, application or petition.

Item (7) Any other plaint, application or petition (including memorandum of appeal), to obtain substantive relief capable of being valued in terms of monetary gain or prevention of monetary loss, including cases wherein application or petition is either treated as a plaint or is described as the mode of obtaining the relief as aforesaid. In column 3 the fees payable against item 7 are mentioned as follows:

"A fee on the amount of the monetary gain, or loss to be prevented, according to the scale prescribed under Article 1."

The contention on behalf of the defendants is that the third party notice prima facie is a notice issued by Court under its seal. It is accordingly in the nature of a writ of summons in a suit. It is not a document of the kind specified as chargeable in the first or second schedule of the Act. The contention is that it is not a plaint nor it is a written statement claiming a set-off or counter-claim, nor it is a plaint to obtain substantive relief. The contention is that it is merely a notice issued by Court. The contention is supported by relying upon Rules 151, 154 and 155 of the Rules made by the High Court. Rule 151 provides for enabling a defendant who claims contribution or indemnity or that he is entitled to any relief or remedy relating to or connected with the subject-matter of the suit, substantially the same as the relief or remedy claimed by the plaintiff against the third party or claims that any question or issue relating to or connected with the said subject-matter is substantially the same as some question or issue arising between the plaintiff and the defendant should properly be determined not only as between the plaintiff and the defendant but as between the plaintiff and the defendant and the third party or between any or either of them, to issue a notice by leave of the Court. The last part of Rule 151 runs as follows:

"...he may, by leave of the Court or a Judge, issue a notice (hereinafter called the third party notice) to that effect, sealed with the seal of the Court. Such notice shall be filed with the Prothonotary and Senior Master and a copy thereof served on such person according to the rules relating to the service of writs of summonses."

Form 13 is the form prescribed for third party notices. The contents of this form show that by the notice the claim of the defendant is intimated to the third party and he is given notice to file appearance within the time prescribed and that in default of filing appearance he would be deemed to have admitted the validity of any decree passed against the defendant and his own liability to contribute or indemnify to the extent claimed in the third party notice. Relying upon the provision that the notice requires seal of the Court and the sealed notice can be served on the third party in accordance with the rules relating to the service of writ of summonses, it is contended on behalf of the defendants that the notice is nothing but a writ issued by Court. In this connection it is pointed out that the issuance of the notice does not directly entitle the defendants to proceed against the third party to a hearing of his claim in the third party notice. Under Rule 154A summons for directions is necessary and at the hearing of the summons it is permissible for the Court inter alia to decide that the defendants are not entitled to proceed by way of third party notice and dismiss the third party notice on that ground alone. In such an event, no proceedings remain outstanding against the third party. It is for that reason also contended that the third party notice cannot be held to be institution of a suit. The third party notice cannot be described as a plaint.

In this connection it is necessary to remember the contents of the third party notice which I have pointed out above. Obviously the third party notice is not merely a writ issued by Court. It has been and must be prepared in the first instance by the defendants in the suit. The defendants are, having regard to the rules made in that connection, bound to make all allegations of their grounds of claims against the third party in the third party notice. The third party notice must have all the particulars as necessary in a plaint in a suit. The defendants would have to state the whole of the cause of action on the basis whereof they claim relief against the third party in the third party notice itself. At the hearing the contents of the third party notice have always in practice been treated as contents of a plaint filed against the third party. For the purposes of defence the third party has to treat the contents of the third party as contents of a plaint against them. The written statement of the third party must refer to and deal with each and every allegation contained in the third party notice on that footing. In all further proceedings at the trial of a third party notice, it would be impossible for the defendants to contend that the contents in the third party notice should not be treated as their plaint against the third party. The third party notice, accordingly, is a document which serves double purpose. When served on the third party, it serves the purpose of a writ and notifies the third party about the consequences of default in filing an appearance. At the trial of the third party proceedings, the contents of the third party notice serve the purpose of a claim-plaint brought on the record of the Court by the defendants for their claims against the third party. Having regard to that fact it is difficult to accept the contention made on behalf of the defendants that the third party notice is merely a writ issued by Court and that for that reason cannot be treated as plaint filed by the defendants for making a claim against the third party. On the contrary, it is clear, having regard to the contents of the third party notice and the Rules and the form prescribed for third party notice, that a party taking out third party notice institutes in Court a suit against the third party.

It is, however, to be observed that having regard to Rule 154, the claim made (in the plaint) in the third party notice is one which is liable to be dismissed without trial. The Court trying the summons for directions for third party proceedings is entitled to come to the conclusion that the claim made in the third party notice was such that it cannot be allowed to be proceeded with as and by way of third party proceedings and for that reason only dismiss the third party notice. Now, if the defendants are liable to pay Court-fees whilst taking out third party notice, the above provision would impose on the defendants liability to pay Court-fees without having the benefit of a trial of the claims made by way of third party notice. That is a lacuna which requires to be remedied.

In this connection it is necessary to point out that reference has been made to *Weld & Co. v. Sher Mahomed*¹ and Karim Elahi v. Sher Ahmed.² In the first case the question related to the necessity of obtaining leave under cl. 12 of Letters Patent when taking out a third party notice against the third party residing outside the limits of ordinary jurisdiction of this Court. It was held that the third party notice must be considered a suit within the meaning of cl. 12 of the Letters Patent and on that footing it was held that leave under cl. 12 must be obtained where the third party was residing outside the ordinary limits of jurisdiction of Court. In the next case also the Court discussed the nature of the third party proceedings and held that a third party notice must be held to be "suit" within the meaning of cl. 12 of the Letters Patent.

Accordingly, the defendants are liable to pay Court-fees in respect of the third party notice issued in this case. The Court-fees to be paid within four weeks.

The defendants appealed.

Murzbán J. Mistree and N. P. Nathwani, for the appellants.

F. S. Nariman, with B. R. Zaiwalla, for respondent No. 1.

M. S. Sanghvi, for the State of Maharashtra.

CHAIYANANI C. J., This is an appeal by the original defendants against the order made by Mr. Justice K. K. Desai directing the defendants to pay court-fees on the third party notice taken out by them against respondents No. 2. On September 5, 1959, respondents No. 2 entered into a contract with respondents No. 1, who are the original plaintiffs, for the supply of manganese ore to the plaintiffs. The contract provided that the material shall be re-routed through the State Trading Corporation of India Ltd., i.e., through the defendants. On the same day the appellants defendants entered into a contract with respondents No. 1 for the supply of manganese ore to respondents No. 1. The appellants also entered into a contract with respondents No. 2, who agreed to supply the manganese ore to the appellants. The arrangement arrived at, therefore, was that respondents No. 2 were to supply manganese ore to the appellants, who had to consign it to respondents No. 1. According to respondents No. 1, the goods supplied to them were not of the proper quality and there were also short deliveries. On September 23, 1963, respondents No. 1, therefore, filed a suit against the appellants, in which they claimed about Rs. 2,50,000 as damages from the appellants. They also claimed another sum of about Rs. 7,75,000 from the appellants. On November 27, 1963, the appellants obtained leave from the Court to issue a third party notice against respondents No. 2 and to serve it upon them. This leave was applied for and granted under rule 151 of the High Court Original Side Rules. By this notice respondents No. 2 were informed that the appellants claimed from them the same reliefs, which had been claimed from the appellants by respondents No. 1. The notice also stated:

"The defendants say that the following questions or issues relate to or are connected with the original subject matter of the above suit and are substantially the same as those arising between the plaintiffs and defendants and the same should properly be determined not only as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, but as between the plaintiffs, defendants and yourselves:

(i) Whether the said consignment of Manganese ore shipped per s.s. 'Older' in July 1960 was deficient in quantity and quality as alleged by the plaintiffs in the plaint and you thereby committed a breach of the alleged contract No. 90/1959.

(ii) Whether you committed fraud, misrepresentation and deceit as stated by the plaintiffs in the suit.

(iii) Whether the damages for the aforesaid breach of contract mentioned in (i) hereof come to the said sum of Rs. 2,49,455.49 nP. as per particulars mentioned in Ex. G to the plaint and the said further sum of Rs. 16,609/- with interest on the aforesaid sums at the rate of 6% per cent per annum from the date of the suit till judgment.

(iv) Whether you failed to ship the remaining quantity of the manganese ore by the end of November 1960 and thereby committed a breach of the said alleged contract No. 90/1959.

(v) Whether under the circumstances stated in sub-paragraph (iv) above, you are liable to return to the defendants the said sum of Rs. 5,77,128.68 nP. being the price paid in advance on behalf of the defendants to you under the contract No. 90/1959 with interest thereon at 6% per annum from the 6th day of May 1960 till payment.

(vi) Whether you are liable to pay to the defendants the costs that the defendants may have to pay to the plaintiffs in the suit and the costs incurred by the defendants in defending the plaintiffs' claims in the suit as also of the Third Party proceedings."

The notice further stated that if respondents No. 2 wished to dispute the plaintiffs' claim in the suit against the defendants or their liability to the defendants, or if they wished to be heard on the said questions or issues or on the defendants' liability to the plaintiffs or the liability of respondents No. 2 to the defendants, then they should cause an appearance to be entered within eight days from the service of the notice. Respondents No. 2 were further informed that in default of their doing so, they would be deemed to admit the validity of any decree that might be passed against the defendants and their liability to indemnify and pay compensation to the defendants to the extent therein specified. On January 17, 1964, respondents No. 2 filed their appearance. On February 5, 1964, the appellants took out a summons for directions under rule 154 of the Original Side Rules. This summons came up for hearing before my learned brother. He directed that a notice should be served on the State Government for consideration of the point whether court-fees were payable on the third party notice. The summons was thereafter heard by Mr. Justice K. K. Desai. He came to the conclusion that the court-fees were payable and accordingly directed the appellants to pay court-fees in respect of the third party notice, which had been issued to respondents No. 2. Against that order the present appeal has been filed.

Mr. Mistree, learned counsel of the appellants, has contended that the third party notice is issued by the Court, that it bears the seal of the Court, that consequently it is only a process issued by the Court, that it is not a pleading of any party and that consequently no court-fee is payable in respect of it. In order to determine the validity of these arguments, it is necessary to consider the relevant provisions of the rules. The provisions in regard to third party procedure are contained in Chapter IX of the Original Side Rules. Sub-rule (1) of rule 151 is in the following terms:

"151. (1) Where in a suit a defendant claims as against any person not already a party to the suit (hereinafter called the third party)—

(a) that he is entitled to contribution or indemnity, or

(b) that he is entitled to any relief or remedy relating to or connected with the original subject-matter of the suit and substantially the same as some relief or remedy claimed by the plaintiff, or

(c) that any question or issue relating to or connected with the said subject-matter is substantially the same as some question or issue arising between the plaintiff and the defendant and should properly be determined not only as between the plaintiff and the defendant but as between the plaintiff and the defendant and the third party or between any or either of them,

he may, by leave of the Court or a Judge, issue a notice (hereinafter called the third party notice) to that effect, sealed with the seal of the Court. Such notice shall be filed with the Prothonotary and Senior Master and a copy thereof served on such person according to the rules relating to the service of writs of summonses."

The third party procedure can, therefore, be adopted when the defendant claims from the third party an indemnity or contribution or some other relief connected with the original subject-matter of the suit or when a common question arises as between the plaintiff and the defendant and between the defendant and the third party, or when any question arising between the plaintiff and the defendant can properly be determined as between the plaintiff and the defendant and the third party. Before this procedure can be adopted, it is necessary to obtain leave of the Court. Sub-rule (2) of rule 151 states that the notice shall state the nature and grounds of the claims or the nature and extent of any relief or remedy claimed or the nature of the question or issue sought to be determined and that such notice shall be in Form No. 13 or No. 14 with such variations as circumstances may require. The defendant has, therefore, to state in the notice not only the nature of the claim made by him, but also the grounds on which his claim is based. He has, therefore, to give the particulars of his claim in the notice. Sub-rule (3) of rule 151 provides:

"(3) The third party shall, as from the time of the service upon him of the notice, be a party to the suit with the same rights in respect of his defence against any claim made against him and otherwise as if he had been duly sued in the ordinary way by the defendant."

After the service of a third party notice upon him, a third party, therefore, becomes a party to the suit between the plaintiff and the defendant. He is also entitled to raise all defences to the claim made against him by the defendant, which he could have urged if instead of taking out a third party notice the defendant had filed a suit against him.

Rule 152 states that in default of the third party entering an appearance, he shall be deemed to admit the validity of the decree obtained against the defendant and his own liability to contribute or indemnify, as the case may be, to the extent claimed in the third party notice. Rule 153 provides that when a third party makes a default in entering an appearance in the suit, in case the suit is tried and results in favour of the plaintiff, the Judge who tries the suit may pass such decree as the nature of the case may require, for the defendant giving the notice against the third party.

Rules 154 provides that if a third party enters an appearance, the defendant may apply to the Court for directions and the Court or Judge may (a) where the liability of the third party to the defendant giving the notice is established on the hearing of the application, pass such decree as the nature of the case may require in favour of the defendant giving the notice against the third party, or (b) if satisfied that there is a question or issue proper to be tried as between the plaintiff and the defendant and the third party to make the contribution or indemnity claimed, in whole or in part, or as to any other relief or remedy claimed in the notice by the defendant or that a question or issue stated in the notice should be determined not only as between the plaintiff and the defendant but as between the plaintiff, the defendant and the third party or any or either of them, order such question or issue to be tried in such manner, before, at or after the trial of the suit as the Court or Judge may direct, or (c) dismiss the application. Rule 155 states that the Court or a Judge upon the hearing of the application mentioned in rule 154 may, if it shall appear desirable to do so, give the third party liberty to defend the suit, either alone or jointly with the original defendant, or to appear at the trial and take such part therein as may be just, and give such directions as to the Court or Judge shall appear proper for having the question and the rights and liabilities of the parties most conveniently determined and enforced, and as to the mode and extent in or to which the third party shall be bound or made liable by the decree in the suit. The third party notice is to be issued in Form No. 13 or No. 14 with such variations as circumstances may require. The relevant part of Form No. 13 is as follows:

"Take notice that this suit has been brought by the plaintiff against the defendant...

The defendant claims to be entitled to contribution from you to the extent of...

Or to recover damages for a breach of a contract for the sale and delivery to the plaintiff of...

The defendant claims to be indemnified by you against liability in respect of the said contract, or any breach thereof, on the ground that it was made by him on your behalf and as your agent.

And take notice that, if you wish to dispute the plaintiff's claim in this suit as against the defendant or your liability to the defendant you must cause an appearance to be entered for you within eight days after service of this notice.

In default of your so appearing you will be deemed to admit the validity of any decree passed against the defendant and your own liability to contribute or indemnify to the extent herein claimed, which may be summarily enforced against you pursuant to the rules of the High Court."

Form No. 14 is to be adopted when a common question or issue is to be determined.

The object of this procedure is to avoid multiplicity of proceedings and to enable the defendant to obtain expeditiously, in the same suit in which a claim had been made against the defendant, relief to which he is entitled in respect of that claim from a third party. It saves the defendant the necessity of instituting a separate suit and eliminates the risk of conflicting decisions on any common question or issue, which may arise between the plaintiff and the defendant and the defendant and the third party. In Barclays Bank v. Tom,¹ it was held that a person who has been served by a defendant with a third party notice is entitled to counterclaim against the defendant. Scrutton L.J. explained the third party proceeding in these terms (pp. 223, 224):

"...I think it is important to keep clearly in mind what the third party procedure is. A plaintiff has a claim against a defendant. The defendant thinks if he is liable he has a claim over against a third party. With that matter between the defendant and the third party the plaintiff has obviously nothing to do. He is not concerned with the question whether the defendant has a remedy against somebody else. His remedy is against the defendant. But the defendant is much interested in getting the third party bound by the result of the trial between the plaintiff and himself, for otherwise he might be at a great disadvantage if, having fought the case against the plaintiff and lost, he had then to fight the case against the third party possibly on different materials, with the risk that a different result might be arrived at. The object of the third party procedure is then in the first place to get the third party bound by the decision between the plaintiff and the defendant. In the next place it is directed to getting the question between the defendant and the third party decided as soon as possible after the decision between the plaintiff and the defendant, so that the defendant may not be in the position of having to wait a considerable time before he establishes his right of indemnity against the third party while all the time the plaintiff is enforcing his judgment against the defendant. And thirdly, it is directed to saving the extra expense which would be involved by two independent actions. With these objects in view the third party order usually provides that the third party may appear at the trial between the plaintiff and the defendant."

It will be seen that in the third party notice the defendant has to specify the relief claimed by him and the grounds on which he claims it, as he would do in a plaint, if instead of taking out a third party notice he files a suit in order to obtain the same relief. The third party notice, therefore, contains a statement of the cause of action of the defendant against the third party. It incorporates the pleading of the defendant in respect of his claim against the third party. It is to this pleading that the third party is called upon to make his reply. It is the claim made in this document which the third party has to defend and it is on the claim made in this document that the Court may pass a decree in favour of the defendant against the third party. A third party notice, therefore, serves two purposes. It is an intimation to the third party that a claim to contribution, indemnity or some other relief had been made against him by the defendant and that if he does not appear and dispute his liability, a decree may be passed against him. It also serves the purpose of a plaint. In this connection reference may be made to the decision of Marten J., as he then was, in Weld & Co. v. Sher Mahomed,² in which he held that third party proceedings fall within the words "suits of every description" in cl. 12 of the Letters Patent. The learned Judge observed (p. 813):

"...We have under the Bombay High Court Rules a form of procedure which is in substance a 'suit' against the third party within the letters patent. Before the third party notice has been served on him, he is a free man and no Court can pass a decree against him. As a result of that third party notice he is in peril, and may, unless he takes certain steps, have a decree passed against him. It seems to me therefore that substantially the case falls within cl. 12 of the Letters Patent, just as the case of an added defendant or of a counter-claim against a new party does, and that leave under cl. 12 is necessary."

A third party notice bears the seal of the Court. This must be so because it is a process issued by and under the authority of the Court. For the same reason it is not signed or verified by the defendant as an ordinary pleading is required to be signed and verified. But as a third party notice also incorporates the defendant's pleading in respect of his claim against the third party, the fact that it bears the seal of the Court or that it is not signed or verified by the defendant in the manner in which a pleading is required to be signed and verified, would not save the defendant from liability to pay Court-fee if it is otherwise payable.

Sub-section (1) of s. 5 of the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, provides that no document of any of the kinds specified as chargeable in the first and second schedule to this Act annexed shall be filed, exhibited or recorded in any Court of Justice, unless in respect of such document there had been paid a fee of an amount not less than that indicated in either of the said schedules as the proper fee for such document. A third party notice is filed in Court. It will, therefore, attract duty if it can be said to be a document of any of the kinds specified in the first or second schedule to the Act. The two schedules prescribe Court-fees on plaints, applications and petitions filed in Court. The Act was enacted in 1959 many years after the third party procedure had been introduced. No separate provision has been made in the Act for levy of Court-fees on third party notices. A third party notice is also not included in the definition of "plaint" given in cl. (c) in s. 2 of the Act. It has, therefore, been contended by Mr. Mistree that no Court-fee is leviable on a third party notice, as, if the Legislature intended that Court-fee should be levied on such a notice, it would have made a provision to that effect. If, however, it can be said to be a plaint, application or petition, it would be liable to Court-fee under one or other of the articles in the two schedules.

The question, therefore, arises whether a third party notice is a plaint within the meaning of the Court-fees Act. According to the Oxford dictionary, a plaint means a statement of grievances made to a Court of Law for the purpose of obtaining redress. In Jowitt's Dictionary of English Law, "plaint" is defined as a statement in writing of a cause of action. In *Assan v. Pathumma*³, Subramania Ayyar J. observed (p. 502) :

"...Plaint, in law, means (and has, since before the days of Blackstone, whose phraseology in regard to the explanation of the term has been accepted by Lexicographers, meant) nothing more than 'a private memorial tendered to a Court in which the person sets forth his cause of action; the exhibition of an action in writing.' In the absence of a distinct and direct statutory definition to the contrary we have no right to put a more restricted construction on the term."

In the same volume at p. 256 there is the report of another decision of a Division Bench of the Madras High Court, to which also the learned Judge was a party, (*Venkata Chandrappa Nayamivaru v. Venkatarama Reddi*⁴), in which it was held that a suit must commence with a plaint and a proceeding which is capable of terminating in a decree or an order having the force of a decree cannot, on that ground alone, be deemed to be a suit within the meaning of the Code, if it has not commenced with a plaint.

Even though the dictionary meaning of the word "plaint" is very wide, it has in legal phraseology come to acquire a more limited meaning and that is a statement in writing of the cause of action in a suit. Every proceeding in a Court is not commenced by a plaint. Section 10 of the Indian Divorce Act, 1869, states that any husband may present a petition to the District Court praying that his marriage may be dissolved on the ground that his wife had been guilty of adultery. The section also provides for a petition by a wife for dissolution of her marriage on certain grounds. Section 18 states that any husband or wife may present a petition praying that his or her marriage may be declared null and void. Sections 14 and 19 provide for decrees being passed in such cases. Section 13 of the Hindu Marriage Act provides for a petition being presented to the Court by either the husband or the wife for dissolution of marriage by a decree for divorce on the grounds specified in this section. These proceedings, therefore, commence with a petition, which is not called a plaint, even though the proceeding ends in a decree of the Court. The Court-fees Act also makes separate provision for such petitions. Article 20 in Schedule II provides for a Court-fee of Rs. 37.50 on every petition under the Indian Divorce Act, except petitions under s. 44 of that Act. The same Court-fee has been prescribed by art. 21 on a petition under the Hindu Marriage Act. An additional Court-fee is payable when in addition to divorce damages are claimed. Court-fees are, therefore, levied on these documents as petitions and not as plaints. Article 4 in Schedule I refers to a plaint, application or petition which is capable of being treated as a suit. Similar phraseology is used in some other articles, such as article 23 in Schedule II. The Court-fees Act itself, therefore, makes a distinction between a plaint and an application or petition presented to a Court. It recognises that every document containing a statement of the cause of action or by which a proceeding is commenced in a Court is not a plaint.

Section 26 of the Civil Procedure Code states that every suit shall be instituted by the presentation of a plaint or in such other manner as may be prescribed. Order IV, r. 1, lays down that every suit shall be instituted by presentation of a plaint to the Court or such officer as it appoints in this behalf. In Hansraj Gupta v. Official Liquidators,⁵ the Privy Council held that the word "suit" in s. 3 of the Indian Limitation Act, ordinarily means a civil proceeding instituted by the presentation of a plaint. The same view has been taken by a Full Bench of this Court in *Farkhundali v. Potdar*⁶ where it is observed that the word "suit" is a term of art and ordinarily means a proceeding instituted in a Civil Court by the presentation of a plaint. It was held in that case that a proceeding under s. 54 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act is not a suit. These authorities, therefore, establish that a plaint is a document, by the presentation of which in a Civil Court a suit is instituted.

Sub-rule (3) of rule 151 of Original Side Rules, which I have quoted above, states that a third party shall have the same rights in respect of any claim made against him as if he had been duly sued in the ordinary way by the defendant. A third party is, therefore, given a right to defend himself as if a suit had been filed, that is, as if a plaint had been presented. The defence is to be made to the claim set out in the third party notice. By a legal fiction created by sub-r. (3) of rule 151 a third party proceeding is, therefore, treated as a suit for certain purposes. In State of Bombay v. Pandurang Vinayak Chaphalkar,⁷ the Supreme Court has observed that full effect must be given to a statutory fiction and that it should be carried to its logical conclusion. It has, therefore, been contended by Mr. Nariman and Mr. Sanghvi that as a third party proceeding is by legal fiction to be regarded as a suit, the third party notice must necessarily be held to be a plaint. The legal fiction has, however, been introduced in order that no prejudice may be caused to the third party by a third party notice being taken out instead of a suit being filed against him and in order to give the third party full opportunity to defend himself. He is, therefore, placed in the same position as if a suit had been filed against him. The legal fiction has, therefore, been enacted for a limited purpose. There is nothing in the rule which suggests that a third party notice must be treated as a plaint for all purposes. Rule 151 itself provides that for the purposes of enforcing his claim against a third party, the defendant may take out a third party notice. A third party proceeding is also a proceeding in the suit filed by the plaintiff against the defendant. In our opinion, therefore, a third party notice is not a plaint at least for the purposes of the Court-fees Act.

The next question to be considered is whether Court-fees would be leviable on a third party notice as an application or petition to the Court. A third party notice being a process issued by the Court, is not itself an application or petition to the Court. Before such a notice can be taken out, leave of the Court has to be applied for. After leave has been granted, the defendant is, however, not bound to proceed further or to take out a third party notice. If he decides to take further steps in the matter, he has to move the Court to issue the notice and to seal it. Thereafter it is to be sent for service. The practice which we have been informed is followed on the Original Side is in accordance with the requirements of the rule. The practice seems to be that after the Court has granted leave to take out a third party notice, a praecipe is addressed to the Prothonotary of the High Court and along with the praecipe a draft of the third party notice is sent to him for approval and for the approved copy of the notice being sealed. It is by this praecipe or application that the Court's jurisdiction is invoked and the Court is moved to summon the defendant and adjudicate upon the claim set out in the draft third party notice between the defendant and the third party. This praecipe is, therefore, liable to Court-fee as an application made to the Court to obtain relief specified in the third party notice.

It has been urged by Mr. Sanghvi that if the relief claimed in the third party notice is capable of being valued in terms of money, the article which would be applicable is art. 7 in Schedule I. This article specifies the Court-fee payable on any plaint, application or petition, not specified in the earlier articles in this Schedule, to obtain substantive relief and which is capable of being valued in terms of monetary gain or prevention of monetary loss, including cases wherein application or petition is either treated as a plaint or is described as the mode of obtaining the relief as aforesaid. Mr. Mistree, on the other hand, has contended that the Court-fee which would be payable in such a case is that indicated against sub-cl. (iii) in cl. (f) in art. 1 in Sch. II, that is, a fixed fee of Rs. 5. Clause (f) in art. 1 in Sch. II refers to an application or petition when presented to a High Court. Sub-clauses (i) and (ii) mention certain kinds of applications or petitions with which we are not concerned. Sub-clause (iii) refers to "any other case not otherwise provided for by this Act." Mr. Mistree has argued that this sub-clause will apply in the case of every application or petition presented to a High Court, unless there is some other specific provision with regard to applications or petitions to a High Court. We have been taken through the various articles in the two Schedules. We find that Court-fees vary according to the subject matter of the plaint, application or petition and also according to the authority before which it is presented. For instance, under art. 6 in Sch. II a Court-fee of Rs. 2 is prescribed for an application for leave to appeal as a pauper, when presented to a District Court. If presented to the High Court the fee is Rs. 5. There are other articles such as arts. 1 to 7 in Sch. I, which prescribe Court-fees with reference to the subject matter, irrespective of the Court in which they are presented. No sufficient reason has been shown why sub-cl. (iii) in cl. (f) of art. 1 in Sch. II should be construed as referring only to absence of other provisions in the Act specifically in regard to applications to the High Court. If there is an article which prescribes Court-fees with reference to the subject matter of the application and if the applicability of that article is not restricted to Courts other than the High Court, it will also exclude the application of sub-cl. (iii) in cl. (f) of art. 1. Thus if the application made to Court is to obtain relief of the nature referred to in art. 7 in Sch. I, this article and not sub-cl. (iii) in cl. (f) of art. 1 in Sch. II will apply.

In the present case the reliefs, which the appellants have claimed from the third party, are all capable of being valued in terms of monetary gain or prevention of monetary loss. Consequently, Court-fees payable will be according to the scale indicated against art. 7 in Sch. I to the Act.

In our opinion, therefore, the learned Judge was right in holding that the appellants are liable to pay Court-fees in respect of the third party notice taken out by them.

Having regard to the circumstances of this case, we make no order as to costs.

The appellants are given three weeks' time to pay Court-fees.

The appellants' attorneys are allowed to withdraw Rs. 1,000 deposited by the appellants for the respondents' costs of the appeal.

It seems to us that in order that there may be no doubt in the matter, Government may consider whether the Court-fees Act should not be amended and specific provision made therein for the levy of Court-fees in respect of third party notices. If it is decided to make an amendment, provision should also be made for refund of whole or part of the Court-fees, if the claim made by the defendant against the third party is not tried on merits either owing to the original suit filed by the plaintiff being dismissed or if the third party notice is dismissed on the application for directions made under rule 154.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chatnani, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Mody.

PEARLY ANDREW FRANZ v. OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE.*

Employees' Provident Funds Act (XIX of 1952), Sec. 10(1)—Presidency-towns Insolvency Act (III of 1909), Sec. 17—Amount in Fund standing to credit of member adjudicated insolvent and not paid to him—Whether Official Assignee can claim it.

Under s. 10(1) of the Employees' Provident Funds Act, 1952, so long as an amount stands in the Fund to the credit of a member who is adjudicated insolvent and has not been paid to such member, the amount does not vest in the official assignee and he cannot lay claim to it. The immunity given by s. 10(1) of the Act will not continue after the amount has been paid to the insolvent member.

Bonjour v. Official Assignee, Madras,¹ referred to.

ONE Pearly Andrew Fraz (appellant) who was employed in M/s. Killick Nixon & Co., Ltd., Bombay, used to contribute to a Provident Fund established by the Company for the benefit of their employees. The Employees' Provident Funds Act, 1952, was made applicable to the Company in 1962 and the appellant became a member of the fund established under the scheme framed under the Act. The appellant retired from service in 1964 and a few months after he was adjudicated insolvent. The Official Assignee then addressed letters to the Regional Provident Fund Commissioner and also to the Company asking them not to pay to the appellant the amounts lying to his credit in his Provident Fund account. The appellant took out a Notice of Motion inter alia for a direction that the Official Assignee withdraw his aforesaid letters. The Notice of Motion was dismissed by K. K. Desai J. who observed as follows in his judgment, delivered on July 21, 1964:—

K. K. DESAI J. As regards the second relief, the debtor's contention is that a sum of Rs. 7,062.75 nP stands to his credit with the Regional Provident Fund Commissioner at Bombay. Admittedly, to this Fund, the provisions of the Employees' Provident Funds Act, 1952, and the Employees' Provident Funds Scheme enacted under that Act are applicable. The contention is that having regard to the provisions in the Act and the scheme, the Official Assignee is not entitled to make any claim in respect of the provident fund amount standing to the credit of the insolvent with the Regional Provident Fund Commissioner. In this connection, reliance is placed on s. 10 of the Employees' Provident Funds Act, the relevant part whereof provides:

"10. (1) The amount standing to the credit of any member in the Fund...shall not be liable to attachment under any decree or order of any court in respect of any debt or liability incurred by the member...and neither the official assignee appointed under the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act, 1909..., nor any receiver appointed under the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920.... shall be entitled to, or have any claim on, any such amount.

(2) ..."

The contention is that the phrase "the official assignee shall not be entitled to, or have any claim on, any such amount" means that at no time whatsoever

*Decided, June 25, 1965. O.C.J. Appeal 1 [1956] Mad. 491.
No. 54 of 1964: Insolvency No. 47 of 1964.

the Official Assignee can make a claim on the Regional Provident Fund Commissioner for paying over or receiving the amount of Provident Fund standing to the credit of an insolvent. The further contention is that such amount cannot be recovered even if it ultimately becomes payable to the insolvent under the scheme of provident funds enacted under the Act. On behalf of the petitioning creditor, it is submitted that the only correct construction of the section is that the Official Assignee can have no claim to recover the amount of provident fund standing to the credit of the insolvent until the time when under the scheme enacted under the Act it becomes and falls to be payable to the insolvent. The amount will be subject to the provisions in the scheme for deductions by the Provident Fund Commissioner in favour of the employers as well as other parties.

In this connection, it is necessary to refer to Clause 69 of the scheme which relates to the liability of the Provident Fund Commissioner to pay over the amount of the provident fund to the person to whose credit it stands with him. It is also relevant in this connection to refer to ss. 17 and 52 of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act which deal with the question of effect of the order of adjudication and the description of the insolvent's property divisible amongst creditors. Section 17 provides that "On the making of an order of adjudication, the property of the insolvent wherever situate shall vest in the official assignee and shall become divisible amongst his creditors,..."

It also provides that after the order of adjudication

"...no creditor to whom the insolvent is indebted in respect of any debt provable in insolvency shall, during the pendency of the insolvency proceedings, have any remedy against the property of the insolvent in respect of the debt..."

Under s. 52(2), the property of the insolvent divisible amongst his creditors is mentioned as follows:—

"(a) all such property as may belong to or be vested in the insolvent at the commencement of the insolvency or may be acquired by or devolve on him before his discharge;"

The rest of the provisions in sub-s. (2) of s. 52 are not relevant. Having regard to the provisions in ss. 17 and 52, it is obvious that all kinds of properties belonging to the insolvent must vest in the Official Assignee. Even "after-acquired" properties must vest in the Official Assignee. The question is as to in what manner these provisions in the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act have been affected by reason of the provisions in s. 10 of the Employees' Provident Funds Act. In this connection, Clause 69 of the Provident Fund Scheme relating to circumstances in which accumulations in the Fund are payable to a member must be considered. The relevant part of this clause provides that a member may withdraw the full amount standing to his credit in the Fund on retirement from service after attaining the age of 55 years. Sub-clause (2) deals with the liability of the Provident Fund Commissioner to make payment of the Fund and the right of the member to recover the same even when the member has not attained the age of 55 and has not retired. The substance of the relevant provision in this sub-section is that a member who has resigned and/or retired prior to his age of 55 and/or has not been employed in any establishment to which the Act applies for a continuous period of not less than 6 months is entitled to withdraw the amount standing to his credit, subject, however, to the deductions which are all in detail referred to in sub-clause (3) of Clause 69. It appears to me that the true effect of the provisions in s. 10 of the Act is that in so far as certain amounts are liable to be deducted and forfeited under the Provident Funds Scheme by the Provident Fund Commissioner and in so far as the amount of the Fund is not payable to a member who becomes insolvent, the Official Assignee can have no claim of any kind against the Provident Fund Commissioner. The provision in s. 10 that the Official Assignee shall not be entitled to have any claim on any amount of provident fund does not have the effect of providing that the Fund which is under the scheme liable to be withdrawn and is payable by the Provident Fund Commissioner to an insolvent member does not vest in the Official Assignee under s. 17 and does not form part of the property divisible amongst his creditors under s. 52(2). The only effect of the provisions in s. 10 is that the right of the Provident Fund Commissioner to make deductions and other rights of third parties in respect of the Funds in his hands as provided in the scheme made under the Act are not liable to be affected by vesting of the property of the insolvent member in the Official Assignee. The contention made on behalf of the debtor must, therefore, fail.

The notice of motion is dismissed with costs.

The appellant appealed.

B. N. Shah, for the appellant.

A. G. Shah, for respondent No. 2.

CHARNANI C.J. The appellant was formerly employed in M/s Killick Nixon & Co., Ltd., Bombay. They had established a Provident Fund for the benefit of their employees. The appellant used to contribute to that fund. In 1962 the Employees' Provident Funds Act, 1952, hereinafter referred to as the Act, was made applicable to the establishment of M/s Killick Nixon & Co. Ltd. The appellant then became a member of the fund established under the scheme framed under the Act. Under sub-s. (2) of s. 15, the accumulations in the Provident Fund of his employers became liable to be transferred to the fund established under the provisions of the Act. The appellant retired from service in the beginning of 1964. On June 16, 1964, he was adjudicated insolvent.

The Official Assignee then addressed letters to the Regional Provident Fund Commissioner and also to the appellant's ex-employers asking them not to pay to the appellant the amounts lying to his credit in his Provident Fund account. The appellant then took out a Notice of Motion, in which prayer (c) was as follows:—

"(c) That the Official Assignee may be directed to withdraw his letters to the ex-employees of the Insolvent and the Provident Fund Commissioner requesting them to detain the insolvent's Provident Fund, and he may be further directed not to write any further letters in order to deprive the insolvent of his Provident Fund."

This motion was dismissed by Mr. Justice K. K. Desai. Against the order made by him the present appeal has been filed.

Sub-section (1) of s. 10 of the Employees' Provident Funds Act is in the following terms:—

"The amount standing to the credit of any member in the Fund or of any exempted employee in a provident fund shall not in any way be capable of being assigned or charged and shall not be liable to attachment under any decree or order of any court in respect of any debt or liability incurred by the member or the exempted employee, and neither the official assignee appointed under the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act, 1909, nor any receiver appointed under the Provincial Insolvency Act, 1920, shall be entitled to, or have any claim on, any such amount."

The latter part of this sub-section provides that the Official Assignee appointed under the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act, 1909, shall not be entitled to or have any claim on the amount standing to the credit of any member in the fund. The reference to the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act in this sub-section makes it clear that when the Legislature enacted this provision, it was aware of the provisions of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act, under s. 17 of which on the making of an order of adjudication, the property of the insolvent wherever situate vests in the Official Assignee. Notwithstanding that provision the Legislature has specifically provided that the Official Assignee shall have no title to or any claim on the amount standing to the credit of the insolvent in the Provident Fund. The intention of the Legislature is, therefore, clear and that is that this sub-section should override the provisions of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act. It follows that so long as the amount stands to the credit of the insolvent in the fund, that is, so long as it is lying with the Regional Provident Fund Commissioner and has not been paid to the insolvent, the amount does not vest in the Official Assignee and he cannot lay any claim to it. The immunity given by sub-s. (1) of s. 10 will, however, not continue after the amount has been paid to the insolvent, see *Bonjour v. Official Assignee, Madras*¹.

The learned Judge has referred to sub-s. (3) of s. 69, which provides for certain percentages of the employer's contribution and interest thereon being forfeited to the Fund, when a member withdraws any amount under sub-s. (2) of this section. The learned Judge was inclined to hold that sub-s. (1) of s. 10 applies only to those amounts, which are liable to be deducted and forfeited under the provisions of the Act and which not being payable to the insolvent cannot vest in the Official Assignee. With respect, it seems to us that the view taken by the learned Judge on this point is not correct. The amounts, which have to be deducted from the sum standing to the credit of a member in the Fund or which are liable to be forfeited under the provisions of the Act, are not payable to the member. As he is not entitled to them, they cannot be attached under any decree or order of any Court, in respect of any debt or liability incurred by him. No special provision in regard to such amounts was, therefore, necessary. The object underlying sub-s. (1) of s. 10 appears to be much wider. One of the purposes of a Provident Fund is to make some provision for the families of the employees. The Legislature, therefore, appears to have provided by s. 10 that the amount standing to the credit of a subscriber in the Provident Fund shall not be available to his creditors.

We, therefore, allow the appeal, set aside the order made by the learned Judge dismissing the notice of motion taken out by the appellant in so far as prayer (c) in the notice of motion is concerned and make an order in terms of prayer (c) in the notice of motion dated July 2, 1964.

were then drawn and petitioner No. 1 was declared as duly elected. One of the persons, who had voted in favour of petitioner No. 1, was Bajubai petitioner No. 2. On June 23, 1964, respondents Nos. 3 and 4 made applications to the Collector evidently under sub-s. (5) of s. 33 of the Village Panchayats Act and requested the Collector to set aside the election of petitioner No. 1 on the ground that petitioner No. 2, who had voted in favour of petitioner No. 1, had ceased to be a member of the Panchayat on April 29, 1964, under cl. (b) in sub-s. (1) of s. 40 of the Act. On July 21, 1964, the President, Zilla Parishad, passed an order stating that as petitioner No. 2 Bajubai had remained absent for more than six consecutive months from the meetings of the Panchayat without any leave from the Panchayat, a vacancy had occurred on April 29, 1964, and that from that date petitioner No. 2 could not continue to be a member of the Village Panchayat of Akkalkuwa. This order was made under sub-s. (2) of s. 40 of the Act. In view of this order the Collector held that petitioner No. 2 was not qualified to vote at the election of the Sarpanch. He, therefore, set aside the election of petitioner No. 1 as the Sarpanch of the Panchayat and directed that a fresh election should be held. The Collector rejected the prayer made on behalf of respondent No. 4 that he should be declared to have been duly elected as the Sarpanch of the Panchayat. Against the order made by the Collector the petitioners have filed the present special civil application No. 1102 of 1964. The other application No. 1177 of 1964 has been filed by respondent No. 4, in which he has prayed that he should be declared to have been duly elected as the Sarpanch of the Panchayat at the meeting held on June 15, 1964.

The main question which arises for determination in these applications is whether petitioner No. 2 Bajubai was disqualified from continuing to be a member of the Village Panchayat under cl. (b) in sub-s. (1) of s. 40 of the Act. This sub-section provides:

"(1) Any member of a panchayat who, during his term of office—...

(b) absents himself for six consecutive months from the meetings of the panchayat, without the leave of the said Panchayat, shall cease to be a member and his office shall be vacant."

Sub-section (2) of this section states that any dispute as to whether a vacancy has or has not occurred under this section shall be referred for decision of the President of the Zilla Parishad, whose decision shall be final. Petitioner No. 2 attended the meeting of the Village Panchayat on October 27, 1963. She remained absent at the next meeting held on November 19, 1963. She also did not attend the subsequent five meetings held on November 28, 1963, December 29, 1963, January 31, 1964, February 29 1964 and March 31, 1964. She, however, was present at the next meeting held on April 30, 1964. It has been contended by Mr. Patil that the period of six months must be counted from November 19, 1963, the date on which she absented herself for the first time after attending the previous meeting held on October 27, 1963. Mr. Adik has, on the other hand, urged that petitioner No. 2 should be held to have been disqualified, as she did not attend any meeting of the Panchayat held during the period of six months from October 28, 1963. The disqualification under the above provisions would be incurred if a member absents himself from meetings of the Village Panchayat for six consecutive months. The absence must, therefore, be from a meeting. Until a meeting is held, no question of absence can arise. Six months of absence cannot, therefore, begin to run unless a member is absent and he cannot be absent until a meeting is held. It follows that the period of six months must be reckoned from the date of the meeting at which the member remained absent and not from the date of the meeting at which he was last present.

This view is in accordance with that taken in Kershaw v. Shoredith Corporation.¹ Sub-section (6) of s. 46 of the Local Government Act, 1894, provided that if a member of a council was absent from the meetings of the council for more than six months consecutively, his office shall on the expiration of those months become vacant. It was held that the period of six months began to run from the first meeting when he was absent and not from the last meeting at which he was present.

In the case of petitioner No. 2, the period of six months therefore began on November 19, 1963, when she was absent for the first time from the meetings of the Panchayat. Six months from this date expired on May 19, 1964. Before the expiry of this period she attended the meeting held on April 30, 1964. Consequently, she had not incurred the disqualification under cl. (b) in sub-s. (1) of s. 40 of the Act. She was consequently entitled to vote at the election for the office of the Sarpanch held on June 15, 1964.

The order made by the President of the Zilla Parishad holding that petitioner No. 2 was disqualified from continuing to be a member under s. 40 of the Act and that a vacancy had consequently occurred, must therefore be set aside. We also set aside the order of the Collector, by which he has held the election of petitioner No. 1 as the Sarpanch to be invalid.

As the election of petitioner No. 1 was valid, special civil application No. 1177 does not survive. The rule in that application will be discharged.

The petitioners in application No. 1102 should get their costs from respondents Nos. 3 and 4. No order as to costs in application No. 1177.

v.

THE COMMISSIONER OF WEALTH TAX, BOMBAY CITY I.*

Wealth-tax Act (XXVII of 1957), Sec. 3—Whether valuation date is date for attraction of tax.

Under s. 3 of the Wealth-tax Act, 1957, the unit of period for which the tax is levied is the unit of the financial year.

The provisions of the Act which determine the tax liability are not the provisions which existed on the date which is the date with reference to which the net wealth is to be computed, but the provisions which are applicable during the period of assessment for which the tax is levied.

R. J. Kolah, with P. Ramaswami, for the applicant.

G. N. Joshi, with R. J. Joshi, for the respondent.

V. S. DESAI J. The question, which has been referred to us under s. 27(1) of the Wealth-tax Act, 1957, at the instance of the assessee, is as follows:—

“Whether for the assessment year 1959-60 the net wealth of the assessee has rightly been charged at the rate of 1%.”

The relevant valuation date for the computation of the net wealth of the assessee for the assessment year 1959-60 was March 31, 1959. By s. 21 of the Finance Act of 1959 the Wealth-tax Act was amended altering the rate of wealth-tax in the Schedule of the Act. The amendment was made effective from April 1, 1959. The result of this amendment was that the rate of wealth-tax, which was applicable to the net wealth of the assessee, was increased from $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. to 1 per cent. The assessee's contention was that the amendment of the Wealth-tax Act increasing the rate of tax came into operation only from April 1, 1959. The rate of tax on the date with reference to which his net wealth was to be computed, i.e. March 31, 1959, was only $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. According to the assessee, under the Wealth-tax Act, the rate of tax which is applicable is the rate of tax, which exists in the Schedule of the Wealth-tax Act on the relevant valuation date for the computation of the net wealth and, therefore, in the present case the rate that was applicable was the rate, which existed in the Schedule on March 31, 1959. Since on that date the rate was only $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. that is the rate, which must be applied to the net wealth of the assessee as computed on the relevant valuation date, viz. March 31, 1959.

*Decided, February 17, 1965. Wealth Tax Reference No. 6 of 1962.

In order to appreciate this contention of the assessee, we must consider s. 3 of the Wealth-tax Act, which is the charging section. That section reads as follows:—

“Assessment year” under the Act means the year for which tax is chargeable under s. 3 and, therefore, means every financial year commencing on and from April 1, 1957. “Net wealth” as defined in s. 2(m) means the amount by which the aggregate value computed in accordance with the provisions of this Act of all the assets, wherever located, belonging to the assessee on the valuation date, including assets required to be included in his net wealth as on that date under this Act, is in excess of the aggregate value of all the debts owed by the assessee on the valuation date other than certain specified kinds of debts and the amounts of certain taxes, penalties and interest. “Valuation date” in relation to any year for which an assessment is to be made under this Act means the last day of the previous year as defined in cl. (II) of s. 2 of the Income-tax Act if an assessment were to be made under that Act for that year and if there were different previous years under the Income-tax Act for different sources of income, the last day of the last of such previous years. Under s. 3, with which we are concerned and which is the charging section, wealth-tax is charged for every financial year. It is a tax on the net wealth as computed for that financial year and the rate of tax is at the rate, which is to be found in the Schedule of the Act applicable to the computed quantum of the net wealth. The dispute in the case centres on the question as to what rate is to be applied to the net wealth in the present case. Is it the rate, which existed in the Schedule to the Act on the date, which is the date for the computation of the net wealth of the assessee, or is it the rate, which is applicable to the financial year, for which the tax is to be levied on the net wealth?

It is argued on behalf of the Department that the tax being for the financial year, the rate of tax is that which is applicable to the financial year in question and it is that rate, which must be applied to the net wealth. That the net wealth is computed with reference to the date, which is anterior to the commencement of the financial year for which the wealth-tax is levied, does not mean that a tax is attracted by the net wealth at any point of time earlier than the commencement of the financial year for which the tax is levied. The valuation date specified in the Act is only for the purpose of fixing the point of time with reference to which the net wealth which will attract the tax will be determined, but it is not the date for the attraction of tax. Tax is only attracted at the commencement of the financial year and at no point of time earlier than that. The tax is again attracted or charged in accordance with the provisions of the Act, which exist at the point of time of the attraction of the tax. Net-wealth, no doubt, is computed with reference to an anterior point of time, but the computation takes place according to the provisions of the Act as they exist in the relevant financial year for which the tax is levied. The range of the net-wealth, the deductions and exclusions, which will be permissible under the Act are all according to the Act as it exists in the relevant financial year. It is argued that s. 3 states that the tax is charged for every financial year subject to the other provisions contained in the Act. The provisions of the Act, which have to be borne in mind and considered for the purpose of charging the tax, are the provisions of the Act, which are there in the relevant financial year. The rates specified in the Schedule, which will apply to the net wealth will, therefore, be the rates, which are specified in the Schedule in the given financial year in which the tax is charged.

In our opinion, the submission, which has been advanced on behalf of the Department with regard to the interpretation of s. 3 of the Wealth-tax Act appears to be correct. Although the net wealth is required to be ascertained as on a date anterior to the commencement of the financial year for which the tax is charged, the said date is only for the purpose of fixing the point of time with reference to which the quantum of wealth which will bear the tax is to be ascertained. What that quantum will be will have to be determined according to the provisions contained in the Act at the time when the determination of the quantum would become necessary for the assessment of the tax liability for the financial year in question. The provisions of the Act, which will determine the quantum of net wealth will not be the provisions, which existed on the date which is the date with reference to which the net wealth is to be computed, but the provisions, which are applicable during the period of assessment for which the tax is levied. Under s. 3 the unit of period for which the tax is levied is the unit of the financial year. The valuation date, which is the date with reference to which the net-wealth is to be computed, is the last day of the previous year. In the present case, the valuation date was March 31, 1959, but it is possible, according to the accounting year chosen by the assessee, that it could be a date much anterior to the commencement of the financial year for which the tax is levied. For instance, where the calendar year is the accounting year of the assessee, it would be December 31, or where the assessee has any other accounting year, like the Samvat years, the valuation date may be some time in October or November of the earlier year. Net-wealth for the purposes of the Wealth-tax Act will, no doubt, have to be determined with reference to these various dates in the case of various assessees, but the determination does not take place on those dates but in the financial year in which the tax liability is attracted by the net wealth. Nor is the tax attracted by the net wealth on those particular dates. If the law changes during the interval between the valuation dates and the date when the tax is actually attracted, which is at the commencement of the financial year for which the tax is charged, the tax that will be attracted will be in accordance with the provisions of the Wealth-tax Act as it stands at the time of the attraction of the tax and not as it was on the valuation date.

In our opinion, therefore, in the present case the rate that was applicable to the net wealth of the assessee for the assessment year 1959-60 was the rate which was to be found in the schedule of the Act as it stood on April 1, 1959.

Mr. Kolah, learned counsel for the assessee, has pressed upon us a different construction of s. 3 of the Wealth-tax Act. He has argued that on the language of s. 3, the tax is charged on the net wealth at the rate or rates, which are specified in the Schedule on the corresponding valuation date, with reference to which the net wealth is computed. The learned counsel has argued that the scheme of the Wealth-tax Act is different from the Income-tax Act. Under the Income-tax Act, the charging section only brings in the chargeability of the income to tax. The charge is actually imposed by the Finance Act, which is required to be passed for the purpose of the imposition of the tax. Under the Income-tax Act, therefore, although the income of the previous year is liable to charge, the actual charging or imposition of the tax is only when the rates are declared by the Finance Act. Even after the introduction of s. 67-B of the Indian Income-tax Act, whereby in the absence of the Finance Act being passed the rates under the earlier Finance Act are made to prevail, the position is not altered because the application of the rates under the earlier Act also does not come in unless the Finance Act is not passed on or before the first of April of the year in question and consequently there is no charge of income-tax even according to the rates of the earlier Finance Act until the first of April of the year, which is necessarily after the last date of the accounting year, in which the income liable to income-tax is earned. That is, however, not so under the Wealth-tax Act. The entire machinery has been provided in the Act itself. The rates at which the tax is to be charged are not required to be brought in by another Act, as in the case of income-tax, but they are in the Wealth-tax Act itself. The entire machinery, not only for bringing in the chargeability of the net wealth to wealth-tax but also for the charging of the tax, is contained in the Act itself.

Mr. Kolah has argued that this difference in the schemes of the two Acts has got to be borne in mind in interpreting the charging section in the Act before us. According to him, the charging section has provided that a tax will be charged on the net wealth on the corresponding valuation date at the rate to be found in the Schedule of the Act. Although this taxation is for every financial year, the tax is charged on the net wealth on the date, which is the valuation date for the net wealth. The charging being on the date of the valuation the rate at which the charge will be made must obviously be the rate, which exists on the date of charging, viz. on the date of valuation. His argument is that such a construction must be put on s. 3 because of the expression "on the corresponding valuation date" following the words "in respect of the net-wealth" occurring in the said section. Mr. Kolah argues that if the charging was not intended to take place on the net wealth on the valuation date itself, those words, viz. "on the corresponding valuation date" were thoroughly redundant and not required to be used at all. The argument of the learned counsel is that 'net wealth' as defined in the Act means net wealth as computed on the valuation date, and "valuation date" is an expression which can only be understood with reference to the year of assessment for which the tax is levied, being the last day of the previous year relevant to the assessment year. The use of the word "net-wealth", therefore, was sufficient to mean net wealth as computed on the corresponding valuation date. The expression "on the corresponding valuation date", therefore, must have connection with the words "shall be charged" and "at the rate or rates specified in the Schedule" as occurring in the section and the meaning of the section, therefore, is that the tax, which is charged under this section, is charged on the valuation date on the net wealth as computed with reference to that date, and at the rate or rates as existed in the Schedule on the date of charging. Now, the words "on the corresponding valuation date" do appear to create some difficulty but we do not think that they have been used for the purpose and object as contended by Mr. Kolah. The tax charged by the section is a tax for every financial year commencing from the first day of April 1957. The subject-matter of the tax is the net wealth as it exists at certain specific point of time referred to as the valuation date with reference to each financial year for which the tax is charged. The subject-matter of tax, therefore, which is expressed by the expression "net wealth" is not a fixed or constant amount which is determined once and for all years of taxation, but a varying amount, which is capable of being different for different years of taxation. What is intended to be taxed in each financial year is the net wealth for that year, that is, the net wealth as computed on the valuation date in relation to that year. The charging section, which is a permanent provision providing for the charging of the tax for all financial years for which the Wealth-tax Act will be on the statute book has brought out that intention by specifying that in each financial year the tax will be charged in respect of the net wealth on the corresponding valuation date. In our opinion, it is for this reason that the words "on the corresponding valuation date" have been incorporated in the section after the words "in respect of the net wealth". We do not think that it is intended by s. 3 of the Wealth-tax Act that the wealth-tax for any financial year should be actually charged at any point of time anterior to the commencement of the said year. If we were to accept the interpretation which is canvassed before us on behalf of the assessee, it may lead to some curious results. Thus, for instance, for the first year for which the Act applied, viz. the financial year 1957-58, no wealth-tax could be charged on the net wealth of the assessee. The valuation date for the first year would, in the case of every assessee, be anterior to the first of April 1957 when the Act came into force. If Mr. Kolah's interpretation of s. 3 is accepted that the tax is actually charged on the valuation date at the rate which is to be found in the Schedule as applicable on that date, there will be no charge to tax because there was no rate in the schedule of the Wealth-tax Act, which was applicable on that date. The entire Wealth-tax Act along with its schedule and the rates specified therein came into operation only on April 1, 1957. Although, therefore, the charging section of the Wealth-tax Act says that the tax will be charged for the financial year commencing from April 1, 1957, there will actually be no wealth-tax charged. Again, if the Legislature decides that from a certain financial year onwards the wealth-tax should be abolished either completely or partially or that it should be amended so as to increase the burden or grant relief against it, the provision will not take effect in spite of the said intention of the Legislature for at least a period of one year, because if the interpretation, which Mr. Kolah seeks to put upon the section is accepted, on the valuation date itself the net wealth gets computed under the provisions of the Act as it existed at that time and the tax at the rate applicable on that date also gets attached to it. We do not think that the meaning which Mr. Kolah wants to give to the language of s. 3 is the meaning which was intended by the Legislature.

Mr. Kolah has argued that curious and anomalous results will follow from the proper construction of the section is no reason for the Court to abandon such a construction. It may be true that where the provision of the statute is so clear as to leave no doubt as to what its meaning and construction is the mere circumstance that giving the section its proper meaning and effect is likely to lead to certain anomalous or curious results would not be a consideration for the Court to reject that construction. The defect in such cases will have to be cured by the Legislature. That is, however, so, where the position is such that the meaning of what the Legislature has said is clear and unambiguous and the section leads only to one construction and to no other. That, however, is not the position in the present case. In the first place the construction, which Mr. Kolah has sought to put on s. 3 does not appear to be the true and proper construction even on the language employed in the section. Assuming that the construction such as he has put on the section is one of the possible constructions, there is, in our opinion, a much better and a more reasonable construction, which the language of s. 3 is quite capable of yielding to. There can be no doubt whatsoever that, when there are two possible constructions even when both are equally possible, though such is not the position in the present case, if one of the constructions leads to curious and anomalous results and tends to defeat what the Legislature has intended, while the other produces no such results and is quite consistent with the scheme of the Act and the manifest intention of the Legislature, it is the latter one that will have to be preferred.

In order to emphasise his arguments that the scheme under the Wealth-tax Act is different from the scheme under the Indian Income-tax Act and that the difference between the two schemes has got to be borne in mind in interpreting the charging section in the Wealth-tax Act, Mr. Kolah has invited our attention to *Commr. of Wealth-tax v. Standard Mills Co. Ltd.*¹ and *Chatturam Horilram Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc.-tax*², where the scheme of the Income-tax Act with reference to the chargeability to tax under the Act and the imposition of the tax or the attraction of the tax liability have been considered. We do not wish to make any detailed reference to those cases because we are in agreement with Mr. Kolah that there is undoubtedly a difference in the scheme of the two Acts. The charging section of the Wealth-tax Act, however, has got to be interpreted on its own language and in view of the scheme under the Wealth-tax Act and in giving our construction and interpretation to the said section, we have properly borne in mind the difference in the schemes of the two Acts, to which Mr. Kolah has invited our attention.

In the result, therefore, our answer to the question, which has been referred to us, is in the affirmative. The assessee will pay the costs of the Department.

Answer accordingly.

Expenditure-tax Act (XXIX of 1957), Sec. 4(ii)—Asset obtained by coparcener at partial partition of joint Hindu family—Whether such asset source created by family within s. 4(ii).

What a coparcener in a joint Hindu family gets at the partition, even when the partition is partial, does not constitute a source created by the Hindu undivided family within the meaning of s. 4(ii) of the Expenditure-tax Act, 1957, before its amendment in 1959.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

G. N. Joshi, with R. J. Joshi, instructed by P. G. Gokhale, for the applicant.
S. P. Mehta, with Y. P. Trivedi, for the respondent.

V. S. DESAI J. The assessee is a Hindu undivided family, consisting of a father, a major son and two minor sons, as its coparceners. Prior to the accounting year in question, a partial partition took place in this joint Hindu family, whereby the shares of joint stock companies held by the family came to be divided amongst the members of the family entitled to property on partition. This partial partition was recognised by the Income-tax authorities and the father and the sons in their individual capacity were assessed to tax in respect of the income derived by them from the assets obtained by them at the partial partition. Out of the said incomes which the sons had received from the said assets, they had incurred expenditure on themselves in the amounts of Rs. 11,169, Rs. 7,582 and Rs. 17,427, respectively. In the assessment for expenditure tax of the Hindu undivided family in the assessment year 1958-59, for which the relevant account year was the year ending March 31, 1958, the Expenditure Tax Officer included in the taxable expenditure of the Hindu undivided family the above mentioned sums of expenditure incurred by the three sons out of the income of the assets obtained by them on partial partition. According to the Expenditure Tax Officer, these amounts were liable to be included in the taxable expenditure of the Hindu undivided family under s. 4(ii) of the Expenditure-tax Act, as it stood at the material time, because in his view the sources out of which the expenditures were incurred by the sons were the sources which were made or created by the Hindu undivided family within the meaning of s. 4(ii) of the Act. The view of the Expenditure Tax Officer was upheld by the Appellate Assistant Commissioner in appeal. In the second appeal, which the assessee preferred to the Appellate Tribunal, the said Tribunal disagreed with the view taken by the departmental authorities and held that the said amounts were not from sources made or created by the *Decided February 15, 1965. Expenditure-tax Reference No. 1 of 1962.

Hindu undivided family and were, therefore, not liable to be included under s. 4(ii). It accordingly allowed the appeal and directed the deletion of the said items from the taxable expenditure of the assessee. On an application made to it by the Department under s. 25(1) of the Expenditure-tax Act, 1957, the Tribunal has drawn up a statement and referred to this Court the following question as arising out of its order:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the expenditure incurred by the dependants of the family amounting to Rs. 11,169/-, Rs. 7,582/- and Rs. 17,427/- was liable to inclusion in the Expenditure-tax assessment of the assessee family having regard to the provisions of section 4(ii) of the Act before its amendment in 1959."

In our opinion, the conclusion of the Tribunal that these items were not liable to inclusion is correct and the question, therefore, must be answered in the negative. The provision under which the amounts were sought to be included by the Department is as follows:

"4. Unless otherwise provided in section 5, the following amounts shall be included in computing the expenditure of an assessee liable to tax under this Act, namely:—

(i) ...

(ii) any expenditure incurred by any dependant of the assessee for the benefit of the assessee or of any of his dependants out of any gift, donation or settlement on trust or out of any other source made or created by the assessee, whether directly or indirectly." The "assessee" under the Act, means an individual or a Hindu undivided family by whom expenditure tax or any other sum is payable under the Act. A "dependant" means where the assessee is a Hindu undivided family, every coparcener other than the Karta and any other member of the family, who under any law or order or decree of a Court is entitled to maintenance from the joint family property. "Expenditure" under the Act includes any sum in money or money's worth spent or disbursed by an assessee. Now, under the relevant provision with which we are concerned, the expenditure to which the said provision will apply must be an expenditure incurred by a dependant of the assessee. It must be incurred for the benefit of the assessee or any of the dependants of the assessee, and the sums out of which it must be incurred must be a gift, donation or settlement on trust or any other source which must be made or created by the assessee either directly or indirectly. In the case before us, the three persons who have incurred the expenditures are coparceners of the assessee Hindu undivided family and are, therefore, dependants within the meaning of s. 2(g) of the Act. The expenditure incurred by them can also be regarded as for the benefit of the dependants of the assessee, since they themselves are the dependants of the assessee. The only question is whether the source from which the said expenditure is made by them is a source of the kind mentioned in the last part of the provision. Now, the expenditure which the three sons have incurred is from the income of the shares which they obtained at the partial partition of the property of the Hindu undivided family. There can be no doubt whatsoever that the partition of the joint family property cannot be regarded as a gift, donation or settlement on trust made by the Hindu undivided family. What has got to be seen is whether the partial partition could be regarded as a source made or created by the Hindu undivided family. It is contended by Mr. Joshi, learned counsel, who appears for the Department, that since the Hindu undivided family is not disrupted and continues to exist, the partial partition could be regarded as an act of the Hindu undivided family creating different sources to be exclusively owned and possessed by the different coparceners of the Hindu undivided family, and therefore, sources made or created by the Hindu undivided family. Now, it must be remembered that the arrangement whereby the three sons have been given the shares possessed by the family for being owned and possessed by them separately, is not an arrangement made by way of convenience for the time being. It is as a result of an act of partial partition of the joint family property that the three sons have come to possess these shares. A partition in a

Hindu Joint family could be a partial partition with regard to some of the properties of the Hindu joint family without disrupting the joint family status of the family with regard to the rest of the properties, and without disrupting the coparcenary. The partial partition, however, is in pursuance of the right possessed by the members of the coparcenary to come to a partition under the Hindu law. What a coparcener gets on partition is not what is given to him by the joint family, but what he has a right to obtain by virtue of his birth in the family. It is not, therefore, possible to say that what a coparcener gets at the partition, even when the partition is partial, is something which is given to him by the family so as to constitute a source created by the family within the meaning of s. 4(4) of the Expenditure-tax Act. The circumstance that the joint family exists and continues with regard to the rest of the property does not have the result of what the coparceners have obtained on partial partition as something which has been given to them by the joint family. In our opinion, therefore, the expenditures incurred by the three sons in the present case cannot be considered as expenditures incurred by them out of the source made or created by the assessee Hindu undivided family.

In the result, therefore, we answer the question which is referred to us in the negative. The Department will pay the costs of the assessee.

Answer accordingly.

Under s. 5(1)(viii) of the Wealth-tax Act, 1957, exemption in respect of furniture does not include what is placed or contained in the article of furniture. Therefore, articles contained in show cases exhibited in drawing-rooms do not form part of the show cases as items of furniture and where they are intended to be excluded, a specific provision is made for their exclusion, e.g. in clauses (xi) and (xii) of s. 5(1) of the Act. Gold caskets although contained in a show case which is part of the drawing-room furniture, are not entitled to exemption under s. 5(1)(viii).

The expression "household utensils" in s. 5(1)(viii) of the Act means utensils which are in fact household utensils i.e. articles which are normally and commonly used by the assessee for his personal or household use and not something which is merely in the shape of household utensils but never intended to be used as such. The use must be according to the ordinary ideas, habits, customs and notions of the class of society to which the assessee belongs or according to the well established habits, customs and traditions of the family of the assessee. The mere possibility that the articles are capable of being put to a personal or household use will not be sufficient to treat them as intended for a personal or household use. The question whether the articles are intended for personal or household use has to be considered with reference to the facts and circumstances as they exist at the time when the question has to be determined.

The personal use contemplated in s. 5(1)(viii) of the Act is the use of a like nature as the use of other items mentioned in the section, namely, furniture, household utensils, wearing apparel and provisions. The use as a decoration in the drawing-room in the house, which is only calculated to give the person making the use a pride of possession is not contemplated in the section. The articles which are intended to give pride of possession and not intended for sale by the assessee are provided for in the other clauses of the section, for instance, cls. (xii) and (xiii). Souvenirs or mementoes which are articles not intended for sale but are only possessed to give the possessor a pride of possession are, however, not exempted under any of the clauses of s. 5 of the Act.

V. S. DESAI J. In the wealth-tax assessment of the assessee for the assessment year 1959-60, for which the relevant valuation date was March 31, 1959, the assessee claimed exemption in respect of certain gold and silver articles under s. 5(I)(viii) of the Wealth-tax Act. He was allowed exemption in respect of the silver articles, but the exemption was disallowed in respect of the gold articles which were valued at Rs. 51,600. The question which arises for consideration on this reference under s. 27(I) of the Wealth-tax Act, at the instance of the assessee, is:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case the assessee was entitled to exemption from tax in respect of the gold articles valued at Rs. 51,600/- in terms of section 5(I)(viii) of the Act?"

The gold articles in question consist of two gold caskets weighing 225 tolas, gold tray of 70 tolas, two gold glasses weighing 42 tolas, a gold cup saucer and spoons together weighing 32 tolas, and photo-frames weighing 61 tolas. The total gold contained in these articles is 431 tolas, and its valuation at the relevant time was Rs. 51,600. The assessee was connected with business in cloth manufactured by the textile mills under the management of M/s. Tata Sons Ltd. In the year 1945, the assessee was appointed a Justice of Peace, and the occasion was celebrated by the dealers and brokers in cloth manufactured by the mills, with whose business the assessee was connected. On the occasion of celebration, these articles were presented to the assessee as souvenirs. Ever since that time the assessee kept these articles in a glass show case for display in his drawing room. Before the Wealth Tax Officer, the assessee contended that these articles were household utensils, which were put to daily use, and, therefore, entitled to exemption. The claim was rejected by the Wealth Tax Officer, who held that the household utensils for daily use, which were exempted under s. 5(I)(viii) of the Wealth-tax Act were ordinary utensils for day to day or ordinary use, and not utensils of gold which were meant for ornamental use for special occasions. Before the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, the same stand was taken by the assessee, namely, that in view of the traditions of the family, the articles in question were of normal nature and were utensils for the day to day use of the appellant-assessee. The Appellate Assistant Commissioner took the view that the exemption under the relevant provisions of the Wealth-tax Act applied only to the normal requirements of household from day to day, and not to articles which were in the form of jewellery. He, therefore, confirmed the decision of the Wealth Tax Officer, disallowing the exemption.

In the second appeal before the Appellate Tribunal, the assessee did not persist in saying that the articles were household utensils for the personal or household use of the assessee, but contended that they fell within the expression "other articles intended for the personal or household use of the assessee" contained in s. 5(I)(viii) of the Act. That claim of the assessee was negatived by the Tribunal, although the two Members of the Tribunal put their reasons for negating the claim on slightly different grounds. According to the Accountant Member, the expression "other articles intended for personal or household use of the assessee" used in the relevant provision must be construed ejusdem generis with the other items which were specified in the said provision, namely, furniture, household utensils, wearing apparel and provisions, and when so construed, they must be taken to mean articles which are intended for consumption as distinguished from decoration or ornamentation. According to him, the word "use" as used in the expression "other articles intended for the personal or household use of the assessee", meant something different from ornamentation or decoration, and necessarily in the context, the use contemplated, whether it is personal use or household use, is such that the article itself is consumed by the use to which it is put. He pointed out that the assessee had clearly admitted that the articles were put in a glass show case which was kept in the drawing room, and they served not only the purpose of decoration, but as souvenirs, so that the assessee when he looked at them recalled happily the memory of the event that took place in 1945 when he was appointed a Justice of Peace. Having regard to the use to which the articles were put according to the assessee, the Accountant Member was of the opinion that the said use was not the personal or household use which was intended by the relevant provision. The Judicial Member was of the opinion that in order to find out whether the articles in question were intended for the personal or household use of the assessee, it was the intention of the assessee and the use to which he had actually put the articles, which were the main criteria for determining the question. Since, on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the assessee had never intended to put the articles to a personal or household use and had used them only as articles of drawing-room decoration, the articles could not be regarded as being qualified for the exemption under the relevant provision. Since both the learned Members of the Tribunal were of the opinion that the articles were not entitled to exemption, they confirmed the decision of the departmental authorities, and dismissed the appeal of the assessee. Thereafter, at the instance of the assessee, they have drawn up the statement of the case, and referred to this Court the question which we have stated earlier.

The relevant clause under which the exemption is claimed, allows exemption in respect of:

"furniture, household utensils, wearing apparel, provisions and other articles intended for the personal or household use of the assessee."

In order to come within the exemption given by this clause, the articles in question must fall within any of the items mentioned therein. Before the departmental authorities, the exemption was claimed on the basis that they were household utensils. The two gold caskets together weighing 225 tolas can by no stretch of imagination be regarded as household utensils. Mr. Mehta, learned counsel appearing for the assessee, has contended that on the facts and on the material on record, they could be regarded as items of furniture. He points out that they are kept in the drawing room in a show case. The show-case, according to him, is undoubtedly a part of the furniture, and he suggests that the show case with its contents is also intended to be and forms part of the drawing room furniture of the assessee. We do not think that gold caskets, simply because they are put in a show case, which is part of the drawing room furniture, also become items of furniture. Nor do we think that the Legislature has intended to include in the items of furniture what is placed or contained in the articles of furniture. A reference to cls. (xii) and (xiii) of the said section will show that works of art, archaeological, scientific or art collections, books or manuscripts belonging to the assessee and not intended for sale are allowed exemption. Works of art, or books or manuscripts, scientific or art collections may be exhibited in show cases in the drawing-rooms. They would not be parts of the furniture. Similarly, under cl. (xiii), drawings, paintings, photographs, prints and any other heirloom not falling within cl. (xii) and not intended for sale, but not including jewellery, are also exempted. Several of these items may be exhibited in show cases. The articles, therefore, which are contained in the show cases exhibited in the drawing-rooms are not intended by the Legislature as forming part of the show cases as items of furniture, and where they are intended to be excluded, a specific provision is made for their exclusion. We do not think, therefore, that the gold caskets, which by themselves are not an item of furniture, will come in for inclusion as a part of the furniture, because they are contained in a show case kept in the drawing-room. There is no doubt whatsoever, therefore, that the two gold caskets would not be entitled to exemption.

As to the rest of the articles, namely, the gold tray, two gold glasses, gold cup, saucer and spoon, and the photoframes, all of them perhaps with the exception of the photoframes, which are ornamental, have the shape of household utensils. The question, however, to be considered is whether, because the articles are in the shape of household utensils, they would necessarily be entitled to exemption under cl. 5(I)(viii) of the Act. Now, in the first place, it may be stated that the assessee before the Tribunal did not argue his case on the basis that the articles in question were household utensils. He admitted that they were not household utensils, and that they had not been put to any such use at any time. His case before the Tribunal was that they were articles other than household utensils intended for the personal use of the assessee. It seems to us that even apart from the circumstance that it was not the assessee's case before the Tribunal that they were household utensils, what is meant by the expression "household utensils" in the clause are utensils which are in fact household utensils and not something which is merely in the shape of household utensils but never intended to be used as such. It seems to us that the intention of the Legislature in prescribing the exemption under the said provision is to allow exemption in the case of articles which are of common and ordinary personal or household use of the assessee. In other words, the articles which are normally and commonly used by the assessee either for his personal or household use like the furniture, household utensils, provisions and wearing apparel, etc. are allowed exemption. The idea in allowing exemption has reference to the use and the purpose of the articles and not to the form or shape that it has. Suppose for instance the assessee were to have the gold and silver in his possession given the shape of articles of furniture as for instance chairs, tables, benches etc., it is hardly possible to contend that because the articles have the shape of articles of furniture that they must qualify themselves for exemption as furniture. It is no doubt true in the present case that the articles have the shape of household utensils, but they would not be by their very shape be qualified for exemption as household utensils if they are in fact in truth not household utensils and neither held or possessed for that purpose nor meant or intended to be used as such. On the facts which are admitted by the assessee, and are found by the Tribunal, there is no doubt whatsoever that these articles, though having a shape of household utensils, were never regarded by the assessee as household utensils, and he never intended to use them as such, nor did he ever put them to any such use. It is not possible for the articles, therefore, to claim exemption as household utensils.

It next falls to be considered whether they would claim exemption as "other articles intended for personal use of the assessee". It seems to us in the first place that the personal use which is contemplated by the expression is the use of a like nature as the use of other items mentioned in the clause, namely, furniture, household utensils, wearing apparel and provisions. The use as a decoration in the drawing-room in the house, which is only calculated to give the person making the use a pride of possession is not contemplated under this provision under which the exemption is claimed. The articles which are intended to give pride of possession and not intended for sale by the assessee are provided for in the other clauses of the section, for instance, cls. (xii) and (xiii), to which we have already referred. Mr. Mehta has contended that the articles with which we are concerned, like the articles mentioned in cls. (xii) and (xiii) are not intended for sale, but are only intended to give the assessee a pride of possession and help him to recall the happy memory of the distinction and honour which he received years ago. Mr Mehta argues that the articles which are not intended for sale but are only possessed to give the possessor a pride of possession are intended to be excluded by the Legislature. There is no reason why the articles, with which we are concerned in the present case, should also not be granted exemption. It must, however, be remembered in the first place that no exemption has been claimed on any such ground or under any other clause of s. 5, excepting s. 5(1)(viii). Secondly, s. 5 is exhaustive of the exceptions, and the articles entitled to exemption must find their place in any of the clauses of s. 5 providing for such exemption. Of the category of articles which could be exempted on the ground that they are not intended for sale, but only give the owner a pride of possession, the exempted articles are mentioned in cls. (xii) and (xiii). It may well be asked as to why the articles of the present nature, which are souvenirs or mementoes and which stand on par with the articles mentioned in cls. (xii) and (xiii) should not have been allowed exemption. That, however, is for the Legislature to consider and not for us. What we have got to consider is whether they are actually exempted under the existing provisions, and the circumstance that we may be inclined to be of the view that they deserve exemption, will not enable us to allow exemption if the existing provisions of the statute do not allow it.

Mr. Mehta has then argued that the expression "intended for the personal or household use" should be interpreted to mean capable of being intended for personal or household use so that if the articles are such as can be put to a personal or household use if so intended by their owners they would be entitled to exemption. The articles in the present case are such, says Mr. Mehta, because it is possible that the assessee in his declining age may think of using them for taking his morning or evening tea. We think that the expression "intended for the personal or household use" would mean normally, commonly or ordinarily intended for personal or household use according to the ordinary ideas, habits, customs and notions of the class of society to which the assessee belongs or according to the well established habits, customs and traditions of the family of the assessee. The mere possibility, therefore, that the articles are capable of being put to a personal or household use would not be sufficient to treat them as intended for a personal or household use. Moreover, the question whether the articles are intended for personal or household use has got to be considered with reference to the facts and circumstances as they exist at the time when the question has to be determined. On the facts as found, at the time when the assessee came in possession of these articles he did not intend to put them to a personal or household use nor has he put them to any such use at any time thereafter so far. In the present assessment at any rate the assessee cannot get exemption for the said articles on the ground that they are intended for personal or household use. What the position will be in future assessment if the assessee starts using these articles for his personal use hereafter we need not consider at present. As things stand at present, we are of the opinion that the decision of the Tribunal is correct, and the assessee is not entitled to exemption under s. 5(1)(viii) of the Wealth-tax Act in respect of the gold articles.

Our answer, therefore, to the question which has been referred to us is in the negative. The assessee will pay the costs of the Commissioner.

Answer accordingly.

Wealth-tax Act (XXVII of 1957), Sec. 3—Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 3—Group of trustees holding wealth as trustees—Whether such trustees can be assessed to wealth-tax.

A group of trustees can be assessed to wealth-tax under the Wealth-tax Act, 1957, in respect of the wealth held by them as trustees.

B. A. Palkhivala, with Payne & Co., for the applicant.

G. N. Joshi and R. J. Joshi, instructed by P. G. Gokhale, for the respondent.

V. S. DESAI J. The short question which arises for consideration on the present reference is whether a group of trustees can be assessed to wealth-tax under the Wealth-tax Act in respect of the wealth held by them as trustees. This question has been referred to us by the Tribunal under s. 27(1) of the Wealth-tax Act, 1957, in the form of two questions, which are as follows:

"(1) Whether the assessments under the Wealth-tax Act are valid?

(2) If the answer to the above question is in the affirmative, whether the status of the assessee is 'Individual'?"

The charging section, which is s. 3, of the Wealth-tax Act provides that

"Subject to the provisions contained in this Act, there shall be charged for every financial year ending on and from the first day of April, 1957, a tax (hereinafter referred to as the 'wealth-tax') in respect of the net wealth on the corresponding valuation date of every individual, Hindu undivided family and company at the rate or rates specified in the Schedule."

It is argued on behalf of the assessee that it is only an individual, Hindu undivided family or a company that can be taxed to wealth-tax, and neither a group of individuals or an association of persons. The assessee in the present case, it is contended, is not an individual, but a group of persons or an association of persons, and do not, therefore, fall within the ambit of s. 3. The contention raised by the assessee in the present case has been answered by the Calcutta High Court against the assessee in Suhashini Karuri v. Wealth-tax Officer.¹ It has been held in that case that

"Joint trustees must be taken to be a single unit in law and not as an 'association of persons' and there is nothing wrong in treating such an unit as an individual holding property and becoming assessable under section 3 of the Wealth-tax Act for purposes of wealth-tax."

The view taken in that case was that having regard to the nature of joint trusteeship, all the co-trustees together formed, as it were, a collective trustee, and the body of trustees, therefore, could be regarded as a unit for the purposes of taxation and fell within the term "individual". In taking this view the learned Judges who decided the case found support in the observations of the Supreme Court in the case of Commr. of Inc.-tax v. Sodra Devi.² In that case, their Lordships of the Supreme Court were concerned with the interpretation of the word "individual" in s. 16 of the Indian Income-tax Act. It was observed that the word "individual" was wide enough to include a group of persons forming a unit. In a recent decision of the Supreme Court in (Seth Banarsi Das's case)³ the Supreme Court after having referred to its decision in Sodra Devi's case, have observed again that though the word "individual" is narrower than the word "assessee", it does not mean only a human being, but is wide enough to include a group of persons forming a unit.

Mr. Palkhivala, learned counsel appearing for the assessee, has sought to argue that a comparison of s. 3 of the Indian Income-tax Act with s. 3 of the Wealth-tax Act will show that while under s. 3 of the former Act, individuals, Hindu undivided family, company, local authority and every firm and other associations of persons or partners of the firm are brought within the ambit of the charging section, only three of them, viz., individual, Hindu undivided family and company, are charged under s. 3 of the Wealth-tax Act. This would, according to the learned advocate, indicate that associations or groups of persons forming a unit, are not intended to be charged to wealth-tax. In the first place, this argument was advanced in the Calcutta case to which we have already made a reference, and has been negatived there. As pointed in that case, if having regard to the nature of the group, it could be treated as a single collective unit, the term "individual" will be wide enough to include it. Secondly, it seems to us that the mere difference in the language of s. 3 of the Indian Income-tax Act and s. 3 of the Wealth-tax Act will not be sufficient to warrant that some of the categories or items mentioned in the former Act are intended to be omitted in the latter Act. If the words retained in the latter Act are sufficiently wide in their ambit to include even those categories or items which have been additionally mentioned in the first Act, it could not be said that they were intended to be omitted simply because they have not been similarly additionally stated in the latter Act. Mr. Palkhivala has then argued that if groups or associations of persons who were capable of being treated as a unit were intended to be included in the word "individual", there was no reason whatsoever to mention a Hindu undivided family separately. His argument, therefore, is that the mention of the Hindu undivided family, which is an association of persons, implies that other associations of persons are intended to be excluded. We do not think that the argument is sustainable. Although a Hindu undivided family consists of a number of persons it is not an association of persons or a firm or a company which is created by the act of parties. It consists of all persons lineally descended from a common ancestor and includes their wives and unmarried daughters. Its fundamental principle is the tie of sapindaship arising by birth, marriage or adoption. The Hindu undivided family with all its incidents is purely a creature of Hindu law and cannot be created by act of parties. It is because of the peculiar characteristics of the institution which distinguishes it from an association of persons or a firm or a company that the taxation laws which want to treat it as a unit for taxation have mentioned it as a distinct unit. We do not, therefore, think that the argument can be advanced that the mention of the Hindu undivided family as a unit of taxation under s. 3 of the Wealth-tax Act is intended to exclude other groups or associations of persons which are capable of being treated as a unit.

In the result, therefore, our answer to both the questions, which have been referred to us, are in the affirmative. The assessee will pay the costs of the Commissioner.

after contest in a writ petition under art. 226 of the Constitution operates as res judicata in a regular suit with respect to the same matter between the same parties.

The facts leading to the appeal are these. The appellant stood surety for a number of contractors who had taken contracts in 1947 for felling timber trees and removing timber in various forests in the erstwhile State of Baria. The contracts were taken as a result of auctions which took place under the 'Conditions of Auction Sale of Forests in the Baria State in the Samvat year 2002' corresponding to 1945-46 A.D., though in the plaint these conditions were referred to as Forest Auction Rules. On April 7, 1948, the appellant presented an application to the Baria State stating therein that certain brokers owed money to the various contractors mentioned in the application and praying that they be restrained to pay the amount due to the contractors until further orders and that those brokers and contractors be also restrained from directly removing the contractors' jungle goods stored in the godowns at Piplod, Baria and Limkheda without the permission of the State Government. It was further mentioned in the application that if those contractors would arrive at an arrangement with him and carry out the vahivat, he would do the needful in that behalf. On this application, it appears, the State Government issued notices to the contractors stating therein that the surety, i.e., the appellant, had moved, under cl. 8 of the Conditions of the Auction Sale of jungle goods for attachment of their goods that be lying in the godowns at Baria, Piplod and Limkheda in the State and the debts or other movable or immovable property belonging to them and for delivering the same to him and directed the contractors not to sell, mortgage, gift away or otherwise dispose of whatever movable or immovable property they had in the State without the permission of the State.

Subsequently, the State of Baria merged with the State of Bombay on June 10, 1948. Thereafter, the contractors were allowed by the Government to remove the materials on certain conditions.

The appellant presented a writ petition under art. 226 of the Constitution to the High Court of Bombay. That petition is not printed in the appeal record. It was Civil Application No. 261 of 1952. It, along with two other applications, C. As. Nos. 260 and 376 of 1952, was disposed of by a common judgment in C.A. 260 of 1952 which is exh. P. 194. The parties agree that what was alleged and what was prayed for by the appellant in his petition could be gathered from the order exh. P. 194. The reply filed by the parties in that petition is exh. P. 196 and gives the case of the opposite party with respect to the allegations of the appellant in his petition. It however appears from the order of the High Court on that writ petition that the reliefs claimed were a direction to the respondents i.e., the State of Bombay and the Mamlatdar of Baria Taluka to raise the attachment levied on Municipal Nos. 728 and 642 of Deogad Baria, the issue of a writ of mandamus or directions under art. 226 of the Constitution prohibiting them from selling those Municipal numbers and from proceeding with the auction sale of those properties on February 15, 1952, or on any other date. The appellant had alleged in that petition that the attached properties of the contractors were allowed to be sold by the contractors without the knowledge and consent of the appellant, that the sale was unauthorised and contrary to the terms of the attachment levied by the State and that, therefore, it had put an end to the liability of the appellants under their surety bonds.

It was urged for the appellant at the hearing of that petition that since the State allowed the contractors to sell their own properties the appellant had been discharged from his suretyship in respect of the said contractors and that the State could no longer claim to recover from him the balance due from the said contractors. The writ application was presented because, in default of the contractors to pay the balance amount due from them the Forest Officers of the Government of Bombay had moved the Revenue Officers to recover the said amount from the appellant who was the surety as an arrear of land revenue. The revenue authorities took steps to attach the immovable properties of the appellant and that led the appellant to present that petition.

The contentions for the State of Bombay and the Mamlatdar in the writ proceedings were:

1. The petition was misconceived as not maintainable and there was no case for the issue of a writ of mandamus because the proper course for the appellant was to redress his so-called grievance by proceeding according to the ordinary law through the Municipal Courts.

2. There were no Baria State Forest Auction Rules. What the Baria State Authorities laid down were the conditions of such auction sales and the appellant's reference to those conditions as rules was not correct.

3. The contractors had to furnish a surety who also had to execute a separate and independent agreement with the State in the Form approved by it. The appellant stood surety for the contractors and executed the necessary agreements.

4. The said agreements stipulated three important conditions (i) that the surety will pay the instalment amount as stipulated; (ii) that if the instalments were not paid on due dates, he will pay interest at one pie per rupee per day and (iii) that if he fails to pay the instalment amounts and the interest, the State will be at liberty to recover the same from any of his properties and from his successors and assignees.

5. Condition No. 8 of the conditions for auction sales of forests was:

"So long as the contractor has not paid the deposit or the confirmed sale price in full into the Treasury or to the Surety, the Surety shall, at any time present an application to the Treasury Officer for the recovery of an amount required to discharge his liability in connection with the confirmed sale price or of the amount paid by him without filing a suit for the same in a civil Court. In that case the property, effects and debts of the contractor that may be within the territory of the State shall, as in the case of land revenue, be attached and auctioned at the cost and risk of the contractor and out of the sale proceeds realised at the auction, the amount due to the surety or an amount equivalent to the amount required to discharge his liability shall be paid to the Surety."

6. The appellant had not applied for attachment and sale of all the properties and outstandings of the contractors but had requested the State to see that the brokers did not pay their dues to the contractors, that the materials in the depots were not directly disposed of by the contractors and that the contractors carried on the business after settling with the petitioner.

7. The State issued the necessary injunction orders of attachment, even though the appellant's request dated April 7, was not at all consistent with the provisions of sale condition No. 8.

8. In order to obviate the complete hold up of the timber trade, a system was devised whereby the contractors were allowed to dispose of the stock of timber, if the sureties consented to its removal and the contractors guaranteed to pay the price realised to the sureties concerned.

9. According to the record, the appellant had requested the State to release the goods of certain contractors by his letters dated May 19 and 22, of 1948. This scheme adopted by the State of Baria was solely motivated in view of the inevitable delay on account of the sureties first realising the amount and then depositing the amount in the Government treasury and the appellant was aware of that slight modification in the procedure.

10. At a meeting convened by the Divisional Forest Officer, Panchmahals, Godhra, on August 1, 1948, the appellant was present and it was decided that the contractors be permitted to remove the material on payment of the price of the materials sold.

11. It was denied that as a result of the alleged action of the Forest Officers, the petitioner's security was considerably diminished and the eventual remedy of the petitioner against the contractors was very much impaired and the petitioner was discharged from his suretyship in respect of the said contracts.

The High Court dismissed the writ petition on July 22, 1952, holding that there was no substance in the contention that the petitioners had been discharged from their liability as sureties. The sole basis on which the contention was raised was that the contractors were permitted by the State to sell their properties which were under attachment contrary to the terms of the attachment, in view of the sales being held without the knowledge and consent of the appellant. The High Court held that it was a wrong assumption of the appellant that the attached goods were not to be sold without his knowledge and consent. The prayer made by the appellant in his application dated April 7, 1948, did not include a prayer to the effect that the attached goods be not sold without his knowledge and consent. The High Court, therefore, held that the plea that the sales absolved the appellant from his liability as surety could not be accepted.

We are no more concerned with the other point raised by the writ petition to the effect that the revenue authorities were not entitled to recover the amount due from the appellant under the summary procedure prescribed by the Land Revenue Code. The High Court did not accept this contention.

On August 29, 1952, the appellant instituted the suit which has given rise to this appeal. It was alleged that the Baria State had its own laws and rules and regulations, that the contractors of that State were bound to act according to them, that the Baria State had rules known as Forest Auction Rules for the auction of timber of the forests and auctions were held according to those rules and that the people acted on the understanding that the auctions and the surety bonds were in pursuance of the said Rules. Auctions were held in September-October 1947. The appellant stood surety with respect to the 11 contracts mentioned in para. 2 of the plaint. The alleged rule No. 8 (condition No. 8 of the Forest Auction Conditions) was quoted in the plaint. The appellant executed all the surety bonds on the understanding that the Baria State Forest Auction Rules were the basis of the auction sales and that the surety bonds were in accordance with those rules. Due to certain reasons mentioned in para. 5 of the plaint, the appellant, on or about April 13, 1948, applied to the Baria State praying for the assets and properties of the contractors to be taken in attachment and sold and for facilities being made available to him to fulfil his liabilities under the surety-bonds. The Baria State authorities attached the assets and properties of the contractors as prayed. It may be mentioned here that in his deposition the appellant admitted the application, exh. 195, dated April 7, 1948 to be the application he had presented for the aforesaid purpose.

It was further alleged in the plaint that subsequent to the merger of the Baria State with the Bombay State on October 6, 1948, the Bombay State Forest Authorities, without asking the plaintiff or without his consent, allowed the said contractors to remove and sell their respective teak and sundry goods which were taken in attachment and thus behaving in contravention of the attachment made in his interest and put an end to his security and that according to law the plaintiff thus became discharged of liability as surety for the said contractors. Another reason for his alleged discharge from liability was alleged to be that even fresh sureties had been obtained from some contractors. It was also mentioned in the plaint that the appellant had to make a petition to the High Court in order to prevent his property from being sold and that he had been informed that the said petition had been dismissed on the ground that he could lawfully get his reliefs in the civil Court.

On the above facts the appellant prayed inter alia, as follows:

"1. It may be declared that I have become discharged from all liability as surety for the contractors mentioned in para. 2 of this plaint and a decree may be passed against the defendant No. 2 and defendant No. 1 herein and their servants, officers and agents, in the form of a permanent injunction prohibiting them for all times from attaching my property, selling or causing it to be sold.

2. A permanent injunction may be issued to the defendant No. 1 herein and their servants, agents and officers that these defendants, under the facts mentioned in this plaint shall not, unless in execution of a decree in their favour obtained from a proper and authorised court, attach any property of this plaintiff and sell it in the revenue manner or cause it to be sold."

The State of Bombay contested the suit mostly repeating what they had urged in their reply affidavit filed in the proceedings on the writ application. It did not admit that the writ application filed by the plaintiff was dismissed by the High Court because another remedy was open and stated that his contentions were not upheld.

Several issues were framed. Issue No. 8A was:

"Is the suit barred by res judicata in view of the High Court's judgment in Civil Applications No. 260, 261 and 376 of 1952?"

The trial Court held on this issue that that judgment operated as res judicata in the suit. It recorded its findings on the other issues as well, but we are not concerned with those findings. It dismissed the suit.

On appeal by the appellant, the District Judge agreed with the trial Court that the suit was barred by res judicata in view of the judgment of the High Court on the writ petition. He accordingly dismissed the appeal. He also recorded his findings on the other points urged before him.

On second appeal, the learned Single Judge of the High Court agreed with the Courts below that the decision of the High Court on the question whether the plaintiff was absolved from liability under the surety agreement must be regarded as res judicata and could not be opened in the suit. He further considered the question whether in the circumstances of the case the appellant was entitled to the injunction prayed for and held that it was open to the appellant to maintain the suit for the determination of the amount due from him as that had not been considered and determined in the writ petition. He, therefore, allowed the appeal, set aside the order of the District Judge and passed a decree in favour of the appellant declaring that he was liable to pay the amount due under the surety agreement less the amount paid by the contractor and such amount as had been recovered by the State by sale of the property of the contractor attached under condition No. 8. He further ordered issue of an injunction restraining the State from enforcing the liability for the amount in excess of the amount declared to be due from the appellant.

The appellant's application for leave to file an appeal under cl. 15 of the Letters Patent of the Bombay High Court was rejected. Thereafter, the appellant filed this appeal after obtaining special leave from this Court.

Mr. Desai, for the appellant, has urged two points. The first is that a decision in a writ application under art. 226 for the issue of a writ of mandamus does not operate as res judicata in a regular suit subsequently filed for a declaration of the plaintiff's rights and for the issue of an order of injunction against the defendant. The other is that the doctrine of constructive res judicata cannot be applied when the dispute was first decided in a writ petition and is to be later decided in a regular suit. It has been said that it would be very dangerous to hold that the decision in the writ application operates as res judicata in the regular suit even if identical reliefs on identical grounds were prayed for in a writ petition, with those prayed for in the later regular suit.

The first question is really the main question for decision in this appeal as it is not a case for the application of the principle of constructive res judicata. It is clear from what has been stated above that the appellant prayed for the issue of a writ of mandamus and a writ of prohibition in the writ application on the ground that his liability as surety for the several contractors stood discharged on account of the State, without the knowledge and consent of the appellant, allowing the contractors to dispose of the goods which had been attached on the application of the appellant, an application which he could present in view of Condition 8 of the Conditions of Auction Sale. The reliefs sought in the plaint are the same and are sought on the same grounds. The High Court had to determine in the writ petition whether the appellant's liability as surety stood discharged in view of what he had alleged. The same point has to be directly and substantially decided in the suit also. The orders to be passed if the appellant's contention is upheld would be the same as that which would have been passed if his contention had been accepted in the writ petition. In both cases, on both occasions, the Court had first to hold that his liability as a surety stood discharged, and that as a consequence of such a finding, it had, in the writ proceedings, to issue a writ of mandamus and a writ of prohibition as prayed for in the writ petition, directing the State of Bombay not to enforce any liability which the appellant had undertaken under the agreement executed as a surety and not to proceed with the realisation of any amount the State alleged to be due from him and in the suit to pass a decree prohibiting the defendants by a permanent injunction for all time from attaching his property, selling or causing it to be sold and also a permanent injunction to the State of Bombay restraining them from attaching and selling any property of the appellant unless a proper decree is obtained from the Court in the manner provided for the recovery of land revenue.

It is urged for the appellant that in the writ petition the contention about the appellant's liability as a surety having come to an end was based on the terms of the contract, which was based on the conditions of auction sales, between the appellant and the State of Baria while in the present suit the contention with respect to the cession of his liability as a surety was based on the auction rules. The distinction sought to be made has no substance. It is denied in the reply affidavit filed on behalf of the respondent in the writ petition that there were any Baria State Forest Auction Rules. We have not been referred to any rules. In fact, when we asked for the rules, we were provided by learned counsel for the appellant with a booklet by the name 'Conditions for the Auction Sale of Forests'. Further, the order of the High Court on the writ petition mentions in the early part of the order:

"It would appear that the Baria State had auctioned the teak wood trees.... on the terms and conditions contained in the said Forest Auction Rules."

It may be said that these conditions for the auction sale of forests have been referred to sometimes as rules, probably in view of their binding nature.

It cannot, therefore, be disputed that if the decision which had been given in a writ petition had been given in a regular suit that decision would have operated as res judicata in the later suit. The question which arises for consideration is whether such a decision in a writ petition can also bar a later suit on account of its operating as res judicata.

Before we deal with the question, we may dispose of the short points urged for the appellant. It is urged that if a decision in a writ application on merits be held to operate as res judicata in a regular suit, the provisions of O. II, r. 2, Civil Procedure Code would also be applicable to the institution of the subsequent suit with respect to such part of the cause of action for which no relief was sought in the writ petition. The contention is not sound as the provisions of r. 2, O. II apply only to suit. Sub-rule (1) requires that every suit shall include the whole of the claim which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect of the cause of action; but a plaintiff may relinquish any portion of his claim in order to bring the suit within the jurisdiction of any Court. Sub-rule (2) then provides that where a plaintiff omits to sue in respect of or intentionally relinquishes any portion of his claim, he shall not afterwards sue in respect of the portion so omitted or relinquished. By its very language, these provisions do not apply to the contents of a writ petition and consequently do not apply to the contents of a subsequent suit. Such a view was indicated by this Court in *Devendra Pratap Narain Rai Sharma v. State of Uttar Pradesh*¹ when it was said (p. 324):

"...The bar of O. 2, r. 2 of the Civil Procedure Code on which the High Court apparently relied may not apply to a petition for a high prerogative writ under Art. 226 of the Constitution, but the High Court having disallowed the claim of the appellant for salary prior to the date of the suit, we do not think that we would be justified in interfering with the exercise of its discretion by the High Court."

The contention that a decision on a writ petition even on merits should not operate as res judicata as it is discretionary for the Court to pass any order it considers fit on a writ petition and not to decide it after considering all the points urged by the parties, was negatived in *Daryao v. The State of U. P.*² With regard to the point that the issue of a writ by a High Court was discretionary as it may refuse to exercise its jurisdiction under art. 226 as, for instance, when the party applying for the writ was guilty of laches but the Supreme Court could not refuse to issue the appropriate writ once it was shown that a fundamental right had been infringed, it was said (p. 589) :

"...and that may be said to constitute a difference in the right conferred on a citizen to move the High Court under Art. 226 as distinct from the right conferred on him to move this Court. This difference must inevitably mean that if the High Court has refused to exercise its discretion on the ground of laches or on the ground that the party has an efficacious alternative remedy available to him then of course the decision of the High Court cannot generally be pleaded in support of the bar of res judicata. If, however, the matter has been considered on the merits and the High Court has dismissed the petition for a writ on the ground that no fundamental right is proved or its breach is either not established or is shown to be constitutionally justified there is no reason why the said decision should not be treated as a bar against the competence of a subsequent petition filed by the same party on the same facts and for the same reliefs under Art. 32."

In this connection, reference may be made to what was said, about the contention that a previous judgment was not to operate as res judicata against a party as it was based on certain statements recorded before that party was impleaded, in *Krishna Behari Roy v. Brojeswari Chowdranee*³ :

"It was suggested by Mr. Cave that the former judgment ought not to be binding, because certain witnesses having been examined before the present Appellant intervened in the suit, he was refused the opportunity of cross-examining them. Their Lordships think that such an objection is no answer to the defence arising from the former judgment. If there had been any miscarriage of that kind, the matter was one for appeal in that suit. The objection does not appear to have been raised in the appeals which were successively made in that suit to the Civil Judge and to the High Court; but whether it was so raised or not, their Lordships think that that cannot affect the operation of the final judgment, which must be taken to have been rightly given."

Another reason urged in support of the contention is that the petitioner in a writ petition had no right to apply for the issue of the appropriate writ and it is a matter of discretion for the High Court to entertain any application or to grant it and that a decision in one proceeding can operate as res judicata in a subsequent proceeding only when the party initiating the first proceeding had a right to initiate both the proceedings when the nature of both the proceedings be the same. This is the same contention as the earlier one, but in a different form and does not merit further consideration.

It is further submitted for the appellant that a writ of mandamus, according to its nature, is to be issued mainly to compel the performance by a public servant of his duty of a public nature, while in a suit the plaintiff prays for the enforcement of his personal rights. The declaration of a personal right is not an essential characteristic in the issue of a writ of mandamus. The difference in the nature of the two proceedings is immaterial if the matter decided inter partes in one proceeding is the same which is to be determined in the subsequent proceedings and the parties to the suit were also parties to the writ petition.

It has also been contended, and support is sought from the case reported as L. Janakirama Iyer v. P. M. Nilakanta Iyer,⁴ that the general principles of res judicata are not to be applied in considering whether a decision in a previous suit bars a later suit on the ground of res judicata.

On the other hand, it is contended for the respondent that the doctrine of res judicata is not confined to the provisions of s. 11, Civil Procedure Code, but is of general application on grounds of public policy, that the fact that the proceedings on a writ petition are conducted summarily is no reason to reduce the value of the decision arrived at in those proceedings especially when a solemn decision is given after affording an opportunity to the parties to put before the Court all the relevant matters and after fully considering the merits of the matter in controversy and that it would be really dangerous if it be held that a decision so arrived at in proceedings in a writ petition does not bar a subsequent suit for the decision of the same matter in controversy. It is pertinently pointed out that if the writ application presented by the appellant had been allowed by the High Court on a finding of fact that the liability of the appellant as a surety stood discharged and a writ of prohibition had been issued against the State as prayed for by the appellant in the writ proceedings, the State could not have sued for a declaration that these orders of the High Court were bad and that a decree be passed in its favour declaring that the appellant's liability as the surety still continued and that the State was free to take any action open to it under law for the recovery of the amount due from him.

It is not necessary to consider in any detail whether all orders made on a writ petition would bar a subsequent suit. We would limit the consideration of the contentions raised before us to two main points: whether s. 11, Civil Procedure Code, is exhaustive with respect to the application of the principle of res judicata in a suit and whether in a subsequent suit general principles of res judicata can bar the consideration of matters directly in issue and identical with those which had been earlier and after full contest, decided on merits by a competent Court in any other proceeding including proceedings on a writ petition.

Before discussing the law of res judicata as laid down in the Code of Civil Procedure, we may refer to the opinion of the Judges expressed in 1776 in *The Duchess of Kingston's Case*⁵ to which reference has been invariably made in most of the cases to be considered by us. It was said in that case (p. 645):

"From the variety of cases relative to judgments being given in evidence in civil suits, these two deductions seem to follow as generally true: first, that the judgment of a court of concurrent jurisdiction, directly upon the point, is as a plea, a bar, or as evidence, conclusive, between the same parties, upon the same matter, directly in question in another court; secondly, that the judgment of a court of exclusive jurisdiction, directly upon the point, is, in like manner, conclusive upon the same matter, between the same parties, coming incidentally in question in another court, for a different purpose. But neither the judgment of a concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which came collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction, nor of any matter incidentally cognizable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment."

It is to be noticed that the opinion does not take into account whether the earlier judgment was in a suit or any other proceeding and whether it was used as res judicata in another suit or proceeding. The emphasis is that the judgment be of a Court and that it is relied upon as res judicata in another Court. Of course, the essential conditions that the judgment be directly upon the same point which is for determination in the subsequent suit and be between the same parties are also to be satisfied. It is obvious that the judgment of a Court of exclusive jurisdiction is to be treated as res judicata upon the same matter in another Court which will not be a Court having jurisdiction over that matter.

It would be helpful to consider how the various Codes of Civil Procedure have dealt with the question of the second suit being barred on account of an earlier decision by a Court. The first Code of Civil Procedure was Act VIII of 1859. Its s. 1 gave jurisdiction to the civil Courts over all suits of a civil nature with the exception of those of which cognizance was barred by any Act of Parliament or by any Regulation of the Codes of Bengal, Madras and Bombay or by any Act of the Governor-General of India in Council. Since then civil Courts had jurisdiction to try all suits of a civil nature except those whose cognizance was barred by any enactment in force. Section 2 provided that the civil Courts would not take cognizance of any suit brought on a cause of action which had been heard and determined by a Court of competent jurisdiction in a former suit between the same parties or between parties under whom they claimed. The bar to the second suit was based on the identity of its cause of action with that of the earlier suit which had been heard and determined by a Court of competent jurisdiction between the same parties.

The language of s. 2 of the Code of 1859 seems to be in pursuance of the principle recognised in common law that a cause of action on which a decree has been based merges in the decree and ceases to be a cause of action for any future suit. Parke B. said in *King v. Hoare*⁶ at p. 210 of the English Reports:

"If there be a breach of contract, or wrong done, or any other cause of action by one against another, and judgment be recovered in a court of record, the judgment is a bar to the original cause of action, because it is thereby reduced to a certainty, and the object of the suit attained, so far as it can be at that stage; and it would be useless and vexatious to subject the defendant to another suit for the purpose of obtaining the same result. Hence the legal maxim, 'transit in rem judicatam',—the cause of action is changed into matter of record, which is of a higher nature, and the inferior remedy is merged in the higher. This appears to be equally true where there is but one cause of action, whether it be against a single person or many. The judgment of a court of record changes the nature of that cause of action, and prevents its being the subject matter of another suit, and the cause of action, being single, cannot afterwards be divided into two."

This principle had the approval of the House of Lords in Kendall v. Hamilton.⁷ It may be noticed that, in special cases, this principle is applied when even parties to the subsequent suit are not the same who were parties in the first suit. The finality of the judgment is based on the fact that the cause of action had merged in a decree and, therefore, no other action can be based on the same cause of action.

In *Khugowlee Sing v. Hossein Bux Khan*⁸ the Privy Council, after quoting the opinion in Duchess of Kingston's case, said:

"There is nothing technical or peculiar to the law of England in the rule as so stated. It was recognised by the civil law, and it is perfectly consistent with the second section of the Code of Procedure under which this case was tried..."

In *Soorjomonee Dayee v. Suddamund Mohapatter*⁹ the Privy Council held that the term 'cause of action' in s. 2 of Act VIII of 1859 be construed with reference rather to the substance than to the form of action, and that even if such an interpretation of the expression be not correct, the provisions of s. 2 of the Code would by no means prevent the operation of the general law relating to res judicata and observed (p. 218):

"...This law has been laid down by a series of cases in this country with which the profession is familiar, and has probably never been better laid down than in a case which was referred to in the 3rd volume of Atkyns (Gregory v. Molesworth), in which Lord Hardwicke held that where a question was necessarily decided in effect though not in express terms between parties to the suit, they could not raise the same question as between themselves in any other suit in any other form; and that decision has been followed by a long course of decisions, the greater part of which will be found noticed in the very able notes of Mr. Smith to the case of the Duchess of Kingston."

In Krishna Behari Roy's case the Privy Council again stated that the expression 'cause of action' in s. 2 of Act VIII of 1859 could not be taken in its literal and most restricted sense, and observed (p. 285) :

"...But however that may be, by the general law where a material issue has been tried and determined between the same parties in a proper suit, and in a competent Court, as to the status of one of them in relation to the other, it cannot, in their opinion, be again tried in another suit between them."

It appears that s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure of 1877 was enacted in view of what was said about the general law of res judicata in Krishna Behari Roy's case. That section reads :

"No Court shall try any suit or issue in which the matter directly and substantially in issue has been heard and finally decided by a Court of competent jurisdiction, in a former suit between the same parties, or between parties under whom they or any of them claim, litigating under the same title."

In *Misir Raghobardial v. Rajah Sheo Baksh Singh*¹⁰ the Privy Council had to construe s. 13 of the 1877 Code (Act X of 1877). It referred to s. 2 of Act VIII of 1859 and then observed (p. 202) :

"...It is clear that this section would not have applied to the present case, the causes of action in the two suits—the non-payment of interest in one and the non-payment of principal in the other—being different. In fact, when the first suit was brought the cause of action in the second had not arisen. But independently of this provision in the Code of Procedure, the Courts in India have adopted the rule laid down in the Duchess of Kingston's case, and have applied it in a great number of cases. It was recognised as the law in India by this Board in Khugowlee Sing v. Hossein Bux Khan..."

The expression 'Court of competent jurisdiction' was construed to mean 'a Court which had jurisdiction over the matter in the subsequent suit in which the decision was used as conclusive' or in other words, 'a Court of concurrent jurisdiction'. In considering this matter, the Privy Council referred to the fact that in this country there were Courts of various grades with different pecuniary limits of jurisdiction, that a suit had to be instituted in the Court of the lowest grade competent to try it and that it would be improper if a judgment of an inferior Court was to operate as res judicata in a suit in a superior Court, and observed (p. 203) :

"...By taking concurrent jurisdiction to mean concurrent as regards the pecuniary limit as well as the subject matter, this evil or inconvenience is avoided; and although it may be desirable to put an end to litigation, the inefficiency of many of the Indian Courts makes it advisable not to be too stringent in preventing a litigant from proving the truth of his case. It appears to their Lordships that if this case had arisen before the passing of Act X of 1877, the High Courts in India would have rightly held that the decision of the Extra Assistant Commissioner in the first suit was not conclusive as to the amount of the principal sum due on the bond," and, after quoting s. 13, said (p. 204) :

"The intention seems to have been to embody in the Code of Procedure, by sects. 12 and 13, the law then in force in India, instead of the imperfect provision in sect. 2 of Act VIII of 1859. And, as the words of section do not clearly shew an intention to alter the law, their Lordships do not think it right to put a construction upon them which would cause an alteration."

This shows that the general law of res judicata was applied to suits in this country despite a specific provision about it in s. 2 of Act VIII of 1859.

The scope of the bar was extended by the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882 (Act XIV of 1882). Its s. 13 dealt with res judicata.

Section 11 of the present Code of Civil Procedure (Act V of 1908) deals with res judicata and is in these terms :

"No Court shall try any suit or issue in which the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit between the same parties, or between parties under whom they or any of them claim, litigating under the same title, in a Court competent to try such subsequent suit or the suit in which such issue has been subsequently raised, and has been heard and finally decided by such Court."

The above-quoted main part of s. 11 is identically the same as the corresponding part of s. 13 of the Code of 1882. Section 11, by its terms, can be applicable only to a subsequent suit when the same matter in controversy had been heard and decided in an earlier suit by a Court competent to try the subsequent suit. There is nothing, however, in its language to exclude the application of the general principles of res judicata to suits.

The general principle of res judicata has been applied to suits even though the decision on the same matter in controversy had been previously given by a competent Court in proceedings which were not suits under the Code of Civil Procedure. The case law on the subject will be discussed later. It is urged that there seems to be no good principle behind applying the general principles of res judicata to suits in circumstances which do not bring the previous decision within the language of s. 11, and that the Legislature's restricting the application of the general principles of res judicata to the circumstances mentioned in s. 11 must be deemed to indicate that the general principle of res judicata be not applied to bar a subsequent suit if the earlier decision of the same controversy between the same parties had been arrived at in proceedings other than suits and in which the entire procedure provided for the decision of the dispute in a regular suit might not have been followed. It appears to us that the reason for the specific provisions of s. 11 is not that the Legislature intended to bar the application of the general principles of res judicata to suits when the previous decision is arrived at in proceedings other than suits. The Legislature was providing in the Code of Civil Procedure for the trial of suits over which the civil Court was given jurisdiction under the provisions of the Code. The preamble of the Code of 1908 reads:

"WHEREAS it is expedient to consolidate and amend the laws relating to the procedure of the Courts of Civil Judicature; It is hereby enacted as follows:—"

The Code was dealing with procedure of the civil Courts only and had, therefore, not to consider what would be the effect on the trial of suits in view of the provisions of other enactments or of general principles of res judicata or of any other kind. It had to restrict its provision about res judicata to the effect of decisions in a civil suit on a subsequent civil suit and, therefore, enacted s. 11 in the form in which we find it. It made one of the conditions for the application of a previous decision to operate as res judicata to be that the previous decision is made not only by a Court competent to make it but by a Court which be competent to try the subsequent suit. This condition must have been considered necessary in view of the observations of the Privy Council in Misir Raghobardial's case and on account of the hierarchy of Courts under the various Acts constituting Courts of civil judicature and it could have been felt that a decision by a Court which is not competent to decide the subsequent suit be not treated of a binding nature. Such an exceptional procedure seems to have been provided as a matter of precaution as the Court not competent to try the subsequent suit must necessarily be a Court of inferior jurisdiction and, therefore, more liable to go wrong. Whatever the reason may be, the provisions of s. 11 will govern a previous decision in a suit barring a subsequent suit with respect to the same matter in controversy and general principle as of res judicata in such particular circumstances will neither be available to bar a subsequent suit nor will be needed. It is in such context that the remarks of this Court in Janakirama Iyer's case at p. 224 are to be considered. In that case, the decision in a previous suit could not operate as res judicata in accordance with the provisions of s. 11 of the Code, because the parties in the two suits could not be said to be the same parties or parties who claimed through one another. It was then said:

"Where s. 11 is thus inapplicable it would not be permissible to rely upon the general doctrine of res judicata. We are dealing with a suit and the only ground on which res judicata can be urged against such a suit can be the provisions of s. 11 and no other." The observations are to be read in the context in which they are made, the context being that the question of res judicata was being considered in connection with the decision in a previous suit and the parties in the two suits being not the same. In fact, general principles of res judicata also require that the earlier decision be between the same parties. A decision not inter partes cannot, even on general principles of res judicata, operate as res judicata in a subsequent suit.

We may now refer to some of the decided cases having a bearing on the applicability of the general principles of res judicata to suits, when the previous decision is not in a suit but in other proceedings.

In *Hook v. Administrator-General of Bengal*¹¹ the question was whether a previous order in an administration suit could operate as res judicata with respect to matters which had been decided in the subsequent administration suit instituted for decision of certain matters left open in the previous suit. It was said (p. 193) :

"...The question as to the perpetuity had been definitely and properly before him on the former hearing, and was, in fact, decided without any reservation, as is made plain by the terms of the judgment itself, which show that the determination of the dispute as to the perpetuity was the foundation of the whole judgment... It is not, and indeed it cannot be, disputed that, if that be the case, the matter has been finally settled between the parties, for the mere fact that the decision was given in an administration suit does not affect its finality: see Peareth v. Marriott.^{12a} The appellate Court, however, took a different view, and regarding the question as still open decided it against the appellant, but the error in their judgment is due to the fact that they regarded the question as completely governed by s. 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure," and then reference was made to what has been said in *Ram Kirpal Shukul v. Mussamat Rup Kuari*¹² :

"...The binding force of such a judgment depends not upon sect. 13, Act X of 1877, but upon general principles of law. If it were not binding there would be no end to litigation."

In *Ramachandra Rao v. Ramachandra Rao*¹³ the question arose about the decision about the title to compensation under proceedings in Land Acquisition operating as res judicata in a subsequent suit with respect to the rights of the parties. It was said (p. 136) :

"...When once the award as to the amount has become final, all questions as to fixing of compensation are then at an end; the duty of the Collector in case of dispute as to the relative rights of the persons together entitled to the money is to place the money under the control of the Court, and the parties then can proceed to litigate in the ordinary way to determine what their right and title to the property may be. That is exactly what occurred in the present case. How the proceedings were commenced is a matter that is not material provided that they were instituted in the manner that gave the Court jurisdiction, for they ended in a decree made by the High Court and appealable to this Board."

The Court then referred to what was said in *Badar Bee v. Habib Merican Noordin*¹⁴ and in Hook's case and said that the principle which prevents the same case being twice litigated is of general application, and is not limited by the specific words of the Code in this respect.

In *Kalipada De v. Dwijapada Das*¹⁵ the Privy Council held that a decision in contentious proceedings under the Probate and Administration Act, 1881, was binding in a subsequent suit upon the parties to the earlier suit, including a party whose name had been omitted from the formal order made and reiterated that the terms of s. 11 were not to be regarded as exhaustive in regard to what decisions could operate as res judicata.

In *Bhagwati v. Ram Koli*¹⁶ a decision about title in Land Acquisition Act proceedings was held to be res judicata in a subsequent suit about the title between the same parties.

These decisions of the Privy Council well lay down that the provisions of s. 11, Civil Procedure Code, are not exhaustive with respect to an earlier decision in a proceeding operating as res judicata in a subsequent suit with respect to the same matter inter partes, and do not preclude the application to regular suits of the general principles of res judicata based on public policy and applied from ancient times.

In *Sheoparsan Singh v. Ramnandan Singh*¹⁷ it was said:

"...But in view of the arguments addressed to them their Lordships desire to emphasize that the rule of res judicata, while founded on ancient precedent, is dictated by a wisdom which is for all time. 'It hath been well said,' declared Lord Coke, 'interest reipublicae ut sit finis litium, otherwise great oppression might be done under colour and pretence of law': 6 Coke, 9a. Though the rule of the Code may be traced to an English source, it embodies a doctrine in no way opposed to the spirit of the law as expounded by the Hindu commentators. Vijnanesvara and Nilakantha include the plea of a former judgment among those allowed by law, each citing for this purpose the text of Katyayana, who describes the plea thus: 'If a person though defeated at law sue again he should be answered, 'You were defeated formerly.' This is called the plea of former judgment.' [See the Mitakshara (Vyavahara), bk. II, ch. i., edited by J. R. Gharpure, p. 14, and the Mayuka, ch. i., s. 1, p. 11 of Mandlik's edition]. And so the application of the rule by the Courts in India should be influenced by no technical considerations of form, but by matter of substance within the limits allowed by law."

This Court had to consider the question of the applicability of the general principles of res judicata in several cases and has repeatedly held that this principle is not based on a rule of technicality but is based on high public policy to bring about an end to litigation by giving finality to judgments inter partes and to save a litigant from harassment a second time. The principles laid down by the Privy Council have been generally accepted. In *Raj Lakshmi Dasi v. Banamali Sen*¹⁸ this Court approved of what was said by the Privy Council in Hook's case; Ramachandra Rao's case and Mst. Bhagwati's case and said (p. 166):

"...and in these circumstances it has to be held that the question of title to the four anna share was necessarily and substantially involved in the land acquisition proceedings and was finally decided by a court having jurisdiction to try it and that decision thus operates as res judicata..."

In *Pandit M. S. M. Sharma v. Dr. Shree Krishna Sinha*¹⁹ the question arose for the first time about applying the principle of res judicata in writ applications under art. 32 of the Constitution and this Court said (p. 103):

"...This Court has laid it down in the case of Raj Lakshmi Dasi v. Banamali Sen that the principle underlying res judicata is applicable in respect of a question which has been raised and decided after full contest, even though the first Tribunal which decided the matter may have no jurisdiction to try the subsequent suit and even though the subject-matter of the dispute was not exactly the same in the two proceedings. In that case the rule of res judicata was applied to litigation in land acquisition proceedings. In that case the general principles of law bearing on the rule of res judicata, and not the provisions of s. 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure, were applied to the case. The rule of res judicata is meant to give finality to a decision arrived at after due contest and after hearing the parties interested in the controversy."

This case made the decision in a former petition under art. 32 of the Constitution res judicata in the subsequent petition under the same article with respect to the same matter.

In Daryao's case this Court had again dealt with the question of the applicability of the principle of res judicata in writ proceedings. The matter was gone through very exhaustively and the final conclusions are to be found at p. 592. We may summarise them thus:

1. If a petition under art. 226 is considered on the merits as a contested matter and is dismissed, the decision would continue to bind the parties unless it is otherwise modified or reversed by appeal or other appropriate proceedings permissible under the Constitution.

2. It would not be open to a party to ignore the said judgment and move this Court under art. 32 by an original petition made on the same facts and for obtaining the same or similar orders or writs.

3. If the petition under art. 226 in a High Court is dismissed not on the merits but because of the laches of the party applying for the writ or because it is held that the party had an alternative remedy available to it, the dismissal of the writ petition would not constitute a bar to a subsequent petition under art. 32.

4. Such a dismissal may however constitute a bar to a subsequent application under art. 32 where and if the facts thus found by the High Court be themselves relevant even under art. 32.

5. If a writ petition is dismissed in limine and an order is pronounced in that behalf, whether or not the dismissal would constitute a bar would depend on the nature of the order. If the order is on the merits, it would be a bar.

6. If the petition is dismissed in limine without a speaking order, such dismissal cannot be treated as creating a bar of res judicata.

7. If the petition is dismissed as withdrawn, it cannot be a bar to a subsequent petition under art. 32 because, in such a case, there had been no decision on the merits by the Court.

In arriving at the above quoted conclusions the Court made certain observations which are helpful in determining the question in this case about the decision on a writ petition operating as res judicata in a subsequent regular suit. The basis for the rule is described thus (p. 582):

"But, is the rule of res judicata merely a technical rule or is it based on high public policy? If the rule of res judicata itself embodies a principle of public policy which in turn is an essential part of the rule of law then the objection that the rule cannot be invoked where fundamental rights are in question may lose much of its validity. Now, the rule of res judicata as indicated in s. 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no doubt some technical aspects, for instance the rule of constructive res judicata may be said to be technical; but the basis on which the said rule rests is founded on considerations of public policy. It is in the interest of the public at large that a finality should attach to the binding decisions pronounced by Courts of competent jurisdiction, and it is also in the public interest that individuals should not be vexed twice over with the same kind of litigation."

Again, it was said (p. 584):

"...The binding character of judgments pronounced by courts of competent jurisdiction is itself an essential part of the rule of law, and the rule of law obviously is the basis of the administration of justice on which the Constitution lays so much emphasis." Limitations to the applicability of this general rule of res judicata are indicated at p. 585:

"...It is true that the general rule can be invoked only in cases where a dispute between the parties has been referred to a court of competent jurisdiction, there has been a contest between the parties before the court, a fair opportunity has been given to both of them to prove their case, and at the end the court has pronounced its judgment or decision. Such a decision pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction is binding between the parties unless it is modified or reversed by adopting a procedure prescribed by the Constitution. In our opinion, therefore, the plea that the general rule of res judicata should not be allowed to be invoked cannot be sustained."

The Court also said earlier at p. 585:

"...In other words, an original petition for a writ under Art. 32 cannot take the place of an appeal against the order passed by the High Court in the petition filed before it under Art. 226."

It can be said with equal force that a regular suit for the determination of the matter which had been decided on merits by the High Court or this Court on a writ petition cannot be given the status of a de facto appeal against the order of the High Court or of this Court. A solemn declaration and order by the Court in its extraordinary jurisdiction is not to be set at nought by a Court of ordinary jurisdiction whose decisions are subject to the appellate or revisional jurisdiction of that Court.

The contention that the remedies available to the petitioners to move the High Court under art. 226 and this Court under art. 32 are alternate remedies and so the adoption of one remedy cannot bar the adoption of the other, which was urged in the aforesaid case, was negatived, and it was observed (p. 591):

"...In such a case the point to consider always would be what is the nature of the decision pronounced by a Court of competent jurisdiction and what is its effect. Thus considered there can be no doubt that if a writ petition filed by a party has been dismissed on the merits by the High Court the judgment thus pronounced is binding between the parties and it cannot be circumvented or by-passed by his taking recourse to Art. 32 of the Constitution. Therefore, we are not satisfied that the ground of alternative remedies is well founded."

In *The Amalgamated Coalfield Ltd. v. The Janapada Sabha, Chhindawara*²⁰ this Court reiterated that the general principle of res judicata applied to writ petitions filed under arts. 226 or 32 and expressed the opinion that constructive res judicata which is a special and artificial form of res judicata enacted by s. 11, Civil Procedure Code, should not generally be applied to writ petitions filed under arts. 226 or 32 of the Constitution and that it would be reluctant to apply this principle to the appeals under decision because they dealt with cases where the impugned tax liability were for different years.

In the later case of *Devital Modi v. Sales Tax Officer, Ratlam*²¹ this Court has held that the principle of constructive res judicata also applies in writ proceedings when the decision of a former writ petition was on merits. It was said:

"This rule postulates that if a plea could have been taken by a party in a proceeding between him and his opponent, he would not be permitted to take that plea against the same party in a subsequent proceeding which is based on the same cause of action; but basically, even this view is founded on the same considerations of public policy, because if the doctrine of constructive res judicata is not applied to writ proceedings, it would be open to the party to take one proceeding after another and urge new grounds every time; and that, plainly, is inconsistent with considerations of public policy to which we have just referred."

The Court further observed:

"As we have already mentioned, though a Court dealing with the questions of infringement of fundamental rights must consistently endeavour to sustain the said rights and should strike down their unconstitutional invasion, it would not be right to ignore the principle of res judicata altogether in dealing with writ petitions filed by citizens alleging the contravention of their fundamental rights. Considerations of public policy cannot be ignored in such cases, and the basic doctrine that judgments pronounced by this Court are binding and must be regarded as final between the parties in respect of matters covered by them, must receive due consideration."

These remarks can apply with greater force when in a regular suit a party desires to obtain an order which may be at variance with the orders pronounced by the High Court in a writ petition on matters not concerning fundamental rights under the Constitution.

The appellant relies on the case reported as *Smt. Bimla Chopra v. Punjab State*²² in support of its contention that a decision on a writ petition cannot operate as res judicata on the points in dispute between the parties in the civil suit. The decision was based on two grounds: (1) that the jurisdiction of the High Court under art. 226 and of the Supreme Court under art. 32 is almost co-extensive, while the jurisdiction of the High Court under art. 226 and of the civil Court in a regular civil suit cannot be said to be almost co-extensive and (2) that the High Court in disposing of writs is not required to go into the detailed examination of facts while in regular civil suits facts can be examined meticulously. It was further held that the plaintiff can take such grounds in the civil suit which he could take in a writ petition. A decision of the Court in a writ petition can be res judicata only with respect to the matters which have been decided on merits by the High Court or by this Court. Courts do not usually enter into disputed questions of fact but there is no bar to their doing so if they feel disposed to enter into such facts and arrive at a conclusion with respect to them. We do not see why all the grounds which can be urged in support of or against a matter raised for decision in a writ petition cannot be urged in the proceedings on it. It is true that the jurisdiction of the civil Court and the High Court or this Court cannot be said to be co-extensive, but it is plain that the civil Court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction, is subject to the appellate or revisional jurisdiction of the High Court and this Court. We do not consider the reasons for holding that a decision in a writ petition cannot operate as res judicata in a subsequent regular suit to be sound and are of opinion that the Punjab case has been wrongly decided.

On the other hand, the Bombay High Court has held in *Manahem v. Union of India*²³ that a decision on merits in a writ petition would operate as res judicata in a subsequent suit.

As a result of the above discussion, we are of opinion that the provisions of s. 11, Civil Procedure Code, are not exhaustive with respect to an earlier decision operating as res judicata between the same parties on the same matter in controversy in a subsequent regular suit and that on the general principle of res judicata, any previous decision on a matter in controversy, decided after full contest or after affording fair opportunity to the parties to prove their case by a Court competent to decide it, will operate as res judicata in a subsequent regular suit. It is not necessary that the Court deciding the matter formerly be competent to decide the subsequent suit or that the former proceeding and the subsequent suit have the same subject matter. The nature of the former proceeding is immaterial.

We do not see any good reason to preclude such decisions on matters in controversy in writ proceedings under arts. 226 or 32 of the Constitution from operating as res judicata in subsequent regular suits on the same matters in controversy between the same parties and thus to give limited effect to the principle of the finality of decisions after full contest. We, therefore, hold that, on the general principle of res judicata, the decision of the High Court on a writ petition under art. 226 on the merits on a matter after contest will operate as res judicata in a subsequent regular suit between the same parties with respect to the same matter.

We may make it clear that it was not necessary, and we have not considered, whether the principles of constructive res judicata can be invoked by a party to the subsequent suit on the ground that a matter which might or ought to have been raised in the earlier proceeding was not so raised therein.

We, therefore, dismiss this appeal with costs.

SUBBA RAO J. I have perused the judgment prepared by my learned brother Raghubar Dayal J. I regret my inability to agree. I shall briefly give my reasons.

Raghubar Dayal J. has stated the facts fully in his judgment. I need not restate them. The few facts relevant to the question raised are these: The appellant filed a petition in the Bombay High Court under art. 226 of the Constitution raising the question that he was discharged as surety, and the High Court negatived his contention. In the suit from which the present appeal arises he again raises the plea that he was discharged as surety: in other words, he seeks to re-open in the present suit the finding given by the High Court in the writ petition. The question is whether the appellant is barred by res judicata to raise the said question in the suit.

Section 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure deals with the doctrine of res judicata in the context of a suit. It says, inter alia, that no Court shall try any suit or issue in which the matter directly and substantially in issue has been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit. To invoke this doctrine, the section lays down many conditions. The most essential condition is that the matter in question should have been directly and substantially in issue in a former suit. The expression "suit" has not been defined in the Code, but s. 26 thereof says that every suit shall be instituted by the presentation of a plaint or in such other manner as may be prescribed. It is not argued that an application under art. 226 of the Constitution is a suit within the meaning of s. 26 or s. 11 of the Code. It follows, and indeed it is not disputed, that s. 11 of the Code does not bar the appellant from raising the question of the discharge of his suretyship again in the present suit.

But it is said that under the general principles of res judicata the Court would be barred to try his suit on the said issue. When the Code of Civil Procedure enacted s. 11 prescribing precisely when an earlier decision would be res judicata in a suit, it is not open to invoke the general principles of res judicata in the context of a subsequent suit, though the conditions laid down in the section were not satisfied, for otherwise the section would become nugatory: it would also introduce anomalies. A decision in a previous suit would not be res judicata in a subsequent suit unless the stringent conditions laid down in s. 11 of the Code were satisfied; whereas a decision in a proceeding which was not a suit would be res judicata whether or not the said conditions were complied with. If the fundamental requisites of res judicata were satisfied, a decision, if it fell under s. 11 of the Code, would be res judicata in a subsequent suit; and even if it did not fall thereunder, it would equally be res judicata. That could not have been the intention of the Legislature.

The cases cited at the Bar do not compel me to accept the construction which would lead to that result. The decisions of the Judicial Committee in *Ramachandra Rao v. Ramachandra Rao*¹ and *Bhagwati v. Ram Kali*² and of this Court in *Raj Lakshmi Dasi v. Banamali Sen*³ may be explained on the ground that the proceeding under s. 18 of the Land Acquisition Act in the District Court wherein the title of the claimants would be put in the issue were in substance a suit. The decisions of this Court in Pandit M. S. M. Sharma v. Dr. Shree Krishna Sinha,⁴ Daryao v. The State of U. P.,⁵ *The Amalgamated Coal Fields Ltd. v. Janapada Sabha, Chhindwara*⁶ and *Devilal Modi v. Sales Tax Officer, Ratlam*⁷ can be distinguished on the footing that the question of res judicata arose in an application either under art. 226 or 32 of the Constitution and not in a suit. On the other hand, in *L. Janakirama Iyer v. P. M. Nilakanta Iyer*⁸ this Court definitely ruled (p. 224):

"...Where s. 11 is thus inapplicable it would not be permissible to rely upon the general doctrine of res judicata. We are dealing with a suit and the only ground on which res judicata can be urged against such a suit can be the provisions of s. 11 and no other."

These observations, in my view, correctly represent the law on the subject. This view, while it does not make s. 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure an unnecessary provision, does not also lead to any practical difficulties, for the decision of a High Court on a question of law will be binding as an authority on subordinate Courts and its decision on a question of fact will rarely be differed from by the said Courts.

I would, therefore, hold that the decision given by the High Court in the writ petition would not preclude the Court from deciding the same question on merits in the present suit. The order of the High Court is set aside and the appeal is remanded to the High Court for disposal on merits in accordance with law. Costs will abide the result.

RAMCHANDRA ABHYANKAR.*

Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947), Sec. 13(1) (1)—“Suitable residence”, what is—Circumstances of tenant whether to be considered by Court in deciding suitability of other accommodation.

Under s. 13(1)(1) of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, “suitable residence” cannot be only for one purpose; it must be suitable for the tenant’s reasonable needs. Therefore, in order to decide suitability of residence for the tenant, the Court has to consider the needs of the tenant and his family and consider whether or not the other accommodation that has been acquired by the tenant is suitable for his needs.

ONE Dr. Shankar Ramchandra Abhyankar (respondent No. 1) was the owner of a house bearing No. 279/8, Narayan Path, Poona. The house had a ground floor and three floors above it. Krishnaji (petitioner) became a tenant of a block on the first floor consisting of four rooms. Respondent No. 1 has got his dispensary on the ground floor and is in occupation of the second and third floors. The petitioner was a teacher in one of the schools conducted by the Deccan Education Society of Poona, and in the year 1958 he was transferred to Wai as Superintendent of a school conducted by the same Society. The transfer was “admittedly for a period of three years.” On transfer, he acquired some accommodation at Wai, but his son continued to stay in the suit premises as he was studying for accountancy. Because of his transfer, respondent No. 1 filed suit No. 3433 of 1958 in the Small Causes Court at Poona for possession, contending that the premises were required by him bona fide for his personal use and that, in any event, the petitioner had acquired suitable accommodation at Wai. Reliefs were claimed under s. 13(1), cls. (g) and (l). The petitioner defended the suit on the ground that it was untrue that respondent No. 1 required the block for his bona fide personal occupation and that he himself had acquired suitable accommodation at Wai. He contended that his son was required to continue his stay in Poona for his education and respondent No. 1 was, therefore, not entitled to relief under either clause. The trial Court found against respondent No. 1 on the first ground. As to the second, it found that the petitioner’s son had continued to stay in Poona for his education in accountancy and gave only a part of the premises to respondent No. 1, retaining two rooms in his possession. Both the parties being displeased with the decree filed appeals to the District Court at Poona. The appeal by the petitioner was

No. 245 of 1959 and that by respondent No. 1 was No. 295 of 1959. The appellate Judge confirmed the judgment of the trial Court. The petitioner then filed an application in the High Court, being Civil Revisional Application No. 1302 of 1960, challenging the orders of the Courts below. The Revisional Application was heard by Mr. Justice K. K. Desai on February 2, 1965. His Lordship held that the contentions raised on behalf of the petitioner did not fall within the ambit of s. 115 of the Civil Procedure Code, and, therefore, he had no power to interfere with the orders made by the Courts below. After the Revisional Application failed, the present Application was filed under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution for challenging the orders made by the Courts below.

M. V. Paranjpe and Y. S. Chitale, for the petitioner.

D. G. Karmarkar and K. J. Abhyankar, for respondent No. 1.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after setting out the facts and considering a point not material to this report, proceeded.] The respondent relied for relief in the present case on s. 13(1), cl. (1) of the Bombay Rent Act. So far as relevant, the section reads:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in this Act (but subject to the provisions of section 15), a landlord shall be entitled to recover possession of any premises if the Court is satisfied—

(1) that the tenant after coming into operation of this Act has built, acquired vacant possession of or been allotted a suitable residence."

The question is whether the petitioner had acquired vacant possession of a suitable residence. If he had, then the landlord is entitled to possession of the premises; but if he had not, then the landlord would not be entitled to possession of the premises.

Mr. Paranjpe contends that the Courts below have not considered the question as to what the phrase "acquired vacant possession of a suitable residence" means, and, secondly, that the Court had no jurisdiction to award half the premises to the landlord, in any event. So far as the second contention is concerned, the finding on the first point being against him, it is in his favour, and it is impossible in the present application to interfere with that part of the order if that finding is to be retained.

What "suitable residence" means has not been defined in the Act itself. The words must be given their natural meaning, and the Court would not be entitled to impose limitation on their meaning. The section requires that the tenant must acquire "suitable residence." He should acquire residence, and it must be suitable. Suitability cannot be only for one purpose. It must be suitability for his reasonable needs. In order, therefore, to decide suitability of the residence for the tenant, the Court has to consider the needs of the tenant and his family and consider whether or not the other accommodation that has been acquired by the tenant is suitable for his needs.

In the present case, the petitioner was a teacher in a secondary school of a private educational society. His salary, therefore, must necessarily be very limited. He was transferred to Wai as Superintendent of a school at that place. But there is nothing to show that his salary had increased considerably. His son who was dependent upon him was at the time studying accountancy. Again, there is nothing to show that there was any institution of accountancy in Wai which he could join and where he could pursue his studies. Again, there is nothing to show that he could have conveniently stayed at Wai and prosecuted his studies in Poona. The finding of both the Courts is that the petitioner's son continued to stay in the premises and pursue his studies, in Poona. The question is, merely because he acquired some premises at Wai, can it be said that he had acquired suitable residence at another place and, therefore, the landlord was entitled to possession? The appellate Court in its judgment observes that the suitability of a place is inherent in itself and does not depend upon surrounding circumstances. It is difficult to appreciate what is intended to be conveyed by this observation. The learned Judge probably meant to say that as soon as a residential place was acquired by the tenant, the Court must for that very reason hold that "suitable residence" has been acquired. The words used in the statute are not "has acquired a residence", but they are "has acquired suitable residence", the emphasis being on the word "suitable". It is wrong, therefore, to hold that circumstances of the tenant have not to be considered while applying this clause.

Having regard to the facts found in the case and the facts apparent on the record, it is impossible to say that the petitioner had acquired an alternative suitable residence for his purposes. If his son was required to stay in Poona for prosecuting his studies, it must mean that the accommodation at Wai was not suitable for all his purposes, though it may be suitable only for the purpose of his service. The lower Court was, therefore, wrong in holding that the petitioner had acquired suitable residence merely on the basis that he had acquired some place to reside at Wai. In view of this, the petitioner is entitled to succeed.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report].

Suit dismissed.

RAM ASHRE.

Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act (Bom. LVII of 1947), Secs. 5(10), 11—Standard rent in connection with premises first let after September 1, 1940, how to be ascertained—Whether open to Court to consider circumstance of landlord having acquired land at much smaller price at anterior date than date of first letting.

Under the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, in connection with premises first let after September 1, 1940, the standard rent should be ascertained as regards the land involved by determining fair return on the basis of the market value of the land at the time of the first letting. Even so, it would be open to the Court to consider the circumstance of the landlord having become owner of the land for a much smaller price at anterior date than the date of first letting and as to how the amount of standard rent should be affected because of that circumstance. Therefore before fixing the amount of standard rent the Court is bound to consider all the relevant circumstances of the case.

K. K. DESAI J. In these revisional applications and also in several other revisional applications on the file of this Court, the question of considerable interest under the provisions of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947 (hereinafter referred to as "the Act"), that has arisen is—whether in connection with premises first let after September 1, 1940, the standard rent should be ascertained as regards the land involved by determining fair return on the basis (i) of the market value of the land at the time of the first letting, or (ii) of the price paid and/or investments made at the time of purchase of the land at anterior date. On behalf of the landlady, petitioner No. 1 in the present revisional applications, it is contended that the basis should be the market value of the land at the time of the first letting after September 1, 1940. On behalf of the respondents-tenants, it is contended that the basis must be the price paid and/or investments made for the purchase of the land at anterior date.

In these revisional applications, the question has arisen under the following circumstances:—Petitioner No. 1 is the owner of two buildings called Khimji Cooverji Chawls situate at Carter Road, Mulund. The land on which these two buildings were constructed was purchased by the husband of petitioner No. 1, Khimji Cooverji, under a deed of sale dated November 18, 1946. The land consisted of 2000 square yards. 1813 square yards of this land were used up in putting up the total construction of the above two buildings. The rest of the area had to be kept unbuilt upon because of the municipal regulations requiring that certain proportion of the land should be kept open to the sky. Thus, 187 square yards remained unbuilt upon. The first building was constructed and completed in 1949. The second building was constructed and completed in 1951-52. Soon after the completion of construction, the tenements in each building were let out to the tenants. In the first building, there are 18 tenements in all. One tenement is occupied by the owner herself. In the second building, there are 17 tenements. Tenements in these buildings are let out to tenants at monthly rents varying between Rs. 29 to Rs. 70 per month. Twelve tenants in each of the buildings commenced proceedings in the Court of Civil Judge, Junior, Division, Thana, for determination of standard rent of the premises and/or tenements in their occupation. As regards the ascertainment of the fair return on the value of the land on which these buildings were constructed, on behalf of the tenants, the contention before us is that the value should be fixed on the footing of the price paid for the purchase of the land under the deed of sale dated November 18, 1946. On behalf of petitioner No. 1 landlady, the contention before us is that the value of the land in connection with ascertainment of the standard rent ought to be fixed as at the date of the first letting of the tenements in these buildings. In connection with the first building, the construction whereof was completed in 1949, the value should be ascertained on the basis of the market value of the land in 1949. As regards the second building, the value should be ascertained on the basis of the market value thereof on the date of the first letting in 1950-51.

These rival contentions, were also made before the Civil Judge, Junior Division, in the applications of the tenants. The learned Judge accepted the evidence of Architect Ghanekar tendered on behalf of the landlady that the value of the land in 1949 at the date of the first letting and/or completion of construction of one of the buildings was Rs. 10 per square yard. Having accepted the contentions made on behalf of the landlady, he arrived at the fair return in connection with the value of the land on the basis of Rs. 10 per square yard. In Civil Revision Applications filed before him by the tenants, the District Judge, Thana, accepted the contentions made on behalf of the tenants. In that connection, he referred to the decision in *Patel Joitram v. Sheth Anandji Kalyanji Padhi*¹. Following the ratio of the judgment of Chagla C.J. he held that in ascertaining standard rent the value of the land to be considered was the price paid and/or investment made under the deed of sale dated November 18, 1946. He also further held that for the period of the time taken in putting up the above two buildings after the date of the deed of sale, the landlady was entitled to a return of 6 per cent. on the investment. He, therefore, fixed fair return at 6 per cent. on the value of the land, at Rs. 5 per square yard being the price in the deed of sale dated November 18, 1946. He also considered the value of the cost of construction and fixed the usual return of 8.2/3 per cent. on the cost of construction and thus determined the standard rent of the premises.

On behalf of the landlady, it is contended with some emphasis that having regard to the provisions in the Act, in the ascertainment of the fair return on the value of the land involved, the basis ought to be the value as at the date of the first letting after September 1, 1940. Reliance is placed in that connection on the provisions in ss. 5(10) and 11 as also ss. 13(1) (hh), 13(1) (i), 13(1) (ii) and 13A and also certain other provisions of the Act. Section 5(10) defines "standard rent" to mean—

- "(a) ...rent...fixed by the Court and the Controller...; or
- (b) where the standard rent is not so fixed—subject to the provisions of section 11,
- (i) the rent at which the premises were let on the first day of September 1940, or
- (ii) where they were not let on the first day of September 1940, the rent at which they were last let before that day, or
- (iii) where they were first let after the first day of September 1940, the rent at which they were first let, or
- (iv) in any of the cases specified in section 11, the rent fixed by the Court;"

The relevant part of s. 11 provides:

"11. (1) Subject to the provisions of section 11A in any of the following cases the Court may, ..., fix the standard rent at such amount as, having regard to the provisions of this Act and the circumstances of the case, the Court deems just—

- (a) where any premises are first let after the first day of September 1940, and the rent at which they are so let is in the opinion of the Court excessive; or
- (b); or
- (c) ...; or
- (d) where any premises have been or are let rent-free or at a nominal rent or for some consideration in addition to rent; or
- (e) where there is any dispute between the landlord and the tenant regarding the amount of standard rent.
- (3);"

Having regard to the above provisions in ss. 5(10) and 11, it is not in dispute between the parties that in cases where premises are first let after September

1366 to 1372 of 1957, decided by Chagla C.J.,

1, 1940, in proceedings for fixation of standard rent, Court should have regard to (i) the provisions of the Act, (ii) the circumstances of the case and (iii) the amount fixed should be just. The main contention on behalf of the tenants is that the provisions of the Act show that "the Legislature wanted to disallow any increase in value of the lands and/or rents as existing in 1941". The submission is that the value and/or prices prevalent in 1941 are the standard prices, on the basis whereof, the standard rents are liable to be fixed in respect of all the properties. According to this submission, in connection with ascertainment of standard rent, it is not permissible under the Act to consider any unearned increment and/or rise in value of the lands after 1941. This being the policy of the Act, the basis for fair return on the value of lands in determining standard rent must be the value thereof at the date of purchase. The value must be on the footing of investments made at the date of purchase.

Reliance has been placed in this connection on the Statement of Objects and Reasons mentioned in the Legislature on the occasion of introduction of the Bill which ultimately became the above Act. Reliance also has been placed on the provisions in sub-cl. (i) and (ii) of clause (b) in the definition of "standard rent" in sub-s. (10) of s. 5 of the Act and also on the provisions in the Act preventing ejection of tenants who pay standard rents regularly and the other provisions fixing the basis of permitted increases in the standard rent. Reliance has also been placed on the observations of Chagla C. J. in Patel Joitram v. Sheth Anandji Kalyanji Padhi and of J. C. Shah J. made in *Jama-loddin Jainoddi Musalman v. Budhesing Amarsing Rajput*². In the Statement of Objects and Reasons, it is, inter alia, stated:

"The latter Act (the Bombay Rents, Hotel Rates and Lodging House Rates (Control) Act, 1944), which was intended to check an inflationary rise in rents and hotel and lodging house rates in areas in which, owing to war conditions, there was an acute scarcity of accommodation, will lapse in April 1948 unless re-enacted before then. The conditions which led to the enactment of these measures continue in an even more aggravated form and it is, therefore, essential that effective control should be continued until sufficient progress has been made with building operations to provide adequate and suitable accommodation for the largely increased populations of the areas concerned..."

Now, it is, therefore, true that the reason why the Act of 1947 was enacted was that in spite of the previous Act of 1944, inflationary rise in rents due to war conditions and acute scarcity of accommodation had continued to exist. In fact, these conditions had become more aggravated in form. The purpose of the Act was to have effective control until sufficient progress had been made with building operations to provide adequate and suitable accommodation. In coming to final decision in this case, we will have, therefore, to bear in mind the above reasons why the Act of 1947 was put on the statute book. It is also true that the provisions in sub-cl. (i) and (ii) of cl. (b) of the definition of "standard rent" contained in s. 5(10) of the Act clearly indicate that as regards previously existing buildings and structures and also as regards the land previously let out for residence, education, business, trade or storage purposes, it was provided that the standard rent was the rent that was being charged on September 1, 1940. If on that date the premises were not let, the standard rent was the rent that was charged last before September 1, 1940. Undoubtedly, therefore, as regards the buildings already let and therefore already constructed and existing prior to September 1, 1940, and even lands already let prior to that date, there was clear provision in the Act that the standard rent was ordinarily the rent already previously charged as on September 1, 1940. It is also clear that the Act is made for the purpose of protection of the tenants who were not liable to be ejected if they paid standard rent and observed other terms and conditions of the tenancy. The ordinary right of ejection was materially affected in the manner provided in ss. 12 and 13 of the Act. It is also true that the basis for permitted increases generally related to actual expenses incurred and/or investments made. In Patel Joitram v. Sheth Anandji Kalyanji Padhi, in connection with the question of standard rent in respect of new structures constructed by the landlord in 1946 on the lands purchased in 1929, Chagla C.J. observed that "The object of the Legislature in enacting the Rent Act was, apart from giving security of tenure to the tenant, to peg down rents as they were prevailing on the 1st September 1940. The view that the Legislature took was that at relevant date rents were normal, but after that date there was inflation and rents were inflated and landlords started charging excessive and unfair rents."

After making the above observation, the learned Chief Justice observed:

"It was also the intention of the Legislature that the landlord should not benefit by any increase in the value of the land brought about by war conditions after 1941". Now, it is this observation that is questioned before us on behalf of petitioner No. 1, the landlady. The contention that is made is that the above observation is not justified, having regard to the relevant provisions in the Act. We propose to discuss this question after noticing the further observations made by the learned Chief Justice in the above Civil Revision Applications and also the observations of J. C. Shah J. in the Civil Revision Applications mentioned above.

The ratio of the decision of Chagla C.J. in the above Civil Revision Applications may be stated as follows:—The lower Court was not justified in fixing the standard rent of the premises on the basis of investment made by the landlord in purchasing the lands in 1928. To fix the standard rent on that basis would not be fair and just, because the value of the land had gone up, the value of rupee had gone down, the cost of living had gone up and the intention of the Legislature was not to deprive the landlord of the capital appreciation of his land between 1929 and 1941. The learned Chief Justice, however, found that the value of the land should be fixed on the basis of the market value thereof in 1941, after which date, the Legislature intended to disallow increase in value. As regards the 5 years' period between 1941 and 1946, when the landlord put up the new construction, the Court found that for the locked up capital, (i.e. the value of the land as in 1941), the landlord should be entitled to a fair return, i.e. interest at 6 per cent. per annum. In this very connection, it was observed that in fixing the standard rent, even after arriving at the value of the land on the basis of market value in 1941, the Court was bound to consider "the rents charged to and paid by the tenants in a very neighbouring locality as one important circumstance." In fact, the learned Chief Justice refused to interfere with the findings made by the lower Court because he found that the standard rent that was fixed by the lower Court could not be described as excessive.

In Jamaloddin Jainoddin v. Budhesing Amarsing, J. C. Shah J. observed:

"Now the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, LVII of 1947, was passed by the Legislature with a view to peg down rents at the pre-war rates and with a view to prevent landlords from profiteering....The Act having been passed to prevent increase of rent above the pre-war level in respect of properties which were let out before the 2nd World War, it is implicit in the provisions of the Act that the landlord is not entitled to return on the unearned increment in the value of his property. He cannot, therefore, claim an economic return on the present market value of his property."

The learned Judge also referred to the previous decision of this Court in the case of *Saipansahab Dawoodsaheb v. Laxman*³. In that case, this Court decided that "in fixing the standard rent the correct approach should be, what is the net return which a landlord should be reasonably allowed on his investment". Having regard to that decision, the learned Judge found that in ascertaining the amount of the standard rent, the "important test to determine what must be regarded as 'just' is what reasonable return to the landlord on his investment may be."

Relying on the observations in the above Civil Revision Applications, on behalf of the tenants, it is contended that the result of the provisions in the Act is that in connection with ascertainment of standard rent, the value of the land on which building construction has been put up at a later date must be ascertained on the footing of its market value in 1941. They, however, concede that in connection with lands purchased subsequently, the basis should be the investment price paid by the purchaser at the date of completion of sale. The contention is that the reasons for this are more specifically those which are mentioned in the above two judgments, i.e. in the observations which we have already referred to.

In connection with the above submission, it is to be borne in mind that in his judgment J. C. Shah J. has observed that "the landlord is not entitled to return on the unearned increment in the value of his property", and restricted the same by using the following phrase, viz., "The Act having been passed to prevent increase of rent above the pre-war level in respect of properties which were let out before the 2nd World War" (the italics are ours). The learned Judge was, it may be stated, conscious of the fact that the Legislature had not made any provision to the effect that the landlord was not entitled to return on the unearned increment in the value of his property in connection with properties that were let out for the first time after September 1, 1940. We would be justified also in observing that the learned Judge was conscious that as regards the properties which were let out for the first time after September 1, 1940, the Act had not provided that the landlord should not benefit by increase in the value after September 1, 1940, or 1941. Though Chagla C.J. observed that the intention of the Legislature was that the landlord should not benefit by any increase in the value of the land brought about by war conditions after 1941, in those very Civil Revision Applications, in connection with lands purchased subsequent to 1941, the learned Chief Justice recited that his attention had been drawn to various decisions of this Court and that in all those cases this Court had laid down that the Court must allow the landlord a fair return on the actual price that he paid for the lands.

It is to be noticed that in those cases, obviously, the lands were purchased much subsequent to September 1, 1940. The price paid and/or investment made were not on the basis of the market value of the land as on September 1, 1940, or in 1941. The purchasers and/or the investors had paid prices which were market values and higher prices at the dates of purchases subsequent to September 1, 1940. The market values had no relation whatsoever with the prices prevalent in 1940-41. Even so, this Court had decided that in arriving at standard rent in connection with the constructions put up on these subsequently purchased lands, the values of the lands, must be ascertained not on the footing of the values prevailing in 1940-41, but the prices paid and/or factual investments made. The learned Chief Justice himself on the day next to the date of decision in Patel Joitram v. Sheth Anandji Kalyanji Padhi i.e. on August 5, 1958, dealt with Vejbai Khetsee v. Dr. Sushilabai Vasantrao Bagwe.⁴ In those applications the land was purchased in 1944, three years after the relevant date mentioned in connection with standard rent in s. 5(10) of the Act. The construction was put up in 1951. In arriving at the standard rent of the premises, the lower Court had fixed the return on the land on the basis of value thereof in 1951. On behalf of the tenants, it was contended before the learned Chief Justice that the lower Court ought to have fixed the standard rent on the basis of the value of the land as prevalent in any event in 1944, if not in 1941. The learned Chief Justice did not accept the contention and refused to interfere with the decision of the lower Court. Similarly, in disposing of Bhagwandas Lilaram v. Dadanbhai Vishindas,⁵ the learned Chief Justice refused to interfere when the standard rent of the premises had been fixed by the lower Court on the basis of price paid by the purchaser in 1947. It is, therefore, clear that the learned Chief Justice himself had and this Court also had throughout accepted the principle that as regards lands purchased by third parties after September 1, 1940, the market values of the lands as prevailing in 1940-41 was not the true basis for determination of fair return thereon and that the prices paid and/or investments made in purchasing the lands subsequent to September 1, 1940, was the basis on the footing whereof the landlord should be entitled to fair and appropriate return. Undoubtedly, the view expressed by the learned Chief Justice in Patel Joitraam v. Sheth Anandji Kalyanji Padhi are emphatic and clear. The views are of, if one may use the expression, "strong Bench" and are entitled to the highest respect. Even so, it is clear that the learned Chief Justice himself and this Court has not accepted the principle that "the intention of the Legislature was that the landlord should not benefit by any increase in the value of the land brought about by war conditions after 1941" and the same has not been applied to transactions where the lands were purchased subsequent to September 1, 1940. This exception recognised throughout by this Court appears to us to prove that the general view of this Court has not been that ordinarily the landlord was not entitled to benefit of increase in the value of the land brought about by war conditions after 1941. To follow up the observations of J. C. Shah J. in the Civil Revision Applications mentioned above, it is true that in connection with properties already let out (being the properties other than those which are first let out after September 1, 1940), the Legislature intended that the landlord should not benefit by any increase in the value of the land brought about by war conditions after 1941. As regards the properties, which are first let out after September 1, 1940, there is nothing in the Act to suggest that the Legislature intended that the landlord should not benefit by increase in the value of the land brought about by war conditions after 1941.

This is clear having regard to the provisions in sub-cl. (iii) of cl. (b) of sub-s. (10) of s. 5 defining "standard rent" and also provisions in s. 11 of the Act. On a reading of these provisions, it is clear that in connection with premises first let after September 1, 1940, the contractual and/or agreed rent was provided to be standard rent except in cases where the Court considering the question could come to the conclusion that the agreed and/or contractual rent was excessive. The clear effect of these provisions is that the Court would not be justified in holding that the agreed and/or contractual rent is not the standard rent unless and until it was in a position to make a finding that the rent was excessive. This has been accepted as true position in all the decisions of this Court. Reference may in this connection be made to the reported case of *Harilal v. Jain Co-op. Housing Soc.*⁶

The question that arises is as to whether in determining that the agreed and/or contractual rent is not excessive, it is not right to hold that fair return on the value of the land should be ascertained on the basis of the market value thereof at the date of the first letting. As we have already stated, the question of importance is as to whether the rent charged is excessive. Having regard to the contents of s. 11 of the Act, this question is liable to be decided by considering three circumstances, viz. (i) the provisions of the Act, (ii) the circumstances of the case itself and (iii) fair and/or just character of the amount involved. It is to be borne in mind that ordinarily the market value of land is roughly the price which an owner willing and not obliged to sell might expect from a willing purchaser. Ordinarily, the value is ascertained on the basis of capitalisation of the net annual income. Ordinarily, the return on investments ought to be determined as at the date of the yield (of the income). This normal method is adopted in all markets and is generally evident in share market. Market values of properties are thus fixed in relation to the produce and/or the income thereof at the relevant date. This ordinary basis of arriving at the true market value is rational and can satisfy objective tests. This has been accepted as the true basis in land acquisition proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act. This is the basis for taxing purposes in respect of all properties in all taxing statutes. If this is not adopted in arriving at market values of properties and any other basis is adopted, the same would exhibit anomalies and result in discrimination between different parties. In this connection, one may refer to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of *The State of West Bengal v. Bela Banerjee*⁷. In considering the validity of the provisions of the West Bengal Land Development and Planning Act, 1948, the question before the Court related to the provisions in the Act that as regards the acquisitions made, the market value at the anterior date, i.e. December 31, 1946, was to be the value for compensation. The Court observed in this connection as follows (pp. 564-65):

"...but the fixing of an anterior date, which might have no relation to the value of the land when it is acquired, may be, many years later, cannot but be regarded as arbitrary....Any principle for determining compensation which denies to the owner this increment in value cannot result in the ascertainment of the true equivalent of the land appropriated."

Applying these observations, in connection with the question of ascertainment of fair return to the landlord as regards the value of the land involved, it would be right to hold that the return ought to be fixed on the basis of the market value of the land at the date of the first letting. The value fixed on any other basis would, as observed by the Supreme Court, be arbitrary. The same would not be satisfying any objective tests and would involve unfair discrimination against the landlord. This can be made evident by illustrations. One may consider the case of lands which have gone up in value tremendously after the fall in the value of the rupee and because of industrialisation taking place in suburbs of Bombay. The small land owners in these suburbs have been for some time past selling their properties at largely increased values. Suppose that a small land-holder owning since 1920-1925 10,000 square yards of land at the suburb of Mulund or Bhandup sells in 1958-59 one-half of his land, i.e. 5,000 square yards of the land, to a big industrialist for the price of about Rs. 60 to Rs. 70 per square yard and constructs on 5,000 square yards of land left with himself a building similar in all respects to a building constructed by the purchaser industrialist on the other 5,000 square yards of land. Both the buildings may be taken as completed in 1960. Having regard to what has already been held by this Court in connection with the rents charged by the industrialist purchaser, the fair return as regards the land involved would be arrived at on the basis of his investments made for the purchase of the land in 1959. In other words, the fair return would be fixed on the basis of the price of Rs. 60 per square yard. Let us take it that the rent fixed for a flat on the newly built structure by the industrialist purchaser is fixed at Rs. 400 per month. The question is whether in connection with exactly similar flat in the building constructed by the small land-holder seller who retains the 5000 square yards with himself, the standard rent should be fixed on the basis of the value of his land prevailing in 1941 as stated by Chagla C.J. in the above Civil Revision Applications. On that basis, one may imagine that the rent per month would come to about Rs. 150. The question is whether there is any provision in the Act to justify this huge difference in the amount of the standard rent in connection with two similar adjacent properties constructed on the lands which were originally owned by the small holder-seller. We have asked counsel for the tenants to point out any provisions from the Act which would justify such indiscriminate determination of standard rent between two such properties. We have also ourselves attempted to find out such provisions in the Act. The counsel have not been able to show us any such provision, nor have we been able to find any such provision. Having regard to the observations made by Chagla C.J. in the above Civil Revision Applications, we have considered this question with some anxiety. We have, under the circumstances mentioned above, come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the Act to warrant a finding that as regards premises first let after September 1, 1940, the Legislature intended that the landlord should not benefit by any increase in the value of the land brought about by war conditions after 1941 and/or brought about by other prevalent conditions in thickly populated cities like Bombay. It has appeared to us that the basis for arriving at fair return to the landlord in respect of the value of his land must be a rational basis which could satisfy objective tests. The rational basis is the normal basis mentioned by us above, i.e. the return on investment ought to be determined at the date of the yield (of the income). This is the basis for which support can be had from the provisions in the Land Acquisition Act and the observations of the Supreme Court referred to above.

In this connection, it is also relevant to observe that there is no provision in the Act which affects the general right of land owners to sell their lands. An owner would be always entitled to sell off his lands and also buildings constructed after September 1, 1940, but not let out at all. A purchaser of such newly constructed building would, having regard to the decisions of this Court, be entitled to have the value of the land fixed on the basis of the investment made by him. This value will be almost the value at the date of the first letting. It is difficult to understand why the original landlord (who does not want to sell his land and property) should not be entitled to charge the same amount as standard rent, as the new purchaser should be otherwise entitled to charge. This discussion also shows that by accepting the contention made on behalf of the tenants, ordinarily, no benefit at all can be gained by tenants. The imaginary benefit can always be defeated by sales of properties and/or exchange of properties. By accepting the contentions made on behalf of the tenants, this Court would lay down a principle which has no rational basis at all. It is not the function of this Court to arrive at constructions for the benefit of tenants when the provisions in the Act do not warrant the same. If the Legislature in fact desired that "the landlord should not benefit by any increase in the value of the land" after 1940-41, the Legislature could have directly provided for the same. In fact, when the Legislature provided in sub-cl. (iii) of cl. (b) of s. 5(10) that the standard rent in respect of the premises first let after September 1, 1940, would be the rent at which they were first let, it exhibited an intention that the landlord was entitled to the benefit of increase in the value of the land which arose subsequent to 1940-41. This was made more clear by providing in s. 11 of the Act that in determining the amount of standard rent the Court was entitled not only to consider the provisions of the Act but also the circumstances of the case and the just and fair character of the amount fixed. The basis of the amount of the standard rent in respect of equally situate and similar properties first let after September 1, 1940, cannot, in our view, be different in the case of the same property, because it is sold subsequent to 1940 by the original landlord. The amount of the standard rent in respect of properties similar in all respects, whether they are sold or not sold, ought to be the same. We have come to the above conclusion after noticing that as regards the properties already first let before September 1, 1940, the Legislature has impliedly provided that the landlord should not be entitled to unearned increment in the value of the land.

It is necessary to point out that reliance has been placed on behalf of petitioner No. 1 landlady on the provisions in ss. 13(1)(hh), 13(1)(i), 13(1)(ii), sub-s. (3A) of s. 13 and s. 13A of the Act. These provisions go to show that tenants are liable to be ejected from old buildings of certain kinds in cases where the landlord intends to put up new constructions. The Act provides for sufficient protection to the ejected tenants for being housed in the new construction. It is contended on behalf of the landlady that these provisions show that one of the objects of the Act is to encourage building constructions.

This is one circumstance liable to be considered in connection with the question which we have just decided

It remains to be pointed out that the definition of the word "premises" as contained in sub-s. (8) of s. 5 includes open land not used for agricultural purposes. It is clear that the provisions of the Act apply to open lands which are let for residence, education, business, trade and storage purposes. In connection with such lands when they are let out prior to September 1, 1940, the amount of standard rent would be the rent at which they were let out on September 1, 1940, or, when they were not let on that day the rent at which they were last let before that day. It would be open, having regard to the provisions in s. 11 of the Act, both for the landlord and the tenant to contend that the agreed and/or contractual rent was not the standard rent. The Court would then have to determine the standard rent in respect of such lands. The principles discussed by us above would be applicable to applications made for fixing standard rent of such lands let out subsequent to September 1, 1940. The return to the landlord will have to be fixed on the basis of market value of such lands as at the date of first letting.

Now, in connection with all that is discussed above, it is necessary to make clear that before fixing the amount of standard rent, the Court is bound to consider all the circumstances of the case. The market value of the land as at the date of first letting after September 1, 1940, is only one prominent circumstance. Even so, it would be open to the Court to consider the circumstance of the landlord having become owner of the land for a much smaller price at anterior date than the date of first letting. It would be open to the Court to consider as to how the amount of standard rent should be affected because of that circumstance. In coming to the conclusion whether the amount of the agreed and/or contractual rent is excessive or not, the Court is not prevented from considering all the relevant circumstances including the circumstance mentioned above.

We have been told by counsel for the petitioners and the respondents that these revisional applications have been put up before us because certain difficulties had arisen due to previous decisions of this Court in connection with the question which we have just decided. It was otherwise unnecessary that these revisional applications should be put up before a Division Bench. Ordinarily and normally, all the revisional applications under the above Act are liable to be disposed of by a single Judge of this Court. Advocates of both sides have requested that now these revisional applications may be allowed to be placed before a single Judge of this Court for final disposal. These revisional applications will accordingly be put up before a single Judge of this Court. The costs will be ultimately decided by the learned Judge who will decide these revisional applications.

GOVINDRAO RATANLAL.*

Representation of the People Act (XLIII of 1951), Secs. 123(4) & (3A), 100(1)(d), (iv)—“Statement in relation to candidature,” meaning of expression in s. 123(4)—Whether expression means “statement in relation to the candidate”—Construction of statute—Circumstances under which words in statute have wider or narrower meaning.

In order that a statement “in relation to the candidature, or withdrawal” of a candidate should amount to corrupt practices within s. 123(4) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, it should be in connection with the continued candidature of a candidate or his withdrawal from the candidature. It must be a statement of a fact connected with the candidature of a candidate and which affects his continued candidature during the election.

It is necessary in every case to examine the statements alleged to have been made and find out whether they are made in relation to the public and political character of the candidate or otherwise. It is possible that in some cases the criticism of a candidate's political and public activity may contain aspersions on his character or fitness to be elected. In that case the statements would be covered by the first part of s. 123(4) of the Act. But if that is not so, then merely because his party or his political and public activities or character is attacked by the statements, they are not “statements in relation to his candidature.”

Maganal Bagdi v. H. V. Kamath,¹ dissented from.

Krishnaji Bhimrao v. Shanker Shantaram,² approved.

*Inder Lal v. Lal Singh*³ and Sarla Devi v. Birendrasingh,⁴ referred to.

While construing a statutory provision the Court must give the words used their ordinary grammatical meaning. A word may take colour from the context, and, in the setting in which it is used it may have a wider or a narrower meaning. The words must be construed, therefore, with due regard to the context, the circumstances under which the same came to be enacted and the mischief that was intended to be prevented.

In order that an election should be set aside under s. 100(1)(d) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951, it is incumbent on the petitioner to produce sufficient number of witnesses and evidence to show that all the votes wasted would have been acquired by the defeated candidate.

*Vashist Narain v. Dev Chandra*⁵ and Hari Vishnu v. Ahmad Ishaque,⁶ referred to.

In a bye-election to the Legislative Assembly from Khamgaon Constituency, No. 164, the nomination papers were filed on November 18, 1963, by eight persons including respondents Nos. 1 to 4. The Returning Officer accepted all the nominations after scrutiny on November 20, 1963. Later four of them withdrew their candidature and the only persons in the field were respondents Nos. 1 to 4 to contest the election. The election was held on December 15, 1963. Respondent No. 1 secured 27,687 votes, respondent No. 2 secured 28,562 votes, respondent No. 3 secured 855 votes and respondent No. 4 secured 257 votes. On December 16, 1963, respondent No. 2 was declared elected to the Assembly.

The petitioner who was a voter and whose name was entered in the electoral roll filed the present petition challenging the election of respondent No. 2 inter alia on the following grounds:

(1) That respondent No. 3 at the material time at the date of his nomination had a subsisting contract with the Government for constructions under the scheme of small irrigation and was, therefore, disqualified for being a candidate for the election under s. 7(d) of the Representation of the People Act, 1951. Acceptance of his nomination paper, therefore, by the Returning Officer was improper and illegal and it had materially affected the result of the election.

(2) That respondent No. 2 was also guilty of corrupt and illegal practices in that he arranged for distribution of pamphlets containing false and defamatory charges against a person working for respondent No. 1 which was calculated to promote communal tension. This was done at a meeting of December 10, 1963. The effect of the same being as contemplated by s. 123, sub-ss. 3A and 4 of the Act.

The Tribunal inter alia held that respondent No. 3 was disqualified from being elected but the acceptance of his nomination paper by the Returning Officer was not improper and illegal, and the acceptance of the nomination paper had not materially affected the result of the election. In respect of the allegations against respondent No. 2, the Tribunal found that the same were not proved and dismissed the petition.

V. R. Manohar and G. S. Thombre, for the petitioner.

D. B. Padhye and S. A. Sohoni, for respondent No. 2.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after stating the facts, proceeded.] In this appeal the grounds of attack are limited by Mr. Manohar. He made three contentions:

1. That respondent No. 2 was guilty of a corrupt practice inasmuch as a leaflet exh. 122 was published by his supporters with his consent or, in any event, with the consent of his election agent. The contents of this leaflet fell within the definition of corrupt practice as contained in s. 123, sub-s. (3A) and sub-s. (4), of the Act.

2. That the acceptance of the nomination paper of respondent No. 3 in spite of his disqualification fell within the provisions of s. 100, sub-s. (1), cl. (d) and as it had affected the results of the election, the election of respondent No. 2 should be set aside.

3. That an application which he made for amendment of his petition under O. VI, r. 17, of the Civil Procedure Code, read with the Act, was wrongly disallowed.

The first contention is in respect of the Pamphlet exh. 122, the translation of which is at exh. 122A. It is very seriously argued that the statements contained in the same are false and that these statements fell within sub-ss. (3A) and (4) of s. 123 of the Act. The pamphlet, it must at once be stated, does not contain any direct allegation against respondent No. 1. It appears from the evidence that one Saqui Niyazi had addressed a few meetings supporting the candidature of respondent No. 1. He was a member of the Council and was also concerned in the management of INTUC. One Vinayakumar Parashar, who was known also as Chhajuram, was at the relevant time President of the Akola Congress Committee. The pamphlet is as follows:

"The Robber Miya Saqui of Chhajuram Company—Subhadrakumari the Secretary of Akola INTUC while in the course of working in the office had disappeared. She is in the harem at Badnera of Saqui Niyazi who has been robbing thousands of rupees under the name of INTUC. This Saqui Niyazi is now making propaganda for pair of bullocks and in doing so, is trying to defame respectable persons. Therefore detailed information will be supplied as to what are his affairs, how many bogus companies he floated, how many societies he mismanaged and how many Hindu girls he has seduced into his harem at various places. Below are photo copies of two sides of a money order sent by Saqui Niyazi to Subhadrakumari from the INTUC Office in Congress Bhavan at Akola. Soon detailed information will be published of the other girl Suman who was of Khamgaon.

Akola,

11-12-63.

Laxmikant Deshpande."

Mr. Manohar contends that this was not an innocent propaganda against a particular individual as could be seen from the circumstances under which this pamphlet came to be published. The elections were to be held on December 15, 1963, and the pamphlet purports to have been printed on December 11, 1963. According to the evidence, it is suggested it was published on the night of December 10, 1963. Respondent No. 1 was a candidate set up by the Congress. Saqui Niyazi had addressed a few meetings and the statements published concerning this Saqui Niyazi are clearly such as to affect the chances of respondent No. 1 in the election by making the suggestion that respondent No. 1 was either keeping company with such people or that his candidature was supported by this kind of people and he says these statements were false. He also relies upon the fact that it expressly says that Saqui Niyazi was making propaganda for the pair of bullocks and that in doing so, he was trying to defame respectable persons. We may accept that the pamphlet is published to tell the public that respondent No. 1 was being supported by men like Saqui Niyazi and Chhajuram and that it was intended that this should have some influence in the voters' mind at the time of exercising their polling right. The question still is whether the pamphlet falls within the mischief of the sub-sections on which Mr. Manohar relies.

Section 100 of the Act requires the Tribunal to set aside an election of a returned candidate if it is of opinion "that any corrupt practice has been committed by a returned candidate or his election agent or by any other person with the consent of a returned candidate or his election agent;"

Section 123 which deals with corrupt practices says that the following shall be deemed to be corrupt practices for the purposes of the Act:

"123. ...

(3A) The promotion of, or attempt to promote, feelings of enmity or hatred between different classes of the citizens of India on grounds of religion, race, caste, community, or language, by a candidate or his election agent or any other person with the consent of a candidate or his election agent for the furtherance of the prospects of the election of that candidate or for prejudicially affecting the election of any candidate.

(4) The publication by a candidate or his agent or by any other person with the consent of a candidate or his election agent, of any statement of fact which is false, and which he either believes to be false or does not believe to be true, in relation to the personal character or conduct of any candidate, or in relation to the candidature, or withdrawal, of any candidate, being a statement reasonably calculated to prejudice the prospects of that candidate's election."

The question as to whether or not this pamphlet was published by respondent No. 2 or by some one with the consent either of respondent No. 2 or his election agent may be deferred from consideration for the present. The first question is whether it falls either within sub-s. (3A) or sub-s. (4) of s. 123.

The first question is whether the pamphlet falls within sub-s. (4). Mr. Manohar very seriously contended that the statements made are statements in relation to the candidature of respondent No. 1. He says inasmuch as the results of the election are bound to be affected by such a propaganda, it amounts to a statement in relation to the candidature of respondent No. 1. He relies in support of this construction of the section on the decision in Maganlal Bagdi v. H. V. Kamath.¹ It was said (p. 367):

"... While, on the one hand, it may only have a limited interpretation, meaning the right or qualification, or factum of candidature, as held in Krishnaji Bhimrao v. Shanker Shantaram,² it may, in the circumstances of a case, even have a wider import, including a reflection on the worthiness of a candidate to contest the election."

According to the dictionary "candidature" means the state of being a candidate. One may even say that it may mean the attributes necessary for being a candidate. This is the ordinary meaning of the word. The question is whether the words "statements in relation to candidature" should be construed very widely to mean "statements in relation to the candidate" as contended for by Mr. Manohar and as held in the above case, or "to mean statements in relation to the candidature" in the ordinary sense.

While construing a statutory provision the Court must give the words used their ordinary grammatical meaning. It is true that a word may take colour from the context, and, in the setting in which it is used it may have a wider or a narrower meaning. The words must be construed therefore with due regard to the context, the circumstances under which the same came to be enacted and the mischief that was intended to be prevented.

The Supreme Court had occasion to consider the provisions of sub-s. (4) of s. 123 in Inder Lal v. Lal Singh.³ The Supreme Court held that it was intended to make a distinction between the personal character of the candidate and his political character and that the provision postulates that if a false statement is made regarding the political character, it would not constitute corrupt practice even if it has a tendency to affect the chances of the candidate being elected. We must have regard to this intendment of the section while considering the meaning of the words "in relation to the candidature" of a candidate along with the context in which the words are used.

First matter that has to be considered is that the personal character or conduct of a candidate has been specifically dealt with in the sub-section. It is clear, therefore, from the context that any statement which is made in relation to the personal character or conduct of any candidate cannot possibly be included within the words, "in relation to the candidature or withdrawal" of a candidate. These are two distinct matters and it could not possibly be suggested that the words "in relation to the candidature" in the context in which they are used ought to mean "in relation to the candidate". Mr. Manohar says that any statement in regard to the activities of a candidate which has likely effect upon the chances of election of a candidate is a statement "in relation to the candidature of a candidate" and therefore must fall within the clause. If the words were intended to have such wide application the provision as to statements regarding the personal character and conduct of the candidate was not necessary at all. By adopting such a construction, the very distinction between the personal character and conduct of a candidate and his political character intended to be made by the Legislature will be destroyed. Moreover, it is seen that the words "in relation to the candidature" are used in juxtaposition of the words "or withdrawal," of any candidate. The theme dealt with in this part of the section is only the matter of candidature—its continuance or withdrawal. This could only mean that the Legislature intended, that in order that the statements should amount to corrupt practices they should be in connection with the continued candidature of a candidate or his withdrawal from the candidature. In other words, it must be a statement of a fact which is connected with the candidature of a candidate and which affects his continued candidature during the election.

This view was taken in Krishnaji Bhimrao v. Shankar Shanta Ram More, by the Election Tribunal where a contention, like the present, was rejected by it. Similar view was taken in *Sarla Devi v. Birendrasingh*⁴ by a Bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court where it was said (p. 138):

"Any false statement made in relation to the fact of a person being a candidate for an election would be covered; but by no stretch of the language can false statements in relation to the activities of a political party of which the candidate is a member be made to refer to his 'candidature'..."

They further said that (p. 137):

"...The false statement must be not in relation to the 'candidate' but in relation to his 'candidature', and candidature cannot be equated to the candidate".

With respect, therefore, it is difficult to agree with the opinion expressed in the case of Maganlal Bagdi.

⁴ [1901] A.I.R. M.P. 127.

It is, therefore, necessary in every case to examine the statements alleged to have been made and find out whether they are made in relation to the public and political character of the candidate or otherwise. It is possible that in some cases the criticism of a candidate's political and public activity may contain aspersions on his character or fitness to be elected. In that case the statements would be covered by the first part of the sub-section. But if that is not so, then merely because his party or his political and public activities or character is attacked by the statements, they are not "statements in relation to his candidature". We will, therefore, examine the pamphlet exh. 122 from this point of view.

A reading of the pamphlet clearly indicates that the attack is directed to the party and not in any manner to respondent No. 1. Though it deals with Saqui Niyazi in particular, it refers to Chhajuram also who was then the President of Akola Congress Party. The statement regarding Saqui Niyazi may or may not be true, but the purport of the pamphlet is to show that those who were making propaganda for respondent No. 1 were people of a particular type, that they were robbing in the name of the INTUC, and were capable of questionable activities. There is not even an innuendo, so far as respondent No. 1 is concerned, in relation to his character or conduct. It only, in short, decries the propaganda carried on by those two in favour of respondent No. 1. We, therefore, reject this contention.

It is then contended that the matter of the pamphlet falls within sub-s. (3A) of s. 123 of the Act. Now, in order that the matter should fall within sub-s. (3A), it must amount either to the promotion or an attempt to promote feelings of (a) enmity or (b) hatred, between different classes of citizens of India, (i) on grounds of religion, (ii) on grounds of race, (iii) on grounds of caste, (iv) on grounds of community, or (v) on grounds of language. It is said that the pamphlet was intended to create hatred between the Hindu and the Mohamedan community. We may assume that telling the public the activities of those two persons who have been referred to in the pamphlet, might affect the chances of respondent No. 1 at the election. But that by itself is not enough in order to bring the pamphlet within sub-s. (3A). It is true that Saqui Niyazi is a Mohamedan. It is equally true that the pamphlet states that one Subhadrakumari was taken to his harem and that there were many other Hindu girls whom he had seduced into his harem at several places. Merely because there is a reference to the words "Hindu girls" it does not necessarily have the effect of inciting one community against another. The pamphlet itself associates Saqui Niyazi with INTUC and the Congress activities and his other Hindu friend is also mentioned in it. It may be that it had the tendency of exposing him in the eyes of the public. It may as well have the tendency of inciting a few fanatics against him as an individual, but there is nothing in the pamphlet to suggest that all Mohamedans as a class are bad or that Saqui Niyazi is having influence with his Mohamedan friends and because of that influence they were all going to vote for that candidate. It is an accident that Saqui Niyazi happens to be a Mohamedan and the girls alleged to have been seduced happen to be Hindus. But then Chhajuram was not a Mohamedan and even so, allegations were made against Chhajuram. Having regard to the nature of the contents and the manner in which two members of a particular political party are alleged to be guilty of certain malpractices in general, it cannot be said that the pamphlet had the effect of promotion of enmity or hatred between different communities.

It is also admitted that even as a result of this pamphlet nothing happened. Not one person raised his finger either against Saqui Niyazi or against any other member of his community. It is true, as pointed out by Mr. Manohar, that such a result need not follow. But the fact that such a result did not follow may be a circumstance which may be considered to show whether or not the propaganda alleged to be made by the pamphlet had the tendency which it is claimed it had and it is to that extent only that it may be regarded as relevant. It is also true that even an attempt to create enmity between communities is sufficient. But then this is not a case of an attempted promotion of enmity between any two communities. Here it is said that in fact the pamphlet was distributed and even so it was completely innocuous. The inference therefore that the pamphlet did not have a tendency to create enmity or hatred between the Mohomedans and Hindus is fortified.

[His Lordship after considering points not material to this report, proceeded].

Mr. Manohar then contended that respondent No. 3 was admittedly disqualified and that though it could not be said that the acceptance of his nomination by the Returning Officer was improper, the fact remains that as his candidature was contrary to the provisions of the Act in that he was disqualified at the time that he was a candidate, there was non-compliance with the provisions of the Act and as the result of the election of respondent No. 2 has been materially affected by it, the election of respondent No. 2 should be set aside. That in the event such as the present it can be said that there was non-compliance with the provisions of the Act is established by the decisions of the Supreme Court in *Durga Shankar v. Raghuraj Singh*⁵ and S. M. Bankerji v. Sri Krishna.⁶ We may also assume for the time being that the petition does contain allegations of facts which would bring the case precisely within sub-cl. (iv) of cl. (d) of sub-s. (1) of s. 100 of the Act. The question remains whether the petitioner has established that, as a result of the non-compliance with provisions of the Act by respondent No. 3, the return of respondent No. 2 is materially affected. The Supreme Court has held in *Vashist Narain v. Dev Chandra*⁷ and *Hari Vishnu v. Ahmad Ishaque*⁸ that it is incumbent upon a petitioner, who seeks to set aside an election under cl. (d) of sub-s. (1) of s. 100 to establish by positive evidence the fact that the result of the election has been materially affected. It has also been held that there is no scope for surmises and conjectures in the matter of such proof. Indeed, the matter may be difficult of proof, but then it is not that an election can be set aside on light grounds. In order that an election should be set aside, the terms of the clause must be properly complied with and in order to do so, it is incumbent on the petitioner to produce sufficient number of witnesses and evidence to show that, all the votes wasted would have been acquired by the defeated candidate. It is admitted that there is no such evidence. Mr. Manohar started to refer to his amendment application after assuming that all the 555 votes thrown in favour of respondent No. 3 would have been obtained by respondent No. 1 and argued that he might be able to account for a few more votes. The assumption that respondent No. 1 would have got all the votes that respondent No. 3 got is highly unjustified. Even the amendment application, therefore, on which he sought to rely could not be pursued and even if it were pursued, it could not have led to any concrete result.

In the result, the appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

VALLABHDAS SHEONARAYAN SHARMA.*

Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act (Mah. V of 1962), Secs. 72(7), 57, 111(6), (7), 61, 39, 42—“Total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti,” meaning of expression—Whether means total number of members actually present and voting at meeting of Panchayat Samiti.

In s. 72(7) of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act, 1961, the expression “the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti” refers to the total number of the possible members of the Panchayat Samiti under s. 57(1) of the Act and not the total number of members present and voting at any meeting thereof.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

V. R. Manohar, for the petitioner.

S. N. Kherdekar, for respondents Nos. 1 to 6.

V. M. Kulkarni and S. S. Deshpande, for respondent No. 14.

KOTVAL J. We are concerned in this special civil application with a motion of no-confidence alleged to have been passed against the petitioner Vishwasrao Dajibarao Ghuge who was the Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti, Malegaon, Taluq Washim, District Akola. The Panchayat Samiti, Malegaon, it is not in dispute, consists of 14 members and 2 associate members under s. 57 of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act, 1961 (No. V of 1962) (hereinafter referred to as the Act). The petitioner was elected Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti on August 7, 1962, and less than two years thereafter on May 11, 1964, a no-confidence motion was attempted to be moved against him, but that motion was for reasons unknown withdrawn on May 22, 1964. Thereafter a fresh notice of a no-confidence motion under s. 72 of the Act was again given on October 24, 1964, by the present respondents Nos. 1 to 6 and 13. A meeting was convened by the petitioner for November 1, 1964. At that meeting, according to respondents Nos. 1 to 6 and 13, the no-confidence motion was validly passed.

The petitioner says that there were rival-factions in the Panchayat Samiti since a considerable time and that respondents Nos. 1 to 6 were in a minority and, therefore, wanted to oust the petitioner. They had made the first attempt, and when that attempt failed, made the present attempt to pass a no-confidence motion. According to the petitioner, the resolution has not been validly passed. The total possible membership of this Panchayat Samiti is 14 [the two—associate members not being entitled to vote under s. 57(1)(c) and (d) read with s. 72(7)]. The no-confidence motion has to be passed by a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti as laid down under s. 72(7). Therefore, the motion could only have been passed if eight members out of a total of 14 had voted for the resolution. But in the present case, the persons who voted for the resolution were only 6 and, therefore, the resolution was not legally passed. It was also stated by the petitioner that respondents Nos. 11, 12 and 13 were initially members of the Panchayat Samiti by virtue of the fact that they were Sarpanchas elected by the members of the Gram Panchayats in accordance with the provisions of s. 57(2) of the Act. Their term of office having expired, they were re-elected by the respective Gram Panchayats prior to the date of the meeting i.e. November 1, 1964. The dates of election and the villages from which they were re-elected as stated by the petitioner in para. 5 are as follows:

	Name of the Gram Panchayat	Date of Election
Respondent No. 11	Borgaon	September 12, 1964.
Respondent No. 12	Mairaldon	September 8, 1964.
Respondent No. 13	Shelgaon Bondade	October 13, 1964.

According to the petitioner, these persons being re-elected Sarpanchas were entitled to vote, but they were not given due notice of the meeting to be held on November 1, 1964, and, therefore, the entire proceedings of the meeting as well as the no-confidence motion passed in the meeting are vitiated.

Now, it will be seen that so far as the petitioner is concerned, he is referring to the electorate for this purpose as the total possible membership of the Samiti as prescribed by s. 57 of the Act, but the respondents say that having regard to the provisions of s. 72(7), the law only requires a majority of the total number of members actually present at the meeting on November 1, 1964. If the latter view were to prevail, then the no-confidence motion must be held to be valid because there were on that date only eleven members present and six voted for the resolution. If the former view were to prevail, the total possible membership of this Samiti was 14, and so far obtaining a majority, at least 8 votes were necessary, which was not the case. Therefore, the no-confidence motion will have to be declared invalid.

Sub-section (7) of s. 72 of the Act runs as under:

"If the motion is carried by a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti (other than associate members), the Chairman, or as the case may be, the Deputy Chairman of the Panchayat Samiti shall cease to hold office forthwith; and the office held by such Chairman or Deputy Chairman shall be deemed to be vacant." The contention on behalf of the respondents is that when the sub-section speaks of "a majority of the total number of the Panchayat Samiti," it means the total number of the members actually present and voting at the meeting of the Panchayat Samiti, and in the present case they were 11. Therefore, the resolution must be deemed to be passed, because 6 members were in favour of it. On behalf of the petitioner it is urged that the expression "a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti" has reference to s. 57 which lays down the constitution of the Panchayat Samiti and which shows that the total number of members of this Panchayat Samiti was 14. The 2 associate members do not enter into the picture because by s. 57 read with s. 72(7) they have no right of vote. This is the principal point which arises for decision in this petition. That gives rise to the question what is the meaning of the words "a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti" in sub-s. (7) of s. 72 of the Act.

It was also argued on behalf of the respondents that on the date of the meeting, namely, November 1, 1964, the Panchayat Samiti itself consisted of 11 members because the three Sarpanchas, respondents Nos. 11, 12 and 13, were not entitled to sit in the Samiti because, though they had been elected as Sarpanchas of their respective Gram Panchayats as stated in the table we have reproduced above, still they had not been elected as members of the Panchayat Samiti under s. 57(1)(f). It was also therefore contended that they were not entitled to notice and no illegality was committed when no notice of the meeting was served on them. It will be noticed that the latter point can only arise if the contention of the respondents upon the first point is upheld that by the use of the words "a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti" in sub-s. (7) of s. 72, is implied the actual number of members present at a particular meeting of the Panchayat Samiti and voting or the actual number of members entitled to sit as members of the Panchayat Samiti, but not if the contention of the petitioner is accepted that by that expression is implied the total number of possible members of the Panchayat Samiti as contemplated by s. 57. We, therefore, turn to consider this point.

Now, first it is necessary to consider the language of sub-s. (7) of s. 72 itself, and we notice that the expression used is not "a majority of the Panchayat Samiti" but "a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti". If the respondents' contention be correct, that it was intended to imply by this expression the members of the Panchayat Samiti who were in fact members and actually entitled to sit as members of the Samiti, then the expression "a majority of the Panchayat Samiti" or "a majority of the members of the Panchayat Samiti" would have sufficed and it would not have been necessary for the Legislature to say "a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti". What then was intended by the Legislature when it used the expression "a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti"? Why was the word "total" used and what is the "total number"?

In order to determine what is the connotation of this expression, we turn to the provisions of s. 57 of the Act, which deals with the constitution of Panchayat Samitis. Sub-section (1) of that section deals with six categories of members of which the Panchayat Samiti is to consist. The sub-section begins with the words "Every Panchayat Samiti shall consist of", and then enumerates the categories as follows:

"(a) all Councillors who are elected to the Zilla Parishad from the electoral divisions included in the Block,

(b) the co-opted Councillor, (if any) residing in the Block,

(c) the chairman of such co-operative society conducting the business of purchase and sale of agricultural products in the Block, as the State Government may by order specify in this behalf (to be an associate member),...

(The proviso is not necessary for our purposes).

(d) the chairman of a co-operative society conducting business relating to agriculture (not being a society falling under clause (c)) in the Block co-opted by the Panchayat Samiti (to be an associate member),

(e) (i) if the members of a Panchayat Samiti falling under clauses (a) and (f) do not include a woman, one woman residing in the Block co-opted by the Panchayat Samiti;

(ii) if the members of a Panchayat Samiti falling under clauses (a) and (f) of such Block as the State Government may specify in this behalf do not include a person belonging to the Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes, a member co-opted by the Panchayat Samiti being a member of the Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes, as the case may be, from amongst persons residing in the Block;

(The proviso is unnecessary for the purposes of the point before us).

(f) Sarpanchas elected by members of Panchayats in accordance with the provisions of sub-section (2)".

It will thus be seen that barring the members contemplated in cl. (e) the number of members of the Panchayat Samiti would be fixed having regard to the provisions of s. 57, and so far as the members coming under cl. (e) are concerned, their number would also be fixed after the elections. Their number would depend upon whether a woman or a member of the Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes was elected from amongst the members of the categories (a) to (d). If no woman or a member of the Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes was elected from amongst the categories of members elected under cls. (a) to (d), then a woman and/or a member of the Scheduled Castes or Scheduled Tribes, as the case may be, will have to be co-opted by virtue of cl. (e). In any case, after the whole procedure under s. 57 is gone through, the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti as well as the number of members actually sitting would be known, and it seems to us that when the expression "the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti" was used in sub-s. (7) of s. 72, it was obviously intended to refer to the total number of the possible members of the Panchayat Samiti under sub-s. (1) of s. 57 and not the members actually entitled to sit. In the instant case, it is not in dispute that that total number of members would be 14 leaving out of account the 2 associate members.

A consideration of the other provisions of s. 72 itself as well as of the Act leads to the same conclusion. Sub-section (1) of s. 72 deals with the tabling of the no-confidence motion and it says:

"A motion of no-confidence in the Chairman or Deputy Chairman of a Panchayat Samiti may be made by a requisition from not less than one-fourth of the total number of the members (other than associate members) after giving a notice thereof..."

Here again therefore, the expression is used "one-fourth of the total number of the members" in connection with a Panchayat Samiti. Now, if the contention of the respondents were to prevail that the meaning of these expressions "total number of the members of the Panchayat Samiti" in sub-ss. (1) and (7) of s. 72 means total number of members actually present and voting, then two other provisions of the Act negate that contention. If one turns to sub-s. (6) of s. 111, one finds the same expression used. Section 111 deals with meetings of Zilla Parishads and by virtue of s. 118 thereof the same provisions apply in relation to meetings of Panchayat Samitis with the modification that the words "Panchayat Samiti" shall be read instead of the words "Zilla Parishad" and with other modifications mutatis mutandis as indicated in s. 118. The provisions of s. 111, therefore, directly apply to Panchayat Samitis by virtue of s. 118. Now, dealing with the question of meetings of Panchayat Samitis sub-s. (6) of s. 111 says:

"All questions shall be decided by a majority of votes of the Councillors present and voting, the presiding authority having a second or casting vote in all cases of equality of votes."

This provision would govern all meetings of the Panchayat Samiti other than meetings for which a special provision is made in the Act, such as a meeting at which a no-confidence motion is to be moved; but the language of the sub-section is in sharp contrast with the language used in sub-s. (7) of s. 72. Where a no-confidence motion is contemplated by this Act it is to be carried by "a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti"; whereas when normal resolutions are to be passed at a meeting of the Panchayat Samiti, sub-s. (6) of s. 111 prescribes "a majority of votes of the Councillors present and voting". The provisions of s. 111(6) show that the Legislature itself made a distinction between "the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti" and "members present and voting." In that view, it is clear that the expression used in sub-s. (7) of s. 72 cannot be held to carry the meaning "the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti present and voting" when it says "the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti".

Another provision of the Act which gives a similar indication is s. 61. That section deals with the removal of a member of the Panchayat Samiti for misconduct. The section has recently been amended by the Maharashtra Act No. XLIII of 1962. Prior to amendment the section prescribed:

"The State Government may, if it thinks fit, on the recommendation of two-thirds of the members of the Panchayat Samiti present and voting, remove any member thereof..."

The section has been amended and for the words "two-thirds of the members of the Panchayat Samiti," the words "the Panchayat Samiti supported by not less than two-thirds of the number of members" have been substituted. The words "present and voting" however remain. Here again, two things are patent: Firstly, the expression "the members of the Panchayat Samiti present and voting" shows again that where the Legislature intended to refer to the members actually present, it clearly said so. Therefore, it must be held that the expression "the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti" in s. 72(7) cannot mean the total number of members present and voting. Secondly, the amendment makes a distinction between members of the Panchayat Samiti and the Panchayat Samiti itself, and the amendment shows that the "recommendation" must be that of two-thirds of the members of the Panchayat Samiti present and voting. But the expression "total number of members" which is to be found in sub-s. (7) of s. 72 is not used here. Therefore, there is a clear distinction drawn in the statute itself between the members of the Panchayat Samiti or the number of members of the Panchayat Samiti and the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti. This word "total", so far as we can see, is not to be found in any other provision of the Act except s. 111(7) dealing with voting. In our opinion, the real reason why it was used in sub-s. (7) of s. 72 was because it was intended to convey thereby the totality of the possible members of the Panchayat Samiti having regard to its constitution under s. 57 of the Act (excluding of course the associate members who are expressly excluded) and not the number of members who were present and voting at any meeting thereof.

Next, we find that in sub-s. (7) of s. 111 the word "total" comes to be used, and the manner of its use in that sub-section and the context in which it is used clearly indicate the intention of the draftsman. Sub-section (7) of s. 111 begins with the words:

"If less than one-third of the total number of Councillors be present at a meeting at any time from the beginning to the end thereof, the presiding authority shall adjourn the meeting to such hour on the following or some other future date as he may reasonably fix;..."

The sub-section fixes a quorum for the meetings of the Zilla Parishad and the Panchayat Samitis (when read with s. 118), and obviously if a quorum is to be prescribed it is usually the minimum number of the total possible membership of that body and that is precisely what sub-s. (7) of s. 111 prescribes. It says that the quorum shall be "one-third of the total number of Councillors" of those "present at a meeting at any time from the beginning to the end thereof". Therefore, sub-s. (7) deals with two ideas "Councillors actually present" and "total number of Councillors" and it says that those who are actually present at a meeting shall not be below "one-third of the total number of Councillors". In this context, and used as it is in contradistinction with the Councillors present at a meeting, the expression "total number of Councillors" can again only mean the total number of possible Councillors of the Zilla Parishad or possible members of the Panchayat Samiti having regard to s. 57. By the use of the word "total" before the word "number" the draftsman therefore clearly intended to refer to the totality of the possible membership of the Zilla Parishad or the Panchayat Samiti and that is the same expression which he has also used in sub-s. (7) of s. 72. Not merely is the similarity of the expression in the two sections—s. 72(7) and s. 111(7) telling but the contrast with the other expressions such as "Councillors present and voting" in s. 61 and s. 111(6) is telling. Similarly, the provisions of s. 39 which provides for removal of a Councillor for misconduct or disgraceful conduct etc. speak of "not less than two-thirds of the number of Councillors present and voting."

It is clear from these provisions of the Act that where the Legislature had in contemplation the number of members actually present at a meeting, the expression has been used Councillors or members "present and voting", but no such expression is to be found in sub-s. (7) of s. 72. Therefore, that is one indication that by the use of the words "the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti" in sub-s. (7) of s. 72, the members actually present at a meeting or voting at a meeting were not contemplated. Secondly, the use of the expression "the total number of members" in contrast with the mere use of the words "the number of Councillors or members" in other provisions is telling. By the use of the word "total" the draftsman has always implied the totality of the possible members of the Panchayat Samiti or the Zilla Parishad or in other words its total membership, and whenever he uses the word "total", he does not have regard to the actual number of members or Councillors present. Thus, the internal indications furnished by the provisions of the Act show that the contention raised on behalf of the petitioner is correct and the interpretation sought to be placed on those words of sub-s. (7) of s. 72 on behalf of the respondents cannot be sustained.

Reference was made by Mr. Kheredekar to s. 112 of the Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act. Sub-section (1) of s. 118 says that during any vacancy in a Zilla Parishad, the continuing Councillors may act as if no vacancy had occurred, and sub-s. (2) says that the Zilla Parishad shall have power to act notwithstanding any vacancy in the Councillorship; and also provides that notwithstanding any defect in the constitution, the power to act remains. Read along with s. 118, this shows that a Panchayat Samiti frequently has its membership fluctuating and that its total number of members may never be known. We are not able to accept this contention, because in the first place s. 112 does not indicate what is the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti. All that it provides for is that the acts and things done at meetings of the Panchayat Samiti should not be invalidated because some person who was not entitled to do so, sat or voted or otherwise took part in the proceedings or that there was a defect in the constitution. It is the usual provision made to safeguard deliberations of public bodies consisting of many members where due to an inadvertent error in its constitution or the inadvertent taking part by a person not qualified to do so may have the effect of vitiating the entire proceedings. The section which really deals with the constitution of Panchayat Samitis is s. 57, and as we have already indicated, upon an analysis of that section, after the entire process contemplated by that section for bringing into existence the Panchayat Samiti is complete, the total number of members of the Samiti must get fixed even having regard to cl. (c) of sub-s. (1) thereof. Section 112 does not, therefore, assist in the interpretation of sub-s. (7) of s. 72.

It was next argued by Mr. Kheredekar that the word "total" must be regarded as mere surplusage or included with a view to additional emphasis and nothing more. The argument would have some force in it if the expression "the total number of members" had been uniformly used throughout the Act wherever it was intended to indicate the number of members present and voting at a meeting or entitled to sit for the time being in a Panchayat Samiti. But we have shown that in other provisions of this very Act, wherever it was intended to refer to persons actually present and voting the legislative draftsman has used appropriate expressions such as "the members present and voting". This contention, therefore, also fails.

A considerable part of the arguments were directed to the object and purpose of the legislation which, it was said, ought to influence our interpretation. The interpretation which we are inclined to accept appears to us to be consistent with the object behind the legislation so far as it can be gathered from this provision. The provisions for the moving of no-confidence motions against the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Zilla Parishads and the Sarpanch and Upa-Sar-panch of the Panchayat Samiti are, so far as we are aware, somewhat unique in a legislation on Local Self-Government, and the Legislature, it appears, thought that the extraordinary right given to the members of these bodies to throw out the Chairman or the Sarpanch should be exercised carefully and only in extreme cases and so it appears the law deliberately imposed more stringent limitations upon the exercise of that right than the limitation imposed for decisions on other subjects. That is why also, originally a bare majority was sufficient, but now by the amending Act No. XLIII of 1964 what is required is a two-thirds majority of the total number of members of the body concerned. For the same reason it appears that the simple majority contemplated in the section as it originally stood was deliberately limited not to the members present and voting at a meeting but to the total number of possible members of the Panchayat Samiti, that is to say, the total membership of the Panchayat Samiti. The principle is understandable having regard to the extraordinary nature of the right granted by s. 72 to the other members. On the other hand, the construction canvassed on behalf of the respondents may result in a grave abuse of this right and bring about a deadlock. The provisions of sub-ss. (1), (2) and (3) indicate that after the notice is given the Chairman has to call a meeting to consider such a motion within 10 days of the receipt of the notice. Sub-section (1) prescribes that in order to give a notice of no-confidence the requisition must be signed by not less than one-fourth of the total number of members. Now, if one turns to s. 57 and glances through the various categories of members, it is clear that some of the members could go out of office and be replaced during the life of a Samiti, thus adding to the membership of the Samiti and enlarging the number of persons who could be actually present and vote at the meeting where the no-confidence motion is to be discussed. If the interpretation which the respondents seek to put upon sub-s. (7) of s. 72 were to be accepted, there may be a conceivable case where a large number of members may become sitting members of the Panchayat Samiti after the notice of no-confidence is given, as for example, under s. 57(1)(f). In that event, the question would arise whether the no-confidence motion is sponsored by one-fourth of the total number of members. Thus, on the date on which it was given the requisition though valid would be rendered invalid before the meeting to be called ten days after. Such a state of affairs could not have been in the contemplation of the Legislature, and indeed that is why the law expressly mentions the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti, that is to say, the totality of the possible members comprising the Samiti, and not the actual members for the time being. That total membership is always a fixed membership before each meeting.

Upon the view we have taken it is clear that in the instant case the respondents had 6 votes in favour of the no-confidence motion and those 6 votes did not constitute "a majority of the total number of members of the Panchayat Samiti". The majority, having regard to the facts here that the Panchayat Samiti was constituted of 14 members, would be 8. In the result, therefore, the no-confidence motion which is said to have been carried must be set aside as invalidly passed.

In the view we have taken it is not necessary to discuss the other point arising in this petition as to whether respondents Nos. 11, 12 and 13 were members of the Panchayat Samiti on November 1, 1964 and whether they could be counted as members of the Samiti. In our view, the number of members actually sitting in the Samiti on a particular day is not the criterion so far as sub-s. (7) of s. 72 is concerned, but the only criterion is the totality of the possible membership of the Samiti. The question whether respondents Nos. 11, 12 and 13 were members, therefore, does not arise.

In the result, the rule is made absolute and the motion of no-confidence passed on November 1, 1964 against the petitioner is quashed. Respondents Nos. 1 to 6 shall pay the costs of the petitioner.

Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court refused.

Rule made absolute.

THE COLLECTOR, BULDANA.*

Maharashtra Municipalities (Postponement of General Elections pending Unification of Municipal Laws) Act (Maharashtra XLII of 1964), Secs. 3, 7, 2(a)(c)—Central Provinces and Berar Municipalities Act (C. P. and Berar II of 1922), Secs. 18(3), 16(2), 16(2A)—Term of office of members of Municipality extended under Mah. Act XLII of 1964—Whether term of office of President of Municipality also extended.

Upon extension of the term of office of Councillors or members of a Municipality under the Maharashtra Municipalities (Postponement of General Elections pending Unification of Municipal Laws) Act, 1964, such an extension is not granted as would fulfil the requirements of the second proviso to s. 18(3) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act, 1922. Therefore, where the term of life of the members of a Municipality is extended under Maharashtra Act XLII of 1964, the President of the Municipality does not also get the advantage of having his term of office automatically extended.

In re Wood's Estate, Ex parte Her Majesty's Commissioners of Works and Buildings,¹ distinguished.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

P. G. Palshikar, for the petitioner.

S. M. Hajarnavis, Assistant Government Pleader, for the respondents.

B. A. Masodkar, for the Intervener.

S. G. Kukde, for the Intervener.

KOTVAL J. As the question arising in this petition is said to be a question which also arises in other petitions, we have heard M/s. Masodkar and Kukday as Interveners, as they are interested in Special Civil Application No. 222/65 and Special Civil Application No. 77/65 in addition to Mr. Palshikar for the petitioner. The short question that arises for determination is as to the effect of Ordinance No. V of 1964 promulgated by the Governor of Maharashtra and Maharashtra Act No. XLII of 1964. These laws were passed in order to stay general elections of Municipalities in Maharashtra State and for making consequential provisions and the question that has to be determined is, what is the effect of their provisions so far as the office of President of a municipality is concerned.

In the present petition, the facts in brief are as follows. We are concerned with the Nandura Municipal Committee. The general elections to that Municipal Committee were held in July 1959 and the notification of election of its present members was published in the Gazette on August 6, 1959. The result of that publication was that under the provisions of s. 16(2) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act those members were entitled to continue in office for a period of five years from the said date till August 5, 1964. Thus, their term of office would have expired on that date; but first of all, the State Government intervened to extend their term of office till November 6, 1964, under the powers given to them under s. 16(2-A) of the Act. While the term of office of the members thus stood extended till November 6, 1964, the Governor of Maharashtra promulgated Ordinance V of 1964. By that Ordinance the life of the Councillors or members was further extended till December 31, 1965. The Ordinance came into force on September 30, 1964, but was later replaced by Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964, which came into force on December 16, 1964. Therefore, today the Councillors or members of this Municipal Committee are continuing to hold office by virtue of Act No. XLII of 1964. It is explained that the reason for all this legislative activity is that the State is about to enact a new law to provide a new and uniform pattern of administration for municipalities in the entire State and till then it was considered expedient that no new general elections should be held but that the status quo should be maintained.

Application No. 717 of 1964.

Now, on November 17, 1964, the Collector, Buldana, purporting to act under rule 3(2) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities President and Vice-President (Election and Appointment) (Bombay) Rules, 1958, announced the appointment of an officer to hold a meeting of the members of the Municipal Committee of Nandura for the purpose of electing a new President of the said Committee. He also issued a notice to all the members including the petitioner. In the present petition, the petitioner challenges not merely the notification appointing the officer to be the Chairman of the meeting at which the election is to be held, but also the issuance of the notice of the meeting to sitting members and the principal ground upon which both these acts of the Collector are challenged is that the petitioner is the present President and entitled to continue in office under law. On behalf of the respondents, the Collector, the sub-Divisional Officer and the State of Maharashtra, this stand of the petitioner is contested and it is urged that the life of the President was not in any way extended by the Ordinance or the Act or under the Municipalities Act and that the fresh elections would, therefore, be justified, and necessary under the Municipalities Act.

The provisions of s. 18 of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act, as amended by Bombay Act No. XVI of 1959, govern the election and continuance in office of the President of a Municipality and sub-s. (2) thereof prescribes that each Committee shall have a President who shall be elected by the members from among their number, and sub-s. (3) lays down the period for which he should hold office. Sub-section (3) runs as follows:

"Save as otherwise provided in this Act,—

(a) the President shall hold office for such term, not less than one year or not less than the residue of the term of office of the Committee, whichever is less, and not exceeding three years, as the Committee shall, previous to the election of the President, determine or until the expiry within the said term of his term of office as member, but shall be eligible for re-election; and

(b) the Vice-President shall hold office during the term of office of the President who appoints him:

Provided that the term of office of such President or Vice-President shall be deemed to extend to, and expire with, the date on which his successor is elected or appointed, as the case may be:

Provided further that where the term of office of a Committee is extended under this Act, the President and Vice-President holding office immediately before the date with effect from which such term is extended shall continue to hold their respective offices until the date on which the term so extended expires."

Reading the second proviso to s. 18(3), it is clear beyond any doubt that the right of a President or Vice-President to continue in office is limited to an extension earned by him under that Act itself and no other Act. This is clear from the vital words which lay down a condition to the application of the proviso itself "where the term of office of a Committee is extended under this Act" and the concluding words "until the date on which the term so extended expires."

It will be noticed that originally the provision which governed the term of office of the petitioner was sub-s. (3)(a) of s. 18 read with s. 16(2) and under those provisions the petitioner would have continued to hold office till September, 1964, but before the expiry of his term of office under those provisions the State Government extended the term of office of the members of the Municipal Committee under powers vested in it under s. 16(2-A). Therefore, by virtue of the second proviso to sub-s. (3)(b) of s. 18 the term of office of the President was extended "under this Act" and he continued to hold office. It was during the period that the petitioner was thus holding office by virtue of the extension granted by the State Government under s. 16(2A), read with sub-s. (3) of s. 18, proviso 2, that the Ordinance No. V of 1964 came to be promulgated. Almost the identical terms of the Ordinance were later enacted in Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964. The short question that now arises is whether the petitioner as the President can get the advantage of the extension of the term of life of the members, implied by the postponement of the general elections and say that he as the President also continues. The only provision that can be pointed out on his behalf is the second proviso to s. 18(3) of the Municipalities Act. That proviso speaks of an extension "under this Act" i.e. the Municipalities Act and the question is whether there is anything in Act XLII of 1964 which directly or indirectly grants such an extension as can be said to be an extension under the Municipalities Act.

Act No. XLII of 1964, as its preamble states, was an Act passed for two purposes, namely,

(i) "to provide for the postponement of general elections to certain municipalities until the enactment of law providing a new and uniform pattern of municipal administration in respect of certain municipalities" and (2) because it was considered expedient

"that the advantages of the new pattern of administration should be available to those municipalities simultaneously with the holding of general elections in accordance with the provisions of the new law".

Two points arising from the terms of this preamble maybe noted here (1) that the Act and Ordinance were in terms temporary or interim provisions. They were intended so to say to maintain the status quo in municipal administration until a new law imposing a new and uniform pattern of administration was enacted, (2) that for the achievement of the above object, it was considered necessary by the Legislature that only general elections to the said municipalities should be postponed until the enactment of the new law, and nothing else. It is, in our opinion, of the greatest importance that the preamble itself says that the object of the Act was to postpone only the general elections, and not Presidential elections by a committee of its own President.

Section 3 of the new Act, which is the operative section, deals with the postponement of municipal elections and it provides:

"Notwithstanding anything in any Act by or under which any municipality is constituted or established,

(a) during the period beginning with the date of the commencement of the Ordinance and ending on the 31st day of December 1965, no general election to a municipality shall be held, or if commenced, and the poll has not taken place, shall be completed;

(b) the term or extended term of office, of the Councillors or members of a municipality, who were in office on the date of the commencement of the Ordinance (and whose term or extended term will expire before the 31st day of December 1965), shall be deemed to be extended to and inclusive of the 31st day of December 1965."

Then ss. 4, 5 and 6 give certain powers to the State Government to nominate members or appoint an administrator to carry on the duties of such municipality. Section 5 gives power of delegation to the officer so appointed and s. 6 provides for the appointment of an Advisory Council which may consist of the erstwhile members of the municipality. Then, for the purpose of the points raised in this petition s. 7 is important. It provides:

"Except as otherwise provided by this Act, the relevant Act shall in all other respects apply to the municipality concerned."

Now, the expression "relevant Act" is defined in s. 2(c) as follows:—"as respects any municipality, means the Act by or under which it is constituted or established". A "municipality" is defined in s. 2(a) as follows:

"'Municipality' means a local authority by whatever name called constituted or established by or under any of the Acts specified in the Schedule."

One of the Acts specified in the Schedule is the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act. Therefore, reading s. 2(a) with s. 2(c) and s. 7, the result is that except as provided by Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964, the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act continues in all other respects to apply to the Nandura Municipal Committee.

Now, it will be noticed that s. 3(b) of the Maharashtra Act No. XLII of 1964, refers only to the Councillors or members of a Municipality. It does not refer to the President or Vice-President and the question, therefore, is whether under the circumstances under which the petitioner was holding office as the President of the Nandura Municipal Committee, his term of office has been extended by operation of either the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act or Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964.

So far as the provisions of s. 18(3) are concerned, we have already referred to the second proviso to that sub-section and the plenary language of that proviso is:

"Provided further that where the term of office of a Committee is extended under this Act the President and Vice-President... shall continue to hold their respective offices until the date on which the term so extended expires." (the italics are ours). Nothing could be clearer than the language of this proviso. The extension must be under the C.P. & Berar Municipalities Act and none other and it is only a term "so extended" that validates further continuance in office. The power conferred under the Municipalities Act of extension of the President's term of office is conferred on the State Government by s. 16(2A). That sub-section provides:

"(2A). Notwithstanding anything contained in sub-section (2), if on any occasion the State Government thinks fit, the State Government may by order in the Official Gazette, for reasons which shall be notified with such order, extend the term of office of the members of any Committee by a period not exceeding one year in the aggregate."

The proviso to this sub-s. (2A) which is new says that the State Government shall first invite and consider objections, if any, a provision with which we are not here concerned. Reading sub-s. (2A) of s. 16 with the second proviso to s. 18(3)(b) of the Act, it is quite clear that the President for the time being holding office may automatically claim an extension of his office as President if the life of the members of the Committee is extended under sub-s. (2A) of s. 16. In that case, it would be an extension "under this Act" and, therefore, the consequence indicated by the proviso will follow. There does not appear to be any other provision either in the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act or in the Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964, granting extension to the existing incumbent of the office of the President.

What is here contended is that that is the effect of the provisions of the new Act, read in the light of the second proviso to s. 18(3) of the Municipalities Act. It is a little difficult to comprehend the argument but so far as we can gather Mr. Palshikar appearing for the petitioner contends that in view of s. 7 of Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964 the provisions of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act, and the provisions of Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964 are so to say approximated to each other. They become one law and the provisions of either Act can be read into the other. It was urged that upon that construction it must be held that when the Maharashtra Act XLII of 1964 extends the life of the Councillors or members of a Municipality, it virtually extends their life under the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act.

It is urged that this conclusion follows from the provisions of s. 7 of Act No. XLII of 1964. It seems to us that the conclusion should be the exact opposite of what is contended. All that s. 7 of Act No. XLII of 1964 says is that "except as otherwise provided by this Act," the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act "shall in all other respects apply to the municipality concerned." It would be begging the question to say that the extension under Act XLII of 1964 is an extension under the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act because the wording of s. 7 is that the Municipalities Act shall "in all other respects apply." It can only apply in all other respects when its provisions are not in conflict with the provisions of the Maharashtra Act No. XLII of 1964. So far as the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act is concerned, s. 16(2A) only speaks of an extension of the life of the members of the Municipal Committee being extended by the State Government and upon such an extension the life of the President for the time being is also extended until the date on which the extended term of the Municipal Committee expires. But the essential condition to the operation of this provision is that the extension must be "under this Act". We cannot find anything in the provisions of the Maharashtra Act No. XLII of 1964 to suggest that any provisions of the Municipalities Act are either incorporated in that Act or vice versa. In fact the provisions of the Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964 themselves indicate that the Municipalities Act is treated as a separate piece of legislation and s. 7 says that the provisions of that piece of legislation shall "in all other respects apply". We are unable to accept the contention that upon extension of the term of office of Councillors or members under the Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964, such an extension was granted, as would fulfil the requirements of the second proviso to sub-s. (3) of s. 18 of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act.

Another shade of the same argument was that by virtue of s. 3(b) of the new Act, s. 16(2) of the Municipalities Act stood amended, and the extension indicated by s. 3(b) was really an extension under s. 16(2) thus attracting the second proviso to s. 18(3)(b). Normally when a Legislature wishes to amend a legislation it says so in unmistakable language by the use of such words as "amended" or "substituted." No such words appear in Act XLII of 1964 or in its preamble. There is moreover no reference in s. 3(b) of the new Act to the C. P. Municipalities Act except indirectly because of the use of the word "municipality" which is defined in s. 2(a) read with the third entry of the Schedule to the new Act nor is there any intention to amend expressed. We cannot suppose that the Legislature effected an amendment of s. 16(2) of Municipalities Act in this vague and indirect manner. There must be a clear intention to amend expressed before we can hold that the Legislature has altered the provisions of a statute. There is no such intention to be found in s. 3(b) of the new Act.

Another argument which may here be noticed was advanced by Mr. Kukday who was appearing for one of the interveners. It is based upon the provisions of cl. (b) of s. 3 of the Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964. As we have shown, cl. (b) says that the term or extended term of office of the Councillors or members of a municipality who were in office on the date of the commencement of the Ordinance "shall be deemed to be extended to and inclusive of the 31st day of December 1965". Now, when the clause opens with the words "the term or extended term of office" Mr. Kukday points out, and rightly in our opinion, that the clause refers to "the term" as mentioned in s. 16(2) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act or the extended term of office as mentioned in s. 16(2A) of the Act. So far we are in agreement with the submission. But the further contention is that since this term or extended term of office of the councillors or members is by cl. (b) of s. 3 "deemed to be extended to and inclusive of the 31st day of December 1965", the extension granted by s. 3(b) of Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964 is an extension under s. 16(2) or 16(2A) of C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act. If so, it is urged it will immediately be covered by the provisions of the second proviso to sub-s. (3) of s. 18, as an extension "under this Act".

We are unable to accept this contention. Clause (b) of s. 3 of Act XLII of 1964 creates a well recognised fiction by the use of the words "shall be deemed to be extended to". The exercise of the positive power conferred upon the State Government, by s. 16(2) or s. 16(2A) to extend for a particular time cannot be equated with the powers exercised under s. 3(b) of Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964 fictionally extending time till December 31, 1965. It is well known that where a fiction of this kind is created, the fiction is essentially and radically different from the real thing. Indeed, if it were the real thing, it would be unnecessary to resort to the fiction at all. Thus, where s. 3(b) says that the term or extended term of office under s. 16(2) or 16(2A) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act shall by a fiction be deemed to be a term up to December 31, 1965, it is clear that the law did not regard that extended term as the real exercise of power under s. 16. In fact, if it were the real exercise of power under s. 16 of the Municipalities Act, it would not be necessary to make any such provision at all. But because it was not considered the exercise of power under s. 16, s. 3(b) had to say that after that power was once exercised, the resultant terms would expire, but shall be deemed to be extended. It cannot, therefore, be held that by virtue of s. 3(b) any power under the Municipalities Act has been exercised. If so, the second proviso to sub-s. (3) of s. 18 of the Municipalities Act would not be attracted.

Reference was made to the objects and purposes of the new Act. Normally, the objects of an Act would not affect its interpretation. But it was urged that where there is no doubt or difficulty, the preamble can be looked to as well as the purpose of an enactment. Even looking to the purpose and object of the enactment, we can see no valid reason why the term of office of Presidents or Vice-Presidents should necessarily be extended because general elections of municipalities had to be postponed in order to await the new legislation intended to usher in a new and uniform pattern of municipal administration. The object of the enactment is clear enough. It was intended that until the proposed new law was passed and began to operate, the status quo in the matter of elections of members to municipalities should be maintained and, therefore, no general elections should be held. The holding of such a general election would result in considerable time, money and energy being expended upon it, which would be wasted if the new measure came into operation within a short time thereafter and fresh election had to be held. But while these were weighty considerations for the passing of that legislation, we cannot see how these considerations would also make it necessary not to hold the periodical elections of the Presidents or Vice-Presidents of those municipalities. The election of the Presidents or Vice-Presidents of the municipalities does not depend upon the general vote of the people, but upon the vote of the members of a Municipal Committee for the time being. Once the life of the Municipal members for the time being is extended, the whole purpose and object of the new enactment would be fully subserved. Therefore, the interpretation which we think is the only possible interpretation of the provisions of Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964 as well as s. 18(3) of the Municipalities Act is in complete agreement with the objects and purposes of the new enactment.

An earlier decision of the English Courts reported in In re Wood's Estate: Ex parte Her Majesty's Commissioners of Works and Buildings,¹ was relied on in aid of the construction which we have earlier negatived that the provisions of the new Act No. XLII of 1964 should, by implication, be read into the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act. In that decision the provision of law which fell to be construed was wholly different. There, the legislation expressly provided that the main sections of one legislation shall be deemed to be repeated in another legislation and be deemed to be incorporated in that Act. There is no such provision here. On page 609, the provisions of s. 9 of Act 14 and 15 Victoria Chapter 42, are given in the Chancery Division report as follows:

"Section 9 provided that, for the purposes of the Act, the following sections of the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 87—namely, secs. 11 to 28, both inclusive; secs. 28 to 57, both inclusive; and secs. 66 to 75, both inclusive, 'shall be deemed to be herein repeated, with the alterations necessary to make the same applicable to the purposes of this Act, and to the Commissioners hereby incorporated, instead of the Commissioners by that Act incorporated, and so as to enable the Commissioners hereby incorporated to carry into effect the purposes of this Act'.

It is clear that in the enactment which was constituted in that case, there was an express reference to stated sections of another Act which were made part of the enactment to be construed. There is no such reference whatsoever in the Mah. Act No. XLII of 1964 before us. The decision, therefore, is distinguishable upon its own facts.

We can see no substance in the contentions raised in this petition. Both the notice to the petitioner and the appointment of an officer to hold the elections were valid acts on the part of the Collector, Buldana. The petition is dismissed with costs. Leave to appeal is granted, as it has been represented that this question affects municipalities and their Presidents and Vice-Presidents in all parts of the State. It would, therefore, be a "fit case" for the grant of leave.

Petition dismissed.

ARJANDAS DAYARAM VACHHANI v. J. S. BAJAJ.*

Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Rules, 1955, Rule 19—Lineal descendants of member of joint Hindu family entitled to claim partition, who are—Father and four sons forming joint family—Applicability of rule 19(2)(b).

The condition for the exclusion of a member of the joint family contained in clause (b) of rule 19(3) of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Rules, 1955, is intended to apply to a case where a joint family consists of more than two persons where each one of them is entitled to claim partition and the members sought to be excluded are lineal descendants of one of such members. It is only in such case that it can be said that they were lineal descendants of a member who was entitled to claim partition against another.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

H. G. Advani, N. H. Gursahani and J. Ramchandani, for the appellant.
G. N. Vaidya, for respondents Nos. 1, 2 and 7.

PATEL J. The petitioner is one of the sons of respondent No. 3. The petitioner and respondents Nos. 4, 5 and 6, who are the other sons of respondent No. 3, along with two other sons of respondent No. 3 formed a joint Hindu Family before the partition of 1947 and were residing in Sindh. The petitioner and respondents Nos. 4 to 6 are the sons of respondent No. 3 by one wife. The other two Sobhraj and Lokumal were the sons by a predeceased wife. In 1944 respondent No. 3 and his sons, who are now before the Court, filed a suit for the partition in the Court of First Class Sub-Judge, Nawabshah, against the two other sons Sobhraj and Lokumal. Large number of properties were included in the suit. It resulted into a decree on December 2, 1944, whereby one property described as item No. A of schedule 'D' to the plaint was awarded to one of his sons and the properties which fell to the share of the plaintiffs were awarded to them jointly. After their migration they filed claims in respect of the properties left in Sindh. The claims were processed after verification. The original application was made by respondent No. 3 and the claim of the joint family of respondent No. 3 and his sons, who are now on record, was verified. Thereafter the present petitioner made an application for being granted the benefit of r. 20 framed under the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act of 1954. This prayer was rejected and it was observed by the Assistant Settlement Officer that the sons may apply for apportionment of compensation under s. 9 of the Act. Thereafter an application came to be made under s. 9 of the Act to the Regional Settlement Commissioner. He rejected the same. In an appeal which was filed before the Chief Settlement Commissioner the matter was remanded for reconsideration by the Settlement Commissioner with delegated powers of the Chief Settlement Commissioner. It was held that the matter ought to be decided by the Regional Settlement Commissioner and not by his delegatee. Again the matter was heard by the Regional Settlement Commissioner who rejected the application. An appeal was filed against that judgment, which was heard by the Deputy Chief Settlement Commissioner who allowed the appeal holding that Dayaram and his four sons got the property jointly and had remained joint and as such they were entitled to apportionment according to the rules. While processing the claim the petitioner made a claim that the joint family was entitled to the benefit of r. 20 and in any event of r. 19 of the Rules framed under the aforesaid Act. Both these prayers were rejected by the Assistant Settlement Officer at Bombay by his order dated June 12, 1963. The orders were confirmed in appeal and revision by the Settlement Officer with delegated powers of the Regional Settlement Commissioner and by the Deputy Chief Settlement Commissioner with delegated powers of Chief Settlement Commissioner. The petitioner seeks to challenge the orders made by the authorities below.

In view of the fact that the decree of the Sub-Judge with regard to the share of the plaintiffs in suit for partition Mr. Advani fairly enough did not press his contention that the petitioner is entitled to claim the benefit of r. 20. That portion of the order, therefore, must be confirmed. He has, however, pressed the contention that the joint family of the petitioner and his brothers and father is entitled to the benefit of r. 19.

Rule 19 so far as is relevant is as follows:—

“Where a claim relates to properties left by the members of an undivided Hindu family in West Pakistan (hereinafter referred to as the joint family) compensation shall be computed in the manner hereinafter provided in this rule.

(2) Where on the 26th September 1955 (hereinafter referred to as the relevant date) the joint family consisted of:—

(a) two or three members entitled to claim partition, the compensation payable to such family shall be computed by dividing the verified claim into three equal shares and calculating the compensation separately on each such share.

(b) four or more members entitled to claim partition, the compensation payable to such family shall be computed by dividing the verified claim into three equal shares and calculating the compensation separately on each such share.

(3) For the purpose of calculating the number of the members of a joint family under sub-rule(2), a person who on the relevant date:—

(a) was less than 18 years of age, or

(b) was a lineal descendant in the male line of another living member of joint Hindu family entitled to claim partition shall be excluded:

[The proviso has no application and need not therefore be referred to.]

Explanation.—For the purpose of this rule, the question whether a family is joint or separate shall be determined with reference to the status of the family on the 14th day of August, 1947, and every member of a joint family shall be deemed to be joint notwithstanding the fact that he had separated from the family after that date.”

The authorities below have not given the benefit to the joint family of sub-r. (2) of r. 19 on the ground that sub-r. (3) is applicable to them. The reasoning is that inasmuch as the four sons and the father constituted a joint family the sons being the lineal descendants of the father they must be excluded from the computation of the number of members of the family under sub-r. (2), cl. (b). Mr. Advani contends that this construction is erroneous and does not take into account the words used in this provision.

It is not denied and it cannot be denied that Dayaram and his sons formed a joint family. Inasmuch as the explanation put the relevant date as August 14, 1947, and as it is admitted that on August 14, 1947, the family continued as it was under the partition decree, it must be held that it was a joint family whether or not the members separated subsequently after that date. If sub-cl. (3) of r. 19 cannot apply then it also cannot be doubted that the joint family consisted of more than four members entitled to claim partition inasmuch as it is settled law that every member of the joint family is entitled to claim partition, except in Bombay where during the life time of his father a grandson is not entitled to claim partition against his grand-father (See Sir Dinshaw Mulla's Hindu Law, p. 479, Art. 307). Now, sub-r. (3) lays down two alternative conditions for the exclusion of a member of the joint family. One is that the member must be less than 18 years of age and the second is that he must be a lineal descendant in the male line of another living member of a joint Hindu family entitled to claim partition. It is clear that this condition is intended to apply to a case where a joint family consists of more than two persons where each one of them is entitled to claim partition and the members sought to be excluded are lineal descendants of one of such members. It is only in such case that it could be said that they were lineal descendants of a member who was entitled to claim partition against another.

In the present case the father and each of the sons is entitled to claim partition against each other. If the lineal descendants are to be excluded even in a case like the present it only means that all the descendants of the father must be excluded even though there is no other member against whom the father can seek to enforce partition. Having regard to the words used the only interpretation which can be placed on cl. (b) of sub-r. (3) of r. 19, is the one adopted by us.

Mr. Vaidya on behalf of the respondents has emphasised the words lineal descendant in the male line and has argued that the sons being descended from the father must be considered as only one unit. It is this argument that appealed to the authorities below but then we must construe a provision giving meaning to every word that is used in the rule unless it leads to manifest absurdity. The context in which the expression is used is that he must be a descendant in the male line of another living member of the joint family. The sons are no doubt the lineal descendants of the father but then there is no other living member of the joint family. The contention that is being pressed, therefore, on behalf of the respondent cannot possibly be accepted.

In the result we set aside the orders of the authorities below and hold that the joint family is entitled to the benefit of r. 19 and we direct that the claim be processed accordingly.

The petitioner to get his costs.

Orders set aside.

Companies Act (I of 1956), Sec. 17—Application for confirmation of alteration in objects of company involving new departure from existing business—Whether Court can refuse confirmation—Present desire to carry on new business in near future whether essential for such confirmation.

Under s. 17 of the Companies Act, 1956, the additional business proposed to be carried on by a company in respect of which confirmation from the Court is sought may involve a new departure from its existing business. The additional business may be one which is different from the original business, but that by itself is not a sufficient ground to refuse confirmation. What the Court has to consider is whether the additional business is destructive of or inconsistent with the existing business. If it is not so, then it may very well be capable of being conveniently and advantageously combined with the existing businesses of the company.

Unless there is a present desire on the part of the company to carry on the new business in the near future, the Court cannot grant the application for confirmation of alteration in the objects of the company.

In the exercise of jurisdiction under s. 17 of the Act, the Court should not overlook the fact that it is for the shareholders to decide what business should be carried on by the company and it is not for the Court to tell the company what business it should carry on and how it should be carried on.

The application was made under s. 17 of the Companies Act, 1956.

The main object of the Company was to carry on in British India the business of spinners, weavers, manufacturers, balers, and pressers of jute, jute cuttings, jute rejections, hemp, cotton, and any other fibrous materials and the cultivation thereof and the business of buyers and sellers of and dealers in jute, jute cuttings, jute rejections, and any other fibrous materials, hides, skins, oilseeds, and other seeds thereof, and to transact all manufacturing, curing and preparing process and mercantile business that may be necessary or expedient and to purchase and vend the raw materials and manufactured articles. By a Special Resolution of the Company duly passed in accordance with s. 189 of the Companies Act, 1956, at an Extra-Ordinary General Meeting thereof on August 3, 1961, it was resolved that:—

"In accordance with section 17 of the Companies Act and other applicable provisions of the Act, the provisions of the Memorandum of Association of the Company be and are hereby altered as follows:—

In Clause III after Sub-para. (2), the following objects shall be added as sub-para. (2A).

(2A) To carry on all or any of the businesses following:—

(b) To manufacture medicinal, pharmaceutical, biological and other preparations and chemicals and to manufacture alkaloids, extracts, drugs, anti-biotics and tranquillisers, useful in human therapy and for use against pathogenic bacteria, fungi, protozoa and virus infections, by physical, chemical fermentation, bacteriological or other methods independently or under license.

(c) To prepare synthetic and other goods for human consumption, cattle and other feeds of all kinds by chemical fermentation or other process or by compounding such as yeast, vitamins, hormones, proteins, amino acids and preparations containing minerals.

(i) To manufacture packing cases or other packing materials out of wood or cardboard plastics or any other raw materials.

(j) To manufacture paints for use in factory or for sale.

(k) To manufacture polishing compositions for various industries".

In the explanatory statement annexed to the notice for convening the extraordinary general meeting, it was stated that the additional objects would help the company to carry on its existing business more economically and more efficiently by having all businesses under one company rather than promote separate companies for such businesses and hold shares therein. Further the Directors were of the view that the establishment of such new businesses would enlarge the area of the company's operations as the businesses i.e. industries proposed to be undertaken may be established at various suitable places in India. The undertaking of such businesses as proposed would help the company to carry on the same, combined with the existing business, more conveniently and advantageously, as the company had necessary funds for undertaking such businesses, and it will be economical and advantageous to combine those businesses, under one management and under one company.

M. P. Amin, instructed by Manilal Kher Ambalal & Co., for the petitioners.

F. S. Nariman, instructed by G. M. Divekar, for the Registrar of Companies.

KANTAWALA J. [His Lordship after setting out the facts, proceeded.] In the course of the hearing of this petition, Mr. Amin, who appeared on behalf of the company, did not press for confirmation of alterations of the objects set out in sub-paras. (b), (c) and (d) of clause 2A set out above. I am, therefore, not called upon to consider whether the proposed alterations in respect of the objects mentioned in the said paras. (b), (c) and (d) of clause 2A should be confirmed by this Court.

The notice of this petition was served upon the Registrar of the Joint Stock Companies and the Registrar has opposed this application. He has mainly objected to additional objects contained in sub-paras. (a) to (e) in clause 2A of the Object clause.

Section 17 of the Indian Companies Act, 1956, makes inter alia the following provision in respect of alteration of objects.

"17. Special resolution and confirmation by Court required for alteration of memorandum.—(1) A company may, by special resolution, alter the provisions of its memorandum so as to change the place of its registered office from one State to another, or with respect to the objects of the company so far as may be required to enable it

(a) to carry on its business more economically or more efficiently;

(b) to attain its main purpose by new or improved means;

(c) to enlarge or change the local area of its operations;

(d) to carry on some business which under existing circumstances may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company;

(e) to restrict or abandon any of the objects specified in the memorandum;

(f) to sell or dispose of the whole, or any part, of the undertaking, or of any of the undertakings, of the company; or

(g) to amalgamate with any other company or body of persons.

(2) The alteration shall not take effect until, and except in so far as, it is confirmed by the Court on petition."

Mr. Amin, who appeared on behalf of the company, has urged before me that the new business, which is proposed to be carried on by the company under the proposed alterations of the object clause can under the existing circumstances be combined conveniently and advantageously with the business of the company; that it is primarily for the company to decide what is for its good and that the Court must presume that the company knows its business and that it is not for the Court to tell the company how it should carry on its business.

On the other hand, it is urged by Mr. Nariman on behalf of the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies that the proposed alteration in the objects clause would enable the company to embark upon several businesses foreign to its main existing business; if the proposed alterations in the object clause are confirmed, it would enable the company to carry on an entirely new class of business having no sort of relation to the existing business of the company; that the provisions of s. 17 of the Companies Act, 1956, do not authorise the carrying on of the business of any nature whatsoever, it must be a cognate one and not one which bears no relation to the existing business of the company; that the proposed new businesses being entirely foreign, are not such businesses as may be conveniently and advantageously combined with the Company's existing business.

It is also contended by Mr. Nariman that in view of the fact that distinct businesses are proposed by the alterations suggested, the Court should not sanction them except upon the evidence that there was really a present desire on the part of the company to extend its business in the directions indicated. I propose to consider hereafter the rival contentions raised by both the parties. Mr. Amin does not dispute that the businesses proposed to be carried on by the Company are wholly different from and bear no relation to the existing business of the Company. But he says that in spite of that, the company can carry on the same, under the existing circumstances conveniently and advantageously in combination with the present business of the company. Mr. Amin relied upon the principles laid down in the case of Parent Tyre Co., In re¹. In that case, the business that was sought to be introduced was one of bankers and financiers in the existing business of the company, which consisted in the holding and management of large investments in two other companies. In construing s. 9(1) (d) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, (section similar to s. 17 of the Companies Act, 1956) Lawrence J. observed (p. 228):

"Dealing now with the main part of the resolution, I have come to the conclusion that, although the businesses there described are, in my opinion, a new departure, in the sense that they do not fall within the memorandum as at present drawn and are businesses which have no definite relation to the present business of the company, yet, in my judgment, this fact is not fatal to the introduction of the additional objects enumerated in the special resolution. The question whether any given additional business is one which may conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company carried on at the time when the special resolution is passed must, in my judgment, be determined by the persons engaged in the business of the company. It is essentially a business proposition, whether an additional business can or cannot be conveniently or advantageously carried on under existing circumstances with the business of the company. The additional business, of course, must not be destructive of or inconsistent with the existing business; it must leave the existing business substantially what it was before; but the additional business may be one which is different from the original business and yet may well be capable of being conveniently and advantageously combined with the business which is being carried on. I think it would be placing altogether a too narrow construction upon s. 9, to hold that, because the additional business involves a new departure which was not contemplated by the original memorandum, therefore it does not fall within the purview of the section".

Thus the additional business proposed to be carried on by the company may involve a new departure from its existing business. It may be that the additional business may be one which is different from the original business, but that by itself is not a sufficient ground to refuse confirmation. What the Court has to consider is whether the additional business is destructive of or inconsistent with the existing business. If the additional business is not destructive of or inconsistent with the existing business, then it may well be capable of being conveniently and advantageously combined with the existing businesses of the company.

Mr. Amin on behalf of the company also relied upon the observations in Palmer's Company Law, 20th edn., pp. 291-292. The said observations are to the following effect:-

"the Statutory authority to alter the objects is not limited to business ejusdem generis but the alteration may extend to quite different business if it can be conveniently or advantageously combined with the existing business of the company."

Mr. Amin on behalf of the company accepted the position that in considering the application for confirmation of alteration in the object clause, the Court has got discretion. But he contended that that discretion has to be exercised on judicial principles. The judicial principles which guide the Court in exercising the discretion are clearly laid down in the decision of this Court in the case of *Jayantilal v. Tata Iron & Steel Co. Ltd.*² At page 755 of the Report, in construing the provisions of s. 17 of the Companies Act, Chagla C.J. observes as follows:—

"...But in exercising the discretion under s. 17 the Court must always bear in mind what is almost axiomatic in the company matters. It is primarily for the company to decide what is for its good. The Court must presume that the company knows its business and it is not for the Court to tell the company how it should carry on its business. It is not for the Court to impose upon the company its own political or moral views. However much we may disagree with the company in the action that it seeks to take, it is not for us to tell the company how it should carry on its business if its shareholders think that the business should be carried on in a particular way".

The special resolution is passed unanimously by the shareholders and no reason is suggested by the Registrar why the Court should take a view contrary to the one taken by the shareholders themselves.

Mr. Nariman on behalf of the Registrar has, however, emphasized the fact that the proposed alterations in the object clause are introduced without there being sufficient evidence that the company has a present desire to extend its business in the directions indicated. He contends that the Court should grant the applications only if the application is limited to those objects which the directors desire to carry out in near future. He relied upon the decision in *Re John Brown & Co.; Re Tredegar Iron & Coal Com. Ltd.*³ There, the new clauses as proposed were numerous and lengthy and included almost every kind of business, and some of the clauses only amplified the existing objects. An interpretation clause was introduced among the clauses by reason of which the objects stated in any clause could be treated as an independent business, unless otherwise so stated in the clause. It was held that the alterations in that case could be sanctioned only when the clauses were reduced in number and simplified, and the interpretation clause had been deleted and that a further clause was inserted disabling the directors from treating any of the new objects as principal objects without the consent of a special resolution of the company. Neville J. at page 234 of the report observed:

"I have been thinking this matter over a great deal. The Legislature may pass a law which will prevent companies trading except within the limits of their memorandum; but, if you have got a memorandum which is co-extensive with the business of the whole world, you get behind the ambit of the legislation.

I think this would meet the case where it is desired (I think unwisely) to have these enormously extended memorandums...The point is that the directors could abandon the main business and take up an entirely new business without consulting the shareholders. I should stand in the way of the company taking up distinct businesses. Where distinct businesses were proposed by the alterations suggested I would not sanction them except upon evidence that there was a really present desire on the part of the company to extend its business in the directions indicated".

The learned Judge's subsequent observations on the same page of the Report are equally cogent and relevant on the point under consideration:

"That is one of the anomalies of the company law.

What I really feel is that if the court takes up the line of least resistance, some day the court may wake up and find that shareholders have lost their money through directors embarking on speculative business.

I am rather inclined to think that it would be better if the application were limited (even as to ancillary powers) to those the directors desire to carry out, not immediately, but in the near future, rather than to put in ancillary powers which you thought might at some future time be desired to be carried out. I don't want you to come once for all and ask for an extended memorandum covering every conceivable alteration in the business of the company".

In fact, Neville J. had observed earlier at the same page of the report:

"...If the circumstances of the company change, they can always come and ask reasonably to enlarge their memorandum".

It is thus clear that unless there is a present desire on the part of the company to carry on the new business in the near future, the Court should not grant the application. There is, therefore, considerable force in this contention of Mr. Nariman. During the course of the hearing, however, Mr. Amin on behalf of the company, abandoned the objects which are mentioned in sub-paras. (b), (c) and (d) of the Object clause 2A. As these objects are abandoned by the company and as the company's main desire is to carry on the businesses which are mentioned in sub-para. (a) of clause 2A of the Object Clause, there is evidence on record that the company intends to start the businesses in chemicals in the near future. Under these circumstances, I find it difficult to accept this contention of Mr. Nariman.

Mr. Nariman also relied upon the case in In the matter of Bhutoria Brothers.⁴ In this case, the principles laid down in the case Parent Tyre Co. In re., and in Re. John Brown & Co.; Re. Tredegar Iron & Coal Co. Ltd., are followed. After referring to these cases at p. 595 of the report, Mukharji J. observed (p. 596):

"I arrive at a similar conclusion from a construction and interpretation of the language of S. 17(1)(d) of the Companies Act, 1956. That provision says that the memorandum may be altered with respect to the objects of the company to enable it to carry on 'some business'. The words 'some business' in that clause apparently must include business other than the business which is already being carried on under the existing memorandum. Therefore, the addition of 'some business' may be the addition of a business which is entirely a new departure from the business already carried on. The only requirement of the Statute law in India is that such business must be one which can (1) conveniently or advantageously be combined with the business of the company, and (2) that this must be so under the existing circumstances. So long as these two limits are observed I should think that the shareholders and the management of the company should be left free to add to or reduce their business by suitable alterations in their memorandum".

In the present case, the company is a private limited company and has only two shareholders. Both the shareholders have unanimously approved of the proposed alteration in the object clause. None of the creditors of the company has come forward to oppose this application for confirmation of the alteration in the object clause. The only opposition to this petition is from the Registrar of the Joint Stock Companies. The company has ample capital with which it can carry on its existing business and also the proposed additional businesses. Simply because the businesses proposed to be carried on are wholly different from and bear no relation to the existing business of the company, it cannot be said that it cannot be conveniently and advantageously combined with the existing business. The proposed businesses, in my opinion, are not destructive of or inconsistent with the business which the company is now carrying on. In exercise of my jurisdiction, I should not overlook the fact that it is for the shareholders to decide what business could be carried on by the company and it is not for the Court to tell the company what business it should carry on and how it should be carried. In view of the facts stated in the petition and the affidavit in rejoinder, I am satisfied that the businesses proposed to be carried on by the company under the proposed alteration of the object clause (save and except those which are abandoned) can conveniently and advantageously be combined with the business of the company under its existing circumstances.

I, therefore, allow the alteration proposed by the object clause 2A set out in para. 6 of the petition on condition that clauses (b), (c) and (d) thereof are deleted therefrom. The objects in clauses (b), (c) and (d) of the Object clause 2A are in fact abandoned during the course of the hearing. The Company will pay the costs of the Registrar of the Joint Stock Companies and will bear its own costs.

Before Mr. Justice Kantawala.

F. HOFFMAN LA ROCHE & COMPANY LIMITED

v.

THE SANITEX CHEMICAL INDUSTRIES LIMITED.*

Trade and Merchandise Marks Act (XLIII of 1958), Secs. 11(a), 12(1)—Burden of proof under ss. 11(a) & 12(1)—Construction of s. 12(1)—Where marks indetical whether permissible to consider manner of intended user of mark applied for registration for limited class of goods—Where marks not identical whether enquiry limited to comparison of two marks—Nature of such enquiry—Tests for determining what is likely to deceive or cause confusion.

Under ss. 11(a) and 12(1) of the Trade and Merchandise Marks Act, 1958, the onus is upon the applicant to establish to the satisfaction of the Court that there is no real and tangible danger of confusion. On the other hand, the objections put forward by the opponents must equally be real and not fanciful. It is not for the Court to consider imaginary and unlikely cases in order to bring s. 12(1) of the Act into operation. Even though the burden is on the applicant their case is not to be defeated by constructing rather fantastic or far-fetched imaginary cases involving a combination of circumstances which, however possible it may be, has no reasonable probability in any business sense. The Court is not concerned with hypothetical possibilities but with the ordinary practical business probabilities having regard to the circumstances of the case. If at the conclusion of the enquiry, the answer to the question: Is deception or confusion likely to occur? is "yes" or if the matter remains in dubio, registration must be refused.

Section 12(1) of the Act deals with two types of cases. The first type of cases deals with two identical trade marks. If the mark of which registration is sought and the mark which is already registered are identical, the registration must be refused. It is not then permissible to proceed to consider whether notwithstanding the circumstances that the marks are identical, the manner of intended user of the mark applied for would justify allowing the registration in respect of some limited class of goods. The second type of cases are those in which it is necessarily postulated that the two marks under consideration are not identical. Here the enquiry is not limited to the comparison of two marks but involves a comparison of the two marks in relation, as regards the existing mark, to the goods in respect of which the marks are registered and in relation as regards the proposed mark, the goods in respect of which registration is applied for. In the conduct of this enquiry, the surrounding circumstances properly to be taken into account must be considered. When the marks have been considered in relation to the goods, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the question must be answered: "Is there likely to be confusion or deception if the application is granted?" When the question is answered, the enquiry under the section is concluded for all purposes and if the answer to the question is either in the affirmative or that the matter remains in dubio, it is incompetent to the tribunal to take into account any further matter in order to consider whether, in the light of those matters, the probability of confusion would be removed and thus the answer already given might be otherwise.

The Act does not lay down any criterion for determining what is likely to deceive or cause confusion. Every case must depend on its own particular facts and the value of authorities lies not so much in the actual decision as in the tests applied for determining what is likely to deceive or cause confusion. A trade mark is likely to deceive or cause confusion by its resemblance to another already on the register, if it is likely to do so in the course of its legitimate use in a market where the two marks are assumed to be in use by the traders in that market. In considering the matter, all the circumstances of the case must be considered.

In the Matter of an application by Smith Hayden & Coy., Ltd.,¹ In the Matter of an Application by William Bailey (Birmingham) Ltd.,² In the Matter of an Application by Bayer Products, Ltd.,³ and In the Matter of an Application by the Pianotist Company Ltd.,⁴ referred to.

On January 30, 1957, the Sanitex Chemical Industries Limited (applicants) made an application under s. 14 of the Trade Marks Act, 1940, for registration of a trade mark in class 5 in respect of pharmaceutical preparations containing iron in injectible form. The trade mark consisted of a label containing inter alia the word "Saniron" in black letters below which were the letters "SCI" appearing prominently in special lettering within a rectangle. The letters "SCI" and the rectangle are in white colours. The label also contained the word "poison" in red colours and the various ingredients that had gone into the composition of the pharmaceutical injectible product as also the name and address of the applicant company. One of the ingredients as specified in the label that went into the composition of the product is "Procain hydrochloride".

The registration was opposed by Messrs. F. Hoffman La Roche and Company Limited (opponents) under s. 8(a) and s. 10(a) of the Trade Marks Act, 1940, corresponding to ss. 11(a) and 12(1) of the Trade and Merchandise Marks Act, 1958. The opponents were the registered proprietors of the mark "SARIDON" registered in class 5 in respect of pharmaceutical preparations as on June 1, 1942. In the notice of opposition, the opponents inter alia contended that the marks sought to be registered by the applicants consisted of a label in which the word "SANIRON" was depicted as an essential feature, that the word "SANIRON" so nearly resembled the opponents' trade mark "SARIDON" that the applicants' mark "SANIRON" was likely to deceive or cause confusion and that their mark "SARIDON" was so well-known throughout India that the use of the "SANIRON" mark and/or their registration was likely to deceive or cause confusion in the trade and the public would assume a connection in the course of trade between the applicants and/or their goods and the opponents.

In their counter-statement, the applicants stated that the applicants' goods and those of the opponents were of different description as they were meant for totally different ailments and that between their respective trade marks there was no similarity whatsoever; that the applicants' product under the trade mark "SANIRON" was in the form of injections which could not be sold in the market without a doctor's prescription and as such there was no possibility of any deception or confusion taking place nor was it likely that wrong medicine would ever be given by a chemist to his customer. The applicants further stated that their mark "SANIRON" was coined by taking prefix "SAN" from the first three letters of the applicants' name "SANITEX" and the subsequent part "IRON" indicated iron of the product which was quite distinct and distinguishable from the opponents' trade mark "SARIDON"; that there was no possibility of confusion as the trade marks of the applicants and the opponents were different both visually and phonetically and the goods in respect of which the said marks were used were also goods of different description and meant for totally different indications: that the applicants' medicine was regarded as "Poison" as clearly indicated on their trade mark label and that it could not be sold at all, according to the provisions of the Indian Drugs Act, without a doctor's prescription and therefore, there was not the slightest danger of confusion having regard to the restrictions imposed under the Drugs Act.

1 (1945) 63 R.P.C. 97.

2 (1935) 52 R.P.C. 136.

3 † (1947) 64 R.P.C. 125.

At the hearing before the Assistant Registrar of Trade Marks, it was admitted on behalf of the opponents, that their particular pharmaceutical preparation in respect of which mark "SARIDON" was used, was an analgesic preparation in tablets form from its very inception and that their mark was advertised as such extensively both in the medical press as well as in the general press. It was held by the Assistant Registrar that the reputation and the user of the opponents' mark had been proved in respect of a preparation used as an analgesic and sold in the form of tablets only since the inception of the mark upto the date of application. He also held that visually the two marks were not similar, that even if the opponents used the mark in respect of identical injectible preparation as used by the applicants or some such preparation, there was no possibility of confusion because in that event, the two injectible preparations under the marks "SARIDON" and "SANIRON" would be administered by a doctor and an expert nurse and professional men of that character were not likely to commit a mistake.

The opponents appealed against the decision of the Assistant Registrar allowing registration of the applicants mark.

KANTAWALA J. [His Lordship after stating the facts and evidence in the case, proceeded.] The sections on which the opposition was based, are ss. 11(a) and 12(1). Section 11(a) provides as follows:—

"11. A mark—

- (a) the use of which would be likely to deceive or cause confusion; or
- (b) ...
- (c) ...
- (d) ...

shall not be registered as a trade mark".

This section is contemplating the consequences of the use of the trade marks.

Section 12(1) provides:—

"12. (1) Save as provided in sub-section (3) no trade mark shall be registered in respect of any goods or description of goods which is identical with or deceptively similar to a trade mark which is already registered in the name of a different proprietor in respect of the same goods or description of goods".

The words "deceptively similar" are defined in s. 2(d) as under:—

"(d) 'Deceptively similar':—A mark shall be deemed to be deceptively similar to another mark if it so nearly resembles that other mark as to be likely to deceive or cause confusion".

It is necessary to have in mind at the outset the scope of the enquiry under each section. For this purpose, one cannot do better than adapt to the present case a passage in the judgment of Evershed J. in the case of *In the matter of an application by Smith Hayden & Coy., Ltd.*¹ substituting the marks with which I am concerned in this case for those with which the learned Judge was concerned in the case before him: (a) under s. 11: Having regard to the reputation acquired by the name "SARIDON", is the Court satisfied that the mark applied for, if used in a normal and fair manner in connection with any goods covered by the registration proposed, will not be reasonably likely to cause deception and confusion amongst a substantial number of persons; and (b) under s. 12: Assuming use by the appellants of their mark "SARIDON" in a normal and fair manner for any of the goods covered by the registration of their mark (and including particularly goods also covered by the proposed registration of the mark "SANIRON" i.e. pharmaceutical preparation containing iron in injectible form) is the Court satisfied that there will be no likelihood of deception or confusion among a substantial number of persons if the applicants also use their mark SANIRON normally and fairly in respect of any goods covered by their proposed registration.

In the case of each section, the onus is upon the applicant to establish to the satisfaction of the Court that there is no real and tangible danger of confusion. On the other hand, the objections put forward by the opponents must equally be real and not fanciful. It is not for the Court to consider imaginary and unlikely cases in order to bring s. 12(1) of the Act into operation. Even though the burden is on the applicants, their case is not to be defeated by constructing rather fantastic or far-fetched imaginary cases involving a combination of circumstances which, however possible it may be, has no reasonable probability in any business sense. The Court is not concerned with hypothetical possibilities but with the ordinary practical business probabilities having regard to the circumstances of the case. If at the conclusion of the enquiry, the answer to the question: Is deception or confusion likely to occur? is "Yes" or if the matter remains in dubio, registration must be refused.

It is equally made clear on the authorities as was pointed out by Farwell J. in *the matter of an Application by William Bailey (Birmingham) Ltd.*² that:

"The decision of the Registrar or the Assistant Registrar is one which should not be disturbed at all lightly. Prima facie his decision should stand and, in my view, though this Court might take a different view from that which was taken by the Registrar as to the similarity or dissimilarity of the two marks or the two words, or even if this Court were to take a different view as to the effect of the evidence as a whole from that taken by the Registrar, the Court would hesitate long before reversing the decision of the Registrar on any such grounds as those. In my judgment, before this Court interferes with the decision of the Registrar in a case of this kind it ought to be satisfied that the Registrar in arriving at his decision has acted upon some wrong principle, e.g., has not approached the problem in the right way, or has taken into consideration matters which he ought not to have taken into consideration or has omitted to take into consideration matters which were proper for consideration. Unless there are some such grounds as those for interfering with the decision of the Registrar, in my judgment that decision ought not to be disturbed".

It was argued on behalf of the opponents that the Assistant Registrar did not approach the problem in the right way; that he had taken merely the decisions of the cases reported and unreported without taking into consideration the facts of those cases and applied them to the present case; that the Assistant Registrar instead of taking into consideration the marks as actually applied for by the opponents, took into consideration the marks as actually used by the opponents, that he misconstrued s. 12(1), that he wrongly applied the provisions of the Drugs Act and the rules made thereunder and that he has, therefore, erred on a matter of principle and in consequence, I am in a position to consider the matter afresh.

In view of this argument, it is necessary to consider the true construction of s. 12(1). Section 12(1) deals with two types of cases. The first type of cases is that no trade mark shall be registered in respect of any goods or description of goods which is identical with a trade mark which is already registered in the name of a different proprietor in respect of the same goods or description of goods. There is an absolute bar of registration of two identical trade marks. It requires that the two marks under consideration should be compared. If the two marks under consideration, that is, the mark of which registration is sought and the mark which is already registered are identical, the registration must be refused. It is not then permissible to proceed to consider whether notwithstanding the circumstances that the marks are identical, the manner of intended user of the mark applied for would justify allowing the registration in respect of some limited class of goods. The second type of cases dealt with by the section are those in which it is necessarily postulated that the two marks under consideration are not identical. Here the enquiry is not limited to the comparison of two marks but involves a comparison of the two marks in relation, as regards the existing mark, to the goods in respect of which the marks are registered and in relation as regards the proposed mark, the goods in respect of which registration is applied for. In the conduct of this enquiry, the surrounding circumstances properly to be taken into account must be considered. When the marks have been considered in relation to the goods, in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the question must be answered: "Is there likely to be confusion or deception if the application is granted?" When the question is answered, the enquiry under the section is concluded for all purposes and if the answer to the question is either in the affirmative or that the matter remains in dubio, it is incompetent to the tribunal to take into account any further matter in order to consider whether, in the light of those matters, the probability of confusion would be removed and thus the answer already given might be otherwise. See In the Matter of an Application by Bayer Products, Ltd.,³ per Wynn-Parry, J. at p. 131.

It is not disputed before me that the goods in respect of which the opponents' mark is registered and the applicants' mark is applied for registration are the same or of the same description. It is also not disputed that the two marks are not identical.

It will be noticed that the words used in the section relevant for the purpose are "deceptively similar", that is, likely to deceive or cause confusion. The Act does not lay down any criterion for determining what is likely to deceive or cause confusion. Every case must depend on its own particular facts and the value of authorities lies not so much in the actual decision as in the tests applied for determining what is likely to deceive or cause confusion. A trade mark is likely to deceive or cause confusion by its resemblance to another already on the register, if it is likely to do so in the course of its legitimate use in a market where the two marks are assumed to be in use by the traders in that market. In considering the matter, all the circumstances of the case must be considered.

The matters which are to be taken into consideration were stated by Lord Parker (then Parker J.) in In the Matter of an Application by the Pianotist Company Ltd.,⁴ where he said:

"...You must take the two words. You must judge of them, both by their look and by their sound. You must consider the foods to which they are to be applied. You must consider the nature and kind of customer who would be likely to buy those goods. In fact, you must consider all the surrounding circumstances; and you must further consider what is likely to happen if each of those trade marks is used in a normal way as a trade mark for the goods of the respective owners of the marks. If, considering all those circumstances, you come to the conclusion that there will be a confusion—that is to say, not necessarily that one man will be injured and the other will gain illicit benefit, but that there will be confusion in the mind of the public which will lead to confusion in the goods—then you may refuse the registration, or rather you must refuse the registration in that case”.

It is necessary to apply each of these considerations in the present case. So far as visual comparison is concerned, one has to compare the opponents’ mark as actually appearing on the register and the applicants’ mark as applied for registration. The mark of the opponents as registered is the word “SARIDON” per se, while the applicants’ mark as applied for registration is not the word mark but is a label mark. The essential feature of the applicants’ mark consists of the word “SANIRON” along with the letters SCI appearing very prominently on a label in a multi coloured background. In view of the statutory restrictions in respect of the labelling of the mark, which I will hereinafter refer to in some detail, the word “poison” appears in red or against red background. The label of the applicants in a normal and fair user of the mark, must be a multicoloured one and in any visual comparison of the mark, the presence of the letters SCI in bold letters cannot be ignored. In my opinion, visually, the two marks are not similar.

It was, however, argued that the essential feature or at least the feature by which the applicants’ mark will be asked for is SANIRON. Both the words SANIRON and SARIDON are the words of three syllables and both the words begin with syllable SA and end with the syllable ON. In the middle portion in one case it is NIR and in the other it is RID. In written order the letter ‘N’ in the word “SANI” and the letter ‘R’ in the word “SARI” especially since both the words are followed by the letter ‘I’ are likely to be written alike and there is a great chance of confusion. It is true that in the two words “SARIDON” and “SANIRON” there are common syllables. But, taken as a whole there is no overall similarity so as to cause confusion. Judging the two words by their sound, the test to be applied in such cases, is the one that is laid down by Luxmoore L.J. *In the Matter of an Application by Rysta Ltd.*⁵ and which is approved by the House of Lords in appeal in *Aristoc, Ltd. v. Rysta, Ltd.*⁶ At p. 108, Luxmoore L.J. said:—

“The answer to the question whether the sound of one word resembles too nearly the sound of another so as to bring the former within the limits of section 12 of the Trade Marks Act, 1938, must nearly always depend on first impression, for obviously a person who is familiar with both words will neither be deceived nor confused. It is the person who only knows the one word, and has perhaps an imperfect recollection of it who is likely to be deceived or confused. Little assistance, therefore, is to be obtained from a meticulous comparison of the two words, letter by letter and syllable by syllable, pronounced with the clarity to be expected from a teacher of elocution.

The Court must be careful to make allowance for imperfect recollection and the effect of careless pronunciation and speech on the part not only of the person seeking to buy under the trade description, but also of the shop assistant ministering to that person’s wants”.

In approaching the question whether the sound of one word resembles too nearly the sound of another, from the point of view of a man of average intelligence and imperfect recollection, it is difficult to find phonetic similarity between the two words SARIDON and SANIRON. Judging the two words by their sound I do not find that there is such a close and near resemblance between them as is likely to cause confusion.

The next thing is to consider the nature and the kind of the customer who would be likely to buy the respective goods and the surrounding circumstances. In the Matter of an Application by Bayer Products Ltd., Lord Green, M. R., emphasised the importance of this consideration in the following words (p. 137) :

“The question whether there is likelihood of deception or confusion cannot be considered under Sec. 12(1), without reference to surrounding circumstances; in other words, the Court is not confined merely to looking at the Register and comparing the two marks as words in the English language or some invented language; it has to consider to what extent, in all the circumstances, deception or confusion is likely."

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Chandrachud.

IBRAHIM MAHOMMED ISSAK v. M/s. MACKINNON
MACKENZIE & Co. PRIVATE LTD.*

Workmen's Compensation Act (VII of 1923), Secs. 3, 30(1)—Merchant Shipping Act (XLIV of 1958), Sec. 101—Indian Evidence Act (I of 1872), Sec. 108—"Accident arising out of employment", meaning of expression in s. 3, Workmen's Compensation Act—Tests to determine whether accident arose out of employment—Balance of probabilities as to whether death caused by accident or design—Presumption to be drawn in such case—Inference of accidental death whether can be drawn in absence of evidence of eye-witness—Whether s. 108, Indian Evidence Act exhaustive of circumstances in which death can be inferred.

The words "accident arising out of employment" in s. 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, mean that there should be a direct connection between the accident and the employment. If the accident has occurred on account of a risk which is an incident of the employment, the claim for compensation must succeed, unless the workman has exposed himself to an added peril by his own imprudent act.

It is open to a Court to find on an inference that the accident arose out of employment though no human being was present who could give direct evidence how and when the accident happened.

The expression "out of employment" is not confined to the nature of the employment, but applies to the employment as such—to its nature, its conditions, its obligations and its incidents. If by reason of any of these, the workman is brought within the zone of special danger or is injured or killed, the accident would be one arising out of employment. If the employment brings the workman within or allows him to be within proximity of the peril to which the injury or death can properly be ascribed, the accident can be said to have arisen out of employment.

If the workman is properly in a place to which some risk attaches and an accident occurs which is capable of being attributed to a risk which is ordinarily inherent in the discharge of his duties, it is legitimate, notwithstanding the absence of evidence as regards the immediate circumstances of the accident, to attribute the accident to the risk and to hold that it arose out of employment.

It is not necessary to prove that the workman was engaged in a particular duty in the discharge of which he was at a particular spot where the accident happened. By the place of danger is meant not a particular spot of danger but the entire place, as for example, the ship or the train.

A seaman's employment puts him in a dangerous position, the ship on high seas or in deep waters being a place to which some risk is incidental. There are perils, surrounding the seaman's life and duty, which are inherent in his employment.

As the employment of a seaman, by the very nature of it, exposes him to certain dangers, whether at work or not, as for example, the danger of falling overboard or being swept overboard, there is a prima facie presumption, if death by drowning be proved, that the death was caused by an accident which arose out of employment.

The presumption thus arising can be rebutted by the employer by leading evidence of facts and circumstances showing that the workman had at or about the time of his death departed from the controlling incidents of his employment or that he had added to the peril by his own imprudent act.

Bender v. Owners of Steamship Zent,¹ Marshall v. Owners of Steamship Wild Rose,² Marshall v. Owners of S. S. Wild Rose,³ Swansea Vale (Owners) v. Rice,⁴ Kerr or Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Company, Limited,⁵ Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair,⁶ *Simpson v. L.M. & S.Ry. Co.*⁷ and Rosen v. S. S. "Quercus", (Owners),⁸ referred to.

Where there is a balance of probabilities as to whether death is caused by accident or by design and there is no clear evidence as to the cause of death, death must be presumed to be accidental. An innocent cause of death must be preferred to a cause which, if accepted, would lead to an inference of crime.

Harvey v. Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation,⁹ *Bender v. Owners of Steamship Zent*¹⁰ and Ranjanibai v. New India Assurance Co.,¹¹ referred to.

Whether an inference of accidental death can properly arise must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of each individual case. But the view that one cannot hold a death to be accidental unless there is an eye-witness to the accident is a rigorous view of the rules of evidence and will defeat the protection afforded to the workers in a large number of cases, especially in cases of seamen whose death is caused by drowning.

Section 108 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, is not exhaustive of the circumstances in which death can be inferred. There may be cases in which death cannot be presumed under s. 108 of the Act, as for example, cases in which a person has not been heard of for less than seven years and yet the fact of death can be inferred from the circumstances of the case.

Under the first proviso of s. 30(1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, the High Court has no jurisdiction to interfere with the decision of the Commissioner if the questions raised in appeal are pure questions of fact, or even if the appeal raises but a settled question of law.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

J. I. Mehta, with B. M. Madnani, for the appellant.

S. J. Sorabjee, instructed by Crawford Bayley & Co., for the respondents.

CHANDRACHUD J. The application filed by the appellant for compensation for the death of his son, a seaman, has been dismissed by the learned Additional Commissioner for Workmen's Compensation, Bombay, on the ground mainly that neither the fact of death nor that it occurred on account of an accident arising out of employment is proved. The facts leading to the application are few, and indeed it is a matter of common experience in cases of 'unexplained accidents', that the paucity of material is due partly to the fact that in the very nature of things the heirs of a deceased seaman can have no personal knowledge of the circumstances in which the death of the seaman was caused and partly due to the apathy of the Shippers to lead oral evidence of the relevant facts and circumstances.

Shaikh Hassan Ibrahim was employed as a deck-hand, a seaman of category II on the ship S.S. 'Dwarka', which is owned by the British India Steam Navigation Co. Ltd., of which the respondents Messrs. Mackinnon Mackenzie & Co. (Pvt.), Ltd. are the agents. The medical log book of the ship shows that on December 13, 1961, Shaikh Hassan complained of pain in the chest and was therefore examined, but nothing abnormal was detected clinically. The Medical Officer on board the ship prescribed some tablets for Shaikh Hassan and he reported fit for work on the next day. On the 15th, however, he complained of insomnia and pain in the chest, for which the Medical Officer prescribed sedative tablets. The official log book of the ship shows that on the 16th when the ship was in the Persian Gulf, Shaikh Hassan was seen near the bridge of the ship at about 2.30 a.m. He was sent back, but at 3 a.m. he was seen on the Tween Deck when he told a seaman on duty that he was going to bed. At 6.15 a.m. he was found missing and a search was undertaken. At 7.15 a.m. a radio message was sent by the Master of the ship saying:

"One Seaman missing between Khorramshahr and Ashar Stop May be in river Stop All ships please keep look out."

The ship arrived alongside Ashar Jetty at 8 a.m. when a representative of the respondents was informed that Shaikh Hassan was missing. The representative in turn passed on the information to the local Police and the Port authorities. The last entry in the log book shows that at 4 p.m. an inquiry was held on board the ship by the local Police and the British Consul-General. On a suggestion made by the latter, the personal effects of the missing seaman were checked and sealed by the Consulate authorities for being deposited with the Shipping Master, Bombay. On February 20, 1962, the appellant filed an application under s. 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Central Act VIII of 1923), claiming compensation of Rs. 4,000 for the death of his son, which according to him, occurred on account of a personal injury caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

The respondents disputed the appellant's claim on the ground, amongst others, that there was nothing to show that the seaman was in fact dead, that the death, if any, was not caused in the course of the employment, that in any event the death could not be said to have been caused by an accident which arose out of employment and that the probabilities were more consistent with a suicidal death than with an accidental death.

The parties did not lead oral evidence at the trial of the claim. The learned Additional Commissioner has held on such facts and circumstances as appeared to him undisputed and indisputable, that there was no evidence to show that the seaman was dead and there was in any view no evidence to justify the inference that the death of the seaman was caused by an accident which arose out of employment. The learned Additional Commissioner has, however, negatived the contention of the respondents that the death, if any, was caused by the seaman's voluntary act.

Before I deal with the main issues arising on this appeal, it is necessary to refer to the first proviso of s. 30(I) of the Workmen's Compensation Act under which no appeal can lie to the High Court against an order passed by the Commissioner unless a substantial question of law is involved in the appeal. If the questions raised in the appeal are pure questions of fact, or even if the appeal raises but a settled question of law, the High Court has no jurisdiction to interfere with the decision of the Commissioner. In my opinion, however, the judgment of the learned Additional Commissioner suffers from errors of law so serious, so substantial that interference with the view expressed by him seems inevitable.

The learned Additional Commissioner has held that the death of the seaman is not proved, because, firstly, there is no evidence that he fell overboard or was drowned and, secondly, because the period for which the seaman was not heard of was much too short to raise a presumption under s. 108 of the Indian Evidence Act. This approach, in my opinion, is erroneous, because in order to find that the seaman is dead, it is not necessary that there should be direct or positive evidence that he was seen falling overboard or being drowned; nor indeed is s. 108 of the Evidence Act exhaustive of the circumstances in which death can be inferred. There may be cases in which death cannot be presumed under s. 108, as for example, cases in which a person has not been heard of for less than seven years and yet the fact of death can be inferred from the circumstances of the case. As the learned Additional Commissioner, in dealing with the fact of death, restricted himself to a consideration of the presumption arising under s. 108 of the Evidence Act and as he wrongly assumed that without that presumption and without direct evidence of death, one cannot hold that the death is proved, it would be necessary to consider whether on the record as it stands, the death of the seaman can be held proved.

On my part, I see no difficulty in inferring that the seaman is in fact dead. That he was on board the ship on December 16, 1961, is admitted. The medical log book maintained on the ship shows that he was indisposed on the 13th and the 15th and that certain medicines were prescribed for him. The ship's log book, which is signed by the Mate and the Master shows that in the early hours of the morning of the 16th the seaman was seen first near the bridge and then on the Tween Deck of the ship. The log book further shows that at 6-15 a.m. a Deck Sarang informed the Chief Officer of the ship that the seaman was missing, whereupon an immediate search was made to find him. As soon as it appeared that he was not on board, a radio message was sent saying that the seaman was missing between Khorramshahr and Ashar, that he might be in the river and that the ships round about should be on the look out for him. As the seaman could not be traced, intimation was given to the respondent's representatives at 8 a.m. and an official inquiry was held on board the ship by the local Police and the British Consul-General at 4 p.m. The last entry in the log book shows that the "personal effects" of the seaman were checked and sealed by the Consulate authorities for being deposited with the Shipping Master, Bombay.

These facts, in my opinion, must raise an inference that the seaman died by being drowned on or about December 16, 1961. The faint suggestion made by Mr. Sorabji, who appears on behalf of the respondents, that the seaman may have swam to safety seems to me too brave to be true. The physical condition of the seaman on the eve of his being found missing as reflected in the medical log book, would in any event render such a possibility too far beyond his endurance.

The next question for decision is whether the seaman died an accidental death. The approach of the learned Additional Commissioner to this question also is erroneous. In para. 9 of his judgment the learned Additional Commissioner has indicated the reason why it was difficult to presume that the death of the seaman was caused accidentally. The difficulty which was felt was that there was no evidence to show how, when and from which place the seaman fell into the sea. In my opinion, the absence of direct evidence showing that the seaman was doing a particular type of work at a particular time at a particular place or that he fell into the sea in a particular manner cannot conclude the question whether he died an accidental death. The view taken by the learned Additional Commissioner can more frankly be expressed by saying that you cannot hold a death to be accidental unless there is an eye-witness to the accident. In my opinion, such a rigorous view of the rules of evidence will defeat the protection afforded to the workers in a large number of cases, especially in cases of seamen, and I see no reason why a Court of facts should not draw an inference, if the facts and circumstances of the case justify it, that the death of the workman occurred on account of an accident. I do not suggest that in every case in which a seaman is found missing he must be presumed to be dead nor that in every case in which a seaman dies a death by drowning must he be presumed to have died an accidental death. Whether an inference of accidental death can properly arise must necessarily depend upon the circumstances of each individual case, but I do not agree that the death of a workman cannot be held to have been caused by an accident unless there is direct evidence to establish the accident.

From such facts as appear on the record, it would, in my opinion, be legitimate to infer that the seaman died an accidental death. There is no dispute that at about 6-15 a.m. he was found missing from the ship when the ship was in the deep waters of a navigable river. The death of the seaman, which I have already held proved, could be caused either by his own act or by the act of some other person or by accident. The learned Additional Commissioner has negatived the possibility of a suicidal death, after taking into account the circumstances that the seaman was suffering from insomnia and was seen on the Tween Deck at an odd hour of the night. I agree with that view. As regards the possibility of a homicidal death, if the choice is between death by accident and death by design, there must be a presumption in favour of an accidental death, for, as observed in *Harvey v. Ocean Accident and Guarantee Corporation*¹, which was a case of death by drowning,

"the death can only be reasonably accounted for in one of the two ways—immersion in the water by accident or design; and an innocent cause ought to be presumed as against what would be prima facie a crime. There is ample authority that the presumption against crime is applicable in a civil action."

In *Bender v. Owners of Steamship Zent*² in which a chief cook was lost overboard on high seas, the possibility of suicide was excluded by Farwell L.J. on the ground

"...suicide being a crime, the presumption is against it."

Finally in *Ranjanbhai v. New India Assurance Co.*³ it was held by a learned Single Judge of this Court in the case of a death by fall from the fourth floor of a building, that though there is no presumption in law of an accidental death in the abstract, where it is proved that a person died of a cause such as drowning or a fall, presumption against violence or suicide must be raised and in the absence of evidence in rebuttal, the presumption must be allowed to prevail. In the case before me, suicide has been negatived on facts by the learned Additional Commissioner, and very rightly. Even otherwise, the possibility that the death of the seaman was caused by design, that is to say, by the commission or attempted commission of a crime must be excluded, for if there is a balance of probabilities and if there is no clear evidence as to the cause of death, death shall have to be presumed to be accidental. An innocent cause of death must be preferred to a cause which, if accepted, would lead to an inference of crime. As regards the possibility of homicidal death, in addition to there being a presumption against it, Mr. Sorabjee has very fairly conceded that it is not possible in this case to suggest that the seaman was murdered. As death by suicide or murder has thus to be excluded, I am of the opinion that the seaman must be held to have died an accidental death. This conclusion emerges not only out of a process of elimination—a process, by which the only two other possibilities in which death may have been caused can be reasonably excluded—but the conclusion would seem to accord best with the broad probabilities of the case.

Having cleared the initial ground as regards the fact of death and whether the death was caused by accident or by design, it is necessary now to consider the two main questions which arise under s. 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Act: whether the accident arose in the course of employment and whether it arose out of employment. As stated in Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd edn., Vol. 34, p. 823, para. 1161.

"The words 'in the course of the employment' mean in the course of the work which the workman is employed to do and what is incidental to it."

It is unnecessary to cite other authorities on what is the true connotation of the phrase "in the course of employment", for the position stated in Halsbury is accepted generally as containing the correct exposition of law. The question whether the death arose in this case in the course of employment does not present any difficulty, because it is inherent in the very nature of a seaman's employment that to be able to discharge the duties assigned to him, he must be on board the ship during a voyage, at all hours of the day and night. Seamen, therefore, sign for the whole voyage and are deemed under the terms of their employment to be on duty at all times during the voyage. Section 101 of the 1 (1905) 2 I.R. 1, at p. 37.

2 [1909] 2 K.B. 41.

Merchant Shipping Act (Central Act XLIV of 1958) provides that an agreement with the crew shall be in the prescribed form and the statutory form of contract would show that under the contract of his employment a seaman is on duty all through the voyage for which he has signed, though for convenience, the timings of his actual duty may be limited to specified hours of the day and night. It is interesting, though it cannot by itself decide the point, that amongst the several authorities cited at the Bar, there is none in which it was suggested that the death of a seaman, which occurred during the course of a voyage when the seaman was on board the ship, did not occur in the course of employment. As observed by Fletcher Moulton L.J. in *Marshall v. Owners of Steamship Wild Rose*⁴

"...Seamen in their employment are necessarily on board continuously, by which I mean that not only when they are employed in active work about the ship, but also in the intervals between their active employment, they must be upon the ship. Therefore I have no doubt that the leisure of a sailor on board the vessel is as much in the course of his employment as the time which he spends in active work."

In my opinion it being clear in this case that the seaman died during the course of voyage, his death must be held to have occurred during the course of his employment.

The decision of the second question whether the death of the seaman occurred on account of an accident which arose out of his employment is rendered somewhat difficult by a marked conflict of views expressed by the English Judges. Counsel for either side contends that the conflict is resolved by the House of Lords, but the respective submissions as to how the conflict is resolved are widely divergent. Ultimately, after a discussion of the authorities, it may be necessary to remind oneself of the warning uttered by Viscount Dunedin in *Simpson v. L. M. & S. Ry. Co.*⁵ that decided cases are only useful so far as they lay down principles, but it is no use trying to decide a case simply by looking at other cases and then inquiring which case most resembles the present on the facts.

As regards the second requirement that the death must be caused by an accident arising out of employment, it is not always possible to keep this and the first requirement entirely separate. The words "arising out of employment" are understood to mean, as stated in Halsbury, that "during the course of the employment, injury has resulted from some risk incident to the duties of the service, which, unless engaged in the duty owing to the master, it is reasonable to believe the workman would not otherwise have suffered." (p. 823).

The same thought has been variously expressed by different authorities, the choice of language being influenced by subjective considerations. It is, for example, said that there must be a causal relationship between the accident and the employment; or that the accident must arise directly out of the fulfilment of the conditions of service; or that the nature, conditions, obligations and incidents of employment must all be considered and if, by reason of any of these factors, the workman is brought within the zone of special danger, the injury would be one which arises 'out of employment'. Phrases apart, the essence of the matter is that there should be a direct connection between the accident and the employment. If the accident has occurred on account of a risk which is an incident of the employment, the claim for compensation must succeed, unless, of course, the workman has exposed himself to an added peril by his own imprudent act.

The question to consider therefore is whether the seaman died in this case on account of an accident which is directly connected with his employment, an accident which occurred on account of a risk incidental to his employment. Having held that he died an accidental death by drowning during the course of his employment, the question for consideration is whether the accidental death by drowning is due to a risk which is an incident of the seaman's employment.

4 [1909] 2 K.B. 46, at p. 49.

5 [1931] A.C. 351, at p. 357.

It is contended by Mr. Sorabji for the respondents that there is no inherent risk of drowning in a sailor's profession, that there is not even a general risk of drowning incidental to a sailor's employment and, therefore, the death in this case cannot be said to have occurred on account of an accident "arising out of employment." It is urged that in the absence of such general risk, it is obligatory on the appellant to establish the precise circumstances in which the death of his son was caused, for every death, which occurs in the course of employment, does not necessarily occur out of employment. On the other hand, it is contended by Mr. Mehta, who appears on behalf of the appellant, that the risk of drowning is incidental to a sailor's employment, and if a sailor is proved to have died accidentally by drowning during the course of his employment, the burden is on the employer to establish that the accident did not arise out of employment. In support of these rival contentions, my attention has been drawn by the learned counsel to several decisions dealing with cases of unexplained deaths, the more important of which are noticed below.

In Bender v. Owners of Steamship Zent,⁶ no one knew how the chief cook of the ship was lost overboard when the ship was in mid-ocean. The chief cook was seen at 5.25 a.m. standing in the port alleyway and he was last seen at 5.35 a.m. going towards the water closet. His absence was discovered at 6.20 a.m. when he was wanted by the Chief Steward. The County Court Judge made an award in favour of the dependants, holding that the death of the cook was caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. In an appeal by the employers, it was held that it was open to a Court to find on an inference that an accident arose out of employment though no human being was present who could give direct evidence how and when the accident happened. On the facts, however, it was concluded that the circumstances of the case did not justify the inference that the accident arose out of employment.

In the same volume is reported another case: *Marshall v. Owners of Steamship Wild Rose*⁷ which was decided by the same three learned Judges, namely, Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Fletcher Moulton L.J. and Farwell L.J., who had decided the Zent case. The Wild Rose case is one of an unexplained accident which occurred while the ship was in the harbour. The second engineer of a steam trawler 'Wild Rose' was seen on board the ship at about 9 p.m. He came out of his berth, went on deck, and, as he passed the first engineer, said that he was going on deck for a breath of fresh air. He was found missing at midnight and his body was discovered next morning just under the place where the staff of the ship usually sat. The decision of the County Court Judge that the accident arose out of employment was reversed in appeal on the view that the unexplained drowning of a sailor by a fall from his ship when at sea, is not by itself sufficient to justify the inference that the accident arose out of employment. The learned Judges followed their earlier decision in the Zent case observing that they were bound by it as there was no distinction between the facts of the two cases. In his concurring judgment Fletcher Moulton L.J. expressed the hope that the point involved in the case would go to the highest Tribunal so that one may have directions upon the question whether because a seaman's employment puts him in a dangerous position, that is to say, on board the ship surrounded by water as opposed to being on land, the mere fact that he is drowned while the ship is at sea is sufficient to raise a prima facie presumption that the death by drowning arose out of employment.

The decision of the Court of Appeal was taken to the House of Lords and is reported in Marshall v. Owners of S. S. Wild Rose.⁸ The House of Lords affirmed the decision by a majority of 3:2 on the view that there was no evidence to show that the engineer's death was caused by an accident arising out of employment. Lord Atkinson, Lord Shaw and Lord Mersey delivered three separate but concurring judgments and the minority view was expressed by Lord Loreburn L.C. and Lord James. In his dissenting judgment Lord Loreburn

L.C. expressed the view that the employment of the engineer, by the very nature of it, exposed him to certain dangers whether at work or not, one of which was falling or being washed off his ship; and if in the course of that employment the man being on the ship accidentally perishes by one of those dangers, the accident arose out of employment. Lord James, who concurred with Lord Loreburn L.C., observes in his judgment that the accident had occurred during the employment under circumstances which showed that the injured person had not at the time of the injury departed from the controlling incidents of the employment and it was for the employers to establish that the accident did not arise out of employment. Since the employer failed to discharge that burden, the death, according to Lord James, occurred out of employment. Lord Atkinson, who delivered the leading judgment of the majority, took the view that it could not be held that the risk of falling into the water was a risk incident to or connected with the employment of the engineer while his ship was in port,

"though it may well be that the risk of being blown or swept overboard or of falling overboard while his ship was at sea was such a risk."

Lord Shaw also observes in his majority judgment that (p. 495)

"...Had the ship been at sea one could have understood the answer better, because the sailor might have been pitched overboard by the rolling of the vessel or blown overboard by the wind. These would have been the perils surrounding the seaman's life and duty, and injuries or accident through them might well enough be held to fall within the category of things arising out of and in the course of the employment. But in the present case such a question does not arise, for the ship was lying quietly in port." Lord Mersey, who delivered a separate judgment concurring with the view of Lord Atkinson and Lord Shaw, has made an observation while concluding his judgment that he did not regard the case as laying down any general principle and that it turned entirely on its particular facts.

It seems to me clear from the majority judgment of the House of Lords that though the decision of the Court of Appeal was affirmed, it was not affirmed for the reason that no risk attaches to a sailor's employment. The judgments of Lord Atkinson and Lord Shaw show that a distinction was drawn between the ship being at port and the ship being at sea, and the conclusion that the death of the engineer did not arise out of his employment was influenced largely by the consideration that the ship was at port. In the case before me the death of the seaman occurred when the ship was in the deep waters of a navigable river and Mr. Mehta seems to me right in his contention that the majority decision far from being against him would support his contention that the death must in this case be held to have arisen out of employment.

In *Swansea Vale (Owners) v. Rice*⁹, William Rice the first mate of the ship died an unexplained death when he was on the steamship Swansea. On June 28, 1909, the ship sailed for Algiers on her maiden voyage. On June 30, at 4 a.m., Rice complained to the captain of giddiness and took a dose of castor oil. He then went on deck for the purpose of keeping his watch. He would have been on duty from 4 a.m. to 8 a.m. and in the performance of his duty he would be sometimes on the bridge and sometimes on deck superintending the work of the watch. The weather was fair but hazy and the sea was calm. Rice was seen on the bridge at about 7 a.m., but nothing was known of him afterwards. The County Court Judge made an award in favour of the dependants of Rice, which was upheld by the Court of Appeal by a majority of 2:1. Cozens-Hardy M.R., and Fletcher Moulton L.J., constituted the majority, and Buckley L.J. expressed the dissenting opinion. The House of Lords upheld the view of the majority of the Court of Appeal, holding that there was sufficient ground for inferring that the first mate accidentally fell overboard and met his death by accident arising out of his employment. The decision of the Court of Appeal in Bender v. Owners of Steamship Zent and of the House of Lords in Marshall v. Owners of S. S. Wild Rose were cited before the learned Law Lords, but these decisions were held peculiar to their facts. Lord Loreburn L.C., who delivered the leading opinion, observes in his judgment (p. 239):

"...In the present case employment on board ship necessarily exposed this unfortunate man to the danger of falling overboard", and that

"...if you weigh the probabilities one way or the other, the probabilities are far greater that this man perished through an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment."

Lord Shaw, who was a party to the majority judgment in Marshall v. Owners of S. S. Wild Rose, observes in his judgment in this case that few cases arise in ordinary life, or in the Law Courts, in which analogy is complete and that in his judgment in the Wild Rose case he had specially reserved the incidents of a sailor whose life was sacrificed under circumstances of mystery. The unanimous judgment of the House of Lords in the Swansea Vale case shows, in my opinion, a distinct swing of the pendulum in favour of the view that the risk of falling overboard is an incident of the sailor's employment and that if the death of a sailor occurs by drowning in mysterious circumstances, the death can be justifiably held to arise out of employment.

In *Kerr or Lendrum v. Ayr Steam Shipping Company, Limited*¹⁰, Lendrum was employed on the steamship Turnberry as a cook and steward. On the morning of December 16, 1911, the ship was lying in the harbour of Larne, and was to sail at 6 p.m. At about 4 p.m. the Captain of the ship told Lendrum, who was resting in his bunk, to prepare and serve tea to the crew before the ship sailed. The Captain afterwards asked the Chief Officer to see if Lendrum was getting the tea ready but the Chief Officer reported to the Captain that he could not find Lendrum in the ship. Lendrum's disappearance from the ship was at once reported to the Police and his dead body dressed in his day underclothes was found next day in the sea. The dead body bore no marks of violence. The evidence showed that Lendrum was a good tempered and sociable man who was subjected to attacks of nausea and sickness. It was held by the House of Lords by a majority of 3:2 that there was evidence to support the finding of the arbitrator that Lendrum had met his death by accident arising out of his employment. Earl Loreburn, Lord Shaw and Lord Parmoor have delivered separate but concurring speeches of the majority, whereas Lord Dunedin and Lord Atkinson have expressed the dissenting opinion. Mr. Sorabji may perhaps be right that this decision would not help the appellant, because the majority view largely rests on the circumstance that the arbitrator having taken a particular view, which was supportable on evidence, it was not open to the House of Lords to take a contrary view of facts. It is, however, important that the evidence on which the arbitrator took the view that the death of the cook arose out of employment was not the direct or positive evidence of any witness who had seen how the death had occurred but was merely evidence of circumstances from which a fair inference could be drawn that the death arose out of employment. It would be useful in this regard to refer to a part of the speech of Earl Loreburn, which reads thus (p. 223):

"This man was in his bed, and a few minutes afterwards he was in the water. Murder is negatived. Suicide is negatived. There is absolutely nothing that points to either. No suggestion was made either of the one or the other, and the arbiter has negatived both. The man was on the ship, a place of some danger if you are careless, in pursuance of his duty. It was not found that he had withdrawn himself from his duty. I really do not know whether he fell overboard because he was trying to vomit over the ship's side. I conclude that he must have fallen over by accident while on board as his duty required."

Lord Shaw emphasises like Earl Loreburn, that the question whether the death of the cook arose out of employment was for the Tribunal of facts to decide and since there was evidence to justify the view taken by that Tribunal, it was not for the House of Lords to take a different view of the evidence. Lord Shaw, however, observes in his speech that were it not that two of his colleagues had expressed a different view, he would say that it was difficult to conceive of a fairer case for the inference that the death had occurred out of employment. Lord Atkinson, who delivered the dissenting speech, has distinguished the Swansea Vale case on the ground that there an officer in a sick and giddy condition was sent to perform duties which would necessitate his being sometimes on the bridge of the ship and sometimes on the deck of the ship. His Lordship took the view that there was no evidence to justify the finding of the arbiter that the death of the cook arose out of his employment and, therefore, the award was liable to be set aside.

*Thom or Simpson v. Sinclair*¹¹ is the case of a woman employed by a fish-curer, who while working in a shed belonging to her employer, was injured by the fall of a wall which was being built on the property of an adjoining proprietor. As a result of the wall falling, the roof of the shed collapsed and the woman was buried under the wreckage. It was held by the House of Lords that the accident arose out of the employment of the woman. It would be useful to draw attention to a passage in the speech of Lord Shaw which is to the following effect (p. 142):

"There may be causes of danger arising to all employees, which causes are not confined to the individual situation, but are general and applicable to the employment as a whole. It may be that that employment is underground, with all the risks attached to underground work. It may be in the air or on the sea, with a special exposure to the dangers relative to such elements; or it may be on the surface of the earth, in surroundings which are those of peril. In all such cases it is quite possible to figure injuries by accident in the course of and arising out of the employment, which are totally disconnected with the nature of the employment upon which the workman was generally or for the moment engaged, but which, without any doubt, sprang from the employment in the sense that it was on account of the obligations or conditions thereof, and on that account alone, that he incurred the danger. In short, my view of the statute is that the expression 'arising out of the employment' is not confined to the mere 'nature of the employment.' The expression, in my opinion, applies to the employment as such—to its nature, its conditions, its obligations, and its incidents. If by reason of any of these the workman is brought within the zone of special danger and so injured or killed, it appears to me that the broad words of the statute 'arising out of the employment' apply."

The decisions which I have discussed above and many others have been considered by the House of Lords in *Simpson v. L. M. & S. Ry. Co.*¹² In that case, a railway guard, who was asked to travel from Glasgow to Gourock in order to take charge of a train at Gourock, entered a railway compartment at Glasgow. When the train arrived at Gourock, the guard was found missing and his articles were found in the compartment. The compartment had its left door shut, but the window was open. The guard was subsequently discovered lying unconscious in a tunnel between Glasgow and Gourock, and he soon died from a fractured skull, without recovering consciousness. In a claim filed by his dependants for compensation, the arbitrator negatived violence and suicide and found that the man had met his death by falling accidentally from the window of the compartment. The arbitrator concluded from this circumstance that the accident had arisen out of employment. The arbitrator stated a special case to the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, which took a contrary view and held that there was nothing to show that the accident had arisen out of employment. In appeal, the House of Lords upheld, by a unanimous judgment, the view of the arbitrator. Viscount Duncedin has examined in his speech an array of cases bearing on the subject, including the Zent case, the Wild Rose case, the Swansea Vale case, Simpson's case and Lendrum's case. He has expressed his conclusion at page 365 by saying that if the deceased was in the course of his employment and if there are facts from which it may be deduced that his employment brought him within, or allowed him to be within, proximity of the peril to which his death could properly be ascribed, and the arbitrator comes to the conclusion that the accident which causes death arises out of, as well as in the course of, his employment, his judgment should not be disturbed. In the concluding portion of his speech Viscount Dunedin says at page 366 that the presence of the guard in the compartment was due to the orders which he had received, that the door and the window of a railway compartment are dangerous places in the same sense as the bulwark of a ship is a dangerous place and that these circumstances justified the finding of the arbitrator that the accident arose out of employment. Lord Tomlin deduces in his concurring judgment the ratio of the cases which he has discussed thus (p. 369) :

12 [1931] A.C. 351.

"Now, my Lords, from these passages to which I have referred I think this rule may be deduced for application to that class of case which may be called unexplained accident cases—namely, that where the evidence establishes that in the course of his employment the workman was properly in a place to which some risk particular thereto attaches and an accident occurs capable of explanation solely by reference to that risk, it is legitimate, notwithstanding the absence of evidence as to the immediate circumstances of the accident, to attribute the accident to that risk, and to hold that the accident arose out of the employment; but the inference as to the origin of the accident may be displaced by evidence tending to show that the accident was due to some action of the workman outside the scope of the employment.

Such a rule so stated seems to me to be consistent with all the previous decisions of Your Lordships' House, including Marshall v. Owners of S. S. Wild Rose, where there was some evidence from which it could be inferred that the seaman who fell overboard had by action of his own outside his employment added a peril to his position."

On the factual aspect of the case, Lord Tomlin took the view that the findings of the arbitrator would justify the inference that at the time of the accident the deceased was travelling in the railway carriage in the course of his employment,

"subject to the inherent risks, slight though they may ordinarily be, of falling from the carriage through insecurely fastened doors or open windows."

Lord Thankerton has also discussed in his concurring judgment, leading cases on the subject of unexplained deaths and he expresses his view by saying that (p. 371) :

"...if the accident is shown to have happened while the deceased was in the course of his employment and at a place where he was discharging the duties of his employment, and the accident is capable of being attributed to a risk which is ordinarily inherent in the discharge of such duties, the arbitrator is entitled to infer, in the absence of any evidence tending to an opposite conclusion, that the accident arose out of the employment."

On the facts of the particular case, Lord Thankerton expressed the opinion that the deceased met with the accident while he was on duty, that it was possible for a railway passenger without any abnormal conduct on his part to fall through an open window or through an insecurely fastened door of a train by pure accident and that the arbitrator was justified on consideration of these circumstances in taking the view that the accident arose out of employment.

This case, in my opinion, is important from more than one point of view. In the first place, it facilitates a clearer understanding of the earlier decisions and it shows that some of the decisions, in which the unexplained accidents were held not to arise out of employment, were confined to their own peculiar facts. Secondly, even a railway compartment was held to be a place which was subject to some inherent risk, slight though it may ordinarily be. Then again, it is not the particular seat near the door nor the window which was held to be a place to which some risk was incidental but the entire compartment was held to be such a place. Thirdly, the decision contains the formulation of a unanimous ratio that if the workman was properly in a place to which some risk attaches and an accident occurs capable of explanation solely by reference to that risk, it is legitimate, notwithstanding the absence of evidence as regards the immediate circumstances of the accident, to attribute the accident to that risk and hold that the accident arose out of employment.

The last of the decisions cited at the Bar is Rosen v. S. S. "Quercus" (Owners).¹³ In that case a fireman who was employed on a steamship was permitted to sleep on the deck, when the ship was moored to a quay in the port. On the night of February 7, 1931, he slept on the deck, and on the following day his dead body was found in the water. There was no evidence whatsoever showing that he was on duty during the night. There was also no suggestion of suicide or murder or of the man being drunk. The application filed by the dependants for compensation was dismissed by the County Court Judge on the view that he could not infer from the facts that the accident arose out of the man's employment. This view was upheld by the Court of Appeal. The House of Lords, however, set aside the decision by a unanimous judgment and remitted the matter to the County Court Judge for a fresh decision, in the light of the observations made by it. Lord Buckmaster, with whom Lord Warrington, Lord Tomlin, Lord Russel and Lord Wright concurred, observes in his speech that if the County Court Judge were to hold, on a consideration of the evidence, that the accident did not arise out of the employment of the deceased, it would have been impossible for the House to interfere with that decision. The County Court Judge, however, had held that he was bound to come to the conclusion to which he came as there was no evidence to show that the deceased was at the spot where he fell overboard in the discharge of some duty which he owed to the owners of the ship. Commenting on this view, Lord Buckmaster observes in his speech (p. 497):

"...If that once be accepted as the true meaning of his award, I do not think that even counsel for the respondents would urge that the award could stand."

The County Court Judge seems to have been largely influenced in his decision by the observations of Lord Thankerton in Simpson v. L. M. & S. Ry. Co. at p. 371 that the accident can be held to have arisen out of employment if the deceased was "at a place where he was discharging the duties of his employment" and the accident is capable of being attributed to a risk, which is ordinarily inherent in the discharge of such duties. In rejecting the view of the learned Judge of the County Court that by "place" was meant the actual spot where the deceased was working, Lord Buckmaster says (p. 497):

"That is, of course, perfectly true if the word 'place' be regarded in this case as the ship, and in the case of the railway as the train, but if it is meant that when a man is on a train or on a ship and an accident occurs, it is necessary to establish some particular duty in the discharge of which he was at the particular spot where the accident happened, I think that is a misinterpretation of what the learned Lord meant, and is not in accordance with the decision."

At page 499, Lord Buckmaster deals with the decision of the Court of Appeal which, while affirming the decision of the County Court Judge, had observed that the deceased

"...must have been doing something which was not involved in or necessary to his sleeping on the deck and not involved in the duty, for at the time he was not operating in any duty."

This, according to Lord Buckmaster, was a clear misunderstanding of the true position. He observes (p. 499):

"...the true position,....I think, is laid down in clear terms in the opinion expressed by Lord Tomlin in the case of Simpson v. L. M. & S. Ry. Co. at p. 369 where he says this: 'Where the evidence establishes that in the course of his employment the workman was properly in a place to which some risk particular thereto attaches'— let me pause there to say that it is quite plain from the context that the learned Lord meant by 'place' the railway train, and not a particular spot in the railway train, as in this case it would mean the ship and not a particular spot on the ship—and an accident occurs capable of explanation solely by reference to that risk, it is legitimate, notwithstanding the absence of evidence as to the immediate circumstances of the accident, to attribute the accident to that 'risk'...."

These then are the more important of the decisions to which my attention has been drawn by the learned counsel. On a consideration of these decisions it would, I think, be possible to deduce the following propositions.

(1) It is open to a Court to find on an inference that the accident arose out of employment though no human being was present who could give direct evidence how and when the accident happened.

(2) The expression 'out of employment' is not confined to the nature of the employment, but applies to employment as such—to its nature, its conditions, its obligations and its incidents. If by reason of any of these, the workman is brought within the zone of special danger or is injured or killed, the accident would be one arising out of employment. In other words, if the employment brings the workman within or allows him to be within proximity of the peril to which the injury or death can properly be ascribed, the accident can be said to have arisen out of employment.

(3) If the workman is properly in a place to which some risk attaches and an accident occurs which is capable of being attributed to a risk which is ordinarily inherent in the discharge of his duties, it is legitimate, notwithstanding the absence of evidence as regards the immediate circumstances of the accident, to attribute the accident to the risk and to hold that it arose out of employment.

(4) It is not necessary to prove that the workman was engaged in a particular duty in the discharge of which he was at a particular spot where the accident happened. By the place of danger is meant not a particular spot of danger but the entire place, as for example, the ship or the train.

(5) A seaman's employment puts him in a dangerous position, the ship on high seas or in deep waters being a place to which some risk is incidental. There are perils, surrounding the seaman's life and duty, which are inherent in his employment.

(6) As the employment of a seaman, by the very nature of it, exposes him to certain dangers, whether at work or not, as for example, the danger of falling overboard or being swept overboard, there is a prima facie presumption, if death by drowning be proved, that the death was caused by an accident which arose out of employment.

(7) The presumption thus arising can be rebutted by the employer by leading evidence of facts and circumstances showing that the workman had at or about the time of his death departed from the controlling incidents of his employment or that he had added to the peril by his own imprudent act.

Applying these tests, I am of the opinion that the death of the seaman in this case must be held to have occurred on account of an accident which arose out of his employment. If one weighs the probabilities one way or the other, the probabilities are far greater that he perished through an accident arising out of his employment than that his death occurred without regard or reference to the risk inherent in his employment.

In the result, the appeal succeeds and the application for compensation is granted. Though the appellant had claimed a sum of Rs. 4,000 by way of compensation, he had agreed to accept a smaller amount from the respondents, which the latter had expressed their willingness to pay, irrespective of the result of the appeal. Since the parties have arrived at an agreement on costs, it is unnecessary to pass a separate order in that behalf.

Appeal allowed.

CRIMINAL REVISION.

Before Mr. Justice Tulzapurkar.

BASHIR HUSSEIN PESHIMAM v. H. R. JOKHI.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Secs. 173(4), 94, 96, 403(1), 252-259, 204(1)(a), 251A(1)—Accused in warrant case upon private complaint—Whether accused entitled to copies of statements and documents on which prosecution going to rely—Whether such copies to be made available on principles analogous to s. 173(4)—Prosecution witness's name disclosed after framing of charge—Maintainability of accused's application for reasonable time to prepare cross-examination of such witness—Permissibility of accused's request for roving discovery of all materials collected by prosecution during investigation—Court under s. 94 how should decide question of necessity or desirability of production of documents or thing.

Section 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, is applicable only to those cases in which the investigation has been made by a police officer and that too under Chapter XIV of the Code. Therefore, an accused person against whom a warrant case has been launched on the basis of a private complaint is not entitled as a matter of right to get copies of all the statements of witnesses whom the prosecution is going to examine and of all the documents on which the prosecution is going to rely at or before the commencement of the inquiry or the trial against him. Copies of such statements and documents cannot also be made available to the accused on principles analogous to the provisions of s. 173(4) of the Code.

Narayan Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh,¹ referred to.

In a warrant case instituted upon a private complaint if the prosecution examines any important witness whose name has been disclosed for the first time after the charge was framed and if such witness gives out a long drawn out or complicated narration, it would be open to the Magistrate to entertain or grant a request for reasonable time on the part of the accused to enable him to prepare for cross-examination of such witness.

*Emperor v. Burn*² and Emperor v. Nagindas,* referred to.

Where in such a case an offer was made by the prosecution before the Magistrate that copies of the previous statements of all witnesses who would be examined—either before a charge was framed or thereafter—would be furnished to the accused as and when the examination-in-chief of each of such witnesses was over and the documents on which the prosecution were going to rely as and when they would be tendered in evidence, Held, that such an offer met the ends of justice and fair trial.

A request made by an accused in a warrant case instituted upon a private complaint for roving discovery or fishing inspection of all the materials collected by the prosecution during investigation, irrespective of whether the prosecution was going to make use of such materials at the trial or not, on the ground that a study of such materials might be helpful to the accused in the preparation of his defence cannot be granted.

People Ex Rel. Lemon v. Supreme Court,* referred to.

Section 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, confers no right upon any party to a criminal proceeding to obtain production of any document or thing. The provisions of the section can be invoked at any stage of any investigation, inquiry or trial and they confer discretion upon the Court enabling it to order production of any document or thing. Before the Court exercises its discretion and orders the production of any document or thing under this section, it must satisfy itself that such production of the document or the thing is either necessary or desirable for the purposes of the trial and in deciding that question the Court has to exercise its discretion judicially, in the sense that it must satisfy itself that the document or the thing has a bearing upon and is relevant to the case. While deciding whether production of a document or a thing is necessary or desirable or not, the Court must take into consideration the aspect of the relevancy of such document to the issues involved in the case, but that is not the only consideration which would guide the Court for ordering production. Everything that is relevant to the facts in issue may not necessarily be either necessary or desirable for the purpose of a trial. Therefore, the relevancy of a statement or document or a thing of which production is sought would be one of the considerations which the Court will have to take into account, while deciding the question of the necessity or desirability of production of such statement, document or thing. Before ordering production of any such statement, document or thing the Court might consider whether such statement, document or thing is being suppressed or might be tampered with or destroyed by the party in whose possession it is or might be lost altogether or whether it would come before it in a normal way without resorting to the compelling processes contained in s. 94 or 96 of Chapter VII of the Code. These considerations would also weigh with the Court in exercising its judicial discretion while deciding the question whether the production of a document or a thing is either necessary or desirable for the purposes of an inquiry or trial.

TULZAPURKAR J. This criminal revision application has been preferred by the petitioner Bashir Hussein Peshimam against the order passed by the learned Presidency Magistrate, 28th Court, Esplanade, Bombay, on February 5, 1965, whereby the learned Magistrate rejected the application of the petitioner for a direction that the Special Prosecutor or the Collector of the Central Excise be directed to furnish him with copies of certain statements and documents in their possession or, in the alternative, to issue a summons under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, directing the Special Prosecutor or the Collector of Central Excise to produce such statements and documents for his inspection before the inquiry started.

The facts giving rise to the application made by the petitioner to the learned Magistrate and the order passed by the learned Magistrate thereon may be stated: On August 3, 1964, Shri H. R. Jokhi, Assistant Collector of Central Excise, Marine Preventive Division, Central Excise, Bombay, filed a complaint (being Criminal Case No. 203/W/64) in the Court of the learned Presidency Magistrate (28th Court, Esplanade, Bombay), charging the petitioner Bashir Hussein Peshimam (being accused No. 1) and eight others under s. 120B of the Indian Penal Code, under ss. 8(1) and 23 of the Sea Customs Act, 1878, as amended, under s. 167(81) of the Sea Customs Act read with ss. 109 and 114, Indian Penal Code, under ss. 8(1) and 23 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act and under ss. 120-B, Indian Penal Code read with ss. 8(1) and 23 of the Foreign Exchange Regulation Act, in respect of 77,600 tolas of gold brought into India at Bombay from places outside India between July 1960 and March 1962 in pursuance of a conspiracy. It appears that prior to the lodging of this complaint against the petitioner and eight others, under directions of Shri

H. R. Jokhi investigation had been carried on by several Customs Officers and during the course of such investigation, statements of various persons including those of the accused were recorded. Similarly, several documents and papers were seized under Panchanamas. Inter alia on February 10, 1962, the houses of accused No. 1 and accused No. 2 were searched and gold was seized from the house of accused No. 2 while a motor car bearing Registration No. BMU 7805 was seized from near the house of accused No. 1. No documents as such were seized from either of them or from any other accused during the investigation. It further appears that during the course of this investigation, reports of the investigation done from time to time and notes or note-sheets in respect thereof were submitted by the inferior officers to their superior officers. Accused No. 1 was arrested on February 22, 1962, accused No. 2 was arrested on March 3, 1962, accused No. 5 was arrested on March 14, 1962, while accused Nos. 3 and 4 were arrested on April 19, 1962. Accused Nos. 6 and 7 were required to remain present in Court on August 3, 1964, when the complaint was filed and they were put under arrest on that day. Accused Nos. 8 and 9 are still absconding. It further appears that before filing the complaint, adjudication proceedings for confiscation of the gold were undertaken and show cause notices were issued and served upon some of the accused and in particular upon the petitioner, in which diverse allegations were made against the petitioner and in the correspondence that ensued between the petitioner and/or his advocate on the one hand and the Customs Authorities and/or their advocate on the other, a request was made on behalf of the petitioner that he should be furnished with copies of all the statements of persons that had been recorded and of all the documents which had been seized during the course of investigation to enable him to show cause why the gold or the motor car should not be confiscated but that request was not acceded to. It further appears that even after the complaint was filed the petitioner through his advocate's letter dated September 17, 1964, inter alia requested for furnishing of copies of all the statements of persons recorded and of documents, and papers seized including the reports and notings made by the Customs officers and offered to pay the necessary charges therefor. By his reply dated September 22, 1964, Shri Adi P. Gandhi, the learned advocate (who appears as the Special Prosecutor in the case) stated that the petitioner was not entitled to the copies of any statements, documents etc. at that stage but without prejudice to that contention it was made clear in the said reply that the statements of such of the witnesses on which the prosecution would rely, would be tendered in evidence by way of corroboration at the time when the evidence would be led and that such of the statements of the witnesses called on which the prosecution would not rely by way of corroboration would be made available to the petitioner on his asking for the same at the time of cross-examination. It was further stated that the documents on which the prosecution would rely would be tendered at the time of leading evidence and it would be open to the petitioner to see those documents at that time for the purpose of cross-examination. In other words, the request for copies of statements and documents beforehand was turned down.

Thereafter, on January 4, 1965, the petitioner made an application to the learned Magistrate for two reliefs viz.

(a) to direct the Special Prosecutor or the Collector of Central Excise to furnish him with the copies of the statements of various witnesses whom the prosecution was going to examine and of the documents on which the prosecution was going to rely including the statements of accused persons as well as notings, note-sheets and reports of the Central Excise officers made during the course of the investigation;

(b) in the alternative, to issue a summons under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, directing the Special Prosecutor or the Collector of Central Excise to produce in Court before the inquiry starts the statements of various witnesses, whom the prosecution was going to examine as well as the documents on which the prosecution relied including the statements of the accused persons as well as the notings, note-sheets and the reports of the Central Excise Officers made during the course of the investigation of the case.

The first relief was sought by the petitioner on the ground that though the complaint had been filed as a private complaint, the complainant was a public officer (being the Central Excise Officer) and as such enjoyed all the powers which a police officer enjoyed including the powers to interrogate, arrest and carry out searches and that, therefore, the complaint filed by him should not be treated as a private complaint and, therefore, under the provisions of s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code, which would be applicable, he was entitled, before the commencement of the inquiry, to get the copies of all the statements of witnesses recorded and of all the documents on which the prosecution proposed to rely, including the statements of accused persons and even the notings, note-sheets and reports of the Central Excise Officers, in order to enable him to properly mould his defence and instruct his advocate to defend the case against him. In the alternative, the petitioner averred that in case the Court held that the complaint lodged by the Central Excise Officer was a private complaint and not a complaint lodged by any police officer, in the interest of justice and fair trial, he should be furnished with the copies of all the aforesaid statements and documents on which the prosecution was going to rely, on principles analogous to the principle contained in s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code. In further alternative, the petitioner averred that if the copies of all the statements and documents could not be furnished to him as prayed for either under the provisions of s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code or on principles analogous to the principle contained in that section, the Court should exercise its powers under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code by issuing a summons directing the Special Prosecutor or the Collector of Central Excise to produce in the Court before the inquiry starts the aforesaid statements and documents. On behalf of the prosecution, a reply was filed on January 11, 1965, wherein it was contended that the petitioner's application was misconceived inasmuch as s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code was not applicable to the facts of the case and that the copies of the statements and documents could not be ordered to be furnished to the petitioner in the interest of justice and fair trial on principles analogous to the principle contained in s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code. It was pointed out that the investigation that had preceded the lodging of the complaint was not carried on by any police officer under Chapter XIV of the Criminal Procedure Code and as such the provisions of s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code were inapplicable and further it was a warrant case instituted otherwise than on a police report and, therefore, the procedure enacted in ss. 252 to 259 under Chapter XXI of the Criminal Procedure Code was applicable and there was no provision in those sections for furnishing copies of such statements and documents on which the prosecution wanted to rely to the accused before the commencement of the inquiry or trial and having regard to the scheme of the Criminal Procedure Code no order directing the furnishing of the copies of the statements and documents to the petitioner could be made on principles analogous to the provision of s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code. As regards the petitioner's prayer for issue of a summons under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code was concerned, it was contended that the scope of s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code was very limited and it was not open to the petitioner to apply for an issue of an omnibus summons for production of statements of all witnesses and of all documents seized during the investigation including the notings, note-sheets and reports made by the Central Excise Officers. It was also contended that at the stage at which such an application was made by the petitioner, there were no materials placed before the learned Magistrate from which the learned Magistrate could come to the conclusion that production of all such statements and documents was either necessary or desirable for the purposes of the inquiry and the learned Magistrate should not exercise his discretion in favour of the petitioner. The learned Magistrate, after hearing the arguments on both the sides, took the view that

The petitioner was not entitled to get copies of all the statements of the witnesses and of all the documents on which the prosecution wanted to rely before the inquiry commenced. He held that the provisions of s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code were not applicable to the facts of the case, inasmuch as it was a warrant case instituted otherwise than upon a police report. He further negatived the petitioner's contention that copies of the statements of witnesses and the documents on which the prosecution wanted to rely should be ordered to be given to the petitioner in the interest of justice and fair trial on the grounds analogous to s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code, as in his view, Parliament while amending the Criminal Procedure Code by Act XXVI of 1955 had deemed it expedient to provide for two separate and distinct procedures for police cases and the cases filed otherwise than on police reports, and to try to act upon an analogy of s. 173(4) in cases instituted otherwise than on police reports, would result in removing the said distinction in the said procedures and it would be an action against the scheme of the Criminal Procedure Code itself. Regarding the petitioner's prayer for an issue of summons under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code, the learned Magistrate took the view that the inquiry had not even commenced before him when the application was preferred by the petitioner and hence there was absolutely no material before him at that stage to determine the necessity or desirability of a summons being issued under s. 94, especially when the application was not for a particular document or a thing but was for all documents, statements of witnesses, statements of the accused and notings, note-sheets and reports etc. He further held that the only use that could be made of any previous statement of a witness was either for the purposes of corroboration or contradiction and nothing more and since the learned Special Prosecutor had offered to make all previous statements of such of the persons who were going to be examined as prosecution witnesses in the case available to the defence after examination-in-chief of each one was over and since the Special Prosecutor had further offered to make available to the defence all such documents on which the prosecution wanted to rely at the time when they would be tendered while leading evidence, there was no question of any prejudice being caused to the petitioner or the other accused in their defence and as such no case had been made out by the petitioner for the exercise of the discretion vested in the Court under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code. In this view of the matter, the learned Magistrate rejected the petitioner's application on February 5, 1965. The petitioner has come in revision against the said order.

At the outset I may state that since I was informed at the Bar that the question involved in this revisional application has been constantly arising in several customs cases and since several cases involving this point are still pending in the Magistrates' Courts below, apart from Mr. J.M. Gandhi, who argued the revisional application on behalf of the petitioner herein with ability, I also permitted Mr. Jethmalani to intervene and put forth his submissions on the point involved in the case as Mr. Jethmalani is appearing in several customs prosecutions that are still pending in lower Courts in which a similar point has arisen. On behalf of the Customs authorities Messrs. Khandalawala and Adi P. Gandhi and Mr. Gumaste, the learned Additional Government Pleader tried to support the learned Magistrate's order on several grounds. Having regard to the rival contentions that have been put forward at the Bar the following three questions arise for determination in the case: First, whether an accused person against whom a warrant case has been launched on the basis of a private complaint and not upon a police report, is entitled as a matter of right to get copies of all the statements of witnesses whom the prosecution is going to examine and of all the documents on which the prosecution is going to rely at or before the commencement of the inquiry or the trial against him? Secondly, if he is not so entitled whether the same should be made available to him on principles analogous to the provisions of s. 173(4)? and, thirdly, whether the Court under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code should exercise its discretion in a manner so as to enable the accused to obtain such copies of statements and documents at or before the commencement of the inquiry or trial? For the purpose of deciding these questions, it is obvious that I will have to take into consideration—(i) the provisions of Chap. XIV of the Code under which cognizable offences are investigated by the police officers and non-cognizable offences are investigated by the police officers only upon receipt of an order of a Magistrate in that behalf, (ii) Chap. XXI of the Code, under which procedures for trial of warrant cases (warrant cases instituted upon a police report as well as warrant cases instituted otherwise than on police report) by Magistrates have been prescribed and (iii) s. 94 which occurs in Chap. VII of the Code. During the course of arguments reference was made to the provisions of ss. 145 and 157 of the Evidence Act and I will also consider those provisions.

On the first point as to whether in the present case the petitioner and his co-accused are entitled to get copies of all the statements of witnesses, whom the prosecution is going to examine and of all the documents on which the prosecution is going to rely, reliance was placed upon the provisions of s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code, but it is obvious that s. 173(4) is inapplicable to the present case, inasmuch as it is a warrant case instituted not upon a police report but upon a private complaint and the procedure contained in ss. 252 to 259 occurring in Chap. XXI of the Code would be applicable. Section 173(4) is applicable only to those cases in which the investigation has been made by a police officer and that too under Chap. XIV of the Code. In the present case the prosecution has been instituted otherwise than upon police report at the instance of Shri H. R. Jokhi, Assistant Collector of Central Excise, Marine Preventive Division, Central Excise, Bombay, upon a private complaint lodged by him before the learned Magistrate and the investigation into the case has been done by the various customs officers under the supervision of Shri H. R. Jokhi, and such investigation is obviously not under Chap. XIV of the Criminal Procedure Code. Mr. Gandhi, however, urged that the Assistant Collector of Central Excise, who has filed the complaint is a public officer and as such officer he enjoys powers to interrogate, arrest and to carry out searches under the provisions of the Sea Customs Act, which are similar to the powers enjoyed by a police officer, who undertakes investigation under Chap. XIV of the Criminal Procedure Code and, therefore, he should be regarded as a police officer and the criminal case should be treated as having been instituted upon a police report and not on the basis of a private complaint. It has now been well settled by the decision of the Supreme Court in *State of Punjab v. Barkat Ram*¹, that a customs officer is not a police officer though in matters of interrogation, arrest and search he performs similar functions as are performed by a police officer. I may also mention that recently in *Laxman Padma v. The State*² a similar view has been taken that a customs officer is not a police officer. In view of this position it is not possible to accept Mr. Gandhi's contention that the Assistant Collector of Central Excise, who has lodged this complaint should be regarded as a police officer. Further, it is also clear that by no stretch of imagination it could be said that the investigation carried on by the several customs officers under the supervision of Shri H. R. Jokhi in this case is an investigation under Chap. XIV of the Criminal Procedure Code. It is, therefore, clear that the provisions of s. 173(4) which occur in Chapter XIV of the Criminal Procedure Code would be inapplicable to the present case and as such the petitioner and his co-accused are not entitled to get copies of all the statements of witnesses whom the prosecution wants to examine and of all the documents on which the prosecution proposes to rely at or before the commencement of the inquiry or trial.

The next ground on the basis of which the petitioner's claim to copies of all the statements of witnesses, whom the prosecution was going to examine and of all the documents on which the prosecution was going to rely, was pressed was that such copies of statements and documents should be furnished on principles analogous to the principle contained in s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code. It was urged on behalf of the petitioner that if in prosecutions which were launched on the basis of police reports—and which prosecutions usually pertained to serious cognizable offences like murder etc.—it has been made obligatory under s. 173(4) upon the officer in charge of a police station to furnish a copy of the First Information Report and the copies of all other documents on which the prosecution proposes to rely, including the statements and confessions, if any, recorded under s. 164 and the statements recorded under s. 161 of all the persons, whom the prosecution proposes to examine as witnesses, to the accused before the commencement of the inquiry or trial, it would be fair and just to furnish copies of similar statements and documents to the accused in a private complaint launched against him to enable him to properly defend the case. It was pointed out that the object of introducing s. 173(4) in Chap. XIV of the Criminal Procedure Code was not merely to avoid delay and help expeditious disposal of criminal cases but also to enable the accused to know the case that he has to meet and to safeguard his interest by giving him the fullest information in the possession of the prosecution, on which the prosecution case was based and statements made against him, so that he could have a complete picture of the entire case beforehand and he could mould his defence accordingly and effectively defend himself. In that behalf reliance was placed upon the observations of his Lordship Mr. Justice Shah of the Supreme Court in the case of Noor Khan v. State of Rajasthan.³ It was, therefore, contended that on principles analogous to the principle contained in s. 173(4) copies of all such statements and documents should be ordered to be furnished to the accused in warrant cases instituted upon a private complaint like the present one. As I will indicate presently, it is difficult to accept this contention for more than one reason.

In the first place, the argument based on the proposition that on principles analogous to the principles contained in s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code such copies of statements and documents should be furnished to the accused in a warrant case instituted upon a private complaint, is, in my view, fallacious, for it postulates or presupposes that s. 173(4) embodies some principle. If the provisions of s. 173(4) are carefully scrutinised, it will at once become clear that it is a purely procedural section and all that it provides for is to enjoin upon a police officer in charge of the police station to see that after he has furnished a report under sub-s. (1) to the Magistrate, a copy of such report as also of the First Information Report recorded under s. 154 and of all other documents or relevant extracts thereof, on which the prosecution proposes to rely, including the statements and confession, if any, recorded under s. 164 and the statements recorded under s. 161(3) of all the persons, whom the prosecution proposes to examine as its witnesses are furnished to the accused before the commencement of inquiry or trial. In other words, the section prescribes what should be done by a police officer in charge of a police station and at what stage he should do what he is enjoined to do thereunder. It is no doubt true that it is by virtue of this provision, which was introduced by way of an amendment in 1955 that an accused person has become entitled to receive copies of all the statements of witnesses, whom the prosecution is going to examine as its witnesses and also of documents, on which the prosecution is going to rely at the trial, but it is well settled that the provisions of sub-s. (4) are directory and not mandatory and the word 'shall' occurring in the said sub-section has been construed accordingly. I may refer to the judgment of the Supreme Court in the case of Narayan Rao v. State of Andhra Pradesh,⁴ where the effect of non-compliance or non-observance of the provisions of s. 173(4) and s. 207 A(3) has been considered. The relevant observations appear in para. 10 of the judgment and run as follows (p. 741) :

4 [1957] A.I.R. S.C. 737.

"...There is no doubt that those provisions have been introduced by the amending Act of 1955, in order to simplify the procedure in respect of inquiries leading upto a Sessions trial, and at the same time, to safeguard the interests of accused persons, by enjoining upon police officers concerned and Magistrates before whom such proceedings are brought, to see that all the documents, necessary to give the accused persons all the information for the proper conduct of their defence, are furnished.

It has rightly been contended on behalf of the appellant that it was the duty of the Magistrate to see that the provisions aforesaid of the Code, have been fully complied with. Magistrates, therefore, have to be circumspect, while conducting such proceedings, to see to it that accused persons are not handicapped in their defence by any omission on the part of police officers concerned, to supply the necessary copies.

But we are not prepared to hold that non-compliance with those provisions has, necessarily, the result of vitiating those proceedings and subsequent trial. The word 'shall' occurring both in sub-s. (4) of s. 173 and sub-s. (3) of s. 207-A, is not mandatory but only directory, because an omission by a police officer, to fully comply with the provisions of s. 173, should not be allowed to have such a far-reaching effect as to render the proceedings including the trial before the Court of Sessions, wholly ineffective...

Certainly, if it is shown, in a particular case, on behalf of the accused persons that the omission on the part of police officers concerned or of the Magistrate before whom the committal proceedings had pended, has caused prejudice to the accused, in the interest of justice, the Court may re-open the proceedings by insisting upon full compliance with the provisions of the Code."

Their Lordships have further gone on to observe that unless such non-compliance has caused prejudice to accused, the same will amount to an irregularity curable by the provisions of s. 537 of the Code. In other words, it is clear that the provisions of s. 173(4) have been held to be directory and non-compliance thereof, unless it has caused serious prejudice to an accused person, or resulted in failure of justice, is an irregularity curable by s. 537 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Similarly, I may also point out that though sub-s. (4) of s. 173 clearly provides for furnishing of copies of all statements of witnesses and of all documents on which the prosecution is going to rely to the accused before the commencement of inquiry or trial, it is not as if that once a trial has already commenced, the prosecution is prevented from producing and tendering additional documents, which may be relevant and necessary (copies whereof may not have been furnished to the accused before the commencement of the trial), or from examining additional witnesses, whose statements might have been recorded even after the trial has commenced. The prosecution is never precluded from leading such additional evidence simply because copies of the statements of such witnesses or of such additional documents have not been furnished to the accused before the commencement of the trial. In such situations, all that the Court is required to do is to see that the accused is not in any manner handicapped in his defence and this the Court can ensure by calling upon the prosecution to make such additional documents or statements of such further witnesses available to the accused in good time, and if necessary by granting adjournment. It will thus appear clear that s. 173(4) both in its content as well as scope is purely procedural and it merely provides as to what should be done by a police officer and at what stage he should do it. Unlike s. 403(1) of the Code which embodies the doctrine of autrefois acquit, s. 173(4) does not enact any fundamental principle of criminal jurisprudence as such and the provisions thereof being purely procedural it would be a fallacious argument to contend that on principles analogous to the principle contained in s. 173(4) (which it does not) copies of statements of witnesses and documents on which the prosecution is going to rely should be ordered to be furnished to accused persons in a warrant case instituted upon a private complaint. At the highest, one could only say that in view of the provisions of s. 173(4) the prosecution should not be allowed to examine witnesses or produce documents at the trial in a manner so as to cause prejudice to the accused or to put him under any handicap in the matter of his defence, but certainly no principle of criminal jurisprudence as such is involved especially on the aspect of the matter as to at what stage such copies of statements and documents should be furnished to the accused, even in trial of cases to which s. 173(4) is applicable. In the present case, in view of the offer made by the Customs authorities through their Special Prosecutor that statements of all witnesses, which would be relied upon by way of corroboration would be made available to accused persons no sooner the evidence of such witnesses in chief is over and in view of the further offer that the statements of such of the witnesses, which may not be relied upon for the purpose of corroboration, would be made available to accused persons on a demand being made by them in that behalf at the end of the examination-in-chief of such witnesses and in view of the further offer that all documents would be made available to the accused persons as and when they are tendered in evidence, I do not think that the petitioner and his co-accused would in any manner be prejudiced or handicapped in the matter of their defence. In my view, therefore, since s. 173(4) does not embody any principle as such, it is difficult to accept the argument that on principles analogous to the principle contained in the said provision copies of statements of witnesses and of documents on which the prosecution is going to rely should be made available to the accused before the commencement of the inquiry or trial.

Secondly, having regard to the scheme of the Criminal Procedure Code and the manner in which the material amendments have been effected to the relevant provisions of the Code by Act XXVI of 1955, it is difficult to pass an order directing furnishing of copies of statements of witnesses and of documents on which the prosecution is going to rely to the petitioner and his co-accused before the commencement of the inquiry or trial, as has been sought by the petitioner. In this behalf certain facts will have to be borne in mind. Admittedly, the present case is a warrant case instituted otherwise than upon a police report, that is to say, upon a private complaint lodged by the Assistant Collector of Central Excise, Bombay, and as such the procedure enacted in ss. 252 to 259 contained in Chap. XXI of the Criminal Procedure Code would be applicable, and admittedly there is no provision in those sections for furnishing of copies of such statements and of documents on which the prosecution would rely to the accused before the commencement of inquiry or trial. For the first time by the Amending Act XXVI of 1955 s. 173(4) was introduced in Chapter XIV of the Criminal Procedure Code, which deals with powers of the police officers to investigate cognizable offences and also non-cognizable offences only upon receipt of an order from a Magistrate in that behalf. Prior to the introduction of s. 173(4) in Chap. XIV and prior to the amendment that was made in s. 162 occurring in the same Chapter, the position was that a very limited or restricted use of police statements of witnesses could be made and that too in a certain manner as was indicated by the proviso to the old s. 162(1). Under the proviso to the old s. 162(1), it was enacted that whenever any witness was called for the prosecution, whose statement had been taken down in writing, the Court shall on the request of the accused refer to such writing and may then, if the Court thinks it expedient in the interest of justice, direct that the accused be furnished with a copy thereof and that such statement may be used to impeach the credit of such witness in the manner provided by the Evidence Act, 1872. In other words, any use other than the one mentioned in the aforesaid proviso, of such police statement of a witness was completely barred and it was only by the Amending Act, XXVI of 1955, that a provision for furnishing copies of all statements of witnesses and of all documents, on which the prosecution was going to rely to the accused before the commencement of inquiry or trial, came to be introduced, by incorporating s. 173(4) in Chap. XIV of the Code. Further, prior to the amendment of the Code by Act XXVI of 1955 the procedure for trial of warrant cases instituted on police reports and for those instituted otherwise than on police reports (i.e. upon private complaints) was the same but as a result of the amendment made by Act XXVI of 1955 a different procedure was introduced for trial of warrant cases instituted on police reports and such procedure is now to be found in s. 251A and sub-s. (1) of s. 251A provides that whenever the accused appears or is brought before a Magistrate at the commencement of the trial of such case instituted on the police report, the Magistrate shall satisfy himself that the documents referred to in s. 173 have been furnished to the accused, while Parliament deemed it fit and expedient to retain the same old procedure that was applicable to warrant cases instituted otherwise than on police reports and the Parliament did not think it expedient or necessary to incorporate in the set of procedure contained in ss. 252 to 259 of the Code a provision for furnishing of copies of statements of witnesses and documents on which the prosecution is going to rely, to the accused. Having regard to the manner in which the amendments were effected in the Criminal Procedure Code, it would be reasonable to hold that the Parliament deliberately omitted to make a provision similar to s. 173(4) in warrant cases instituted upon a private complaint and, therefore, it is difficult to accept the argument that on the analogy of s. 173(4), copies of such statements of witnesses and documents, on which the prosecution is going to rely should be ordered to be furnished to the accused in warrant cases instituted upon a private complaint.

Mr. Jethmalani offered an explanation as to why Parliament did not make a specific provision—similar to s. 173(4), while prescribing procedure applicable to warrant cases instituted upon a private complaint. He pointed out that in cases instituted upon a private complaint, the complainant, who is an individual and has no State machinery behind him does not record statements of witnesses nor does he seize documents from the custody of others before he lodges a complaint and therefore, a private complainant is ordinarily not in possession of any statements of witnesses or any documents and, therefore, Parliament with knowledge of these facts may not have thought it necessary to make a provision similar to s. 173(4) while prescribing the procedure for cases instituted upon a private complaint. I am unable to accept this explanation for the absence of such provision in the procedure prescribed for trial of warrant cases instituted upon private complaints. It is common knowledge that even before the Criminal Procedure Code was amended by Act XXVI of 1955, for a number of years prosecutions on the basis of private complaints were launched at the instance of several local bodies or public authorities under provisions of different statutes like the District Municipal Boroughs Act, the City Municipal Corporations Act, the Sales Tax Act, the Income-tax Act, the Companies Act and the Sea Customs Act. Prosecutions under these statutes were always instituted and are even now instituted upon a private complaint lodged by some officer duly authorized in that behalf and these prosecutions were always tried and are being tried as warrant cases instituted otherwise than on police reports. It cannot for a moment be believed that Parliament while it passed the Amending Act XXVI of 1955 was unaware of these innumerable cases which were instituted otherwise than on police reports and Parliament was equally aware of the fact that the local bodies or public authorities or the public officers concerned in such cases first collected materials in the form of statements and documents and had the same in their possession before the complaints were lodged and even so Parliament while amending the Criminal Procedure Code by Act XXVI of 1955 did not think fit to incorporate in the set of procedure contained in ss. 252 to 259 (which is applicable to such cases instituted upon a private complaint) a provision similar to s. 173(4) of the Criminal Procedure Code. In view of these facts, it must be held that Parliament intentionally omitted to provide for furnishing of copies of statements and documents on which the prosecution was going to rely to the accused at or before the commencement of inquiry or trial of cases that were instituted otherwise than on police reports. For these reasons, it is not possible to accept Mr. Jethmalani's contention that by analogy of s. 173(4) copies of statements of witnesses and documents, on which the prosecution is going to rely should be ordered to be furnished to the petitioner or his co-accused.

It was, however, contended by Mr. Jethmalani that in the interest of justice and fair trial the copies of all such statements and documents should be made available to the accused so that he could have a complete picture of the case he has to meet and he could effectively defend himself. It was urged that even in a warrant case instituted upon a private complaint to which provisions of ss. 252 to 259 are applicable, it is open to an accused to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses, not only after but even before a charge is framed and it is further open to him to satisfy the learned Magistrate, even before a charge is framed, that no case has been made out against him by the complainant and that he should be discharged; in this behalf he relied upon sub-ss. (1) and (2) of s. 253 of the Code. Mr. Jethmalani, therefore, urged that since a right to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses means a right to effectively cross-examine them, it would not be possible for the accused to effectively cross-examine the prosecution witnesses without their previous statements being furnished to him. Mr. Jethmalani referred to the provisions of s. 145 of the Evidence Act under which a witness could be cross-examined with reference to his previous statements which have been reduced to writing and relevant to matters in question. He, therefore, contended that in fairness to the accused copies of all such statements and documents should be furnished to him beforehand without which he is bound to be prejudiced in the matter of cross-examination of prosecution witnesses and in his attempt to satisfy the Magistrate, even before a charge is framed, that there is no case against him and that he deserves to be discharged. In reply Mr. Khandalawala fairly conceded that the accused should be furnished with copies of statements of all the witnesses, whom the prosecution was going to examine to enable him to effectively cross-examine them by reference to their previous statements and he, therefore, pointed out that the offer made by the Special Prosecutor before the learned Magistrate that copies of the previous statements of all witnesses who would be examined—either before a charge was framed or thereafter—would be furnished to the petitioner and his co-accused as and when the examination-in-chief of each of such witnesses was over and the documents on which the prosecution were going to rely as and when they would be tendered in evidence, was sufficiently just and fair and in this manner if copies of statements and documents were made available to the defence, there was no question of the accused being prejudiced or he not receiving a fair trial. There is considerable force in the argument of Mr. Khandalawala. In my view since the previous statement of a witness could only be used either for contradiction under s. 145 or for corroboration under s. 157 of the Evidence Act an offer of furnishing copies of such statements and documents to the defence in the manner suggested by the Special Prosecutor in the present case would meet the ends of justice and fair trial. Mr. Jethmalani, however, demurred and pointed out that in order to ensure a fair trial it was necessary that the accused should be informed in sufficient time before the trial of the nature of the evidence to be called for by the prosecution. I do not for a moment dispute that in order that an accused person should have adequate opportunity to prepare his defence he must be informed in sufficiently good time of the nature of the evidence intended to be led by the prosecution against him. But in serious cases involving trial of cognizable offences this is ensured by s. 173(4) under Chap. XIV and in warrant cases instituted upon police reports by s. 251-A(1) in Chap. XXI, while in criminal cases instituted upon private complaints by the very procedure contained in ss. 252 to 259 of the Code. That procedure envisages leading of all such evidence—which ordinarily includes testimonies of the complainant and his material witnesses—as would be produced in support of the prosecution before any charge is framed and then the accused's plea is taken on the charge that may be framed and under s. 256 ordinarily at the commencement of next hearing (which means an adjournment after framing of the charge and recording the accused's plea is contemplated) the accused is given the right to recall all or such of the prosecution witnesses already examined as he wants for his cross-examination, notwithstanding the fact that he might have cross-examined them earlier i.e. before the charge was framed. It is thus clear that the accused is usually apprised of almost all the material prosecution evidence (and not merely the nature thereof) in sufficient time to enable him to prepare his defence. It is possible, however, that the Magistrate might frame a charge before all witnesses named by the complainant under s. 252(2) are examined or the complainant might examine some material or important witnesses after the accused's plea on the charge framed is taken and after the accused has exercised his right of recalling the previously examined prosecution witnesses,—which is permissible under s. 256—but in either of such cases the prosecution cannot spring a surprise upon the defence and sufficient opportunity must be given to the latter to prepare for cross-examination of such witnesses and this could be and is usually ensured by granting reasonable time to the accused. For instance, in Emperor v. Burn,⁵ which was followed in *Emperor v. Nagindas*⁶ it has been held that s. 256 enables the prosecution to examine witnesses, who had not been examined or whose names had not been disclosed before the charge was framed, and if the accused desires time to enable him to cross-examine witnesses whose names had not been disclosed, it is open to the Magistrate to give time. In my view, if the prosecution were to examine any important witness, whose name had been disclosed, for the first time after the charge was framed and if such witness were to give out a long drawn out or complicated narration, it would be open to the Magistrate to entertain or grant a request for reasonable time on the part of the accused to enable him to prepare for cross-examination of such witness. Such being the procedure applicable to warrant cases instituted upon private complaints, the accused is invariably apprised of all material prosecution evidence in sufficient time to prepare his defence and hence the offer made by the Special Prosecutor in my view sufficiently meets the ends of justice and fair trial to the petitioner and his co-accused.

It was next contended by Mr. Jethmalani that the defence in this case should be supplied not merely the copies of statements of witnesses whom the prosecution was going to examine and documents on which the prosecution was going to rely at the trial but copies of statements of all persons who had been interrogated during the investigation, irrespective of whether the prosecution was going to examine them or not and of all documents that have been seized during the investigation again irrespective of whether the prosecution was going to make use of or rely on them or not, for according to him unless all such material collected by the prosecution during investigation is furnished to the defence it may not be possible for the accused to mould his defence as it was likely that some of such material might either help him directly or afford him some clue whereby he could collect and produce evidence in refutation. Incidentally, I may observe that this contention goes beyond what was applied for by the petitioner by his application in the lower Court. Mr. Khandalawala objected on the ground that it amounts to prying into Prosecutor's brief. He contended that the prosecution had absolute discretion in the matter of examination of witnesses, the only obligation being to put before the Court all material evidence which was necessary for unfolding its case, and since the previous statement of a witness could only be used either for corroborating him or contradicting him, the petitioner and his co-accused could be and would be furnished with copies of the previous statements of such persons whom the prosecution actually examined in the case and it was neither necessary nor desirable to furnish copies of previous statements of all the persons including those whom the prosecution were not going to examine to the accused. Similarly, documents though seized during investigation on which prosecution was not going to rely could not be and need not be made available to the accused. In this behalf, he relied upon the observations of the Supreme Court in the recent decision in Masalti v. State of Uttar Pradesh.⁷

The relevant observations run as follows:

"It is not unknown that where serious offences like murder are committed and a large number of accused persons are tried, attempts are made either to terrorise or win over prosecution witnesses, and if the prosecutor honestly and bonafide believes that some of his witnesses have been won over, it would be unreasonable to insist that he must tender such witnesses before the Court. It is undoubtedly the duty of the prosecution to lay before the Court all material evidence available to it which is necessary for unfolding its case; but it would be unsound to lay down as a general rule that every witness must be examined even though his evidence may not be very material or even if it is known that he has been won over or terrorized. In such a case, it is always open to the defence to examine such witnesses as their witnesses and the Court can also call such witnesses in the box in the interest of justice under S. 540."

Mr. Jethmalani did not dispute the position that it was in the discretion of the prosecution to decide how many witnesses it should examine and whether to examine a particular witness or not but he contended that it was not quite correct to say that a previous statement of a witness could only be used for the purpose of either corroborating him or contradicting him. He urged that during the course of investigation when several persons are interrogated and their statements recorded, such statements have some impact—either favourable or adverse—on each other and, therefore, unless these statements of all such persons who have been interrogated are made available to an accused person before the commencement of the inquiry or the trial, he would not be in a position to mould his defence properly. Elucidating his point further Mr. Jethmalani pointed out that in a given case it was quite possible that on a vital factual issue involved in the case the prosecution may have recorded statements of four persons say A, B, C and D and it was just possible, according to him that the statements of A, B and C might be corroborative of each other but the statement of D might be having an adverse impact upon the statements of A, B and C and the prosecution may not choose to call D as its witness at the trial.—In such a case, according to him, the non-furnishing of the statement of D to the accused would prejudice him in his defence at the trial, for he would be deprived of an opportunity for want of knowledge as to what D had stated during the investigation, to examine him as a defence witness, or to collect materials on the lines of the statement given by D and produce the same in refutation of the evidence that might be given by A, B and C on behalf of the prosecution. Similarly, he pointed out that it was possible that some of the documents seized by the prosecution during the investigation may have adverse effect on its case and these may never be produced or tendered at the trial. He, therefore, urged that it was in the interest of fair trial that copies of the statements of all the persons who had been interrogated by the prosecution, irrespective of whether they were going to be called as witnesses or not, and of all the documents seized, irrespective of whether they were going to be tendered in evidence or not, should be made available to an accused person inasmuch as a study of these statements and documents will be helpful to him in preparing his defence. In other words, according to him all material collected by the prosecution during the course of the investigation, irrespective of whether at the trial the prosecution was going to make use of it or rely upon it or not, must be made available to the accused, for it was likely that some of such material may have adverse impact on the prosecution case, and might be helpful to the accused in his defence. It is difficult to accept this contention of Mr. Jethmalani. In the first place, it is based upon an assumed possibility or likelihood of the prosecution having collected some materials having adverse impact on its case. Secondly, to grant the prayer for copies of all such statements and documents irrespective of whether the prosecution was going to make use of them or not in the hope or on the off chance that some of such material might turn out to be helpful to the accused in his defence or might proffer some clue to him to collect and produce materials in refutation, is nothing short of granting what may be called a roving discovery or a fishing inspection and I do not think that considerations of fair trial to an innocent accused could be so stretched as to grant such roving discovery or fishing inspection.

In this connection, I may refer to an American decision in the case of People Ex. Rel. Lemon v. Supreme Court,⁸ where a somewhat similar question was considered. The facts of the case as could be gathered from the observations of Cardozo C. J. which have been quoted in extenso in Wigmore on Evidence (3rd edn.), Vol. VI, at pages 395-397, were as follows: One Lucy Earley had been indicted for the murder of her husband by poisoning his food by the Grand Jury of Orange county. The effect of this indictment was to supersede an information, filed by the district attorney with the recorder of the city of Newburg, charging the same crime. The minutes of the Grand Jury had been inspected by the defendant under an order of the Court. One Wagley, an accomplice, had given testimony that the defendant had asked him for arsenic to enable her to kill her husband and had received the poison from his hands. Physicians who had examined the contents of the stomach gave testimony as to the quantity of arsenic disclosed by the analysis. Other witnesses gave testimony directed to the cause of death and to the methods and agencies through which the poison was administered. A transcript of all this testimony was given to the defendant and was embodied in the record. The defendant was not satisfied with this disclosure of the case against her. It was urged on her behalf that other evidences not submitted to the Grand Jury had been gathered by the district attorney and she prayed for an order that the same be submitted to her scrutiny. An order granting a very limited relief was passed in her favour. The defendant preferred an appeal and it was contended that criminal Courts had inherent power to compel discovery of documents in furtherance of justice and that the defendant's prayer that all the other material collected by the district attorney, which had not been submitted to the Grand Jury should be made available to her for her scrutiny to enable her to prepare her defence, should have been granted. Chief Justice Cardozo observed as follows:

"The decision of this case does not require us to affirm or deny the existence of an inherent power in Courts of criminal jurisdiction to compel the discovery of documents in furtherance of justice. The beginnings or at least the glimmerings of such a doctrine are to be found, as we have seen, in Courts other than our own. A search of precedents in this State yields results that are largely negative, if our scrutiny is confined to criminal prosecutions. On the other hand, the tendency is unmistakable in the field of civil causes to limit the power strictly within the statutory schedules. Whether apart from statute and beyond it there is a supervisory jurisdiction, as yet unplumbed and unexhausted, in respect of criminal prosecutions, is something that can best be determined at the call of particular exigencies in the setting of the concrete instance. The Courts are properly reluctant to abjure the power in advance, or to confine in predetermined formulas the occasions of its exercise. We have a statute to the effect that the rules of evidence shall be the same in criminal as in civil causes. (Code Crim. Proc. Ss. 392). The provisions of the Civil Codes for the discovery of documents are not rules of evidence in the strict sense. They are closely akin, however, to such rules, for they govern and define the remedies whereby evidence is made available. Those remedies are now so inveterate and established that they form part of the warp and woof of the procedural system of the State. The time has arrived, so it is argued, when they should be taken over by the Criminal Courts, and applied to criminal actions by a process of analogy. The appropriation is justified, we are told, by the germinal developments of a like power in the Courts of other States, by the public policy implicit in the rule of uniformity of evidence, and by the necessities of justice.

We leave the question open; for, if the power exists at all, this case is not within it. The most that can be argued with any show of reason in behalf of the defendant is that the remedy of inspection in civil causes as now prescribed by statute is to be applied

“in consimili casu” to criminal prosecutions. The power in criminal prosecutions may not improbably be less. It surely can be no greater. But the defendant, if subjected to that test, fails to make out her title to the remedy. She does not ask, as did the defendant in Commonwealth v. Jordan, supra, that the body of the dead man or any part of it be submitted to her scrutiny or to that of her advisers. Her demand is that a prosecutor who has gathered statements from prospective witnesses shall place the statements in her hands that she may study and repel them. She does not ask that she inspect any confession made in her name and admissible against her. Conceivably such inspection may be necessary at times, as, for instance, to enable a defendant to prove a forgery of a signature. She asks that she examine the incriminating statements of a conspirator whose confessions will not be evidence except against himself. So far as the record shows, he has not even been indicted. If indicted, his trial will be separate from hers. The reason why she asks for a disclosure of the statements of the physicians and the chemist is her belief that their statements to the prosecutor were fuller in all probability than their statements to the grand jury already in her possession. A like reason explains her request for confessions. In a word, statements and memoranda collected by the prosecutor are to be exhibited to the defendant, though none of them will be admissible either for her or against her if offered at the trial. She makes no claim that they will be. She takes the ground that she should have them because study of the evidence will be helpful in preparing her defence. This is to enlarge the remedy beyond anything permitted by analogy or precedent.”

It will thus be clear that the specific ground on which the defendant wanted the statements and memoranda collected by the district attorney and which had not been submitted to the Grand Jury, to be exhibited to her scrutiny viz. such statements made to the district attorney were in her belief, fuller in all probability than the statements to the Grand Jury (which were already in her possession) and that the study of these would be helpful to her in preparing her defence, was expressly negatived. Similarly, in the present case a request for roving discovery or fishing inspection of all the materials collected by the prosecution during investigation, irrespective of whether the prosecution was going to make use of such materials at the trial or not, on the ground that a study of such materials might be helpful to the accused in the preparation of his defence cannot be granted.

During the course of his arguments Mr. Jethmalani referred to and relied upon certain Articles in Wigmore on Evidence. Particularly he relied upon Article 1850, Sub-Articles 1, 2, 3 and 4, Article 1851, Article 1855(a), Article 1959(g) and Article 2224. It is not necessary for me to set out these Articles here. The first four Articles appear at pages 390, 399, 417 and 475 respectively in Vol. VI, while the last Article appears at page 206 in Vol. VIII of the third edition. So far as these Articles, on which reliance was placed by Mr. Jethmalani, are concerned, in the first place it will be clear that the learned author has in these Articles historically surveyed the legal position in the matter of furnishing names of witnesses, their testimonies and documents to the accused by first stating what the position was under the orthodox Common Law Rules and how the position changed from time to time under the several statutes in several jurisdictions. It may be stated that just as in other jurisdictions considerations of fairness to an innocent accused led to the passing of statutes making provisions in derogation of the orthodox Common Law practices in matters of furnishing to the accused names or testimony of witnesses or documents intended to be produced on behalf of the prosecution. There are statutory provisions contained in our Criminal Procedure Code which abjure the old Common Law Rules or practices; for instance s. 204(I)(a) of the Code provides that no summons or warrant shall be issued against the accused until a list of the prosecution witnesses has been filed; s. 173(4) itself is another instance in point, which however, is applicable to criminal cases where the investigation has been done by a police officer under Chap. XIV of the Code. Section 251A(I) is another instance in point which is applicable to warrant cases instituted on the basis of police reports. Secondly, it is also clear that unless and to the extent to which the statute law has made a departure, the Courts have been inclined to follow the Common Law Rules in the matters like discovery and inspection in criminal cases. That this is so will appear clear from the observations of Chief Justice Cardozo, which I have quoted above. So far as our Indian statute is concerned, I have already indicated above that in the matter of furnishing testimonies of intended witnesses and of documents to the accused, the Parliament has been silent and has deliberately omitted to make a provision therefor while prescribing the procedure applicable to warrant cases instituted otherwise than on police reports. In my view, therefore, the Articles in Wigmore on Evidence relied upon by Mr. Jethmalani are of no avail to him. Having regard to the aforesaid discussion in my view the petitioner's prayer for furnishing of copies of statements of witnesses and of documents including notings etc. was rightly rejected.

Lastly, it was contended that the learned Magistrate ought to have exercised the discretion vested in him under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code and ought to have issued a summons directing the Special Prosecutor or the Collector of Central Excise to produce in Court before the inquiry commenced all such statements of witnesses and documents on which the prosecution was going to rely. It was urged that if once the accused satisfied the Court that the documents (which would include the statements of witnesses) were relevant to the facts in issue, the production thereof would either be necessary or desirable and if once the accused satisfied the Court that the production of such documents was either necessary or desirable, the Court ought to exercise the discretion vested in it under that section. In this behalf it was pointed out that the previous statements of the witnesses, whom the prosecution was going to examine in the case and the documents on which the prosecution wanted to rely at the trial would obviously be statements and documents relevant to the facts in issue and therefore, their production was either necessary or desirable and as such it should have been held that the petitioner had made out a case for the exercise of the discretion by the learned Magistrate. Both Messrs. Gandhi and Jethmalani further contended that having regard to the language used therein, s. 94 could be invoked at any stage of an inquiry or trial and the same was not controlled by s. 257 of the Code, under which the accused is entitled to apply for issue of any process for compelling attendance of a witness or the production of any document only after he has entered upon his defence. In support of their contentions strong reliance was placed upon *Muhammed Rahim v. Emperor*⁹ and on Hari Charan v. The State.¹⁰

In the former case at the trial in the Court of the learned Magistrate it was suggested to one of the prosecution witnesses that he had made a certain statement before the police officer during the departmental inquiry; he denied it, whereupon an application was then made under s. 94 for an order of production of the previous statement recorded during the departmental inquiry. The learned Magistrate ruled that this request at that stage was premature but that it might be repeated after the framing of the charge. It appears that in due course after the charge was framed, the application was repeated but the learned Magistrate then ruled that the defence were not entitled to the statements they had asked for and he had not considered those statements necessary for the trial. The application was, therefore, rejected. It appears that in the view which he took on the earlier occasion while rejecting the application for production of documents under s. 94, the learned Magistrate was influenced by an earlier decision in Tahilram v. Pitamberdas,¹¹ where it had been held that the proper stage at which the accused could apply for production of documents was only after he had entered upon his defence under s. 257 of the Criminal Procedure Code. The Full Bench of the Sind Court took the view that s. 257 of the Criminal Procedure Code neither controlled nor imposed any limitations on the power of a Court to exercise its discretion in using the machinery provided by s. 94 of the Code. The relevant observations on which reliance has been placed by Messrs. Gandhi and Jethmalani run as follows (p. 17):

"In our opinion also there is nothing in S. 94, Criminal P. C., which restricts the use of the machinery provided therein to any particular stage of an investigation, inquiry, trial or other proceeding under the Code. On the contrary, the word 'when-ever' appearing at the very fore-front of the section excludes the idea of any such restriction."

The Court then considered the earlier decision reported in Tahilram v. Pitamberdas and then observed as follows (p. 18):

"In these circumstances it seems to us that the question at issue in the case of Tahilram v. Pitamberdas, was decided solely upon the provisions of S. 257, Criminal P. C., and it does not appear to have been the case of the accused that his application came within the terms of S. 94, Criminal P. C. In our opinion, S. 257, Criminal P. C., neither controls nor imposes any limitations on the power of a Court to exercise its discretion in using the machinery provided by S. 94, Criminal P. C. It is no bar to the exercise of that discretion in a trial under the provisions of Chap. 21 before that trial has reached the stage indicated by S. 257. No such restriction is indicated by the section itself or by any other section in Chap. 21..."

Sections 257 and 94, Criminal P. C., are not antagonistic, they are interdependent. S. 94, Criminal P. C., affords any party to an inquiry, trial or other proceeding under the Code, the facility of having documents and things produced at any stage of such inquiry, trial or proceeding. The facility is restricted. The restriction lies in the fact that the necessity or desirability of the production must be shown to the satisfaction of the Court. S. 257, Criminal P. C., gives an accused person a right, subject to another, but lesser restriction, to claim the same facility. The restriction consists in the accused having to satisfy the Court that his demand is not made for the purpose of vexation or delay or for defeating the ends of justice."

While considering the provisions of s. 94 in juxtaposition with the accused's right to cross-examine prosecution witnesses with reference to their previous statements under s. 145 the Court has observed as follows (p. 19):

"...To deny his claim to the production of such documents would be to deny the accused a right given to him in the procedure prescribed for the trial of his case. In our opinion a Court exercising its discretion under S. 94, Criminal P. C., not only may call for the production of such documents at the request of the accused, but ought to do so, as their production is obviously necessary and desirable for the purposes of the trial."

In the latter case of Hari Charam v. The State production of certain documents was prayed for by the accused, even before a charge had been framed against him by the Magistrate but the only order passed by the learned Magistrate was:

"There is no necessity for the prosecution to wait for the documents prayed for in the application. The prosecution shall proceed. These documents, if at all be needed in defence, they may be summoned. Prosecution need not wait."

Against this order a revisional application was preferred to the Punjab High Court. Following the Full Bench ruling of the Sind Court the Punjab High Court took the view that the learned Magistrate could not refuse to call these documents merely on the ground that these could be summoned in defence, if at all needed and directed the learned Magistrate to issue a summons for production of those documents.

According to Messrs. Gandhi and Jethmalani, these rulings clearly establish two propositions, first, that once the accused satisfied the Court that the statements and documents were relevant to the facts in issue and therefore, the production thereof was either necessary or desirable for the purposes of an inquiry or trial, the Court ought to exercise its discretion under the section and direct production thereof and secondly, the discretion vested in the Court under s. 94 could be invoked at any stage of an inquiry or trial and that s. 257 did not control the Court's power under s. 94. That is undoubtedly so. But the real question is whether relevancy of statements and documents is the sole criterion for determining the question whether the production thereof is either necessary or desirable? Similarly, though it is true that s. 94 is not controlled by s. 257 the question is whether the scope of s. 94 should be enlarged so as to incorporate a provision similar to s. 173(4) in the procedure applicable to warrant cases instituted upon private complaints? In fact at one stage it was contended that since s. 94 was there in the Code there was no necessity to make a provision similar to s. 173(4) in the procedure applicable to warrant cases instituted upon private complaints and s. 94 could be resorted to for the purposes of getting such statements and documents produced to enable the accused to inspect the same at any stage of an inquiry or trial. Of course, it is not possible to accept such contention for the simple reason that s. 94 has been there in the Code all along and even then it was felt necessary to introduce s. 173(4) in Chap. XIV dealing with criminal cases involving investigation into and trial of cognizable offences as also to introduce s. 251A in the procedure applicable to warrant cases instituted upon police reports by the amending Act XXVI of 1955.

On the other hand, Mr. Khandalawala, though he conceded that s. 94 could be invoked at any stage of any inquiry or trial, contended that the section did not confer any right upon the accused to the production of all such statements and documents, but that the section was merely an enabling section which conferred discretion upon the Court in the matter of issuing a summons directing production of documents or articles or things and that such discretion had to be judicially exercised. He further contended that no materials had been placed by the petitioner before the learned Magistrate enabling him to reach a conclusion that the production of all the statements and documents was either necessary or desirable and that, therefore, the learned Magistrate was right in refusing to exercise his discretion in the matter. He pointed out that the offer made in this case by the Special Prosecutor (of making copies of statements of witnesses available to the accused as and when the examination-in-chief of each was over and documents as and when the same were tendered) was invariably made in all customs prosecutions without exception and as such there was no question of the statements or documents being either withheld or suppressed from the accused. He, therefore, urged that the occasion for exercising the discretion vested in the learned Magistrate under s. 94, which occurs in Chap. VII, which deals with "processes to compel the production of documents and other movable property and for the discovery of persons wrongfully confined", did not arise, for when the Special Prosecutor had offered to make these statements and documents available to the accused, there was no necessity to resort to the compelling processes contained in Chap. VII of the Code.

In my view, there is considerable force in the submissions made by Mr. Khandalawala on this point. Section 94 so far as is material to the present case runs as follows:

"Whenever any Court...considers that the production of any document or other thing is necessary or desirable for the purposes of any investigation, inquiry, trial or other proceeding under this Code by or before such Court...such Court may issue a summons...to the person in whose possession or power such document or thing is believed to be, requiring him to attend and produce it, or to produce it, at the time and place stated in the summons..."

In the first place, it is clear that no right is conferred upon any party to a criminal proceeding to obtain production of any document or thing under this section. Secondly, though it is clear that the provisions of the section could be invoked at any stage of any investigation, inquiry or trial as is indicated by the expression 'whenever' used at the commencement of the section, the words 'such Court may issue' clearly show that the section confers discretion upon the Court enabling it to order production of any document or other thing. Thirdly, before the Court exercises its discretion and orders the production of any document or thing under this section, it must satisfy itself that such production of the document or the thing is either necessary or desirable for the purposes of the trial and, lastly, as has been held by the Sind Court, in deciding that question the Court has to exercise its discretion judicially, in the sense that it must satisfy itself that the document or the thing has a bearing upon and is relevant to the case. What was urged very strenuously by Mr. Gandhi was that since the previous statements of witnesses, whom the prosecution was going to examine and the documents on which the prosecution wanted to rely at the trial, would be statements and documents having a bearing upon and relevant to the issues involved in the case, their production was either necessary or desirable and as such their production ought to have been ordered by the learned Magistrate. In other words, for the exercise of judicial discretion vested in the Court under s. 94, all that was necessary for a party in a criminal proceeding to show to the Court was that the statements or documents of which production was sought were relevant to the issues involved in the case and if once that was shown, the discretion ought to be exercised. I am unable to accept this argument of Mr. Gandhi. It is no doubt true that while deciding whether production of a document or a thing is necessary or desirable or not, the Court must take into consideration the aspect of the relevancy of such document or thing to the issues involved in the case, but that is not the only consideration which would guide the Court for ordering production. In the first place, everything that is relevant to the facts in issue may not necessarily be either necessary or desirable for the purposes of a trial; for instance, it may be that during the course of prior investigation the prosecution may have interrogated and obtained statements of 4/5 persons on the same vital point and it is just possible that to avoid repetition of evidence, the prosecution may not think it necessary or desirable to examine all the 5 persons as its witnesses to prove the same point. In such a case, the previous statements of all the 5 persons would undoubtedly be relevant to the point in issue but it cannot be said that their production is either necessary or desirable. Therefore, the relevancy of a statement or a document or a thing of which production is sought would be one of the considerations which the Court will have to take into account, while deciding the question of the necessity or desirability of production of such statement, document or thing. Further, before ordering production of any such statement, document or thing the Court might consider whether such statement, document or thing is being suppressed or might be tampered with or destroyed by the party in whose possession it is or might be lost altogether or whether it would come before it in a normal way without resorting to the compelling processes contained in s. 94 or 96 of the Chap. VII of the Code. These considerations would also weigh with the Court in exercising its judicial discretion while deciding the question whether the production of a document or a thing is either necessary or desirable for the purposes of an inquiry or trial. It is in this connection that Mr. Khandalawala's point assumes some significance. He has pointed out that s. 94 occurs in Chap. VII of the Code, which deals with "processes to compel the production of documents and other movable property and for the discovery of persons wrongfully confined" and he has rightly urged that in view of the Special Prosecutor's offer to make these statements and documents available to the accused, no occasion for resorting to such compelling process by exercising the discretion under s. 94 arose. I can understand if the prosecution had either withheld or altogether refused to supply copies of statements of witnesses, whom they are going to examine or of documents on which they were going to rely to the petitioner or his co-accused, the learned Magistrate could have resorted to the compelling processes contained in Chap. VII of the Code. In my view, therefore, the learned Magistrate was right in not granting the alternative prayer of the petitioner under s. 94 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

In the result, all the contentions urged by Messrs. Gandhi and Jethamalani fail and the rule is, therefore, discharged.

Rule discharged.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 103, 63—Transfer of Property Act (IV of 1882), Secs. 53A, 54—Indian Registration Act (XVI of 1908), Sec. 49—Person in possession of property under agreement for sale—Whether such person can file suit under O. XXI, r. 103 of Code against auction purchaser of same property—Whether auction purchaser person claiming under transferor within s. 53A of Transfer of Property Act.

A suit filed under O. XXI, r. 103, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, by a person who has obtained possession of the property on the basis of a contract of sale for protecting that possession is maintainable on the basis of the doctrine of part performance under s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, inasmuch as such a suit is essentially of a defensive character.

Such a suit, however, is not maintainable against an auction purchaser of the same property, as the latter is not a person claiming under the transferor within the meaning of s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

NAIK J. This appeal raises an interesting question of law namely whether the person who has obtained property on the basis of a contract of sale can maintain a suit against an auction purchaser of the same property. The material facts briefly stated are as follows:

The suit property (i.e. survey Nos. 162 and 177) (half share) originally belonged to defendant No. 3 and two others. On April 12, 1949, defendant No. 3 and two others entered into an agreement for selling the said property to the plaintiff for a sum of Rs. 1,600. Part of the sale price i.e. Rs. 585 was paid on the date of the agreement and the plaintiff was put in possession of the property. In the month of May, 1949, defendant No. 2 obtained a decree against defendant No. 3. In execution of the said decree, the land in suit was sold in auction and purchased by defendant No. 1. Defendant No. 1 started proceedings for recovering possession of the property on the basis of the sale certificate. The plaintiff obstructed the delivery of possession. Proceedings were started by the auction purchaser for removing the obstruction under r. 99 of O. XXI of the Code of Civil Procedure. After summary enquiry, the Court came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was not entitled to continue in possession. The Court, therefore, directed him to remove his obstruction. On April 2, 1952, the plaintiff filed a suit under r. 103 of O. XXI of the Civil Procedure Code contending that he was a transferee under a contract of sale; that he was in possession of the property by virtue of that contract of sale; and that, therefore, he was entitled to protect his possession under s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act.

Defendant No. 3 did not appear and the suit proceeded ex parte against her. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 contended that the plaintiff cannot maintain any action for the enforcement of his claim under s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act. The trial Court dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff went in appeal to the District Court. The District Court allowed the appeal and decreed the plaintiff's claim. It is against that judgment defendants Nos. 1 and 2 have now come up in appeal.

Mr. Guttal for defendants Nos. 1 and 2 urged two contentions before me. Firstly, that the plaintiff who bases his claim on the doctrine of part performance of the contract, embodied in s. 53A cannot maintain an action for protecting his possession. At best he can use the part performance of the contract as a shield. He can never use it as a weapon of offence. Secondly, it is argued that neither the judgment-creditor (defendant No. 2) nor the auction-purchaser (defendant No. 1) could be said to be claiming under defendant No. 3, the judgment-debtor. It is only the transferor or persons claiming under him who are debarred from proceeding to evict the transferee claiming under a contract of sale. Mr. Guttal contended that since the auction-purchaser could not be said to have derived title from the judgment-debtor, the bar imposed by s. 53A cannot apply to him.

On the other hand, Mr. Pathak maintains that a suit under r. 103 of O. XXI of the Civil Procedure Code is in the nature of a defensive action. Therefore when the plaintiff maintains an action under r. 103, he is resisting, in substance, the claim of the auction purchaser to evict him on the basis of the auction sale. In regard to the second point, Mr. Pathak argues that in a broader sense the auction purchaser must be treated as claiming from the transferor within the meaning of that expression in s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act.

Before considering the authorities cited, it is necessary to refer to the provisions of s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act itself. The first para. of that section runs thus:

"Where any person contracts to transfer for consideration any immoveable property by writing signed by him or on his behalf from which the terms necessary to constitute the transfer can be ascertained with reasonable certainty, and the transferee has, in part performance of the contract, taken possession of the property or any part thereof, or the transferee being already in possession, continues in possession in part performance of the contract and has done some act in furtherance of the contract".

It is not disputed that there is a valid contract of transfer. Nor it is disputed that the transferee is in possession on the basis of that contract. The third para. of s. 53A provides:

"and the transferee has performed or is willing to perform his part of the contract".

The transferee has expressed his willingness to perform his part of the contract in the course of his deposition. It is conceded that the plaintiff's suit for specific performance was barred by limitation at the time of the suit. It is, however, well settled that even if the plaintiff's remedy for specific performance is barred by limitation he has still the right to invoke the protection of s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act. The fourth para. is relevant and runs thus:

"then, notwithstanding that the contract, though required to be registered, has not been registered, or, where there is an instrument of transfer, that the transfer has not been completed in the manner prescribed therefor by the law for the time being in force, the transferor or any person claiming under him shall be debarred from enforcing against the transferee and persons claiming under him any right in respect of the property of which the transferee has taken or continued in possession, other than a right expressly provided by the terms of the contract."

Then there is a proviso:

"Provided that nothing in this section shall affect the rights of a transferee for consideration who has no notice of the contract or of the part performance thereof".

The first question that arises for consideration is what is the nature of the claim put forward by the transferee under s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act. In Probodh Kumar Das v. Dantmara Tea Co. Ltd.,¹ their Lordships of the Privy Council held that s. 53A confers no right of action on a transferee in possession under an unregistered contract of sale and that the right conferred by s. 53A is a right available only to a defendant to protect his possession. The section imposes a statutory bar on the transferor. It does not confer any active title on the transferee. This view was followed by the Bombay High Court in Ramrao Nilkanth v. Purnanand Saraswati Swami.² The principle laid down by the Privy Council in Probodh Kumar's case has been followed by other High Courts in India and is now well settled. There is, however, a sharp conflict of opinion as to whether a suit instituted under r. 103 of O. XXI of the Civil Procedure Code is in the nature of a defensive action or not. In other words the question for consideration is whether such a suit based as it is on the doctrine of part-performance is maintainable. The Privy Council specifically stated that s. 53A does not confer any title on the transferee. It also stated that it does not confer any right of action on a transferee in possession and the only right available to him is to protect his possession as a defendant.

The Allahabad High Court had occasion to consider the scope of the Privy Council decision. The facts were as follows in Ram Chander v. Maharaj Kunwar.³

The plaintiff was a lessee of certain properties under a deed of lease which was duly registered but was not signed by either the lessor or the lessee in accordance with the provisions of s. 107 of the Transfer of Property Act. Nevertheless, the plaintiff had obtained possession of the subjects leased. While the plaintiff was thus enjoying the possession, defendants demolished part of the property. Plaintiff brought a suit for injunction restraining the defendants from interfering with any of the right of the plaintiff as lessee of those properties. It was contended by the plaintiff that as he had entered into possession of the properties in terms of the lease executed in his favour and was willing to perform his part of the contract of the lease though it was not completed in accordance with law the defendants were not entitled to eject him otherwise than by due process of law. Upon a question whether plaintiff could rely upon the provision of s. 53A, Held that "It was defendants who were seeking to enforce their rights under the contract of lease. The plaintiff was only seeking to debar them from doing so and was thus merely protecting his rights. There was therefore nothing in the terms of Sec. 53-A which disentitled the plaintiff from maintaining the suit".

The learned Judges observed that the case before the Privy Council was different from the case on their hands because there (in Probodh Kumar's case), the transferee sought a direct relief in support to his title.

The Allahabad view was followed by the Chief Court of Oudh in Firdos Jahan v. Mohd. Yunus.⁴ In that case a suit was brought by the plaintiff under O. XXI, r. 103 of the Civil Procedure Code, in the following circumstances:

Mt. Firdos Jehan's husband, Sheikh Habibullah, was the tenant of a house in Lucknow which was owned by Dr. Mohamed Yunus, a sub-assistant surgeon in Gonda. In 1936 Dr. Yunus sued Habibullah for ejectment and arrears of rent. In May 1936, a compromise decree was passed according to which Habibullah was to vacate the house by August 31. He did not vacate and on September 17, Dr. Yunus applied for execution of his decree for ejectment. At this stage, Mt. Firdos Jehan, who was living with her husband in the house, appeared on the scene. Her story was that she came to know that Dr. Yunus wanted to sell the house and she got into touch with Dr. Yunus through one Hakim and negotiations were started for purchase of the house. It was eventually agreed that Mt. Firdos Jehan should buy the house for Rs. 7,800, Rs. 500 were paid to Dr. Yunus as earnest money and the receipt was obtained. She continued in possession under the contract of sale. Dr. Yunus thereafter sold the house to a man named Evas Malli on September 30. He did not inform Evas about the previous agreement. Mt. Firdos having failed in the resistance proceedings, filed a suit under O. XXI, r. 103, of the Civil Procedure Code. It was contended that the suit was not maintainable inasmuch as it was based under s. 53A and s. 53A could only be used by way of defence. This contention was negatived and it was held that although it is a settled law that s. 53A is available by way of defence only, that principle is not applicable to a suit brought by a vendee under O. XXI, r. 103, because the vendee in substance is merely seeking to protect the rights to which he is entitled under s. 53A.

A similar case arose before the Andhra Pradesh High Court in *Achayya v. Venkata Subba Rao*⁵ and the Division Bench comprising Subba Rao C. J. and Viswanatha Sastri, J. held:

"Section 53-A does not either expressly or by necessary implication indicate that the rights conferred on the transferee thereunder can only be invoked as a defendant and not as a plaintiff. Under the section no title passes to a transferee. He cannot file a suit for a declaration of his title to the property or seek to recover possession of the same on the basis of any title conferred to him.

But, if the conditions laid down in the section are complied with, it enables the transferee to defend his possession if the transferor seeks to enforce his rights against the property. This statutory right he can avail himself both as a plaintiff and as defendant provided he is using his right as a shield and not as a sword. Or to put it in other words, he cannot seek to enforce his title but he can resist the attack made by a transferor".

This decision was reiterated by the same Court in the case of Akram Mea v. Mucpl. Corpn., Secunderabad.⁶

The Madras High Court in the case of *Pakkirichi Umma v. Kalandan*⁷ have also taken the view that in respect of suits filed under r. 63 or r. 103, it cannot be said that the plaintiff is using s. 53A as a weapon of offence. At page 703, Ramaswami J. observes:

"The only exception in form, though not in substance, is in cases under the Civil P.C, O. 21, R. 63 or R. 103. In such cases the plaintiff will not be necessarily debarred from the benefit of the rule because where by the nature of the case, as disclosed by the pleadings or otherwise, it is apparent that the transferee comes to the Court to defend his possession against invasion of it by the transferor, he is entitled to invoke the doctrine of part performance. The mere position of a party in the heading of a suit would not determine whether he is or is not entitled to the benefits of the section. Since the object of a suit under O. 21, R. 103, Civil P.C. would be to protect possession and the capacity in which the plaintiff comes to the Court is in reality a defence and the suit would in reality be part of the same proceedings as those in which the transferee's rights are attacked, the plaintiff can take advantage of S. 53A."

Although there is no direct ruling of the Bombay High Court on this question, this Court has discussed the scope of the provisions of r. 103 of O. XXI, Civil Procedure Code, in a number of decisions. In the case of Ramlaxmi v. Bank of Baroda,⁸ the division bench observed:

"A suit under O. 21, R. 103 is evidently for the purpose of establishing the right which the plaintiff claims to the present possession of the property...The question is what is the plaintiff's claim to the present possession of the property, not whether he is the sole owner of the property".

It is thus clear that the only right which the plaintiff puts forward in a suit under O. XXI, r. 103, Civil Procedure Code is the right to maintain his present possession. The suit, therefore, is essentially for the purpose of preserving that right. The objective is to maintain his possession undisturbed.

As against this preponderance of authorities Mr. Guttal relied upon the solitary ruling of the Orissa High Court in Padmalabha v. Appalanarasamma.⁹ The decision was taken by a division bench comprising Ray, C. J. and Jagannathadas J. They were considering the nature of the suit under O. XXI, r. 63, Civil Procedure Code on the basis of s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act. The learned Judges posed the question whether it is open to the transferee under a contract of sale to bring a suit based on s. 53A. The learned Judges observed:

"The section can never be availed of as founding a cause of action; and it cannot, therefore, be urged that what is available to the transferee as a defence in a suit in ejectment by the transferee is available to him as a weapon of attack in an action which takes its rise from an invasion of the transferee's rights under the contract. Moreover, a suit by the transferee against an attaching creditor of the transferor under O. 21, R. 63, Civil P.C., is not one between him and the transferor or anybody claiming under the transferor. Hence the transferee as a plaintiff cannot avail himself of the benefits of the doctrine of part performance of contract for sale as against an invasion in his rights by attaching creditor of the transferor."

The learned Judges repelled the argument that the action under O. XXI, r. 63 is in the nature of a defensive action by pointing out that (p. 145):

"...if this were permissible, it would amount to creating an enforceable right or title to immovable property by means of an unregistered contract-deed and thus to reduce to nullity the effect of Section 49, Indian Registration Act..."

Thereafter the learned Judges referred to decisions of various High Courts which had held that a suit under r. 63 or r. 103 of the Civil Procedure Code substantially is a defensive action, and observed: (p. 147).

"...while purporting to give effect to S. 53-A, T.P. Act, they do, in effect, make use of the 'doctrine of part performance' as the basis of an action on the analogy of the practice on the equity side in England."

With respect, I am unable to accept the view taken by the Orissa High Court for the simple reason that the learned Judges have not examined s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act in the context of O. XXI, r. 103 of the Civil Procedure Code and have laid emphasis upon the provisions of s. 49 of the Indian Registration Act and s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act which have relevance only on the question of the title. The transfer immoveable properties the value of which is Rs. 100 or more can only be effected, by a registered instrument under s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act. Section 49 of the Indian Registration Act provides that documents which required compulsory registration are not admissible in evidence in any suit or proceedings for any purpose. The rigour of s. 49 of the Indian Registration Act and s. 54 of the Transfer of Property Act has been partially relieved by the provisions of s. 53A. In the case of a suit filed under r. 103 all that the plaintiff can claim is that he has a right to present possession of the property and the question of title is not relevant. In essence such a suit is defensive in character. I, therefore, prefer to follow the view taken by the Allahabad, Oudh, Madras and Andhra Pradesh High Courts to the view taken by the Orissa High Court on this point.

The next and more important point for consideration is whether the auction purchaser can be regarded as a person claiming under the transferor. I have already cited all the relevant clauses of s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act. The relevant portion of the fourth clause, on the interpretation of which the decision of this turns, runs thus:

"...the transferor or any person claiming under him shall be debarred from enforcing against the transferee and persons claiming under him any right in respect of the property of which the transferee has taken or continued in possession."

The short question for consideration is whether the auction purchaser in execution can be treated as a person claiming under the transferor within the meaning of that expression as used in fourth clause of s. 53A. There was considerable controversy prior to the amendment of s. 47 in the Civil Procedure Code as to whether the auction purchaser could be regarded as a representative either of the judgment-debtor or of the judgment-creditor. The Bombay High Court had consistently taken the view that the auction purchaser is neither the representative of the judgment-debtor nor of the judgment-creditor. Section 47 provides that all questions arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed or their representatives shall be determined by the Court executing the decree and not by a separate suit. The Explanation to s. 47 before it was amended ran thus:

"For the purposes of this section, a plaintiff whose suit has been dismissed, a defendant against whom a suit has been dismissed are parties to the suit".

In Hanmantagouda Nagangouda v. Shivappa Dundappa: District Local Board, Belgaum v. Shivappa Dundappa,¹⁰ this Court held:

"A purchaser at an auction held by Court in execution of a decree who is a stranger is not a representative of either the judgment-debtor or the decree-holder [judgment-creditor]."

This view followed earlier decisions of the Bombay High Court in Gangadhar Dhanjishet v. Balwant Kashirao; *Supdusing Daulatsing v. Balwant Kashirao*¹¹ and in Narsinhbhat v. Bando Krishna.¹² The view taken by some of the other High Courts was to the contrary and it was held that the auction purchaser must be treated as a representative of the judgment-debtor. In order to put the matter beyond the pale of controversy, the Legislature amended the Explanation to s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code and substituted the following explanation by Act No. LXVI of 1956:

"For the purposes of this section, a plaintiff whose suit has been dismissed, a defendant against whom a suit has been dismissed and a purchaser at a sale in execution of the decree are parties to the suit.

It is pertinent to note that the Legislature, by this explanation did not constitute the auction purchaser as the representative of the judgment-debtor.

A.I.R. Bom. 210.

On the other hand they chose the less controversial line by making the auction purchaser in execution as equivalent to a party to the suit. It is difficult, on general principles, to hold the auction purchaser as in any way the representative of the judgment-debtor or a person claiming under the judgment-debtor. It is true that the auction purchaser gets the right, title and interest of the judgment-debtor. But he does not get it by virtue of an act of parties. He does not get the title as a result of an agreement with the transferor. He does not obtain his right in accordance with the wishes of the transferor but contrary to his wishes. In the first place it is clear that the decree holder or the judgment-creditor makes a claim against the judgment-debtor and obtains a decree. After obtaining the decree he gets the property attached in execution. In so far as he proceeds to attach the property in execution he takes a step contrary to the interest of the judgment-debtor and against his consent. When the property is brought to sale, the judgment-creditor himself may purchase the property after securing permission of the Court or a third person may purchase the same. Whether it is the judgment-creditor or a third person who is purchasing the property, it is difficult to hold that either of them steps into the shoes of the judgment-debtor.

On this point strong reliance was placed by Mr. Pathak on the decision by King J. in Audinarayudu v. Mangamma.¹³ The facts of the case were that the decree-holder had certain property allegedly belonging to his judgment-debtors attached. Defendant No. 4 intervened with a claim petition in which it was asserted that defendants Nos. 1 and 2 had contracted to sell the property to her and had duly put her in possession. There was thus, what was in effect a plea under s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act. The District Munsiff dismissed the claim. An appeal was preferred in the District Court and the learned District Judge allowed the plaintiff's claim. Then a second appeal was preferred before the Madras High Court which was decided by King J. sitting singly. The main question that came up for consideration was whether the judgment-creditor could be regarded as claiming under the judgment-debtor. After conceding that the interest of the judgment-debtor and that of the judgment-creditor are distinctly adverse and also after conceding that the judgment-creditor cannot be called a legal representative of the judgment-debtor at the stage in which he is proceeding to attach the judgment-debtor's property, the learned Judge proceeded to consider the eventuality of the property having been sold in auction and on that basis posed the question whether the auction purchaser can be regarded as claiming under the transferor. At p. 707 the learned Judge asserted in somewhat categorical terms: "it can now no longer be denied that the auction purchaser is the legal representative of the judgment-debtor". This statement is justified on the basis of the view that prevailed in the Madras High Court viz. that the auction purchaser is a representative of the judgment-debtor under s. 47 of the Civil Procedure Code. (Vide Annamalai Mudali v. Ramasami Mudali.)¹⁴ According to the learned Judge, as soon as the sale is held, the rights of the judgment-creditor revives with irresistible force. The learned Judge then proceeded to observe (p. 707):

"...In these circumstances, I prefer to hold that the expression 'claiming under the transferor' is wide enough in S. 53A to include a judgment-creditor in the situation in which the appellant in this appeal now stands".

With respect, I cannot accept the view taken by King J. The learned Judge took up the hypothetical case of the proceedings culminating in the sale of the property and on that assumption considered the position of the auction purchaser. On the analogy of the position of the auction purchaser, the learned Judge held that the judgment-creditor also will be included in the expression "claiming under the transferor". This view is based on the assumption that the auction purchaser is the legal representative of the judgment-debtor, a position which has never been accepted in this Court.

13 [1943] A.I.R. Mad. 706.

14 [1941] A.I.R. Mad. 161, F.B.

The Orissa High Court had occasion to consider this aspect of the matter in the very case to which reference has already been made by me (Padmala-bha v. Appalanarasamma). I have already set out the facts of the case and it is not necessary to repeat them. At para. 30, the learned Judges observed (p. 149):

"There is another reason equally fatal to the plaintiff's suit. His suit is not one between him and the transferor or anybody claiming under him (the transferor). The attaching creditor derives nothing from the judgment-debtors by way of any right to purchase or charge upon the property. He wants to attach the property against the will and consent of the judgment-debtors."

After citing the relevant passage from the judgment of King J. in Audinayudu v. Mangamma the learned Judge proceeded to observe:

"With great respect, I cannot place myself in the same position as his Lordship, King, J. At the time of attachment, the attaching creditor's purchase, and the sale following it, would be mere expectation. I shall not be understood to accept, without reservation, the view that an auction purchaser in execution of a money decree is in general, a representative of the judgment-debtor."

In my opinion the auction purchaser is not a person claiming under the transferor within the meaning of that expression in para. 4 of s. 53A of the Transfer of Property Act. The result, therefore, is that the appeal succeeds.

Appeal allowed. The decree of the appellate Court is set aside and that of the trial Court is restored. There will be no orders as to costs.

Appeal allowed.

Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950 (Hyd. Act XXI of 1950), Secs. 38(6), 38E(1)—Indian Registration Act (XVI of 1908), Secs. 17(1), 49—Certificate issued under s. 38(6)(a) of Hyderabad Tenancy Act whether admissible in evidence—Whether such certificate requires registration.

A certificate issued under s. 38(6)(a) of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950, operates as a legal transfer and it does not require registration. It is, therefore, admissible in evidence.

NAIK J. This Revision Application raises a somewhat ticklish point under the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950. Respondent No. 1, who is hereinafter described as the plaintiff, filed a suit in ejectment against the petitioner, who is hereinafter described as defendant No. 2, in respect of survey No. 292/D and No. 293/D at village Mangrul, Taluka Kallam. The plaintiff contended that while he was enjoying the land as owner, the husband of defendant No. 1, Sahebrao, forcibly dispossessed him. According to him the date of dispossession is March 15, 1950. It is common ground that Sahebrao died on September 19, 1950, leaving his widow as the only heir. The plaintiff alleges that defendant No. 2, in collusion with defendant No. 1, entered into possession of the land in suit. The plaintiff has, therefore, claimed possession and mesne profits from both the defendants.

Defendant No. 1 appeared and admitted the plaintiff's claim. Defendant No. 2 contended that the land in dispute was gifted to Sahebrao by Krishnaji on the ground that Sahebrao happened to be an illegitimate son of Krishnaji. According to defendant No. 2, he started cultivating the land as tenant of defendant No. 1 since 1955. Defendant No. 2 alleged that defendant No. 1 entered into a deed agreeing to sell the land for a sum of Rs. 2,500. A deed of agreement was executed and Rs. 2,000 were paid under the agreement. The remaining amount was stipulated to be paid at the time of the execution of the sale-deed. Since defendant No. 1 did not fulfil the contract, he filed a suit for specific performance (Suit No. 24 of 1958) and on admission by defendant No. 1, the suit has also been decreed. Defendant No. 1 did not execute the sale-deed in pursuance of the decree for specific performance. Therefore defendant No. 1 applied to the Agricultural Lands Tribunal under s. 38(3). The Tribunal determined the price and defendant No. 2 deposited the amount before the Tribunal. It appears that after the written statement, a certificate was issued under s. 38(6) of the Hyderabad Tenancy Act. Before the framing of the issues defendant No. 2 tendered the certificate in evidence. The plaintiff objected to the admissibility of the document. The trial Court held that the document required registration under s. 17(1) and inasmuch as it has not been registered it is not admissible under s. 49 of the Indian Registration Act. It is against that decision that defendant No. 2 has come up in revision. The only point for consideration is whether the certificate is admissible in evidence or not.

Before considering the question of the admissibility or otherwise, it is necessary to refer to the provisions contained in Chapter 4, relating to protected tenants. Section 34 defines a protected tenant to mean a tenant in respect of land if he—

(a) has held such land as a tenant continuously—

(i) for a period of not less than six years, being a period wholly included in the Fasli years 1342 to 1352 (both years inclusive), or

(ii) for a period of not less than six years immediately preceding the 1st day of January 1948, or

(iii) for a period of not less than six years commencing not earlier than the 1st day of the Fasli Year 1353 (6th October 1943), and completed before the commencement of this Act, and

(b) has cultivated such land personally during such period.

Section 35 relates to decisions on claims and s. 36 relates to the recovery of possession by a protected tenant. They are not relevant for the present discussion. Section 37 embodies the definition of 'deemed tenant' and provides that "Every person who at the commencement of this Act holds as tenant any land in respect of which no person is deemed to be a protected tenant under section 34, shall, on the expiration of one year from such commencement or, the final rejection of all claims by any other person to be deemed under section 34 to be a protected tenant in respect of such land..."

Section 37 also relates to another category of deemed tenant and provides that every person who at the commencement of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1950, holds as tenant any land in respect of which he is not deemed to be protected tenant under this Act, shall be deemed to be a protected tenant if the total area of the land owned by the landholder including the land under the cultivation of his tenants is more than three times the area of a family holding. It is not disputed that defendant No. 2 is not a protected tenant either within the meaning of s. 34, 37 or 37A. Defendant

No. 1 has himself admitted that defendant No. 2 was his tenant. It is thus clear that defendant No. 2 is an ordinary tenant as distinguished from a protected tenant.

That takes me to the consideration of the provisions of s. 38. Sub-section (1) provides that a protected tenant or an ordinary tenant shall at any time after the commencement of the Hyderabad Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Amendment) Act, 1954, be entitled to purchase the landholder's interest in the land held by the former as a protected tenant or an ordinary tenant. Sub-section (1), therefore, speaks of the right of a protected tenant or an ordinary tenant, as the case may be, to get the land sold in his favour. Sub-section (2) relates to a protected tenant and provides that a protected tenant who desires to exercise the right conferred by sub-s. (1) shall make an offer to the land-holder stating the price which he is prepared to pay for the landholder's interest in the land. Sub-section (2a)(a) relates to an ordinary tenant and in effect assimilates his position to that of a protected tenant in sub-s. (2). It is clear that in pursuance of his right to purchase the land, it is open to the protected tenant or an ordinary tenant to make an offer about the price on which he is prepared to purchase the land. Sub-section (3) takes into account the contingency of the landholder refusing to accept the offer within a period of 3 months and provides that in that eventuality the protected tenant or the ordinary tenant may apply to the Tribunal for determination of a reasonable price for the land. Sub-section (4) relates to the procedure to be followed by the Tribunal in determining the price of the land. After the amount is determined sub-s. (5) provides that the protected tenant or the ordinary tenant, as the case may be, shall deposit with the Tribunal the amount of the price determined by the Tribunal either in lump sum or in instalments. Sub-section (6)(a) is the most relevant portion for our consideration and it runs thus: (H. T. & A. L. Act) (p. 19):

"On deposit or recovery of the entire amount of the reasonable price (fixed by the tribunal) being made, the tribunal shall issue a certificate in the prescribed form to the protected tenant or the ordinary tenant, as the case may be, declaring him to be the purchaser of the land and such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the sale as against the land-holder and all persons interested therein."

The scheme laid down by s. 38 runs into different stages. The first stage recognises the right of the protected tenant to have the land sold to him. At the second stage the tenant (protected or otherwise) is to make an offer to the landholder regarding the price, of the land. The third stage is reached when the landholder refuses or fails to accept the offer within a period of 3 months. The fourth stage relates to the fixation of the price according to the mode prescribed in sub-s. (4). At the fifth stage the tenant is expected to deposit the amount of the price with the Tribunal either in lump sum or in instalments. After all these stages have been crossed, the final stage is reached and that has been explained in sub-s. (6). Sub-section (6) in effect provides that on the deposit of the entire amount, the Tribunal shall issue a certificate declaring the tenant to be the purchaser and such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the sale. The form of the certificate is in form 13 of the Rules which runs thus:

"Whereas Shri... is the protected/ordinary tenant of the land specified below belonging to the land-holder Shri... and whereas under the provisions of sub-section (5) of Section 38 of the Tenancy Act, the tenant was required to deposit and has deposited as the price Rs..., it is hereby declared that the said tenant Shri... was deemed to be the purchaser of the land under provisions of sub-section (6) of section 38 of the said Act."

The effect of the certificate has been stated in sub-s. (6) itself namely that "such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the sale as against the landholder and all persons interested therein."

Mr. Choudhari contended that s. 38 envisages the execution of the sale-deed by the landholder, in case an agreement is reached about the price of the land. When such an agreement is not forthcoming then the price is fixed by the Tribunal and after the amount determined by the Tribunal is deposited, a certificate is issued. According to Mr. Choudhari, a certificate does not and cannot stand on higher footing than a sale-deed. He argued that such a sale-deed would not confer any title in the absence of a registered sale-deed. He carried the argument a step further by referring to s. 38E of the same Act. Section 38E(1) runs thus:

“...the Government may, by notification (in the Official Gazette) declare in respect of any area and from such date as may be specified therein that ownership of all lands held by protected tenants which they are entitled to purchase from their landholders in such area under any provision of this chapter shall stand transferred to and vest in the protected tenants holding them and from such date the protected tenants shall be deemed to be the full owners of such lands.”

Sub-section (2) speaks of the certificate which again is to be issued in the prescribed form. Sub-section (2) also lays down that such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the protected tenant having become the owner of the land with effect from the date of the certificate. Sub-section (3) reserved the right of the tenant to apply to the Tribunal for determination of reasonable price of the land and the price so fixed can be recovered as arrears of land revenue from the defaulting tenant. It will be at once clear that s. 38-E is confined to a case of protected tenant whereas s. 38 applies to the case of a protected as well as an ordinary tenant. Mr. Choudhari referred to the wording of s. 38-E(1) namely “that the land shall stand transferred to and vest in the protected tenants holding them and from such date the protected tenants shall be deemed to be the full owners of such lands”.

It is true that there is difference in the language of s. 38(6) and s. 38E of the Hyderabad Tenancy Act. All that s. 38(6) provides is that the certificate shall declare the tenant as the purchaser and such certificate shall be a conclusive evidence of the sale as against the land-holder and all persons interested therein. The wording of s. 38-E goes a step further and says “that the ownership of the land shall stand transferred and vest in the protected tenant”. Mr. Choudhari argued that the transfer under s. 38-E(1) is statutory transfer and would not require any registration. This question was considered by me in *Narayan Lazman v. Keshav Bhimji*¹ wherein I observed (p. 891):

“...Section 38-E applies when the Government issues a notification that the same may be applicable in respect of a particular area. Section 38-E provides for a statutory transfer of ownership and it does not contemplate the execution of a sale-deed by the vendor in favour of the vendee. A protected tenant becomes the owner of the land by virtue of the provisions of s. 38-E of the Act, when all the conditions laid down in that section have been fulfilled notwithstanding that a regular sale-deed has not been passed. There is nothing to suggest in the wording of s. 38-E of the Act that it allows a sort of option to the tenant”.

Then I have discussed the scheme of s. 38E of the Act. The mere fact that the wording of s. 38-E(1) is different from the wording of s. 38(6) is no ground for holding that s. 38-E(1) brings about the effect of a statutory transfer and s. 38(6) does not do so but merely contemplates the execution of a further document or the registration of the certificate. It is significant to note that under s. 38(6) the determination of the price and its payment precede the issue of the certificate whereas under s. 38E(1) the statutory transfer takes place as soon as a notification is issued; and then, if the protected tenant fails to pay the amount within 90 days, the amount becomes recoverable as land revenue arrears. It is clear that s. 38-E is intended to confer higher rights because it relates to protected tenant. In the case of a protected tenant as soon as the notification is issued statutory transfer takes place notwithstanding that the price has not been determined and has not been paid. On the other hand under s. 38, the tenant must in the first instance exhaust all his remedies of making an offer and getting the price determined and then make a deposit in accordance with the decision of the Tribunal. The position of the tenant under s. 38(6) is inferior to that of the protected tenant under s. 38E, but once the tenant has gone through the procedures of making the offer and getting the price determined and depositing the said amount, I fail to understand why there should be any difference in his position and that of protected tenant. Section 38(6) clearly says that the certificate shall declare the tenant to be the purchaser of the land. This declaration will have the same effect as a regular deed of sale or gift as the case may be. But the section does not stop at this declaration. It goes further and says that the certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the sale as against the land-holder and all persons interested therein. Similar effect is given to a statutory transfer under s. 38-E, sub-s. (2). Sub-section (2) also says that the certificate shall declare the protected tenant to be owner and such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the protected tenant having become the owner of the land. The difference between the two is only of a terminological character. Section 38(6) (a) says that the certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the sale whereas s. 38-E(2) speaks of the certificate affording a conclusive evidence of the tenant having become the owner of the land. I think that the difference is only in form and has no significance in substance. As soon as the certificate is issued under s. 38(6) the person holding the certificate will be assimilated to the position of a person in whose favour declaration of ownership is made under s. 38-E. There is nothing to indicate that the Legislature contemplated the need of registering the certificate. Much less the need of execution of another document. I am unable to understand how another document of sale could be obtained by the holder of the certificate. Ordinarily there is no agreement of sale in his favour, and he cannot seek specific performance of the agreement of sale. Of course in the present case there was an agreement of sale, and defendant No. 2 has obtained a decree for specific performance; but that is neither here nor there. I am unable to see how ordinarily the land-holder can be compelled to pass a sale deed voluntarily. All that can be urged is that the certificate should be got registered. But the difficulty will be that the certificate is not an 'instrument' within the meaning of that word in s. 17 of the Registration Act. Apart from this I do not think that the Legislature has contemplated that the certificate needs to be registered. In my view, therefore, as soon as the certificate is issued under s. 38(6), it operates as legal transfer and there is no need of registration of the document. In that view of the case I hold that the document is admissible in evidence and ought to have been allowed to be produced in evidence. I should hasten to add that I am not deciding the question as to whether the certificate would be conclusive so far as the plaintiff is concerned. The question is whether defendant No. 2 who claims to be the tenant of defendant No. 1 acquires any rights of ownership as against the plaintiff and if so what will be the effect of that acquisition upon the plaintiff's rights. This judgment is intended to decide the simple point raised before me namely as to whether the certificate is admissible in evidence or not. The application succeeds. The decision of the trial Court is set aside. It is directed that the certificate should be admitted in evidence. No orders as to costs.

Order accordingly.

BHAGWANDAS DWARKADAS.*

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXXVII; Sec. 151—Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Rules, 1948. Rule 8—Decree passed under O. XXXVII—Application to set aside decree under O. XXXVII, r. 4. dismissed as no special ground made out—Whether resort to s. 151 to set aside decree permissible—Validity of r. 8.

Express provision is made by O. XXXVII, r. 4, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, for setting aside a decree passed under O. XXXVII of the Code and, therefore, if a case does not come within the provisions of that rule, there is no scope to resort to s. 151 of the Code for setting aside such a decree.

Rule 8 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Rules, 1948, is not ultra vires.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

D. R. Dhanuka, K. Rajendra Chaudhuri and K. R. Chaudhuri, for the appellant.

Purnushottam Tricumdas, with S. T. Tejoriwala, J. B. Dadacharji, O. C. Mathur and Ravinder Narain, for the respondent.

SARKAR J. The appellant was the tenant of the respondent of a third floor flat in Bombay. The tenancy was governed by the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates (Control) Act, 1947, hereafter referred to as the Rents Act. We will refer to the appellant as the tenant and the respondent as the landlord.

The landlord obtained a decree in ejectment against the tenant in a suit filed under O. XXXVII of the Code of Civil Procedure and the present appeal arises out of an application made by the tenant to set aside that decree under r. 4 of that Order. The question is, should the decree be set aside?

There were various proceedings between the parties before the judgment under appeal came to be passed but it will be unnecessary to refer to all of them. The suit was filed in the Court of Small Causes, Bombay, on November 1, 1960 for ejectment on two grounds, namely, (1) a certain default in payment of rent and (2) unlawful sub-letting of the demised premises. The Rents Act permits ejectment if these grounds are proved. The tenant entered an appearance to the suit on December 3, 1960. On March 23, 1961, the landlord took out a summons for judgement under O. XXXVII, r. 2 and the tenant opposed that summons by an affidavit, setting out various defences to the claim for ejectment to the details of which it is unnecessary to refer. On May 2, 1961, an order was made by consent of parties on that summons directing the tenant to deposit moneys in Court by certain instalments on account of the arrears of rent and providing that if it made a default in making the payments on the dates mentioned, the suit was to be set down for disposal in accordance with law. The effect of this order clearly was to give a conditional leave to defend so that on failure to perform the conditions the tenant would, under the provisions of O. XXXVII, r. 2, no longer have the right to defend the action.

Now the first instalment under the consent order was payable on June 1, 1961. It was not however paid. The tenant thereafter made an application for extension of time and this was rejected on June 22, 1961. It filed an appeal against the order refusing extension of time but this was rejected. The tenant then appealed against the consent order of May 2, 1961 but this also failed. Thereafter the suit was placed on the list on June 28, 1961, and a decree in ejectment was passed on that date under the provisions of O. XXXVII on the basis of the statements made in the plaint and without permitting the tenant to appear and oppose. This is the decree which the tenant sought to set aside. These are all the proceedings between the parties that need be mentioned for the purpose of this judgment.

On September 12, 1961, the application under r. 4 of O. XXXVII to set aside the ejectment decree was made to the trial Court. The trial Court dismissed the application holding that no special ground had been made out by the tenant as required by r. 4, O. XXXVII to set aside the decree. The tenant then appealed from this Order to a bench of the Court of Small Causes under s. 29 of the Rents Act which is said to have treated the appeal as a revision. That bench agreed with the trial Court that no special circumstances as required under r. 4 of O. XXXVII had been made out to justify the setting aside of the decree, but it observed that that Court had not considered whether relief could be given to the tenant under s. 151 of the Code and itself set aside the decree acting under that section. The landlord appealed to the High Court from the judgment of the bench. The High Court agreed with the Courts below that no special circumstances justifying the setting aside of the decree existed. It, however, held that there was no scope for applying s. 151 to the present case as r. 4 of O. XXXVII of the Code had made special provision for it. It also rejected the other contentions raised by the tenant, to one of which we will refer later. In the result the High Court allowed the appeal and hence the present appeal to this Court.

Learned advocate for the tenant contended that the High Court was wrong in its view that s. 151 had no application to the present case. We are unable to accept this contention. It has been observed by this Court in Manohar Lal v. Seth Hirakal,¹ "The inherent powers are to be exercised by the Court in very exceptional circumstances, for which the Code lays down no procedure." This is a well-recognised principle. Rule 4 of O. XXXVII expressly gives power to a Court to set aside a decree passed under the provisions of that Order. Express provision is thus made for setting aside a decree passed under O. XXXVII, and hence if a case does not come within the provisions of that rule, there is no scope to resort to s. 151 for setting aside such a decree. We, therefore, agree with the High Court that the appellate bench of the Court of Small Causes was in error in setting aside the ex parte decree in exercise of powers under s. 151. Again all the Courts have taken the view, and we think rightly, that no circumstances justifying the setting aside of the decree under r. 4 of O. XXXVII existed in the present case. We did not also understand learned advocate for the tenant to rely on any such circumstances in this Court. No question of setting aside the decree under that Order, therefore, arises.

The next point argued by learned advocate for the tenant was that O. XXXVII was not applicable to a decree in ejectment in view of the provisions of the Rents Act in terms of which alone such a decree could be passed. Now s. 49 of the Act gives the Government power to make rules for the purpose of giving effect to its provisions. The Government made certain rules under these powers and r. 8 of these rules provides that suits under the Act may be instituted in accordance with the procedure laid down in O. XXXVII. It is by virtue of this rule that the landlord filed his suit for ejectment under the procedure laid down in O. XXXVII. The High Court of Bombay had made certain amendments to the provisions of O. XXXVII as contained in the Code. Rule 2 of that Order as so amended and so far as relevant, is in these terms:

Rule 2.—(1) "Suits in which the landlord seeks to recover possession of immovable property... may, in case the plaintiff desires to proceed hereunder, be instituted by presenting a plaint in the form prescribed but the summons shall be in Form No. 4 in Appendix B, or in such other form as may be from time to time prescribed.

(2) In any case in which the plaint and summons are in such forms respectively, the defendant shall not defend the suit unless he enters an appearance and obtains leave from a judge as hereinafter provided so to defend; and in default of his entering an appearance and of his obtaining such leave to defend, the allegations in the plaint shall be deemed to be admitted, and the plaintiff shall be entitled to a decree for possession...."

It is by virtue of this rule that the decree in the present case was passed without permitting the tenant to be heard. This was because the tenant had been given leave to defend on May 2, 1961, on a condition that it paid the arrears of rent by instalments as prescribed in the order. This order had been made by consent and the tenant had failed to perform that condition, the result of which was to deprive him of the leave to defend earlier granted; the case became one as if no leave to defend had been given to the tenant and upon which the landlord became entitled to a decree under sub-r. (2) of r. 2 of O. XXXVII.

The contention of learned advocate for the tenant is that under the provisions of the Rents Act the landlord is not entitled to a decree as a matter of right; the Court has to consider the position of the tenant and has a discretion to pass or not to pass a decree. Therefore, to a suit governed by the Act the provisions of r. 2 of O. XXXVII, which make it incumbent on the Court to pass a decree in circumstances coming within that sub-rule, are inapplicable. It is on this ground that it is said that r. 8 of the Rules made under the Rents Act is ultra vires and void.

The first difficulty that appears to us to arise on this line of argument is that even if the contention is right, we cannot in the present appeal make an order setting aside the decree. The appeal has come to us out of an application originally filed in a Court of Small Causes under the provisions of O. XXXVII, r. 4, by the tenant itself. If the present contention is right, then the tenant's application was wholly incompetent. The result of that however would not be to set aside the decree; it would only cause the dismissal of the tenant's application. The tenant has to take other appropriate proceedings to show that the decree was ineffective in case it wants to contend that the suit had not been brought according to the procedure permissible in law, and that it had been illegally deprived of a hearing. It itself having resorted to O. XXXVII, it scarcely lies in it now to contend that that Order is wholly inapplicable. Furthermore, by consenting to the Order of May 2, 1961, it had in this case clearly agreed that the suit had been rightly brought under O. XXXVII. It cannot be allowed to change its position in the proceedings arising out of that very suit. For that reason alone we think no relief can be granted to it in this appeal based on the present contention.

On the merits too, we think that the contention is fallacious. It proceeds on the basis that when leave to defend has been refused to a defendant, the Court is bound to pass a decree. It seems to us that what sub-r. (2) of r. 2 of O. XXXVII contemplates is that the Court will accept the statements in the plaint as correct and on those statements pass such decree as the plaintiff may in law be entitled to. If, for example, the plaint discloses no cause of action, the Court cannot pass any decree in favour of the plaintiff. If this were not so, the words "allegations in the plaint shall be deemed to be admitted" in sub-r. (2) of r. 2 of O. XXXVII would have been unnecessary. The Court in making a decree under sub-r. (2), r. 2 of O. XXXVII has to keep the law in mind. If the law requires the Court to exercise a discretion on the facts deemed to be admitted, it will have to do so.

In the procedure laid down under O. XXXVII the defendant may not be allowed at the hearing to place his side of the case for assisting the Court in the exercise of that discretion, but that does not create any conflict with the Rents Act. A rule can be made quite consistently with the Act that the defendant will have to adopt a certain procedure and to act within a certain time in order to be heard in that matter. Suppose a defendant does not put in an appearance in a suit for ejectment not brought under O. XXXVII, can he say that the Act gave him a right to appear at the hearing and place his case before the Judge? We feel no doubt that such a thing is not contemplated by the Act and cannot be permitted. Rules of procedure may be framed for the exercise of rights and such rules are not ultra vires only because the right has to be exercised in accordance with them. Therefore we do not think that r. 8 is ultra vires.

In what we have said in the preceding paragraph we have proceeded on the assumption that the Court has a discretion. Certain provisions in ss. 12 and 13 of the Rents Act had been read to us and it had been contended that they conferred that discretion on the Court. In the view that we have taken, it is unnecessary to express any opinion on that contention and we do not do so.

In the result this appeal fails and it is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

THE MUNICIPAL CORPORATION OF GREATER BOMBAY

v.

LALA PANCHAM.*

Bombay Municipal Corporation Act (Bom. III of 1888), Secs. 354R, 354RA; Schedule GG. Clause 2—Constitution of India, Art. 19(1)(f) & (g)—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XLI, r. 27—Sections 354R & 354RA whether constitutional—Person aggrieved by clearance order under s. 354RA not preferring appeal under cl. 2, Sch. GG or his appeal dismissed—Whether remedy by suit available to such person—Expression “any person aggrieved” in Sch. GG, cl. 2 whether includes tenant or occupant of building likely to be dishoused as result of clearance order—Whether open to such tenant to lodge objection to order under s. 354RA(4).

The restrictions on the tenants' right to hold property enacted by ss. 354R and 354RA of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act are not unreasonable and the provisions of the sections are valid.

Finality is given to a clearance order under s. 354RA of the Act after its confirmation by the Government and its publication in the manner prescribed in clause (1) of Schedule GG to the Act, subject only to the result of an appeal preferred under clause (2) of Schedule GG by a person aggrieved. If no such appeal is preferred or if such appeal is filed and dismissed no remedy by suit is available to a person like a tenant who contends that he is aggrieved.

The words “and specifying the time within and the manner in which objections thereto can be made to the Commissioner” occurring at the end of clause (b) of s. 354RA(4) of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act should be read as governing not only the rest of clause (b) of s. 354RA(4) but also clause (a) of s. 354RA(4).

The expression “any person aggrieved” in clause 2 of Schedule GG to the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act is sufficiently wide to include not only a tenant but also an occupant of a building who is likely to be dishoused as a result of the action taken under a clearance order.

It is open to a tenant of the building included in the area to which a clearance order made under s. 354RA of the Act relates, to lodge an objection to the proposed order under s. 354RA(4).

evidence it can pronounce judgment in a case. It does not entitle the appellate Court to let in fresh evidence only for the purpose of pronouncing judgment in a particular way. It is only for removing a lacuna in the evidence that the appellate Court is empowered to admit additional evidence.

MUDHOLKAR J. The question which falls for decision in this appeal from the judgment of the High Court of Bombay is whether the suit instituted by the plaintiffs in the City Civil Court, Bombay, was maintainable. The plaintiffs are some of the tenants occupying different rooms in a group of buildings known as Dhobi Chawls (and also known as the Colaba Land Mill Chawls) situate on Lala Nigam Road, Colaba, Bombay. There are a large number of other tenants also who reside or carry on business in these Chawls and the plaintiffs instituted a suit in a representative capacity on behalf of all the tenants. Defendant No. 1 to the suit is the Municipal Corporation of Greater Bombay and the remaining defendants Nos 2 to 4 are landlords of the plaintiffs.

The buildings and the land on which they stand belong to the Colaba Land Mill Co., Ltd., Bombay. Under an agreement dated May 16, 1956, called the Demolition Agreement defendants Nos. 2 to 4 undertook for a certain consideration to demolish the buildings which are admittedly in a dilapidated condition after taking the permission of the Rent Controller, Bombay. Under cl. 7 of that agreement defendants Nos. 2 to 4 were to be put in possession of the buildings and land on which they stand, with leave and licence of the Company and were liable to pay Rs. 20,221-8-0 p.a. to the Company till the demolition of the buildings and thereafter they were to hold the land as tenants at will of the Company. Until the demolition of the buildings, defendants Nos. 2 to 4 were entitled to the rents payable by the tenants occupying the buildings and were liable to pay monthly taxes, insurance premia and other dues payable in respect of the buildings. After the demolition of the buildings defendants Nos. 2 to 4 were entitled to all the materials and debris but had to pay Rs. 40,000 as the price thereof to the Company. Out of this amount these defendants had to pay and had actually paid Rs. 10,000 at the time of the agreement.

The plaintiffs' contention is that the buildings were in a dilapidated condition for a number of years and that between August 1951 and May 1956 as many as 138 notices were served on the Company for effecting repairs to the buildings but they took no action whatsoever in this regard. The plaintiffs further say that between November 1956 and January 29, 1960, eleven notices were served on defendants Nos. 2 to 4 for the same purpose but no action was taken by them either on those notices. Further the Company and defendants Nos 2 to 4 were prosecuted 71 times for not complying with the notices but even these prosecutions proved ineffective. Their contention is that the Company as also defendants Nos. 2 to 4 deliberately refrained from carrying out the repairs because they wanted to demolish the buildings and in order to facilitate the attainment of this object they invited various notices issued by the Corporation and the prosecutions launched by it.

The plaintiffs admit that the Corporation, in exercise of the powers conferred by s. 354R of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, 1888, (hereafter referred to as the Act) have declared the area in which the buildings stand as a clearance area and under s. 354RA of that Act made a clearance order which has been duly confirmed by the State Government. According to them, however, these provisions are ultra vires of arts. 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution. Further, according to them defendant No. 1 has abused the provisions of the Act and that the action taken by it is mala fide. No particulars of mala fides have, however, been set out in the plaint.

The defendants denied that the aforesaid provisions are ultra vires and also denied that the Order was made mala fide. They further contended that the present suit was barred by virtue of the provisions of cl. (2) of Schedules GG to the Act and was also barred by time.

The trial Court dismissed the suit mainly upon the ground that it was not tenable. An appeal was taken by the plaintiffs to the High Court which was dismissed summarily by Datar J., on August 25, 1961. On the same day the plaintiffs preferred an appeal under the Letters Patent which went up before a Division Bench consisting of Patel and Palekar JJ. The learned Judges permitted the plaintiffs to amend the plaint over-ruling the objections of the defendants. In their judgment the learned Judges held that the suit was not barred. Then they proceeded to consider the question of mala fides. According to them the plaintiffs had pleaded mala fides but that they had omitted to give particulars. They also observed that it was true that no evidence was led by the plaintiffs before the trial Court and ordinarily they would not have been entitled to lead fresh evidence at that stage, much less so at the stage of the appeal under Letters Patent. According to them, however, it is not possible to dispose of the case on the material on record, that there are certain documents on record which, if unexplained,

"support in a large measure the contention of the plaintiffs that defendants 2, 3 and 4 obtained an order by fraud and also that the order was mala fide."

After referring to some of these documents they observed:

"Though therefore no evidence is led on the question of mala fides or fraud committed upon them, it prima facie leads to such an inference, and it would not be proper to decide the question without requiring further evidence."

This observations was followed by another which, we think, is a very unusual one. It is this:

"We particularly want the Commissioner and the City Engineer and the defendants to be examined on this question."

Eventually, the learned Judges remitted the case to the City Civil Court for recording additional evidence and directed that Court to certify the evidence and its findings by the end of November, 1962. After the grant of special leave to the appellants the proceedings before the City Civil Court have been stayed.

We must first address ourselves to the question as to whether the High Court was justified in permitting the amendment to the plaint. By that amendment the plaintiffs have added para. 8A to the plaint. There they have purported to summarise the correspondence which took place between the plaintiffs and the officers of the Corporation and between the landlords and the Corporation. Then they have stated as follows:

"In the premises the plaintiffs say that the Defendants 2, 3 and 4 have fraudulently and wrongfully induced the 1st defendant to make the said order. In the alternative and in any event plaintiffs say that as defendants 2, 3 and 4 have desired (sic) their responsibility to provide accommodation to all the tenants in the new buildings intended to be constructed on the site, the plaintiffs will submit that the approval of the Improvement Committee to the said Order and the subsequent confirmation thereof by the Municipal Corporation and Government was given under a mistake of fact and under circumstances not warranted by the provisions of section 354R and of the law. In the circumstances the plaintiffs submit that the said orders passed by the 1st defendant under section 354R have been passed in utter disregard and in violation of the strict provisions of the said section. The plaintiffs submit that the 1st defendant failed and neglected before making the said order to take any measures whether by arrangement of the programme or otherwise to ensure that as little hardship as possible was inflicted on the tenants. The plaintiffs accordingly submit that the said orders are illegal, invalid and void."

In the plaint as originally filed, in para. 9 they have said the following on the question of mala fides:

"The plaintiffs submit that the action sought to be taken is a clear abuse of the provisions of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act and as such ultra vires the powers conferred upon the defendant No. 1 by the said Act. The plaintiffs, therefore, submit that the action of the defendant No. 1 is mala fide."

In the earlier paragraph the plaintiffs have challenged the validity of s. 354R, and 354RA on the grounds that they confer untrammelled and uncontrolled executive discretion upon the Corporation and its officers and also upon the ground that they are violative of the plaintiffs' rights under art. 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution. They have not indicated why the making of the clearance order by the Corporation was an abuse of the provisions of the Act. No doubt, later in para. 9 they say that the Corporation failed to give a hearing to the plaintiffs and that had they been given an opportunity they would have satisfied the Corporation that the premises in question did not require to be pulled down. While, therefore, it is true that the plaintiffs have characterised the action of the Corporation as "mala fide" the grounds upon which the action is characterised as mala fide appear to be (a) the unconstitutionality of the provisions of ss. 354R and 354RA and (b) failure of the Corporation to give an opportunity to the plaintiffs to satisfy its officers that the premises did not require to be demolished. By the amendment made by them in pursuance of the order of the High Court they have shifted their ground by saying that the landlords have fraudulently and wrongfully induced the Corporation to make the order and plead alternatively that as the landlords have denied their responsibility to provide accommodation to all the tenants in the new building intended to be constructed on the site, a clearance order could not properly be made by the Corporation.

It was urged before us by Mr. Setalvad that an entirely new case has been made out in the amendment and that the plaintiffs did so at the suggestion of the Court. In support of his contention he also referred to the objection of Mr. S. V. Gupte before the High Court to the effect that the plaintiffs had not made an application for the amendment of the plaint. He further, relying upon a reference in the judgment, said that the amendment proposed by the plaintiffs was not found by the Court to be adequate and that it was at the instance of the Court that the plaintiffs proposed the amendment which now actually finds place as para. 8A of the plaint. There appears to be good foundation for what Mr. Setalvad says but merely because an amendment was sought by the plaintiffs at the suggestion of the Court it would not be proper for us to disallow it unless there are grounds for holding that it was forced upon an unwilling party. That is, however, not the suggestion. For, the Court wanting to do justice may invite the attention of the parties to defects in pleadings so that they could be remedied and the real issue between the parties tried. There is, however, another ground and a stronger one which impels us to hold that the amendment should never have been allowed. That ground is that the plaintiffs are now making out a case of fraud for which there is not the slightest basis in the plaint as it originally stood. The mere use of the word mala fide in the plaint cannot afford any basis for permitting an amendment. The context in which the word mala fide is used in the plaint clearly shows that what the plaintiffs meant was that the order of the Corporation having been made in exercise of arbitrary powers and having the result of adversely affecting the plaintiffs' right under art. 19(1)(f) and (g) of the Constitution amounted to an abuse of the provisions of the Act and was thus made mala fide.

The High Court was quite alive to the requirement of law that a party should not be allowed to make out a new case by way of an amendment to the pleading.

Dealing with this matter the High Court has observed:

"This brings us to the course which we must adopt in the present case and the amendment application. In the plaint, the plaintiff alleged that the order was mala fide and that it was obtained for collateral purposes."

The learned Judges were not correct in observing that it was the plaintiffs' case in the plaint that the landlords had obtained the clearance order or that the Corporation had made order for a collateral purpose. This impression of the High Court seems to be the basis of the rather curious procedure which it chose to follow in this case. Then the High Court referred to the fact that no evidence whatsoever had been led by the plaintiffs before the City Civil Court to the effect that the order was passed fraudulently or for a collateral purpose. It was alive to the fact that in such a case a party should not be allowed to adduce fresh evidence at the appellate stage and much less so at the stage of letters patent appeal. Then it observed:

"If the case had rested thus the matter would have been very simple apart from the amendment application. It seems to us however that it is not possible to dispose of this case satisfactorily on the material on record. There are some documents on record which if unexplained support in a large measure the contention of the plaintiffs that defendants 2, 3 and 4 obtained the order by fraud and also that the order was mala fide." If the High Court, in making these observations, was referring to the provisions of O. XLI, r. 27, Code of Civil Procedure, it ought not to have overlooked the mandatory provisions of cl. (b) of sub-r. (1) of r. 27. No doubt, under r. 27 the High Court has the power to allow a document to be produced and a witness to be examined. But the requirement of the High Court must be limited to those cases where it found it necessary to obtain such evidence for enabling it to pronounce judgment. This provision does not entitle the High Court to let in fresh evidence at the appellate stage where even without such evidence it can pronounce judgment in a case. It does not entitle the appellate Court to let in fresh evidence only for the purpose of pronouncing judgment in a particular way. In other words, it is only for removing a lacuna in the evidence that the appellate Court is empowered to admit additional evidence. The High Court does not say that there is any such lacuna in this case. On the other hand what it says is that certain documentary evidence on record supports "in a large measure" the plaintiffs' contention about fraud and mala fides. We shall deal with these documents presently but before that we must point out that the power under cl. (b) of sub-r. (1) of r. 27 cannot be exercised for adding to the evidence already on record except upon one of the grounds specified in the provision. If the documents on record are relevant on the issue of fraud the Court could well proceed to consider them and decide the issue. The observations of the High Court that certain documents would support the plaintiffs' contention of fraud only if they were not explained would show that according to it they furnish a prima facie evidence of fraud. There is nothing to show that the defendants or any of them wanted to be afforded an opportunity for explaining the documents. It would further appear that it was not merely for the limited purpose of affording the defendants an opportunity to explain the documents that the High Court remitted the case to the City Civil Court. For, in the concluding portion of its judgment the High Court has directed as follows:

"In the result, we remit the case to the City Civil Court for receiving additional evidence as directed by us in the judgment and also to allow evidence on the amendment. We direct that the defendants do file their written statement within three weeks from today, or at such earlier time as they can in answer to the amendment permitted to be made. Discovery and inspection forthwith within a week thereafter. And after this formality is over, the case to be on the Board for final hearing for taking evidence on the issue of mala fide and the issues that arise on the amended pleadings between the parties..."

This clearly shows that what the High Court has in substance done is to order a fresh trial. Such a course is not permissible under O. XLI, r. 27, Code of Civil Procedure. The High Court has quite clearly not proceeded under O. XLI, r. 25, because it has not come to the conclusion that the City Civil Court had omitted to frame or try an issue or to determine the question of fact which was essential to the right decision of a suit. For, the High Court has not indicated which issue was not tried by the trial Court. If the High Court meant that the necessary issue had not been raised by the trial Court though such issue was called for in the light of the pleadings, the High Court is required under this rule to frame the additional issue and then remit it for trial to the City Civil Court. Finally, this is not a case which was decided by the trial Court on any preliminary point and, therefore, a general remand such as is permissible under r. 23 could not be ordered.

The only documents to which the High Court has referred to in its judgment as supporting the plaintiffs' allegations of fraud and mala fides are the letter dated September 3, 1959, which the City Engineer wrote to the Tenants' Association and the letter dated September 11, 1959 which the Commissioner wrote to the Improvements Committee. In the first of these letters the City Engineer had stated that the landlords had agreed to construct a building consisting of single room tenement for the purpose of letting out at standard rents and that the landlords were taking the responsibility for providing either alternative accommodation to bona fide residents by shifting them temporarily to other premises or by arranging a phased programme of demolition and construction as may be found convenient. How this letter can afford any evidence of fraud or mala fides it is difficult to appreciate. It is not disputed before us that the landlords had constructed some chawls at Kurla and that they had offered to house the tenants of the Dhobi Chawls in the Kurla Chawls temporarily. It was also not disputed that the landlords had agreed to construct, after the demolition work was over, new buildings in which the present tenants would be afforded accommodation at standard rents. Paragraph 3 of the letter of September 11, 1959, quoted by the High Court in its judgment mentions that a representation was received from the tenants to the effect that the landlord should construct a new structure near about the clearance area instead of asking the tenants to go to the Kurla Chawls. But their demand cannot be regarded as reasonable. The landlords are not shown to own any land in the neighbourhood. The correspondence through which we were taken by Mr. Setalvad abundantly shows that land values are very high in Colaba and range between Rs. 250 and Rs. 275 per sq. ft., and the landlords could not be reasonably expected to buy land for the purpose. Moreover, there is nothing to show that any vacant building site was available in the neighbourhood of Dhobi Chawls at the relevant time.

The High Court observed in its judgment that it was only after the scheme was finally approved by the Corporation, confirmed by the State Government and the final orders made by the City Civil Court became operative that the City Engineer wrote to the Tenants' Association stating that no undertaking was given by the landlord. The High Court had apparently in mind the letter dated April 1, 1960, sent by the City Engineer to the Tenants' Association which is described in the paper books as item no. 38. That letter reads thus:

"Gentlemen,

Reference: your letter no. nil dated 19-2-1960. The landlord of the abovementioned property has undertaken the responsibility of providing alternative accommodation to bona fide residential tenants at standard rent by constructing a building on one of the plots viz. plot No. 7 at the same site. The question of making the site available for the construction of the said building, either by the tenants shifting temporarily to other place or by the landlord arranging a phased programme of demolition and construction, it is a matter which should be mutually arranged by the landlords and the tenants. The Municipality would facilitate towards arriving at any such arrangement between the two parties as indicated by you, no undertaking has been obtained by the Municipality from the landlord for any phased programme of demolition of the Chawls. The landlord will be required to demolish the chawls in compliance with the Clearance Order after the same becomes operative.

As there is no sufficient open space available at the above property, it does not seem feasible to provide temporary accommodation for the tenants at the same site. If the tenants are not in a position to make their own arrangement to shift from the place, they should temporarily shift to tenants (sic) at Kurla offered to them by the landlord with a view to facilitate speedy construction of the proposed building.

Yours faithfully,
Sd./_____”

This letter, far from showing that either the Corporation or the landlords had gone back on the assurance of providing the tenants alternative accommodation, reaffirms it. No doubt it says that no undertaking was obtained by the municipality from the landlords to the effect that a phased programme of demolition of the chawls would be followed. This, the City Engineer pointed out, was a matter of negotiation between the landlords on the one hand and the tenants on the other. Having made alternative arrangements for housing the tenants temporarily there was no further responsibility either on the Corporation or on the landlords to do anything more. The High Court, however, thought otherwise and observed:

“Though therefore no evidence is led on the question of mala fides or fraud it prima facie leads to such an inference and it is not proper to decide the question without further evidence.”

It will be repeating ourselves to say that in these circumstances the High Court had no powers to admit additional evidence or to direct additional evidence being taken.

Mr. Shroff, who appears for the plaintiffs, has referred us to two reports of architects in which the architects have stated that repairs to the buildings would cost Rs. 2 lacs whereas new buildings would cost Rs. 3 lacs and that, therefore, the best thing for the landlords to do was to approach the Corporation for making a clearance order so that they could eventually construct new buildings on the site. According to learned counsel this circumstance taken with the fact that there was deliberate avoidance by the landlords and the owners of the Colaba Land Mill Co. Ltd., to comply with the notice of the Corporation to undertake repairs, goes to show collusion between the landlords and the Corporation and that, therefore, it cannot be said that there was no material on record in support of the plea of fraud set out in para. 8A. Apart from the fact that the High Court has not referred to this material it is sufficient to observe that though the landlords may have deliberately allowed the buildings to become unfit for human occupation or a danger to the safety of the tenants occupying them, these matters do not indicate any collusion between the landlords and the Corporation.

We are, therefore, of the view that the High Court was in error in allowing the amendment to the plaint and in remitting the suit to the trial Court for a virtual retrial. The High Court, however, did not rest content with this order but further directed “we particularly want the Commissioner and the City Engineer and the defendants to be examined on this question”—the question being the breach of an assurance given to the tenants. In making this direction the High Court may have been actuated by a laudable motive but we think it ought to have borne in mind the limits which the law places upon the powers of the Court in dealing with a case before it. Just as it is not open to a Court to compel a party to make a particular kind of pleading or to amend his pleading so also it is beyond its competence to virtually oblige a party to examine any particular witness. No doubt, what the High Court has said is not in terms a peremptory order but the parties could possibly not take the risk of treating it otherwise. While, therefore, it is the duty of a Court of law not only to do justice but to ensure that justice is done it should bear in mind that it must act only according to law, not otherwise.

The question then is whether we should send back the matter to the High Court for deciding the question of the vires of ss. 354R and 354RA. It will be remembered that the High Court has not given a finding on this point. We would ordinarily have sent back the case to the High Court for deciding the point. But bearing in mind the fact that the clearance order was made by the Corporation as long ago as May 7, 1959, and confirmed by the State Government on January 23, 1960, and also the possibility of the appeal not being dealt with within a reasonable time by the High Court on account of the congestion of work there, we thought it appropriate to hear the parties on this point as well and to decide it ourselves.

The contention of Mr. Shroff is briefly this. The plaintiffs and those who are occupying the buildings have an interest in them by reason of the fact that they are tenants. As a result of the clearance order they are liable to be evicted from their respective tenements. Therefore, he contends, the Corporation could not make such an order without giving them an opportunity of showing cause against it. According to him, the provisions of ss. 354R and 354RA do not contemplate an opportunity to be given to the tenants before a clearance order is passed and, therefore, the provisions are ultra vires. Further, according to him, their suit is not barred by virtue of the provisions of cl. (2) of Schedule GG, because they cannot be said to be "persons aggrieved" by the clearance order. They, therefore, did not have a right to prefer an appeal before a Judge of the City Civil Court, Bombay, from that order. He also points out that the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, has placed restrictions on the right of a landlord of a house situated in an area like the city of Bombay to which the Act extends, to evict a tenant therefrom by enacting in s. 12 that a tenant shall not ordinarily be evicted as long as he pays the standard rent and permitted increases, whatever may have been the duration of his tenancy, under the original agreement. A right conferred by this provision on the tenant exists independently of the landlord's right to own and possess property and this right could not be interfered with or derogated from by the Corporation by making a clearance order behind the back of the tenant. He admits that under cl. (hh) of sub-s. (1) of s. 13 a landlord will be entitled to recover possession of the premises from the tenant on the ground that they are required by a local authority or other competent authority. But, he argues, this provision furnishes another reason for the tenant being afforded an opportunity by the Act to show cause against a proposed clearance scheme which affects or is likely to affect him inasmuch as he will be bound by the clearance order in a proceeding undertaken by the landlord under s. 13(1) of the Act for recovery of possession of the demised premises on the strength of that order.

We have no doubt that a tenant has both under the Transfer of Property Act and under s. 12 of the Bombay Rents, Hotel and Lodging House Rates Control Act, 1947, an interest in the demised premises which squarely falls within the expression property occurring in sub-cl. (f) of cl. (1) of art. 19 of the Constitution. The right which a tenant enjoys under this sub-clause is, however, subject to the provisions of cl. (5) of art. 19 which, among other things, provides that the right recognised by the sub-clause does not affect the operation of any existing law in so far as it imposes, or prevent the State from making any law imposing, reasonable restrictions on the exercise of any of the rights conferred by the said sub-clauses in the interests of the general public. The Bombay Municipal Corporation Act was admittedly an existing law at the date of the commencement of the Constitution but ss. 354R to 354RA were substituted for the earlier provisos by s. 18 of Bombay Act XXXIV of 1954. So what we have to ascertain is whether the law as it stands imposes a reasonable restriction on the tenant's right to hold the demised premises. For this purpose we will have to examine the provisions of the Act which empower the Corporation to make a clearance order.

Sub-section (1) of s. 354R provides that if it shall appear to the Commissioner, among other things, (a) that residential buildings in any area are by reason of disrepair unfit for human habitation or for like reason dangerous or injurious to the health of the inhabitants of the area and (b) that the conditions in the area can be effectually remedied by the demolition of all the buildings in the area without making an improvement scheme, the Commissioner can define the area and submit a draft clearance scheme for the approval of the Corporation. The Corporation can then pass a resolution declaring that the area as defined and approved by it to be clearance area. Sub-section (2) provides, among other things, that the Corporation should ascertain the number of persons who are likely to be dishoused in such area and thereafter take such measures as are practicable to ensure that as little hardship as possible is inflicted on those dishoused. The resolution is then required to be forwarded to the State Government.

Sub-section (4) provides as follows:

"As soon as may be after the Corporation have declared any area to be a clearance area, the Commissioner shall, in accordance with the appropriate provisions hereafter contained in this Act, proceed to secure the clearance of the area in one or other of the following ways, or partly in one of those ways, and partly in the other of them, that is to say—

- (a) by ordering the demolition of the buildings in the area; or
- (b) by acquiring on behalf of the Corporation land comprised in the area and undertaking or otherwise securing, the demolition of the buildings thereon."

Sub-section (1) of s. 354RA requires the Corporation to submit the clearance order to the State Government for confirmation. Sub-section (4) reads thus:

"Before submitting the order to the State Government, the Commissioner shall—

- (a) publish simultaneously in the Official Gazette and in three or more newspapers circulating within Greater Bombay, a notice stating the fact of such a clearance order having been made and describing the area comprised therein and naming a place where a copy of the order and of the plan referred to therein may be seen at all reasonable hours; and

- (b) serve on every person whose name appears in the Commissioner's assessment book as primarily liable for payment of property tax leviable under this Act, on any building included in the area to which the clearance order relates and, so far as it is reasonably practicable to ascertain such persons, on every mortgagee thereof, a notice stating the effect of the clearance order and that it is about to be submitted to the State Government for confirmation, and specifying the time within and the manner in which objections thereto can be made to the Commissioner."

Under sub-s. (5) objections, if any, received by the Commissioner are to be submitted to the Improvements Committee and that Committee is entitled under sub-s. (6) to make such modifications in respect of the order as it may think fit. The matter is then to go to the Corporation and thereafter to the State Government. Sub-section (7) provides that the provisions of Schedule GG to the Act shall have effect with respect to the validity and date of operation of a clearance order. We are not concerned with the rest of the provisions of s. 354RA. Clause (1) of Schedule GG provides that as soon as the clearance order is confirmed by the State Government the Commissioner has to publish, in the same manner as a notice under sub-s. (4) of s. 354RA, a notice stating that the order has been confirmed. Clause (2) is important and we would reproduce it. It runs thus:

"Any person aggrieved by such an order as aforesaid, or by the State Government's approval of a redevelopment plan or of a new plan may, within six weeks after the publication of notice of confirmation of the order, or of the approval of the plan, prefer an appeal to a Judge of the City Civil Court, Bombay, whose decision shall be final."

It is contended on behalf of the Corporation by Mr. Setalvad and also on behalf of the landlords by the Solicitor General that a tenant is entitled to raise an objection to the making of a clearance order not only under cl. (b) of sub-s. (4) of s. 354RA but also in his appeal under cl. (2) of Schedule GG. It is no doubt true that there is no express mention of tenants in either of these provisions but from the fact that cl. (a) of sub-s. (4) of s. 354RA requires the publication of the clearance order it would be reasonable to infer that the object of doing so is to invite objections at the instance of persons who would be affected by the order. Since tenants would be affected by it, they fall in this class. It is true that cl. (b) of that provision contemplates actual service of notice only on the persons primarily liable to pay property tax and on the mortgagees of the property but not on others and also says that the time within and the manner in which objections to the order could be made to the Commissioner should also be specified but it does not say anything regarding the tenants. But if because of this we were to hold that it would not be open to a tenant or any other person who would be affected by the order, to lodge an objection to the proposed order it would be making the publication of notice practically meaningless. Undoubtedly tenants are persons who would be affected by the order. Sub-section (2) of s. 354R casts certain duties upon the Corporation with respect to the persons who are likely to be dishoused in consequence of the clearance order. It would, therefore, be legitimate to infer that a corresponding right was conferred upon the tenants to secure the performance of its duties towards them by the Corporation. This right would be in addition to their interest in the property itself. They must, therefore, be held to be persons who are entitled to lodge an objection to the proposed order. Mr. Shroff, however, contends that cl. (b) of sub-s. (4) of s. 354RA confines the right to lodge an objection only to the persons specified in that clause and that there is nothing in the language of cl. (a) from which a similar right can be deduced in favour of other persons. It seems to us that in order to give full effect to the provisions of both cls. (a) and (b) of sub-s. (4) the words "and specifying the time within and the manner in which objections thereto can be made to the Commissioner" occurring at the end of cl. (b) should be read as governing not only the rest of cl. (b) but also cl. (a). We would not be re-writing the section if we did so because if the object of the Legislature was to give a right to lodge objections only to the persons specified in cl. (4) (b), sub-s. (5) would not have said that the Commissioner shall submit to the Improvements Committee the objections received under sub-s. (4), but would have said instead "objections received under clause (b) of sub-section (4)".

That a right has been conferred upon a tenant to lodge an objection is made further clear by the provisions of cl. (2) of Schedule GG which we have earlier reproduced. The expression "any person aggrieved" is sufficiently wide to include not only a tenant but also an occupant of a building who is likely to be dishoused as a result of the action taken under a clearance order. The expression "person aggrieved" has not been defined in the Act and, therefore, we are entitled to give it its natural meaning. The natural meaning would certainly include a person whose interest is in any manner affected by the order. We are supported in this by the observations of James L. J., in Ex parte Sidebotham: In re Sidebotham.¹ A similar expression occurring in s. 24(1) of the Administration of Evacuee Property Act, 1950, was the subject of construction in Md. Sharfuddin v. R. P. Singh.² The learned Judges there held that these words are of the widest amplitude and are wide enough to include an Assistant Custodian of Evacuee Properties.

Since the right conferred by cl. (2) of Schedule GG upon an aggrieved person is a right to prefer an appeal against a clearance order, as confirmed by the Government, before a Judge of the City Civil Court, Mr. Shroff contends that the words "aggrieved person" therein must necessarily mean a person who was a party to the order. It is true that ordinarily a right of appeal is conferred on a person who is a party to the proceeding but that would be so only where the proceeding is between certain parties. A proceeding of the nature contemplated by s. 354R is not, strictly speaking, a proceeding between the parties ranged on opposite sides. What is contemplated is the exercise of certain powers by the Corporation which will affect the interests of a variety of persons or a class or classes of persons and cl. (2) of Schedule GG gives a right to any of them to prefer an appeal if his legal right or interest is affected by any action of the Corporation taken in pursuance of its powers.

Upon a reasonable construction of s. 354RA and Schedule GG it must, therefore, be held that they afford opportunities to tenants to object to the clearance order. It follows from this that the restrictions on the tenants' right to hold property enacted by ss. 354R and 354RA are not unreasonable and that the provisions are valid. Mr. Shroff agrees that if the restrictions are reasonable his contention that these provisions are unconstitutional must fail.

Upon the view then that these provisions are valid it must further follow that it was open to the plaintiffs to prefer an appeal before a Judge of the Civil Court. Finality is given to a clearance order after its confirmation by the Government and its publication in the manner prescribed in cl. (1) of Schedule GG subject only to the result of an appeal preferred under cl. (2) of Schedule GG by a person aggrieved. If no such appeal is preferred or if such appeal is filed and dismissed no remedy by suit is available to a person like a tenant who contends that he is aggrieved. Agreeing with the learned City Civil Court Judge we hold that the plaintiff's suit was not maintainable.

Accordingly, we set aside the judgment of the High Court and allow this appeal. We, however, make no order as to costs.

Appeal allowed.

INCOME-TAX REFERENCE.

Before Mr. Justice Tambe and Mr. Justice V. S. Desai.

v.

M/S. CIBA PHARMA PRIVATE LIMITED.*

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Secs. 10(2)(xii), 10(2)(xv)—Expenditure laid out on scientific research, what is—Amount paid by assessee to another merely to obtain knowledge whether allowable deduction—Whether necessary that research should be carried on by assessee.

In order to bring a case within s. 10(2)(xii) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, it is incumbent on the assessee on whom the burden lies, to establish that the expenditure incurred by him was on a research carried on either by himself or on his behalf or at his instance for the purposes of his own business. The sum paid by an assessee to another merely to obtain the knowledge gained by him by carrying on research for himself cannot be said to be an expenditure incurred by the assessee on scientific research, because it is neither carried on by him, nor on his behalf, nor at his instance.

For an expenditure to be one laid out and expended on such scientific research, there must be some direct or at any rate proximate nexus or connection between the expenditure and the scientific research and the research and business of the assessee.

A company dealing in drugs, chemicals, pharmaceuticals etc. was in possession of very valuable technical knowledge and practical experience as a result of its long and extensive research in the pharmaceutical field. It had obtained patent rights in respect of certain products and had also registered its trade marks. Under an agreement the company granted to the assessee, which was one of its subsidiaries, the user of the patents and trade marks and gave the assessee the technical "know-how" and assistance. The use of the knowledge or the practical experience was limited only for the purpose of the conduct of the business during the period of the agreement which was of a duration of five years. The assessee in return agreed to give to the company a certain percentage of the sale price of the pharmaceutical pro-

Held, that in the transaction between the company and the assessee there was no transfer of any property or asset, nor any capital element was involved therein and, therefore, the transaction was not “capital in nature”, that the payment was laid out or expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the assessee's business, and that, therefore, the assessee was entitled to the deduction under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Act in respect of this payment.

TAMBE J. This is a reference under sub-s. (1) of s. 66 of the Indian Income-tax Act and is in respect of the five reference applications made to the Tribunal relating to the assessment years 1949-50, 1950-51, 1951-52, 1952-53 and 1953-54: the accounting years being the respective previous calendar years. After consolidation of these five reference applications relating to the aforesaid assessment years, two questions of law have been referred to this Court. The first question is common for all the five years and the second question is common only for three assessment years, viz. 1950-51, 1951-52 and 1952-53. Facts giving rise to this reference in brief are:

The assessee company Messrs. Ciba Pharma Private Limited, Bombay, hereinafter referred to as the “Ciba Pharma” is a cent per cent Indian subsidiary of Ciba Limited, Basle (Switzerland), hereinafter referred to as “the Ciba Basle”. Ciba Basle deals in drugs, medicines, chemicals, pharmaceuticals and biological products. Ciba Pharma has been incorporated in India on December 13, 1947. Prior to incorporation of Ciba Pharma and for some little time after its incorporation, Ciba Basle was carrying on its business in India through a company called Ciba (India) Limited, which was also a cent per cent subsidiary company of Ciba Basle. The activities of the Ciba Basle carried on in India through Ciba (India) Ltd. consisted of dealings both in pharmaceuticals as well as dealings in dyes and chemicals. In the year 1948 the activities of Ciba (Basle) in India till then carried on through Ciba (India) Ltd. were bifurcated. The pharmaceutical section was carved out and given over to Ciba Pharma and rest of the activities in dyes and chemicals were being continued by Ciba (India) Ltd. under a changed name Ciba Dyes Ltd.

Now, with regard to the business in pharmaceuticals, which was handed over to Ciba Pharma, an agreement has been entered into between the Ciba Basle and Ciba Pharma. The agreement is of date December 17, 1947 and is annexure A to the Statement of the Case. The answer to the first question turns on the construction of this agreement. The preamble of this agreement consists of two paras. The first para. describes the various activities of Ciba Basle and the second para. sets out the business, which Ciba Pharma had installed for carrying on its business and the consideration it had agreed to pay to Ciba Basle for obtaining the necessary information for the conduct of its business. After the preamble, the operative part of the agreement consists of six articles. Articles 1 and 2 set out the obligations, which Ciba Basle had undertaken to perform or fulfil. Article 1 relates to the technical consultancy which Ciba Basle had agreed to give to Ciba Pharma and article 2 relates to the licence under Ciba Basle's Patent and Trade Mark rights, the use of which Ciba Basle had agreed to grant to Ciba Pharma. Article 3 describes the consideration, which Ciba Pharma had agreed to pay to Ciba Basle. Article 4 prohibits Ciba Pharma from assigning the benefit and the obligation of this agreement without the written consent of Ciba Basle. It similarly prohibits Ciba Pharma from granting any sub-licence under the Patents and/or Trade-marks of Ciba Basle without its previous written consent. Article 5 relates to the duration of the agreement and its termination. It provides that the agreement would come into force from January 1, 1948, and its duration was five years, but terminable on three months' notice in the event of default in the performance of its obligations by any party. Article 6 relates to the arbitration in the event of any dispute arising between the parties to the agreement. We are here concerned principally with the preamble and Articles 1 to 3.

The first para. of the preamble shows that Ciba Basle, at the material time, was engaged in the development, manufacture and sale of medical, pharmaceutical, biological and bacteriological preparations. These products have been referred to in this agreement as "the said products". For the purpose of the production or of the trade with the said products, Ciba Basle had established and was maintaining and continuously developing chemical, medical, biological, bacteriological and pharmaceutical research laboratories, factory laboratories, standardization departments, engineering departments and propaganda and patent departments. Ciba Basle, therefore, had acquired valuable scientific knowledge, research methods, data and material concerning its activities in the aforesaid sphere of development, manufacture and sale of medical, pharmaceutical, biological and bacteriological preparations. The preamble further states that the work, which had been allocated to these various departments essentially consisted of discovery of new pharmaceutical products, the introduction thereof into the clinical, medical and general use, as the case of each particular product may be, the elaboration of processes of production on factory scale and the improvement of already used processes, the drawing up and filing and supervising of patent applications as well as the continuous watch on patents, the standardization of processes and of new products; the design and construction of suitable engines for the production on laboratory and factory scale, the continuous entertainment of relations with the scientific and medical professions in order to secure their help as well as the results of their medical, clinical and scientific work. Paragraph 1 of the preamble further states that for these purposes Ciba Basle had employed and was employing in its various departments, chemists, physicians, druggists, lawyers, engineers and other scientific and technical experts. It had also secured the help of considerable number of famous University professors and other well-known scientific authorities. Ciba Basle was also engaged in training certain staff members in various departments with a view to sending them out to its affiliated and associated companies in order to give the benefit of the special knowledge acquired by these members of the staff in the various departments conducted by Ciba Basle. The concluding part of the first para. of the preamble is:

"The yearly amount of current costs, salaries and expenses incurred by Ciba Basle in the maintenance and the development of these departments as well as in new equipments forms part of Ciba Basle's general costs."

Paragraph 2 of the preamble provides:

"Ciba Pharma has installed its own tableting, ampoule filling and finishing work and has an organisation suited for the distribution and promotion of the said products. Ciba Pharma wishes to acquire the extensive knowledge and practical experience in the pharmaceutical field that Ciba Basle commands by reason of its long and extensive research work and scientific and practical experience. Therefore, the parties have agreed that Ciba Pharma shall pay to Ciba Basle a technical and research contribution for the use of its Indian patents and/or Trade Marks referring to the said products. The technical and research contribution is at the same time a consideration for the scientific and technical assistance and will refund partly Ciba Basle's costs and expenses for the maintenance and development of the research work described in this Preamble." Article 1 consists of two paras. and para. 1, which is the material paragraph, reads:

"Ciba Basle will communicate currently and/or at request of Ciba Pharma all the results of its research work, insofar as they relate to the said products, which are already manufactured or processed or sold by Ciba Pharma or which shall hereafter with the prior approval of Ciba Basle be manufactured or processed or sold by Ciba Pharma. Whenever manufacture or processing of a preparation is taken up by Ciba Pharma with the prior approval of Ciba Basle, the pertaining patent rights and Trade Marks will be licensed to Ciba Pharma according to the terms of Articles II and III. In this case Ciba Basle undertakes to deliver to Ciba Pharma all processes, formulae, scientific data, working rules and prescription pertaining to the manufacture or processing of the said products, which have been discovered and developed in Ciba Basle's laboratories and will forward to Ciba Pharma as far as possible all scientific and bibliographic information, pamphlets or drafts, which might be useful to introduce licensed preparations and to promote their sale in India. All physical material shall be invoiced by Ciba Basle to Ciba Pharma at cost price."

Paragraph 2 of article 1 prohibits Ciba Pharma from divulging to third parties confidential information received by Ciba Pharma from Ciba Basle and requires Ciba Pharma to keep all data connected with the manufacturing processes under lock and key. Paragraph 1 of article 2, which relates to the licence under Ciba Basle's patent and trade-mark rights, states:

"Ciba Basle is registered or has applied for the registration as the case may be as the proprietor of several Letters Patent in India relating to the pharmaceutical products and listed in Schedule I of this Agreement. Furthermore, Ciba Basle is registered proprietor or has applied for the registration as the case may be of several trade marks relating to pharmaceutical products and giving protection in India, these Trade Marks being set out in Schedule II of this Agreement."

Under para. 2 of the said article II Ciba Basle granted to Ciba Pharma the full and sole right and licence under the Patents listed in Schedule I to make use of, exercise and vend the inventions referred to therein in India. It similarly granted Ciba Pharma the full and exclusive licence to use the Trade Marks set out in Schedule II. The other paragraphs of this article are not material for the purpose of this case. Paragraph 1 of article III is in following terms:

Technical Research Contributions.

"As consideration for Ciba Basle's obligations stipulated in Article I and II, Ciba Pharma agrees to pay to Ciba Basle half-yearly the following percentage contributions of the total of the net selling prices of all pharmaceutical products manufactured or processed and/or sold by Ciba Pharma:

(a) Contribution towards Technical Consultancy and technical service rendered and research work done.	5%
(b) Contribution towards cost of raw material used for experimental work.	3%
(c) Royalties on Trade Marks used by Ciba Pharma.	2%
Total	10%

The said technical research contribution of 10 per cent. was reduced to 6 per cent. with effect from January 1, 1949. It has been stated at the Bar by counsel for the parties that the reduction was from 5 per cent. to 1 per cent. in the aforesaid item (a). The other paragraphs of Article III are not material for the purposes of this case. Schedule I sets out the Indian Patents of which Ciba Basle had been registered as a proprietor or which had been applied for. It may be mentioned that it held a patent for a preparation known as "Cibazol".

Schedule II gives a list of these trade marks of which Ciba Basle was the proprietor or which had been applied for by Ciba Basle. It may be mentioned that it was also the proprietor of the Indian Trade Mark "Cibazol".

The first question relates to the payment made by Ciba Pharma to Ciba Basle under the aforesaid para. 1 of Article III of the said Agreement. Paragraph 6 of the Statement of the Case shows that under the certificate dated June 6, 1950, given by the Swiss Company, it is found that out of the total expenditure of 8,409,364 Swiss frs. incurred in 1948, on research, recoveries from several entities like the Ciba Pharma and others came only to 4,613,701 Swiss frs. It is not necessary for us to give the figures of all the five years of the contributions made by Ciba Pharma to Ciba Basle. Barring the difference in the figures and the amount paid, the facts are identical. We may, therefore, take the assessment figure of 1949-50.

Now, in the assessment year 1949-50 Ciba Pharma claimed deduction under s. 10 in respect of the payment of 10 per cent. of its net sale price made by it to Ciba Basle under para. 1 of article III of the Agreement. Two per cent. out of the said amount had been allowed by the Income-tax Officer being a payment towards royalties on Trade Marks used by Ciba Pharma. But the remaining 8 per cent. which amounted to Rs. 6,32,948 had been disallowed by the Income-tax Officer on the ground that the expenditure was incurred by the Swiss Company for its own business and that the assessee was not a manufacturing company so as to be eligible to get the benefit of research expenditure.

The assessee took an appeal to the Appellate Assistant Commissioner, who took the view that the said payment, which has been made under the agreement of December 17, 1947, was clearly in the nature of a purchase price paid for the permanent rights of acquisition conferred upon the appellant company under the agreement of the knowledge and the technical 'know-how' of the parent company for the enduring benefit of the undertaking of the appellant's business in pharmaceuticals, which is in the offing to be set up. The payment is clearly in the nature of a payment by annual instalment of a capital sum. In this view of the matter, the Appellate Assistant Commissioner held that the payment is in the nature of a capital expenditure. He, therefore, disallowed the claim of the Ciba Pharma that the said payment was an expenditure incurred on scientific research relating to its business. In this view of the matter the Appellate Assistant Commissioner dismissed the appeal. The assessee-company took a further appeal to the Tribunal. Before the Tribunal, the aforesaid amount was claimed as an allowable expenditure under s. 10(2)(xii) as well as under s. 10(2)(xv). The Tribunal accepted the contentions of the assessee and allowed the assessee's claim on the ground that the expenditure was incurred in connection with the research in the line of the assessee's business. It, therefore, came within the provisions of s. 10(2)(xii). There was nothing to show in s. 10(2)(xii) that the expenditure must be incurred by the assessee. The Tribunal also, in the alternative, held that the expenditure was laid out wholly and exclusively for the assessee's business and there was no capital element involved in the expenditure. The Tribunal, therefore, in the alternative held that the expenditure would be an allowable deduction under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Income-tax Act. At the instance of the Department, the following questions have been referred to us:

"Whether on the facts and in the circumstances of the case, the payment made by the assessee to Ciba Basle Ltd. in pursuance of the Agreement dated 17-12-1947 is an admissible deduction under the provisions of sec. 10(2)(xii) of the Income-tax Act and if not, under sec. 10(2)(xv) of the Act, either in part or whole?"

It would be convenient to deal with this question first before we proceed to deal with the second question. The first aspect of the question, therefore, that arises is whether the said payment, which admittedly is made in pursuance of the agreement dated December 17, 1947, is an expenditure laid out and expended on scientific research relating to the business within the meaning of s. 10(2)(xii) of the Indian Income-tax Act.

It is the contention of Mr. Joshi, learned counsel for the Revenue, that the payment is not an expenditure within the meaning of s. 10(2)(xii) of the Act. It is his argument that on a true construction of the said agreement of December 17, 1947, it is not an expenditure laid out or expended by Ciba Pharma on scientific research. On the other hand, it is a contribution made towards the expenditure incurred by Ciba Basle. The organisation or the research carried on by Ciba Basle is maintained by Ciba Basle for its own purpose and for the purpose of extending its own business. The research, which is carried on by Ciba Basle is not dependent on whether the contribution is made by Ciba Pharma or not. There is also no obligation on the Ciba Basle to carry on any research in a particular manner as such at the instance of Ciba Pharma. Ciba Pharma, therefore, has neither incurred any expenditure on scientific research nor has it incurred any expenditure on scientific research carried on on its behalf. On the other hand, it is the argument of Mr. Kaka, learned counsel for the assessee, that the expenditure falls under s. 10(2)(xii) of the Act. To attract the provisions of s. 10(2)(xii) it is sufficient to establish that it is an expenditure, not being in the nature of a capital expenditure, laid out and expended on scientific research relating to the business. It has not been held that the expenditure is in the nature of a capital expenditure. For an expenditure to be laid out or expended on scientific research, it is not necessary that an assessee himself must expend it on the research. If two or more persons agree to conduct for their mutual benefit research work and share the expenses, the contributions made by each would be an expenditure incurred, laid out or expended on such research. It will thus be an allowable deduction as an expenditure laid out or expended on scientific research relating to the business. Mr. Kaka also drew our attention to the following observation of the Tribunal in its order:

"There is no dispute that this expenditure relates to the appellant's business...." and contended that one of the conditions that the expenditure must relate to the business has been established. There is also no dispute that Ciba Basle was carrying on research and the research carried on by Ciba Basle was also in respect of the products in which Ciba Pharma was dealing. There could, therefore, be no doubt that the expenditure incurred by Ciba Pharma was an expenditure relating to its business. Mr. Kaka also further drew our attention to the first sentence in para. 10 of the Tribunal's order, which reads:

"The amount paid per Article III of the Agreement appears to us to be in the nature of a share of expenses incurred by the foreign company for conducting research for itself and also on behalf of the Indian company."

Relying on the aforesaid observation Mr. Kaka argued that the Tribunal has found as a fact that the research, which was carried on by Ciba Basle was on behalf of the assessee company. That being the position, it can hardly be said that the contribution made by Ciba Pharma towards the expenditure incurred by Ciba Basle was not an amount laid out or expended on scientific research.

We are unable to accept Mr. Kaka's contention that in the aforesaid observation on which reliance has been placed by Mr. Kaka, there is any finding of fact as such that the research carried on by Ciba Basle was a research carried on by itself and on behalf of Ciba Pharma. On the other hand, reading the judgment as a whole, it is clear that the said view taken by the Tribunal is on the construction of the Agreement. The Tribunal does not say that they so hold on consideration of the evidence, but, on the other hand, what is said by the Tribunal is "it appears to them" that the amount paid under article III of the Agreement to be "in the nature of a share of expenses incurred by the foreign company" for conducting research for itself and also on behalf of the Indian company. After setting out the facts upto para. 4, the Tribunal has set out article III of the agreement. In para. 5 the reduction in the percentage contributions is referred to. Paragraph 6 refers to the calculation of 8 per cent. and paras. 6A and 7 of the judgment the arguments advanced on behalf of Ciba Pharma as well as the Department are summarised. The arguments advanced by Ciba Pharma as summarised in para. 6A show that the contentions raised before it were two-fold: in the first instance it was contended that the contribution made as per agreement represented a part of, or an addition to, the invoice cost of the goods and as such allowable under s. 10(I) on the principles of commercial accountancy. In the alternative, it was argued that it was allowable under s. 10(2)(xii), 10(2)(xiv) or 10(2)(xv). The arguments advanced related to the construction of the agreement. Paragraphs 8 and 9 deal with the first part of the argument as to whether it was a part of the sale price, and the sentence on which reliance is placed is the first sentence of para. 10 of the judgment. In our opinion, therefore, the observations on which reliance is placed are made on a construction of the agreement and the question to be considered is whether such a position emerges on the construction of the Agreement. Section 10(2)(xii) is in the following terms:

(1) "The tax shall be payable by an assessee under the head profits and gains of business, profession or vocation in respect of the profits or gains of any business, profession or vocation carried on by him.

(2) Such profits or gains shall be computed after making the following allowances, namely;...

(xii) any expenditure not being in the nature of capital expenditure laid out or expended on scientific research related to the business."

Clauses (i) and (ii) of the Explanation relating to cls. (xii) and (xiii) provide:

(i) "'Scientific research' means any activities in the fields of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge.

(ii) references to expenditure incurred on scientific research do not include any expenditure incurred in the acquisition of rights in, or arising out of, scientific research, but, save as aforesaid, include all expenditure incurred for the prosecution of, or the provision of facilities for the prosecution of, scientific research."

Mr. Joshi, laying emphasis on the concluding words of sub-s. (1) "carried on by him" argued that the profits and gains on which tax is leviable are the profits and gains of the business, profession or vocation carried on by the assessee. It is from this amount that certain deductions in respect of certain expenditure under sub-s. (2) are allowed. It would necessarily follow that the allowable deduction is in respect of the expenditure incurred by the assessee on a research carried on by him in the conduct of his business. It is not in dispute that the Ciba Pharma itself had not carried on any activity in the field of natural or applied science for the extension of knowledge. It, therefore, cannot be said, and indeed it has not been said, that it is the Ciba Pharma who had carried on scientific research. Scientific research has been carried on by Ciba Basle. The payments made to Ciba Basle under article III of the Agreement, therefore, cannot be said to be an expenditure incurred by Ciba Pharma on any activity in the field of natural or applied science carried on by itself.

On the language used, it does not appear that to be an allowable deduction, the expenditure incurred must necessarily be on an activity in the field of natural or applied science, for extension of knowledge carried on by the assessee himself. All that is required to be established is that the expenditure incurred by the assessee was laid out or expended on scientific research related to the business. In other words, all that is required to be established is (1) that the expenditure was on scientific research and (2) the scientific research was one which related to the business of the assessee. It would necessarily follow that for an expenditure to be one laid out and expended on such scientific research, there must be some direct or at any rate proximate nexus or connection between the expenditure and the scientific research and the research and business of the assessee. The instance which Mr. Kaka gave is one where there is such a connection established. Two or more persons conducting business of a similar nature may not individually be in a position to carry on research for the purpose of their business. They may join together, agreeing to share expenses and conduct scientific research for the purpose of their business. Here, though it cannot be said that each one of them is carrying on research himself, yet, there is a direct connection between expenditure incurred by each one of them and the scientific research which relates to their business. If we may give another instance, a business man may ask a research institution to conduct on his behalf a research on a particular subject or problem relating to his business, agreeing to pay its charges. Here again, there is a proximate connection between the expenditure incurred by the businessman and the research which relates to his business. In our opinion, therefore, in order to bring the case within the exemption cl. 10(2)(xi), it is incumbent on the assessee on whom the burden lies, to establish that the expenditure incurred by him was on a research carried on either by himself or on his behalf or at his instance, for the purposes of his own business. The sum paid by an assessee to another merely to obtain the knowledge gained by him by carrying on research for himself cannot be said to be an expenditure incurred by the assessee on scientific research, because it is neither carried on by him, nor on his behalf, nor at his instance. When cls. 10(2)(xi) and 10(2)(xii) are read together, it becomes apparent that the Legislature has distinguished between the two situations—one where the expenditure is laid out or expended by the assessee on scientific research, and the other where a sum is paid by the assessee to another who is carrying on scientific research relating to the class of business carried on by the assessee. No doubt, the expenditure relating to which exemption has been claimed has been described in the agreement as “Technical and Research Contribution”. But the description given by a party to the expenditure is not determinative of the issue. It is not in dispute that the scientific research is not carried on by the assessee itself, but by Ciba Basle. Of course, if on the construction of the agreement it emerges that the scientific research carried on by Ciba Basle was on its behalf or was at the instance of the assessee, the assessee would, none the less, be entitled to claim exemption under the said cl. 10(2)(xi).

We have already referred in detail to the preamble of the agreement, and when the preamble is read as a whole, there is no doubt that the research carried on by Ciba Basle is for the advancement of its own business, and not on behalf of the assessee or at the instance of the assessee. Paragraph 1 of the preamble discloses that Ciba Basle is engaged in the development, manufacture and sale of medical, pharmaceutical, biological and bacteriological preparations. These preparations have been referred in the agreement as “the said products”. It is for the purpose of the production or the trade with the “said products” that the Ciba Basle had established various laboratories, such as, Chemical, Medical, Biological, Bacteriological and Pharmaceutical laboratories in which research is carried on continuously for the purpose of its business. It has continuously maintained various departments for the purpose of the said business, such as Standardization department, Engineering department, Propaganda and Patent departments. For the purpose of carrying on activities in these laboratories and departments, Ciba Basle had employed chemists, physicians, druggists, lawyers, engineers and technical experts. The activities in these various laboratories and departments have been carried on continuously for a long time, and the work allocated to them consists essentially of “discovery of new pharmaceutical products, the introduction thereof into the clinical, medical and general use, as the case may be.” At the end of para. 1 of the preamble, it has been clearly stated that the expenditure incurred by it on the research “consisting of current costs, salaries and other expenses incurred in the maintenance and development of the various departments mentioned in para. 1 as well as in new equipments, form part of Ciba Basle’s general costs”. There is no ambiguity in the matter. It has not been said that the costs incurred by Ciba Basle are incurred for itself as well as on behalf of some other person or on behalf of Ciba Pharma or at its instance. There can hardly be any doubt that as a result of these activities carried on on a large scale, Ciba Basle had acquired "valuable scientific knowledge, research method, data and material concerning the aforesaid sphere of activities."

Paragraph 2 of the preamble indicates the purposes for which Ciba Pharma had agreed to make the payment termed as "Technical and Research contribution". The first part of para. 2 of the preamble shows that Ciba Pharma had by then installed its own tableting, ampoule filling and finishing work and it had also built up its own organization suited for the distribution and promotion of the said products. It is for the conduct of this business of Ciba Pharma, it has been stated in para. 2:—

"Ciba Pharma wishes to acquire the extensive knowledge and practical experience in the pharmaceutical field that Ciba Basle commands by reason of its long and extensive research work and scientific and practical experience and it is, therefore, that Ciba Pharma had agreed to pay to Ciba Basle 'a technical and research contribution'."

"This technical and research contribution has been divided under different heads in para. 1 of article III of the agreement. Paragraph 2 further provides that the technical and research contribution, which it had agreed to pay was by way of consideration:—

(i) for the use of Indian patents and/or Trade Marks referring to the "said products."

(ii) for the scientific and technical assistance;

Concluding part of para. 2 provides that Ciba Pharma had also agreed to refund part of Ciba Basle's costs and expenses for the maintenance and development of the research work described in this preamble. Reading the preamble as a whole, it becomes patently clear that for the purpose of its own business, Ciba Basle has maintained laboratories and departments in which activity on a large scale is continuously going on. The costs incurred by Ciba Basle are its own costs. As a result of these activities, very valuable knowledge is in possession of Ciba Basle. The assessee company which is a 100 per cent. subsidiary company of Ciba Basle, had by then installed its own tableting, ampoule filling and finishing work, and had also built its own organization suited for the distribution and promotion of certain products relating to which Ciba Basle had patents and had registered trade marks. Use of Indian patents and/or trade marks relating to these products was allowed by Ciba Basle to the assessee. The assessee wanted to obtain from Ciba Basle scientific and technical knowledge. Ciba Basle had agreed to give that knowledge to Ciba Pharma. In consideration thereof, Ciba Pharma had agreed to make certain payments which are referred to in the agreement as "technical and research contribution" as well as to "refund partly of Ciba Basle's costs and expenses for the maintenance and development of research work" described in the preamble.

For the reasons stated above, it is not possible to hold that the consideration paid for the use of patents and trade marks or for obtaining scientific and technical 'know-how' or an amount paid by way of refund of costs of research carried on by Ciba Basle on its own behalf is an amount expended by the assessee on technical research. The view taken by the Tribunal that the payment of Rs. 6,32,948 representing the 8 per cent. of the net sale price is primarily an allowable deduction under s. 10(2)(xii) does not appear to be in consonance with the terms of the agreement.

Mr. Kaka in the course of his argument later admitted this position. He conceded that the contributions paid by Ciba Pharma towards technical consultancy and technical service rendered by Ciba Basle and the consideration paid for by Ciba Pharma to Ciba Basle for the use of patents and trade marks is not an expenditure allowable under s. 10(2)(xii). He, however, contended that part of the technical and research contribution, which is referable to "research work done" as mentioned in cl. (a) of para. 1 of article III and "contribution towards costs of raw material used for experimental work" as mentioned in cl. (b) of para. 1 of article III, is allowable as a deduction under s. 10(2)(xii) being an amount laid out or expended on scientific research.

It is true that the contribution as described in respect of these items and referable to cls. (a) and (b) gives an impression that it is an amount laid out or expended by Ciba Pharma on scientific research. But then it is a well settled principle that in construing an agreement, it is to be read as a whole and when so read, in our opinion, for reasons which we have already stated, it appears to us that the scientific and research work done by Ciba Basle was on its own behalf and not on behalf of itself and somebody else, much less on behalf of Ciba Pharma or at its instance. Reason, which Ciba Pharma has given in para. 2 of the preamble for making the research contribution, is also not that Ciba Basle had agreed to carry on any scientific and research work at the instance of Ciba Pharma. On the contrary, what has been said in para. 2 is that Ciba Pharma had agreed to make these payments, apart from the reason that use of the trade marks and patents were given to it, but wished to acquire the extensive knowledge and practical experience in the pharmaceutical field that Ciba Basle commands by reason of its long and extensive research work and scientific and practical experience. In other words, the object with which Ciba Pharma had agreed to make technical and research contribution was for the use of patents and trade marks and to obtain the know-how of the business it was then conducting. The consideration paid or the amount expended for the said purpose cannot be called an expenditure laid down or expended on scientific research. The view taken by us that one of the reasons why Ciba Pharma had agreed to pay these technical and research contribution was to obtain the technical 'know-how' of the business from Ciba Basle, which Ciba Basle had acquired, receives support from certain other parts of the agreement itself.

Now, if really the research had been carried on by Ciba Basle on behalf of itself and at the instance of and/or on behalf of Ciba Pharma, Ciba Pharma would have equal rights in the results of the research as Ciba Basle would therein have. Such, however, is not the position. Clause (2) of article 1 provides:—

"Ciba Pharma agrees not at any time to divulge to third parties without Ciba Basle's consent any confidential information received under this Agreement from Ciba Basle and in particular to keep all data connected with the manufacturing processes under lock and key."

Similarly, para. 3 of article V provides:—

"Upon the termination of this Agreement for any cause Ciba Pharma shall cease to use the Patents and Trade Marks to which this Agreement refers except as to stocks then on hand and shall return to Ciba Basle or to such persons as they may appoint for that purpose all copies of information, scientific data or material sent to it by Ciba Basle under this agreement and then in its possession and shall expressly refrain from communicating any such information, scientific data or material received by it hereunder to any person, firm or company whomsoever other than Ciba Basle."

These two clauses leave no doubt that the result of scientific research was exclusively the property of Ciba Basle and its use only for the purpose of its business during the course of its business was allowed to Ciba Pharma, and the contribution made was for that purpose. In other words, the contribution made by Ciba Pharma or the payment made by Ciba Pharma was for the purpose of acquiring the extensive technical knowledge and practical experience in the pharmaceutical field, which Ciba Basle commanded by reason of its long and extensive research work and scientific and practical experience. The payment is nothing but a payment for acquiring the technical 'know-how'.

Mr. Kaka in the course of his arguments laid some stress on the words "at the request of Ciba Pharma" appearing in the first sentence of para. 1 of article I. The sentence reads:—

"Ciba Basle will communicate currently and/or at request of Ciba Pharma all the results of its research work, insofar as they relate to the said products which are already manufactured or processed or sold by Ciba Pharma."

Laying emphasis on the words "at the request of Ciba Pharma" Mr. Kaka argued that the obligation incurred by Ciba Basle was not only to communicate currently results of its research work but there was also an obligation to communicate to Ciba Pharma the result of its research work at the request of Ciba Pharma. This clause, according to Mr. Kaka, shows that the research work, which was carried on by Ciba Basle, was carried on at the instance and on behalf of Ciba Pharma.

We find it difficult to accept this argument of Mr. Kaka. The sentence, when read as a whole, itself shows that the research work carried on by Ciba Basle was not on behalf of Ciba Basle and Ciba Pharma. On the other hand, the sentence itself shows that the research work of Ciba Basle was its own. What Ciba Basle had promised was to communicate to Ciba Pharma, at the request of Ciba Pharma, results of its research work. In our judgment, therefore, no part of the payment of 8 per cent. can be said to be an expenditure laid out or expended by Ciba Pharma on scientific research. The said payment, therefore, is not an allowable deduction under s. 10(2)(xii) of the Act.

The question next to be considered is whether the said payment of 8 per cent. of the sale price is an allowable deduction under s. 10(2)(xv). That clause reads:—

(xv). "any expenditure (not being an allowance of the nature described in any of the clauses (i) to (xiv) inclusive, and not being in the nature of capital expenditure or personal expenses of the assessee) laid out or expended wholly and exclusively for the purpose of such business, profession or vocation."

It has not been contended on behalf of the Department that it is an expenditure falling under any of the clauses (i) to (xiv), nor has it been contended that it is in the nature of personal expenses of the assessee. The question to be considered is whether the said payment or any part thereof is laid out or expended wholly and exclusively for the purposes of the business of Ciba Pharma or whether the expenditure incurred is in the nature of a capital expenditure.

It is the contention of Mr. Joshi that save and except the payment attributable to "technical services" rendered by Ciba Basle referred to in cl. (a) of para. 1 of article III of the agreement, the rest of the payment must be disallowed because it is of capital nature. Mr. Joshi, in the course of his argument, drew our attention to the observations made by the Tribunal for holding that the expenditure was not of capital nature. The reasons given in para. 12 of the judgment are in the following terms:—

"The Departmental Representative's next contention was that even assuming that any portion of the expenditure was of a revenue nature, the whole of it cannot be treated as such and that he would require the expenditure being apportioned suitably between capital and revenue. As we have already stated the certificate given by the foreign company has been accepted as such. That clearly states that no capital expenditure has been incurred by the foreign company. Nor has the appellant acquired any asset of enduring benefit."

It is the argument of Mr. Joshi that whether the foreign company has incurred any capital expenditure or not is not relevant for the purpose of deciding whether the expenditure incurred by Ciba Pharma was of capital nature or not. This part of the argument undoubtedly is well-made. But the decision of the Tribunal is not based solely on that observation. The other reason given by the Tribunal is that in its opinion by incurring this expenditure, Ciba Pharma had not acquired any asset of enduring benefit and the expenditure incurred by Ciba Pharma, therefore, is not of a capital nature.

We have recently in *S. F. Engineer v. Commr. of Inc-Tax*¹ elaborately discussed what is a capital expenditure and what is a revenue expenditure. Therein we have also referred to three decisions of their Lordships of the Supreme Court. The first decision of their Lordships is in Assam Bengal Cement Co. Ltd. v. Commr. of Inc-tax.² Bhagawati, J., who spoke for the Court, after discussing the various decisions and after referring to the Full Bench decision of the Lahore High Court and enumerating the three tests laid down in the Full Bench of the Lahore High Court, observed as follows (p. 45):

"This synthesis attempted by the Full Bench of the Lahore High Court truly enunciates the principles which emerge from the authorities. In cases where the expenditure is made for the initial outlay or for extension of a business or a substantial replacement of the equipment, there is no doubt that it is capital expenditure. A capital asset of the business is either acquired or extended or substantially replaced and that outlay whatever be its source whether it is drawn from the capital or the income of the concern is certainly in the nature of capital expenditure. The question however arises for consideration where expenditure is incurred while the business is going on and is not incurred either for extension of the business or for the substantial replacement of its equipment. Such expenditure can be looked at either from the point of view of what is acquired or from the point of view of what is the source from which the expenditure is incurred. If the expenditure is made for acquiring or bringing into existence an asset or advantage for the enduring benefit of the business it is properly attributable to capital and is of the nature of capital expenditure. If on the other hand it is made not for the purpose of bringing into existence any such asset or advantage but for running the business or working it with a view to produce the profits it is a revenue expenditure. If any such asset or advantage for the enduring benefit of the business is thus acquired or brought into existence it would be immaterial whether the source of the payment was the capital or the income of the concern or whether the payment was made once and for all or was made periodically. The aim and object of the expenditure would determine the character of the expenditure whether it is a capital expenditure or a revenue expenditure. The source or the manner of the payment would then be of no consequence. It is only in those cases where this test is of no avail that one may go to the test of fixed or circulating capital and consider whether the expenditure incurred was part of the fixed capital of the business or part of its circulating capital. If it was part of the fixed capital of the business it would be of the nature of capital expenditure and if it was part of its circulating capital it would be of the nature of revenue expenditure. These tests are thus mutually exclusive and have to be applied to the facts of each particular case in the manner above indicated.... One has therefore got to apply these criteria one after the other from the business point of view and come to the conclusion whether on a fair appreciation of the whole situation the expenditure incurred in a particular case is of the nature of capital expenditure or revenue expenditure in which latter event only it would be a deductible allowance under section 10(2) (xv) of the Income-tax Act."

These tests have again been referred to as principles formulated in determining the question as to whether a given item of expenditure is a capital or a revenue expenditure in *State of Madras v. G. J. Coelho*³ and in a still more recent decision of their Lordships of the Supreme Court given in the case of *Bombay Steam Navigation Co. Ltd. v. Commissioner of Income-tax, Bombay*⁴ decided on October 21, 1964 (not yet fully reported), it has been observed:—

"The question whether a particular expenditure is revenue expenditure incurred for the purpose of the business must be viewed in the larger context of business necessity or expediency. If the outgoing or expenditure is so related to the carrying on or conduct of the business that it may be regarded as an integral part of the profit-making process and not for acquisition of an asset or a right of a permanent character, the possession of which is a condition to the carrying on of the business, the expenditure may be regarded as revenue expenditure."

In the light of these tests and the observations of their Lordships of the Supreme Court, the facts of the present case will have to be considered in the larger context of the business necessity or expediency of Ciba Pharma.

The contention of the Department, as raised before the Tribunal, was that part of the said expenditure was of capital nature, because it brought in asset of an enduring benefit. The same argument also has been advanced before us. We have already discussed the various clauses of the agreement and, in our opinion, the payment of 8 per cent. of its net sales, which has been made by Ciba Pharma is by way of consideration:

- (1) for the use of the rights under the Patents of Ciba Basle, and
- (2) for acquiring the extensive knowledge and practical experience in the pharmaceutical field that Ciba Basle commands by reason of its long and extensive research work and scientific and practical experience in so far as it relates to the products which were manufactured or processed or sold by Ciba Pharma.
- (3) for obtaining Scientific and technical assistance.

It is indeed true that the payment of 8 per cent. of the net sale price, though referred to under various heads in cls. (a) and (b) of para. 1 of article III as contributions, is on an analysis of the agreement, a consideration paid for the aforesaid objects. It is not in dispute that consideration paid or payment made for the use of rights in patents of Ciba Basle is a revenue expenditure. The question to be considered is whether the consideration paid for acquiring the extensive knowledge and practical experience of Ciba Basle constitutes acquisition of an asset of an enduring nature. In other words, whether by the expenditure incurred for acquiring the technical know-how of the business, Ciba Pharma had acquired an asset of an enduring benefit. Having regard to para. 2 of article I and para. 5 of article V of the agreement, there can hardly be any doubt that Ciba Pharma had acquired no asset in obtaining the 'know-how' of the business. No right in the results of the scientific research has been acquired by Ciba Pharma. These two paragraphs make it clear that the confidential information received by Ciba Pharma from Ciba Basle about the conduct of the business and all data connected with the manufacturing processes was not to be divulged by Ciba Pharma during the currency of the agreement. On the termination of the agreement, Ciba Pharma is required to return to Ciba Basle or to such other persons as Ciba Basle may appoint, all copies of information, scientific data or material sent to it by Ciba Basle under this agreement. Further, Ciba Pharma is expressly refrained from communicating such information, scientific data or material received by it hereunder to any person, firm or company whomsoever, other than Ciba Basle. The use of the knowledge or the practical experience, which Ciba Pharma gets by knowing the technical 'know-how' is thus limited only for the purpose of the conduct of the business during the period of the agreement, which is of a duration of five years. Payments made for acquiring the said knowledge cannot, in our opinion, be said to have brought into existence an asset of an enduring nature. On the other hand, payment has been made to get the technical 'know-how' only for the purpose of running the business during the period of the agreement with a view to earn profits. In the payment, therefore, in our opinion, no expenditure of a capital nature is involved.

It is next argued by Mr. Joshi that on a true construction of para. 1 of article I, the expenditure incurred or the payment made cannot be said to be an expenditure wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of Ciba Pharma's business in the year of account. According to Mr. Joshi, the consideration paid is for all the obligations of Ciba Basle, which it had stipulated in articles 1 and 2. The obligation stipulated by Ciba Basle in para. 1 of article I is not confined to convey to Ciba Pharma the 'know-how' in respect of the products in which Ciba Basle was then dealing. The obligation stipulated by Ciba Basle in these clauses was also to convey to Ciba Pharma the technical 'know-how' in respect of certain other products also as and when Ciba Pharma would undertake the manufacture or processing of these products. It is the argument of Mr. Joshi that the payment made or the expenditure incurred also relates to both the things: for obtaining the 'know-how' in respect of the products in which Ciba Pharma was already dealing as well as in respect of the right to acquire the technical 'know-how' in respect of the other products as and when Ciba Pharma would undertake the manufacture or processing of those products.

In our opinion, the argument is not well-founded. The consideration, which Ciba Pharma had agreed to pay to Ciba Basle, is not for a fixed sum. On the other hand, the consideration it had agreed to pay was a certain percentage of the net sale price of all pharmaceutical products manufactured, processed and/or sold by Ciba Pharma. The later part of para. 1 of article I is merely an agreement to enter into another agreement on the same terms and conditions as are mentioned in articles II and III of this agreement, as and when the occasion would arise, viz. "Whenever manufacture or processing of a preparation is taken up by Ciba Pharma with the prior approval of Ciba Basle". It is only when such an occasion would arise Ciba Basle had promised that it would licence the pertaining patent rights and trade marks to Ciba Pharma according to the terms of articles II and III. Ciba Basle further promised that it would in that event deliver to Ciba Pharma all processes, formulae, scientific data, working rules and prescriptions pertaining to the manufacture or processing of those products, which have been discovered and developed in Ciba Basle's laboratories. The further promise is that in that event Ciba Basle would forward to Ciba Pharma as far as possible all scientific and bibliographic information, pamphlets or drafts, which might be useful to introduce licenced preparations and to promote their sale in India. These being the terms of the later part of para. 1 of article I, in our opinion, there was no present obligation incurred thereunder by Ciba Basle. On the other hand, as we have already said, the later part contains only an agreement to enter into another agreement for a fresh consideration. The consideration stipulated in article III relates only to the obligations that had already been incurred by Ciba Basle under the agreement. Reading the agreement as a whole, it would be noticed that the consideration, which Ciba Pharma had agreed to pay, was not a fixed sum but was proportionate to the advantage received by it from Ciba Basle. The agreement in short is that Ciba Pharma agreed to pay to Ciba Basle 10 per cent. of the net selling price of the products manufactured, processed and/or sold by Ciba Pharma in consideration of the user of the technical and scientific knowledge of research conducted by Ciba Basle, technical assistance and for the user of trade marks and patents pertaining to those products. The later part of article I further provides that as and when Ciba Pharma would undertake manufacture or processing of some other products, which would by then have been discovered by Ciba Basle, Ciba Pharma would also be required to pay 10 per cent. of the net sale price of those products in lieu of the user of the knowledge of the research conducted by Ciba Basle pertaining to those products as well as for the user of the Trade Marks and Patents pertaining to those products. In our opinion, therefore, there was no payment made by Ciba Pharma to Ciba Basle in respect of any obligation stipulated by Ciba Basle, which had no concern with the relevant assessment years. The entire expenditure, therefore, was an expenditure incurred in respect of matters pertaining to the year of account. We have already said that the expenditure incurred, viz. the payment of 8 per cent. or 4 per cent., as the case may be, of the net selling price, was for acquiring the technical knowledge of the research conducted by Ciba Basle and for the user of patents pertaining to the products manufactured, processed or sold by Ciba Pharma in the years of account. It is not in dispute that the expenditure incurred pertaining to the user of the patents is a revenue expenditure. We have also said that the expenditure incurred for the user of the knowledge of the research conducted by Ciba Basle also is a revenue expenditure and that therein no element of capital nature is involved inasmuch as by incurring the expenditure, Ciba Pharma had not acquired any asset of an enduring nature. Before the Tribunal it was not in dispute that the expenditure related to Ciba Pharma's business. The expenditure thus would be an expenditure wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purpose of business. In our judgment, therefore, the expenditure would be an allowable deduction under s. 10(2)(xv) of the Act. The view taken by us finds support in a decision of King's Bench Division in British Sugar Manu- *facturers, Ltd. v. Harris (H. M. Inspector of Taxes).*⁵ Facts in that case were that the assessee company, which was the appellant, had agreed to pay to two other companies a certain percentage of its net annual profits "in consideration of their giving to the company (assessee-company) the full benefit of their technical and financial knowledge and experience". The question to be considered was whether the payment made under this agreement by the assessee company to the other companies was an allowable deduction. The contention of the assessee-company was that payment under the agreement was a payment for the services rendered; that it was a sum expended in earning its profits and not expended for capital purposes; that it was not a distribution of its profits and, therefore, the expenditure should be allowed as a deduction in computing the assessee-company's profits. The contentions of the assessee-company were upheld by the Appeal Court and it held that the payments made under the aforesaid agreement were admissible deductions in computing the appellant-company's profits.

Our attention has been also drawn, to another case reported in *Musker v. English Electric Co., Ltd.*⁶ Though the case is distinguishable on facts and the question considered there related to the income of the assessee-company and not to its expenditure, it throws considerable light on the point to be considered. Facts in this case were: the assessee-company in the course of carrying on its trade of engineering manufacturers, had acquired a fund of specialised information and technique in engineering processes. It has not been the practice of the assessee-company to turn this information and technique to account by imparting it to others. However, at the request of the Admiralty, the assessee-company had entered into an agreement to design and develop a marine turbine and to license its manufacture by a limited number of companies in the United Kingdom, Australia and Canada. The agreement, which the assessee-company had entered into with these companies, provided for imparting of manufacturing technique to the licensee-companies and in consideration of this, the assessee-company received specified lump sum payments. The claim made by the assessee-company was that the amount received by it under the agreement was not the income of its business, but capital receipt and, therefore, was not taxable. The claim of the assessee-company was negatived by the House of Lords. Viscount Radcliffe in his speech observed (p. 585):

"In my opinion, there are two considerations which govern cases of this kind and which go a long way towards destroying the force of the analogies by which the Appellant's argument seeks to prove that the transactions under review were sales of fixed assets, and that receipts arising from them ought to be treated as receipts on capital account. One is that in reality no sale takes place. The Appellant had after the transaction what it had before it. There is no property right in 'know-how' that can be transferred, even in the limited sense that there is a legally protected property interest in a secret process. Special knowledge or skill can indeed ripen into a form of property in the fields of commerce and industry, as in copyright, trade-marks and designs and patents, and where such property is parted with for money what is received can be, but will not necessarily be, a receipt on capital account. But imparting 'know-how' for reward is not like this, any more than a teacher sells his knowledge or skill to his pupil."

The position here is more or less the same. As a result of its extensive and valuable research Ciba Basle is in possession of very valuable technical knowledge and practical experience. They had also obtained certain patent rights in respect of certain products and have also registered their trade marks. Under the agreement Ciba Basle have parted with their rights and trade marks. All what has been agreed to under the agreement is to grant the user of the patents and trade marks to Ciba Pharma and to give Ciba Pharma the technical 'know-how' and assistance. In the transaction, there is no transfer of any property or asset nor any capital element is therein involved. The transaction, therefore, is not "capital in nature".

[His Lordship after dealing with the second question, concluded.]

For reasons stated above, our answer to the first question is that the payment made by the assessee to Ciba Basle in pursuance of the agreement of December 17, 1947, is not an admissible deduction under the provisions of s. 10(2)(xii) of the Income-tax Act, but the whole of the amount is an admissible deduction under s. 10(2)(xv).

Our answer to the second question is in the negative. In the circumstances of the case we make no order as to costs.

Answer accordingly.

HUKUMCHAND GULABCHAND JAIN

Damdupat—Applicability of rule of damdupat to interest payable by trustee on breach of trust with respect to trust fund—Rate of interest payable.

The rule of Damdupat does not apply with respect to the interest adjudged payable by a trustee on his committing breach of trust with respect to the trust funds in his hands.

Though a trustee who has custody of trust funds, has a pecuniary liability to make good those funds if he has used them and may, on the basis of such a liability, be said to be a debtor of a trust, yet he, as an individual, is not a borrower of the funds from the trust and cannot be said to have taken a loan from himself as a trustee in charge of the trust funds. His liability to pay interest, when ordered by the Court on equitable grounds, does not come within the provisions dealing with interest in Hindu Law, as mentioned in Colebrooke's Digest.

Dhondo Jugonath v. Narayan Ramchunder,¹ approved.

*Sharp v. Jackson*² and Lake, In re: Dyer, Ex parte,³ referred to.

When a trustee in breach of his duty retains the trust money in his own hands uninvested or mixes it with his own money or property he is liable to pay interest on it. There is no fixed rate of interest which a trustee is liable to pay but in general he is charged simple interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum.

RAGHUBAR DAYAL J. There is a temple known as Shri Chandraprabhu Khandelwal Jain Temple at Dhulia. Gulabchand Hirālāl, father of appellant Hukumchand Gulabchand Jain, a leading member of the Khandelwal Jain community at Dhulia, looked after the temple for over 40 years till his death sometime in 1950. The appellant looked after it after his father's death. Two members of the community interested in the temple, held to be a public temple, instituted the suit against the appellant and the Charity Commissioner, Bombay, praying for the removal of the appellant from possession of the trust properties, for the rendering of true and faithful accounts of all the assets and income of the trust property and for the framing of the scheme for the administration of the trust. It was alleged in the plaint that the appellant's father was maintaining all accounts of income and expenditure concerning the temple and that the funds of the temple were many times advanced at interest and that the temple had come to hold large properties, moveable and immovable. It was further alleged that the temple had a large income from offerings, house-rent etc., but the appellant and his deceased father had not been maintaining the accounts properly and that the funds of the temple were being advanced at interest, though no such income was shown as received recently by the appellant.

The appellant, in his written statement, denied that the amount was so advanced at interest as alleged by the plaintiffs and stated that his father had been keeping a ledger in the name of the temple in the accounts in which its income and expenditure had been duly entered since over 40 years and that the appellant himself had kept separate account books for the temple since October 30, 1951. He denied that any income recently received had not been shown in the accounts.

The trial Court held that the appellant had committed minor irregularities in the maintenance of the accounts, that he was liable to render accounts and that the Commissioner was to ascertain the amount due from the appellant on taking the accounts. It definitely held it not established that income, if any, derived by way of interest on loans advanced out of the funds of the temple had not been credited to the account of the temple and that no instance of fraudulent or dishonest misappropriation of temple funds on the part of defendant No. 1 or his father had been established. It found that the meeting of the community had passed a resolution on August 22, 1958, by an overwhelming majority, sanctioning the accounts submitted by the appellant and that only two persons who opposed against the resolution were the two plaintiffs of the suit.

The Commissioner found that on the date of the institution of the suit, i.e. on February 17, 1954, Rs. 10,088-10-3 were due for principal and Rs. 16,853-6-0 were due for interest, from the appellant. The plaintiffs admitted the report to be correct but the appellant contended that under the rule of damdupat interest exceeding the amount of principal could not be allowed. The appellant's contention was accepted and the trial Court passed a decree on April 23, 1955, for Rs. 20,177-4-6 against the appellant, with future interest at 6 per cent. per annum. We are not now concerned with the other items of the decree and, therefore, we make no reference to them.

The appellant deposited the amount due under the decree on July 18, 1955. The plaintiffs appealed and claimed a larger amount on various grounds, including the one that the principle of damdupat should not have been applied and that interest on the balance of the trust fund should have been calculated and compound interest allowed in place of simple interest on the amount of the trust fund in the hands of the defendant or his father.

The appellant filed a cross-objection against the allowing of interest on the balance of the trust funds with his father and himself.

The High Court agreed with the plaintiffs that the principle of damdupat could not be applied in the circumstances of the case and that compound interest should have been charged against the appellant. It, therefore, set aside the decree passed by the trial Court in so far as it determined the amount due to the temple and referred the case back to the trial Court for re-assessment of the amount due to the temple having due regard to the observations made in its judgment. On an application by the appellant, certificate under art. 133(1) of the Constitution was granted.

The appellant has then filed this appeal and questioned the correctness of the order of the High Court holding him liable to pay compound interest and holding that the principle of damdupat was not applicable in this case.

The High Court said in its judgment that it was the contention of the plaintiffs that the appellant's father and the appellant used the funds of the temple in their business and that they were, therefore, liable to account on that footing. There was no such allegation in the plaint or in the memorandum of appeal to the High Court. The High Court referred to the khulasa submitted to the Commissioner by the plaintiffs and stated that it was specifically alleged therein that the amount was being used by the defendant and his father in business. Support for such an allegation was found in the statement exh. 24 of the appellant's father in 1931. Reference was also made to the fact that the appellant had nowhere denied the fact of the moneys of the temple being used for the purpose of the business and to the non-production of certain books of account by the appellant. His statement that they were not available was not accepted. The High Court recorded the finding in this form (at p. 43 of the appeal record):

"Under these circumstances it would not be an unreasonable inference to draw that the amounts belonging to the temple were being utilised by Defendant No. 1 (the appellant) and before him by his father in their business."

Having come to this conclusion and to the view that the position of the appellant's father and the appellant vis-a-vis the temple funds was that of a trustee, the High Court considered whether the plaintiffs could claim interest on equitable grounds and held that they could claim compound interest with yearly rests, as the money had been used in the business or had been so mixed up with their own funds that it was impossible to say that they had not so used it. The High Court did not apply the rule of damdupat as the liability of the appellant was not founded on loans or on any contract.

It is contended for the appellant that there was neither an allegation nor evidence to the effect that the trust funds had been used in his business by the appellant's father or the appellant and that, therefore, the appellant was not liable to pay compound interest on the trust funds in his hands or in the hands of his father. It was further urged that if interest was payable by the appellant's father or the appellant on the balance of trust funds, it should be simple interest and the amount of interest could not be more than the amount of principal due on the date of the institution of the suit on the principle of damdupat.

[His Lordship then considered the question whether the trust funds with the appellant or his father were used in their trade or business and proceeded:]

In view of the shaky finding of the High Court about the funds being used in business by the appellant's father or the appellant and in view of what we have said above, we hold that it has not been proved that these funds had been used in business and that, therefore, the appellant is not liable to pay compound interest on the balance of the trust funds with his father or himself.

We may now consider whether the appellant is liable to pay simple interest on the balance of trust money with his father or himself.

Two questions arise for consideration and they are whether the trustee is liable to pay simple interest on the trust capital in his hands and if he is so liable what rate of interest be charged from him in the present case. Interest can be allowed on equitable grounds only as no statutes in force during the period in suit and dealing with public charitable trusts made the trustee liable to pay interest. The Indian Trusts Act does not apply to public or private religious or charitable endowments and, therefore, the provisions of s. 23 thereof cannot be used for charging interest from the appellant trustee. The Charitable and Religious Trusts Act has no provision which provides for charging the trustee with interest.

Reference may, therefore, be made in this connection to what is stated in para. 1691 of Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd edn., vol. 38:

"Subject to this, or unless a trustee is expressly otherwise authorised or required under the terms of his trust, he must duly and promptly invest all capital trust money coming to his hands, and all income which cannot be immediately applied for the purposes of the trust; and he is liable for any loss which may result from its being improperly invested or being left uninvested for an unreasonable length of time, and for interest during the period of its being so left."

This is so because the trustee has to conduct the affairs of the trust in the same manner as an ordinary prudent man of business would conduct his own affairs. In para. 1812 are set out the circumstances in which a trustee, besides being required to account for the principal trust money, can also be charged with interest on it and one of the circumstances is when the Court considers that the trustee ought to have received interest. Such could be the case when the trustee, in breach of his duty, retains the trust money in his own hands uninvested or mixes it with his own money or property.

It appears from the Commissioner's report that the trustee in this case had over Rs. 10,000 in his hands from samvat year 1988 commencing from November 10, 1931, upto February 17, 1954, when this suit was instituted. The trustee kept such a large sum uninvested for a long time extending over 22 years. The accounts show that reasonably he could not have expected to require this amount for any current purpose of the trust during these years. He should have invested the amount. His failure to do so makes him liable to pay interest.

It appears from what is said in para. 1814 of Halsbury's vol. 38 that where a trustee simply fails to invest trust money which he ought to have invested or there are no other special circumstances in the case, he is in general charged simple interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum. We consider it reasonable to charge interest at 4 per cent. per annum in this case.

[His Lordship then proceeded to decide what had been the amount of trust funds in the hands of the appellant's father at different times and what would be the amount due from the appellant on the date of the institution of the suit, both for principal amount of trust money and for accumulated interest with him.]

According to the report of the Commissioner, the amount of interest on the principal amount of trust money in the hands of the trustee worked out to Rs. 16,853-6-0 upto February 17, 1954 at 6 per cent. per annum. We have held that the interest be calculated at 4 per cent. per annum. It follows that at this rate the amount of interest found due by the Commissioner would be reduced to Rs. 11,235-9-4. The principal due on that date was Rs. 10,088-10-3. The question now arises whether the amount of interest be limited to the amount of principal, on the basis of the principle of damdapat, or not. The High Court has held that the principle of damdapat will not apply in this case. We agree with that opinion.

The rule of damdapat applies to cases where a loan is advanced. This is clear from Colebrooke's Digest on Hindu Law.

Part I, Vol. I, of the Digest deals with Contracts. Book I of this Part deals with Loans and Payment. Section I of Chapter I of Book I deals with Loans in General and describes what may or may not be loaned by whom, to whom and in what form, with the rules for delivery and receipt. These matters are comprised under the title 'loans delivered (rinadana)', which means the complete delivery of a loan or debt, by whom, where and to whom made. Chapter II deals with interest and states at the commencement of Section I:

"Such interest, as may be taken without a breach of duty on the part of the creditor, is a rule (dharma) for delivery by the creditor. Or... for it is the nature of a loan, that it should produce to the lender the principal sum advanced, and interest in addition thereto."

The various Articles in this Section use the expressions 'creditor', 'lender', 'loan', 'principal', 'lent', 'borrowers' and thus make it amply clear that it deals with interest on the amounts advanced by a creditor to a debtor. Section I deals with the rates of interest to be charged. Section II deals with Special Forms of Interest. Paragraph 53 thereof states:

"Interest on money, received at once, not year by year, month by month, or day by day, as it ought, must never be more than enough to double the debt, that is, more than the amount of the principal paid at the same time."

This is what is known by the rule of damdupat and has been rightly construed, as long ago as 1863, by the Bombay High Court in Dhondo Jugonath v. Narayen Ramchunder.¹ Section III deals with Interest Specially Authorized and Specially Prohibited. Article II of this Section deals with Limits of Interest. Paragraph 59 thereof states:

"The principal can only be doubled by length of time, after which interest ceases."

The limit of interest is different under other paragraphs for loans advanced in different circumstances. Paragraph 61 repeats what has been stated in para. 53 of Section II and adds a special rule to the effect:

"On grain, on fruit, on wool or hair, on beasts of burden, lent to be paid in the same kind of equal value, it must not be more than enough to make the debt quintuple." It is, therefore, clear, as stated earlier, that the rule of damdupat applies in respect of interest due on amounts lent by a creditor to the borrower, the debtor. The question then is whether the funds in the hands of a trustee can be said to be such loans notionally advanced by the trustee to himself as an individual. If their character can be deemed to be such, there may be a case for applying the rule of damdupat to the interest on such funds and that if it is not so, this rule of damdupat will not apply to the interest ordered to be paid on such funds.

It has been urged for the appellant that the trustee is a debtor with respect to the trust money in his hands. Reference has been made to Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd edn., vol. 38, p. 1044 where it is stated at para. 1801:

"A breach of trust is, in equity, regarded as giving rise to a simple contract debt." In the foot-note is stated:

"Strictly speaking, the relation of debtor and creditor does not subsist between a trustee and his cestui que trust (per Lindely, L. J. in Ex parte Taylor: In re Goldsmid)."² Lewin on 'Trusts', 15th edn., states at p. 745:

"The debt constituted by a breach of trust is, even after it has been established by a decree, an equitable debt only, and until the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, would not have supported a petition in bankruptcy."

It was said by the Earl of Halsbury, L.C., in *Sharp v. Jackson*³:

"...It has been suggested that there was a proposition which could be maintained, as to which I confess I entertain grave doubts whether any decision goes to that extent, namely, that the relation between a cestui que trust and a trustee who has misappropriated the trust fund is not that of debtor and creditor. That it may be something more than that is true, but that it is that of debtor and creditor I can entertain no doubt. As that question has been mooted and brought before your Lordships' House as one question for decision here, I certainly have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion no such proposition can properly be maintained, and that although there are other and peculiar elements in the relation between a cestui que trust and a trustee, undoubtedly the relation of debtor and creditor can and does exist."

No other Lord expressed an opinion on this point.

The correctness of this expression of the Earl of Halsbury has been doubted in *Lake, In re: Dyer, Ex parte*⁴ by Rigby L. J., who remarked at the hearing:

"How is a trustee a debtor? Can he be sued at common law? I do not see how he can be a 'debtor', for the money he is fraudulently dealing with is, at law, his own money. No doubt he can be called upon to replace the money, but that must be by a suit in equity, not at law. Notwithstanding the high authority of the statement that has been referred to, I confess I do not understand it."

We are of opinion that though a trustee, who has custody of trust funds, has a pecuniary liability to make good those funds if he has used them and may, on the basis of such a liability, be said to be a debtor of the trust, yet he, as an individual, is not a borrower of the funds from the trust and cannot be said to have taken a loan from himself as a trustee in charge of the trust funds. His liability to pay interest, when ordered by the Court on equitable grounds, does not come within the provisions dealing with interest in Hindu law, as mentioned in Colebrooke's Digest.

There is no fixed rate of interest which a trustee is liable to pay as there is no contract between him as a trustee and as an individual to pay interest. He simply uses the money in his custody. It is only when the Court determines his liability to pay interest that interest is to be calculated on the principal amount due from him. It is not the case of a creditor letting interest accumulate and thus make the debtor pay interest much more than what he had borrowed as principal.

The principle of damdupat was evolved both as an inducement to the debtor to pay the entire principal and interest thereon at one and the same time in order to save interest in excess of the principal and as a warning to the creditor to take effective steps for realising the debt from the borrower within reasonable time so that there be not such accumulation of interest as would be in excess of the principal amount due, as in that case he would have to forego the excess amount. There may be justification for the principle of damdupat applying in the case of an ordinary creditor and a debtor, but there seems no justification for extending that principle to the case of a trustee who has to pay interest on the funds in his hand with respect to which on certain grounds he is held liable to pay interest. We, therefore, hold that the rule of damdupat will not apply with respect to the interest adjudged payable by a trustee on his committing breach of trust with respect to the trust funds in his hands.

The result then is that the appellant is liable to pay Rs. 10,088-10-3 for principal and Rs. 11,235-9-4 as interest, upto the date of the institution of the suit, i.e. upto February 17, 1954.

We, therefore, allow the appeal, set aside the decree of the High Court and modify and decree of the trial Court accordingly. The result will be that the suit temple will be entitled to get from defendant No. 1 a sum of Rs. 21,324-3-7 upto the date of the suit, together with future interest at 4 per cent. per annum on Rs. 10,088-10-3 from the date of the suit till the date of payment. The appellant will bear his costs throughout. The costs of the respondents will come out of the estate.

Appeal allowed.

Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order, 1950. Clause 3—Constitution of India, Art. 25—Word "profess" in cl. 3 of Order, meaning of—Definition of Hindu in Explanation II to art. 25.

The word "profess" in clause 3 of the Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order, 1950, is used in the sense of an open declaration or practice by a person of the Hindu or the Sikh religion. Where, therefore, a person makes a public declaration that he has ceased to be a Hindu and has accepted the Buddhist religion he cannot derive any benefit from that Order and claim to be treated as one belonging to a Scheduled Caste.

N. C. Chatterjee, with V. S. Sawhney, S. S. Khanduja, S. K. Manchanda and Ganpat Rai, for respondent No. 1.

MUDHOLKAR J. The question which arises for consideration in this appeal by special leave from the judgment of the Bombay High Court is whether respondent No. 1 Dr. D. P. Meshram was entitled to be a candidate for election to the Maharashtra Legislative Assembly from constituency No. 190 of Nagpur III, a constituency reserved for candidates from scheduled castes.

The appellant and respondents Nos. 1 to 4 were candidates duly nominated for election to the Assembly from the aforesaid constituency. The poll was taken on February 27, 1962, and respondent No. 1 who had polled the highest number of votes was declared elected. The appellant thereupon preferred an election petition before the Election Commission, the main allegations in which were (a) that respondent No. 1 having embraced Buddhism on March 17, 1957, had ceased to be a member of a Scheduled Caste within the meaning of the Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order, 1950, and was thus disentitled from being a candidate for the particular seat and (b) that respondent No. 1 was guilty of several corrupt practices. The Tribunal held that the corrupt practices alleged against respondent No. 1 were not established. It, however, came to the conclusion that respondent No. 1 had embraced Buddhism as alleged by the appellant and was, therefore, not eligible for being a candidate for election from the reserved constituency. Upon this ground the Tribunal set aside the election of respondent No. 1. It may be mentioned that the appellant had made a further prayer to the effect that he should be declared elected to the seat; but this prayer was not granted by the Tribunal on the ground that he was not the only other candidate for election and, therefore, it cannot be said how the votes which respondent No. 1 had secured would have been distributed among the remaining candidates. Aggrieved by the decision of the Tribunal respondent No. 1 preferred an appeal before the High Court of Bombay. The only question which was urged before the High Court was regarding the alleged conversion of respondent No. 1 to Buddhism. On that question the High Court reversed the finding of the Tribunal and held that the fact had not been established by evidence. The High Court, therefore, upheld the election of respondent No. 1.

[His Lordship then considered the evidence whether respondent No. 1 was converted to Buddhism and held that he was so converted, and proceeded.]

What cl. (3) of the Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order, 1950 contemplates is that for a person to be treated as one belonging to a Scheduled Caste within the meaning of that Order he must be one who professes either Hindu or Sikh religion. The High Court, following its earlier decision in *N. W. Karwadi v. P. H. Shambharkar*¹ has said that the meaning of the phrase "professes a religion" in the aforementioned provision is "to enter publicly into a religious state" and that for this purpose a mere declaration by a person that he has ceased to belong to a particular religion and embraced another religion would not be sufficient. The meanings of the word "profess" have been given thus in Webster's New World Dictionary: "to avow publicly; to make an open declaration of; . . . to declare one's belief in: as, to profess Christ. To accept into a religious order". The meanings given in the Shorter Oxford Dictionary are more or less the same. It seems to us that the meaning "to declare one's belief in: as to profess Christ" is one which we have to bear in mind while construing the aforesaid order because it is this which bears upon religious belief and consequently also upon a change in religious belief. It would thus follow that a declaration of one's belief must necessarily mean a declaration in such a way that it would be known to those whom it may interest. Therefore, if a public declaration is made by a person that he has ceased to belong to his old religion and has accepted another religion he will be taken as professing the other religion. In the face of such an open declaration it would be idle to enquire further as to whether the conversion to another religion was efficacious. The word "profess" in the Presidential Order appears to have been used in the sense of an open declaration or practice by a person of the Hindu (or the Sikh) religion. Where, therefore, a person says, on the contrary, that he has ceased to be a Hindu he cannot derive any benefit from that Order.

Finally it is argued that the word Hindu is comprehensive enough to include a Buddhist and in this connection our attention is invited to Explanation II to cl. (2) of art. 25 of the Constitution. Clause (1) of art. 25 recognises, amongst other things, freedom to practise and propagate religion. Sub-clause (b) of cl. (2) runs thus:

"Nothing in this article shall affect the operation of any existing law or prevent the State from making any law—...

(b) providing for social welfare and reform or the throwing open of Hindu religious institutions of a public character to all classes and sections of Hindus."

Explanation II reads thus:

"In sub-clause (b) of clause (2), the reference to Hindus shall be construed as including a reference to persons professing the Sikh, Jaina or Buddhist religion, and the reference to Hindu religious institutions shall be construed accordingly."

The definition of Hindu is expanded for the special purposes of sub-cl. (b) of cl. (2) of art. 25 and for no other. Paragraph 3 of the Constitution (Scheduled Castes) Order reads thus:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in paragraph 2, no person who professes a religion different from the Hindu or the Sikh religion shall be deemed to be a member of a scheduled caste."

If it was intended that the word "Hindu" used in this paragraph should have a wide meaning similar to that in Explanation II just quoted there would have been no need to make a mention of the Sikh religion. From the fact that a special mention is made of the Sikh religion it would follow that the word "Hindu" is used in the narrower sense of the orthodox Hindu religion which recognises castes and contains injunctions based on caste distinctions.

For the foregoing reasons we are satisfied that respondent No. 1 had ceased to be a Hindu at the date of his nomination and that consequently he was ineligible to be a candidate for election from a constituency reserved for members of scheduled castes. In the circumstances the Tribunal was right in setting aside his election. Accordingly we allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the High Court and restore that of the Tribunal. Costs throughout will be borne by respondent No. 1.

Appeal allowed.

Whether such Inam abolished under Act.*

Certain lands were granted as Inam to some individuals on condition of service which was specified as Taziadari, i.e., for taking out Tazias during the period of Mohurram. On the question whether this Inam was abolished by the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, as amended in 1959 :—

Held, that as the lands were granted as Inam not to any society or organization but to certain individuals, the Inam could not be said to have been held by or for the benefit of any charitable or religious institution within s. 1(2) of the Act, that the service for rendering which the grant was made was a service to be rendered to a section of the Muslim community and, therefore, the Inam was a community service Inam within the meaning of the Act, and that such an Inam was abolished with effect from July 1, 1960, under s. 1 (2A) of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

M. P. Kanade, for the petitioner.

S. G. Deshmukh, for opponent No. 1.

R. B. Kotwal, Government Pleader, for opponent No. 2.

CHANNANI C. J. The lands in dispute were granted as Inam on the condition of service which was specified as Taziadari, that is, for taking out Tazias during the period of Mohurram. After the coming into force of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act as amended in 1959, the question arose whether this Inam was abolished by this Act. The Deputy Collector held that the Inam was not abolished. That order was confirmed in appeal by Government. It is being challenged before us in this application.

Sub-section (2) of s. 1 of the Act states that it shall be applicable to all inams except (i) inams held by or for the benefit of charitable and religious institutions and (ii) inams held for rendering village service useful to the Government or to the village community including sethsendhi, neeradi and balutha inams. Sub-section (2A) provides that on the coming into force of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams (Amendment) Act, 1959 (July 1, 1960) the Act shall apply also to cash grants and inams of the nature of community service inams and watans. The expression "community service inam" is defined in sub-s. (1) of s. 2 to mean an inam held for performing service useful to the village community and includes an inam held for such service even where such service has ceased to be demanded.

The Muntkhab which was issued about 1916 shows that the grant had been made to Saroji Kondaji and four other persons on condition of rendering service which is mentioned as Taziadari. The holders of the inam were, therefore, five individuals, who cannot be described as a charitable and religious institution. The grant was not made to any society or organisation. According to the Oxford English Dictionary the word "institution" means "establishment; organization or association instituted for the promotion of some object, specially, one of public or general utility, religious, charitable, educational etc. e.g. a church, school, college, hospital, asylum, reformatory, mission or the like."

This is the ordinary meaning of the word. Another meaning is "established law, custom, usage, practice, organization or other element in the political or social life of the people."

Colloquially it is some times used in the sense of something having fixity or importance of a social institution, e.g. in the sentence "He is one of the institutions of the place." Ordinarily, therefore, an individual is not referred to as an institution. A grant to an individual would not, therefore, be a grant to an institution. The fact that the grant was made for the performance of service of a religious or charitable nature is immaterial. Every inam for a charitable or religious purpose is not for the benefit of a charitable or religious institution.

*Decided, April 9, 1965. Special Civil Ap- 1 (1915) I.L.R. 42 Cal. 933, at p. 935.
plication No. 1114 of 1964.

The Deputy Collector has referred to a casual observation in the judgment of Imam J. in Ram Charan Law v. Fatima Begum,¹ which is as follows :

"...but it is the keeping up of the Mohurum as an institution with all its moral effect on the general Mahomedan public."

The word "institution" here is obviously used in the sense of a custom or practice. It would be wrong to draw from this sentence an inference that a grant for performing religious service is a grant to a religious institution. The question, which the Calcutta High Court had to decide, was also quite different and that was whether a waqf was created where with the object of dedicating a house to the service of the Imams, Hassan and Hussain and for other religious purposes, the settlor had conveyed the house to his grand-children on trust for the proper observance of the objects mentioned in the deed.

As the lands in the present case were granted as inam not to any society or organization but to five individuals and as the present holders of the inam are also some individuals, the inam cannot be said to have been held by or for the benefit of any charitable or religious institution. The service for rendering which the grant was made was a service to be rendered to a section of the Muslim community. The Inam would, therefore, be a community service inam within the meaning of the Act. Such an inam was abolished with effect from July 1, 1960, under sub-s. (2A) of s. 1 of the Act.

In our opinion, therefore, the view taken by the Deputy Collector and by Government is not correct. We set aside the orders made by them and hold that the inam was a community service inam which was abolished with effect from July 1, 1960.

No order as to costs.

Orders set aside.

A suit for the recovery of a loan advanced by a money-lender is not liable to be dismissed merely because the money-lender was not registered under s. 11-B of the C.P. and Berar Moneylenders Act, 1934, on the date of the transaction.

Section 11-H of the Act contemplates that if after the suit has been instituted, the Court finds that the plaintiff money-lender does not hold a valid registration certificate, it shall stay the suit for a reasonable time until a valid registration certificate is produced. HAJARIMAL Girdharilalji Shop (plaintiff), who was a money-lender advanced Rs. 2,000 and Rs. 4,500 to Harinarayan (defendant) under two pro-notes of dates April 20, 1952, and June 29, 1952, respectively. On these dates the plaintiff did not hold a valid registration certificate as required under s. 11-F of the Central Provinces and Berar Money-lenders Act, 1934. Both these pro-notes were ultimately renewed on April 7, 1955. The amount found due on these two pro-notes together with interest thereon was found to be Rs. 8,500. The defendant on the said date i.e. on April 7, 1955, executed a fresh promissory note for the said amount of Rs. 8,500. Prior to this date, i.e. April 7, 1955, the plaintiff did hold a valid registration certificate under the said section of the Act. On April 7, 1958, plaintiff instituted this suit to recover from the defendant a sum of Rs. 11,500. The details of this sum were Rs. 8,500 the principal amount of pro-note dated April 7, 1955, plus Rs. 3,060 interest at the rate of one per cent per month from April 7, 1955 to April 7, 1958 on the said sum of Rs. 8,500. The total came to Rs. 11,560. Plaintiff gave up Rs. 60 and claimed a decree for Rs. 11,500 together with interest thereon from the date of the suit till the date of realisation and costs. The defendant inter alia contended that the plaintiff's suit was liable to be dismissed inasmuch as plaintiff had no money-lender's certificate under s. 11-F on the date of the original transactions of April 20, 1952, and June 20, 1952.

The trial Judge, following the decision in *Wasudeo Bhairulal v. Ramchandra*¹ held that the plaintiff not having held a money-lender's certificate under s. 11-F, his suit was liable to be dismissed. He, therefore, dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff appealed to the Nagpur Bench of the High Court. The appeal came on for hearing before Tambe and Deshmukh JJ., who referred it to a larger bench. In the course of his referring judgment, delivered on June 17, 1965, Tambe J., observed as follows :—

TAMBE J. Mr. Bobde, learned counsel for the appellant, stated that he was not disputing the finding of the trial Court on the minor issues as to interest and the appellant would accept that the amount due to him on the date of the suit was, as found by the learned Judge, Rs. 9,008. He, however, contends that the learned Judge was in error in holding that the plaintiff's suit was liable to be dismissed for the reason that the plaintiff did not hold money-lender's licence on the date of the original transactions, viz. April 20, 1952 and June 29, 1952. He has brought to our notice a decision of the Nagpur High Court supporting his view in *Patiram v. Baliram*². Mr. Bobde in the alternative contends that, at any rate, plaintiff having held the money-lender's licence on the date of the renewal, viz. April 7, 1955, the plaintiff was entitled to a decree for the full amount inasmuch as the renewal of the pro-note is a fresh transaction affording an altogether new cause of action to the plaintiff. The question whether plaintiff's failure to hold money-lender's licence under s. 11-F on the date of the original transactions is fatal to the suit or not, is of considerable importance. The section has been construed differently in two decisions of the Division Bench. In our opinion, it is necessary that the question is decided by a larger Bench. The papers be placed before My Lord the Chief Justice for constituting the larger bench.

The question was considered by a Full Bench composed of Chainani C. J. and Tambe and Abhyankar JJ.

A. S. Bobde, for the appellant.

B. A. Udhoji, for the respondent.

CHAINANI C. J. The question, which has been referred to the Full Bench, has been formulated as under :—

Whether a suit for the recovery of a loan advanced by a moneylender is liable to be dismissed, because the moneylender was not registered under s. 11-B of the C.P. and Berar Money-lenders Act, 1934 (No. XIII of 1934) on the date of the transaction?

The facts of the appeal, which has given rise to this reference, are that the appellant-plaintiff is a money-lender. He advanced two loans of Rs. 2,000 and Rs. 4,500 to the defendant on April 20, 1952, and June 29, 1952, respectively. On these dates he did not hold a valid registration certificate. These promissory notes were renewed on April 7, 1955, on which date the defendant executed a fresh promissory note for Rs. 8,500 which represented the principal of the original two promissory notes and the interest thereon. In 1958, the plaintiff instituted a suit to recover the amount due from the defendant on the promissory note dated April 7, 1955. This suit was dismissed following the decision of this Court in *Wasudeo Bhairulal v. Ramchandra*¹. In that case, it was held that a suit to recover money advanced by a money-lender as defined in the C.P. and Berar Moneylenders Act, 1934 (hereinafter referred to as the Act) and who did not hold a registration certificate on the date of the transaction, cannot be instituted. Against that decision, the plaintiff filed an appeal. When the appeal came up for hearing, reliance was placed on behalf of the appellant on the decision of the Nagpur High Court in *Patiram v. Baliram*². In that case, the Nagpur High Court had held that s. 11-F of the Money-lenders Act applies to the business of money-lending and not to an individual transaction of lending money, that the individual transaction of money-lending made by a money-lender, who has not obtained a registration certificate, is not made invalid and that the only obstacle created in his way is that he cannot obtain a decree on his loan unless he possesses a valid registration certificate on the date on which a decree is to be passed. In view of these two conflicting decisions, the Division Bench decided to refer the matter to a larger Bench.

Section 11-A of the Act provides that every Sub-Registrar shall maintain a register of money-lenders. Sub-section (1) of s. 11-B states that every person, who carries on or intends to carry on the business of money-lending, shall get himself registered by an application made to the Sub-Registrar of any sub-district of the district or any one of the districts in which he carries or intends to carry on such business. Section 11-B provides that the registration certificate granted under s. 11-B shall not entitle the holder thereof to carry on the business of money-lending in any district other than the district or districts for which such certificate has been granted. Sub-section (1) of s. 11-F states that no person shall carry on the business of money-lending in any district unless he holds a valid registration certificate in respect of that district. Sub-section (2) of this section states that whoever contravenes the provisions of sub-s. (1) shall be punishable with the fine specified in the section. Section 11-H, and which is the section which is to be construed, is in the following terms :—

"11-H. No suit for the recovery of a loan advanced by a moneylender shall proceed in a civil court until the court is satisfied that he holds a valid registration certificate or that he is not required to have a registration certificate by reason of the fact that he does not carry on the business of money-lending in any of the districts of Madhya Pradesh.

Provided that this section shall not apply to a suit instituted before the 1st October 1940".

The language used in s. 11-H is very significant. The section does not say that no suit shall be instituted or entertained. What it states is that no suit shall proceed. The section does not therefore bar a suit for the recovery of a loan advanced by a money-lender, who did not hold a valid registration certificate. A suit can lie, but the Court is required not to proceed with the suit, that is, to hold any proceeding in the suit until it is satisfied that the plaintiff money-lender holds a valid registration certificate. There is also no total prohibition on the Court from proceeding with the suit. The prohibition is to operate "until" the Court is satisfied about the possession of a valid certificate by the plaintiff. The other important word to be noted is "holds". The word is used in the present tense. It suggests that the money-lender must possess a registration certificate at the time when the Court proposes to proceed with the suit. If at that time he does not possess a valid registration certificate the Court cannot proceed with the suit.

It has been urged that as under s. 11-F a money-lender cannot carry on money-lending business without a valid registration certificate, the words "holds a valid registration certificate" in s. 11-H imply that the certificate should have been held on the date of the transaction. The material word used however is "holds" and not 'held'. The section does not say that the money-lender should have held a valid registration certificate on the date of the transaction. The word "holds" considered along with the words "shall proceed" on the other hand indicate that the requirement about the certificate is to be satisfied at the time when the Court intends to proceed with the suit.

Section 11-H does not also lay down that the suit shall be dismissed if the certificate is not produced. It only prohibits a Court from proceeding with the suit until it is satisfied as stated in the section. What the section, therefore, contemplates is that if after the suit has been instituted, the Court finds that the plaintiff money-lender does not hold a valid registration certificate, it shall stay the suit for a reasonable time until a valid registration certificate is produced. If no such certificate is produced thereafter, the Court will not pass a decree in the plaintiff's favour.

A plain reading of the section, therefore, makes it clear that a suit cannot be dismissed only on the ground that the plaintiff did not possess a valid registration certificate on the date of the transaction.

The principal reason for the contrary view taken in Wasudeo Bhairulal v. Ramchandra, is that as s. 11-F prohibits a money-lender from carrying on the business of money-lending without a valid registration certificate and also provides a penalty for the contravention of this provision, a suit on a money-lending transaction entered into by an unregistered money-lender cannot be maintained. With respect, it may be pointed out that the Legislature itself has not barred a civil suit in respect of such a transaction. The only obstacle which it has placed in the way of a plaintiff in such a case is that the suit shall not proceed until a valid registration certificate has been produced. The Legislature has also in sub-s. (2) of s. 11-F specified the penalty for contravention of the provisions of sub-s. (1) of s. 11-F, that is, for carrying on money-lending business without a certificate. It has not prescribed any additional penalty such as that a suit to recover a loan advanced by an unregistered money-lender shall not lie or shall be dismissed. It is not open to a Court to subject a person to any penalty other than what the Legislature has prescribed.

Reliance has been placed in the above judgment on *Mohd. Saleem v. Umaji*³ in which a Full Bench of the Hyderabad High Court held that a suit should be dismissed if the money-lender did not possess a licence on the date of the transaction. It was observed that the object of the enactment was to serve a public purpose and the mischief it sought to secure was to protect borrowers from unscrupulous and usurious money-lenders by prohibiting them from lending monies without obtaining licences on pain of imprisonment as well as by empowering Courts to dismiss suits of such money-lenders. Section 9 (2) of the Hyderabad Money-lenders Act provides that if it is proved that the plaintiff is a money-lender as defined in sub-s. (7) of s. 2, but does not hold a licence granted under s. 3, the Court shall dismiss his suit. The object of the C.P. & Berar Act is also the same, to protect borrowers from unscrupulous money-lenders, but there is no provision in this Act empowering the Court to dismiss a suit on the ground that the money-lender did not possess a registration certificate. The wording of s. 11-H is materially different.

It has been urged that a transaction entered into by a money-lender in contravention of the provisions of s. 11-F is void and opposed to public policy. It is not necessary for us to decide this question in this reference. Assuming that the transaction is void, the plaintiff may be able to obtain relief under s. 65 of the Contract Act. It will be open to the respondent to urge this point at the hearing of the appeal.

In Janki Bai v. Ratan Melu,⁴ a Full Bench of the Madhya Pradesh High Court has taken the same view as we are inclined to take. It was held in that case that if a money-lender does not have, and cannot produce a registration certificate covering the date on which he advanced a loan, his suit for recovery of that loan is, for that reason alone, not liable to be dismissed, and that it will be sufficient compliance of s. 11-H if, during the pendency of the suit he produces a registration certificate which is valid at the time of its production.

In our opinion, therefore, Wasudeo Bhairulal v. Ramchandra was not correctly decided. Our reply to the question referred to the Full Bench will, therefore, be in the negative. The appeal may now be placed before a Division Bench for further orders.

Answer accordingly.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

[NAGPUR BENCH]

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Wagle.

THE INDIAN HUME PIPE COMPANY LTD. v. BHIMRAO BALIRAM GAJBHIYE.*

Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), Secs. 25-H, 25-F—Retrenched workman re-employed—Whether such workman entitled to previous terms and conditions of service.

Section 25-H of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, only gives a right to a worker to have preference in the matter of re-employment; it does not give him a right to secure employment on his previous terms and conditions of service.

*Indian Hume Pipe Co. v. Labour Court*¹, dissented from.

The facts appear in the judgment.

E. J. Moharir, for the petitioner.

S. G. Kukde, for respondent No. 1.

CHAINANI C. J. The facts giving rise to this application are that respondent No. 1, hereinafter referred to as the respondent, had been employed by the petitioners sometime in 1960. After about two years' service, he was retrenched on March 10, 1962, and was paid retrenchment compensation in accordance with the provisions of s. 25-F of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. At the time when the respondent was retrenched, a proceeding under s. 38A of the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, 1947, was pending before the State Industrial Court. Under the award, which was made by that Court in that proceeding, the respondent became entitled to a basic wage of 86 nP. in addition to dearness allowance of Rs. 1.75 on the date of his retrenchment. The respondent was re-employed on October 1, 1962. According to the employment order issued to him, he was to be paid a basic wage of 62 nP. and dearness allowance of Rs. 1.75 nP. Under the award 62 nP. was the basic wage fixed for new entrants. The respondent subsequently made an application to the Labour Court under s. 33C (2) of the Industrial Disputes Act. He contended in that application that he was entitled to receive the same wages from the date of his re-employment as were being paid to him on the date of his retrenchment, that is, 86 nP. per day, apart from dearness allowance. He complained that he had been paid 24 nP. less per day and accordingly he claimed Rs. 65 from the petitioners. The petitioners resisted the application of the respondent and raised various contentions. The principal contention of the petitioners was that as the respondent had been paid retrenchment compensation, he was liable to be treated as a new entrant and accordingly entitled only to the basic wage of 62 nP, which is the wage fixed for new entrants by the award. This argument was not accepted by the Labour Court, which relied upon the decision of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in *Indian Hume Pipe Co. v. Labour Court*¹. The Labour Court, therefore, made an order directing the petitioner to pay Rs. 65 to the respondent. That order has been challenged before us in this application.

Section 25-H of the Industrial Disputes Act provides that where any workmen are retrenched, and the employer proposes to take into his employ any persons, he shall, in such manner as may be prescribed, give an opportunity to the retrenched workmen to offer themselves for re-employment and retrenched workmen who offer themselves for re-employment shall have preference over other persons. This section, therefore, imposes an obligation on an employer to give first preference to retrenched workmen whenever he decides to increase the strength of his establishment and employ some additional persons. The employer must first offer the job to a retrenched workman before he can engage any other person. Under the section, an offer is to be made to retrenched workmen for re-employment. According to the Oxford Dictionary, "re-employ" means "employ again" or "take back into employment." Re-employment, therefore, means taking back in employment, but it does not necessarily imply that the taking back into employment or service must be on the same terms and conditions, to which the employee was entitled previously. Section 25 H only gives a right to a worker to have preference in the matter of re-employment, but we do not find anything in the section or any other provision in the Act which also gives him a right to secure employment on his previous terms and conditions of service. Under s. 25-F, when a worker is retrenched, he gets compensation for the loss of service. The amount of this compensation depends on the length of service put in by him. His previous service, is, therefore, taken into consideration when the retrenchment compensation is paid. Thereafter, the only right available to him by reason of his having been previously employed is that conferred on him by s. 25 H and that is of preference in securing the employment. If the argument that a worker is entitled to be re-employed on his previous terms and conditions of service is accepted, the position would be that if a worker is retrenched again, he would be entitled to have his previous service also taken into consideration for the purpose of determining the retrenchment compensation payable to him. It could not have been intended by the Legislature that the same period of service should be taken into consideration more than once for the purpose of paying retrenchment compensation.

It has been urged by Mr. Kukday that a distinction should be drawn between retrenchment compensation and the wages payable to a worker. He has in fairness conceded that previous service of a worker cannot be taken into consideration again if after being re-employed, he is retrenched, for the purpose of determining the compensation then payable to him. But he has argued that wages, which a worker is entitled to draw at any time, depend also upon the length of service put in by him. He has urged that there is no reason why the previous service of a worker should not be taken into consideration for the purpose of fixing his basic wage. In the absence of any provision to the contrary, it will, however, be difficult to accept the argument that while the previous service should be taken into consideration for one purpose, it should be ignored for another purpose.

Reference has been made to the decision of the Andhra Pradesh High Court in Indian Hume Pipe Co. v. Labour Court.¹ At page 775 it has been observed :

"... The word 're-employment', in our opinion, connotes employment on the same terms as before. The meaning given in the Oxford English Dictionary is 'to employ again, to take back into employment.' This implies employment on the same terms and conditions of service. In our considered judgment, the obligation to employ the workmen on the same condition as to emoluments, etc., is implicit in the concept of re-employment."

With respect, we find ourselves unable to agree that the word "re-employment" necessarily connotes employment on the same terms as before. All that s. 25-H provides for is preference to retrenched workmen in securing employment, but it does not say that the re-employment should be on the former terms and conditions of service. If that had been the intention of the Legislature, it would have made a specific provision to that effect.

In our opinion, therefore, the view taken by the Labour Court is not correct. Accordingly, we set aside the order made by the Labour Court and direct that the application made by the respondent to the Labour Court should be dismissed. No order as to costs.

Order set aside.

CRIMINAL APPELLATE.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice.

KRISHNA GUNDU POTJALE v. STATE OF MAHARASHTRA.*

Criminal Procedure Code (Act V of 1898), Sec. 173—Police Manual. Vol. III. Para 219—Request for grant of summary on report to magistrate— Whether obligatory on magistrate to hear accused before granting summary.

On a report made to a magistrate under s. 173 of the Criminal Procedure Code, 1898, requesting grant of a summary, it is not obligatory on the magistrate to hear the accused before he decides as to which summary he should grant.

State v. Murlidhar¹, referred to.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

H. D. Gole, for the petitioners.

M. A. Rane, Assistant Government Pleader, for the State.

CHAINANI C. J. The petitioners are two police constables who were formerly attached to the Jaisingpur Outpost. On September 7, 1962, one Bhupal Anna Chougule was murdered. Two persons were prosecuted in connection with that offence, but they were acquitted. The allegation against the petitioners was that they had taken some illegal gratification and had tried to shield the culprits and that they had thereby committed offences under ss. 193, 201, 204 and 217, Indian Penal Code. They were arrested and released on bail. These offences were investigated by the police, but after the acquittal of the accused, who were tried on the charge of murder the police came to the conclusion that it would be difficult to obtain a conviction against the petitioners. They, therefore, sent a report to the Judicial Magistrate concerned under s. 173, Criminal Procedure Code, and asked for a non-cognizable summary in respect of the offences alleged against the petitioners. The learned Magistrate, however, granted "A" Summary. Being aggrieved by the order, the petitioners filed a revision application in the Sessions Court at Kolhapur. That was rejected. Thereafter they have filed the present revision application in this Court.

It appears that before the learned Magistrate passed orders on the report made to him under s. 173, the petitioners had made an application to him and requested that they should be heard before orders were passed. In State v. Murlidhar¹, it has been held that an order passed by a Magistrate on a report under s. 173, Criminal Procedure Code, requesting that Summary "A", "B" or "C" be issued is in its very nature a judicial order and not an administrative order. Mr. Gole, the learned advocate for the petitioners, has therefore contended that the Magistrate was bound to hear the petitioners before deciding as to which Summary he should grant. He has urged that a judicial order necessarily contemplates that there must be application of mind and that there can be proper application of mind only after the parties have been heard. There is no provision in the Code providing for classification of offences or for the issue of Summaries by the Magistrate to whom a report is made under s. 173 of the Code. The classification is made and the Summaries are granted under para. 219 in Vol. III of the Police Manual. Clause 3 of this paragraph states that a request should be made to the Magistrate to classify the case and to issue an appropriate Summary of his order, and the clause further provides that "A" Summary is to be issued when the complaint is true but undetected (where there is no clue whatsoever about the culprits or property or where the accused is known but there is no evidence to justify his being sent up to the Magistrate for trial), that "B" Summary is to be issued when the complaint is maliciously false, while "C" Summary is to be issued when the complaint is neither true nor false. These Summaries are asked for when the police do not propose to send a charge-sheet against the accused or when it is not proposed to prosecute him. A Magistrate has no doubt power to direct a prosecution, but if he decides not to do so, then he issues an appropriate summary.

*Decided, August 17, 1965. Criminal Revision Application No. 189 of 1965.

1 (1959) 61 Bom. L.R. 1656.

A summary is, therefore, issued only when it is not proposed to prosecute the accused. An order of the Magistrate granting one or the other summary does not, therefore, cause any prejudice to the accused. So far as he is concerned the proceeding under the Code commenced by the Police then comes to an end. Consequently it is not necessary to hear the accused for deciding which summary should be granted. There is also no provision either in the Code or in the Police Manual, which provides that the accused should be heard before the Magistrate decides as to which summary he should grant. I am, therefore, unable to accept Mr. Gole's argument that the Magistrate was under an obligation to hear the petitioners before he decided to grant "A" Summary.

It has, however, been urged by Mr. Gole that the consequence of the grant of "A" Summary may be that departmental proceedings may be instituted against the petitioners. Such proceedings could have been instituted against the petitioners even if the petitioners had been prosecuted and acquitted or if the Magistrate had issued "C" Summary. The order made by the Magistrate granting "A" Summary is based on the evidence collected by the police during the course of the police investigation. Such an order cannot prejudice an accused person in any departmental proceeding which may be held against him, because the finding in the departmental proceeding must necessarily be based on the evidence led in the course of the departmental inquiry. The order of the Magistrate granting "A" Summary made without hearing the petitioners cannot, therefore, prejudice the petitioners in any departmental inquiry which may be decided to be held against them.

[His Lordship after dealing with a point not material to this report, concluded.]

I, therefore, see no sufficient reason to interfere in this case. Rule discharged.

Rule discharged.

THE LASALGAON MERCHANTS CO-OPERATIVE BANK LTD.

v.

M/S. PRABHUDAS HATHIBHAI.*

Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. V of 1879), Secs. 150, 154, 12—Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922). Sec. 46 (2)—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 43, 46—Constitution of India, Arts. 31 (1), 265—Income-tax Officer issuing certificate under s. 46(2) of Income-tax Act and revenue officers attaching goods of assessee pledged to and in possession of assessee's creditor—Goods damaged during subsistence of attachment—Suit against Government by creditor to recover amount of debt secured by pledge whether maintainable.

The defendants, who were constituents of the plaintiff-bank, took advances under an agreement from the plaintiff on the security of certain agricultural produce. A part of the produce was kept in the defendants' godown and the key of the same was handed over to the plaintiff, thus giving the goods in its possession. The defendants owed a sum towards income-tax dues and the Income-tax Officer issued a certificate under s. 46(2) of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, and forwarded it to the Collector and by a letter called upon him to make recoveries by attachment and sale of the goods lying in the defendants' godown. The Collector forwarded the letter to the Mamlatdar for taking necessary action. The Circle Officer under order from the Mamlatdar went to the godown and, notwithstanding the plaintiff's protest, attached the goods. During the subsistence of the attachment the goods were badly damaged as a result of rain water leaking through the roof of the godown. The plaintiff filed a suit against the defendants, the State of Bombay, the Collector, the Mamlatdar, the Circle Officer and the Union of India, alleging that the attachment and seizure of goods from its possession was illegal and claimed the amount of the debt secured by the pledge. It was contended inter alia by the Government that it was not responsible for the illegal attachment as it had not ratified the act of officers attaching the goods:—

Held, that crown debt such as e.g. income-tax dues, cannot have priority over secured debts,

That the question of special authorisation or of subsequent ratification did not arise in the circumstances of the case, as the Circle Officer had exercised powers delegated to him under the provisions of law when he proceeded to attach the goods, that in seizing the goods he had acted in excess of the powers and the seizure of the goods was, therefore, illegal and unconstitutional, and that, therefore, the plaintiff was entitled to a decree against all the defendants.

The immunity of the State in respect of the acts of its subordinates in the exercise of its sovereign powers cannot be treated as a dogma or a mantra and will have to be considered on the facts of each case. Immunity cannot be claimed for acts which are either illegal or unconstitutional.

The distinction between rr. 43 and 46 of O. XXI of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908 is of prime importance. When the goods are in possession of a pledgee, the seizure of the goods amounts to wrongful deprivation of the goods which the pledgee is entitled to retain in his possession.

NAIK J. The suit giving rise to this appeal was filed by the plaintiff against ten defendants for recovery of a sum of Rs. 3,455-1-0 in the following circumstances: The plaintiff is the Lasalgaon Merchants Co-operative Bank Ltd., Lasalgaon. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were the constituents of the Bank and had entered into an agreement with the plaintiff to the effect that the plaintiff-Bank should make advances to defendants Nos. 1 and 2 on the security of agricultural produce such as, groundnuts, jaggery, tobacco etc. This agreement took place on November 20, 1952. The plaintiff was to make advances to defendants Nos. 1 and 2 upto sixty per cent. of the value of the goods pledged. The upper limit of the credit was fixed at Rs. 5,000. Certain advances were made on the basis of this agreement. On November 16, 1953, the agreement was renewed and was to remain in force till September 30, 1954. In about December 1953 defendant No. 1, which is the firm of which defendant No. 2 is a partner, owed a sum of about Rs. 2,332 towards the income-tax dues. Defendants Nos. 1 and 2 had kept certain packages of tobacco in their own godown and handed over the key of the same to the plaintiff, thus giving the property in possession of the plaintiff. On August 23, 1954, defendants Nos. 1 and 2 were indebted to the plaintiff to the tune of Rs. 3,181. On December 16, 1952, the Income-tax Officer, Nasik, issued a certificate (exh. 68) under s. 46(2) of the Income-tax Act, 1922, and forwarded the same to the Collector, Nasik. He wrote a letter on December 11, 1953 (exh. 69) to the Collector calling upon the latter to make recoveries by attachment and sale of the stock of tobacco or by the attachment and sale of the open plot belonging to defendants Nos. 1 and 2. As already stated, on August 23, 1954, the liability of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 towards the plaintiff would have worked out to a sum of Rs. 3,181 with future interest. At that time, ninety-seven packages of tobacco were in plaintiff's custody. On December 24, 1953, the Collector, Nasik, forwarded the letter to the Mamlatdar, Niphad, for taking necessary action. On August 23, 1954, the Circle Officer went to the godown of the plaintiff, made valuation of the packages of tobacco kept therein under a Panchnama and sought to attach the same. The plaintiff gave a writing (exh. 52) protesting against the proposed attachment. The Circle Officer without giving heed to the protest proceeded to attach the goods. He kept the goods in the same godown, locked it and handed over the key to the police patil of the village. The same day, he made a report (exh. 75) of what he had done, to the Mamlatdar. In this report, the Circle Officer stated:

"In accordance with the orders given by you (Mamlatdar) personally, the tobacco had been attached and kept in the same godown handing over possession to the police patil".

It may be mentioned at this stage that the letter written by the Mamlatdar to the Circle Officer has not been placed on record on behalf of the defendants. The Circle Officer in his report also mentioned the fact that the plaintiff-Bank was claiming that the goods were secured for its dues. He forwarded the protest letter of the Plaintiff to the Mamlatdar for his perusal. In reply to the protest letter, the Circle Officer informed the plaintiff on August 24, 1954, that the goods were attached in pursuance of the orders of the superior officers. It appears that on September 29 or 30, 1954, there were heavy rains and the roof of the godown where the goods were stocked leaked heavily and as a result of the leakage, the tobacco was damaged. On October 1, 1954, the Collector sent a telegram to the Mamlatdar stating that the goods be returned to the plaintiff. Unfortunately, the telegram has not been placed on the record of the case, nor has any evidence been led on behalf of the defendants to show as to why the Collector thought of returning the goods to the plaintiff on this particular day. It appears to have been assumed in the Courts below that this action was taken by the Collector, because the latter realised that the attachment was not regular. In the absence of evidence on the point, it is difficult to say whether this action was taken by the Collector on account of realisation of irregularity, impropriety or illegality of the attachment or because of the fact that the goods have been heavily damaged on account of rains and the Collector felt it imprudent to continue to keep the goods under his custody thereafter. On October 3, 1954, the Circle Officer submitted a report to the Mamlatdar stating that the goods have been heavily damaged on account of heavy rains and also by reason of the fact that the door of the godown was not open. He also stated that defendants Nos. 1 and 2 though informed three or four times were avoiding to accept delivery of the goods. The Mamlatdar informed the Collector about what had happened. On October 8, 1954, the Mamlatdar directed the plaintiff to accept delivery of the goods. On October 14, 1954, the plaintiff replied that it was not going to accept delivery of the goods inasmuch as the goods had been damaged. In this letter it was pointed that the authorities had committed an illegality in attaching the goods. It also stated that it was unable to take delivery of the goods which were wrongfully attached and damaged while in custody. It further stated that it would hold the Government responsible for the dues for which the attached goods were pledged by defendants Nos. 1 and 2. On April 15, 1955, the Mamlatdar sold the goods by public auction for a sum of Rs. 857. It may be mentioned at this stage that according to the allegations in the plaint, the Mamlatdar, Niphad, had informed the plaintiff on January 12, 1955, stating that the Government debt had priority over the debt of the plaintiff and all other private debts. That letter, however, is not on the record of the case. On June 30, 1955, a notice was given to the Government under s. 80, Civil Procedure Code, and in due course of time, a suit was filed against the pledgors (defendants Nos. 1 and 2); the State of Bombay (defendant No. 3); the Collector of Nasik (defendant No. 4); M. R. Yardi, Collector of Nasik (defendant No. 5); the Mamlatdar of Niphad (defendant No. 6); Gajanan Dattatraya Thite, Mamlatdar of Niphad (defendant No. 7); the Circle Officer, Lasalgaon (defendant No. 8); Ramchandra Nathu Patil, Circle Officer of Lasalgaon (defendant No. 9) and the Union of India (defendant No. 10). It would thus be seen that the Collector, the Mamlatdar and the Circle Officer were sued not only in their official capacity but also in their individual capacity.

I will now give a short resume of the case made out by the plaintiff in the plaint. After pointing out that the plaintiff was a secured creditor to the extent of Rs. 3,181 and future interest, the plaintiff stated in the plaint that defendant No. 9, the Circle Officer, came to the plaintiff and informed that he had orders from the superiors to attach the goods. The plaintiff protested saying that it was a secured creditor and that the goods were pledged with it. Notwithstanding this protest, defendant No. 9 proceeded to attach the goods and took away the key of the said godown with him. It is in that way that the plaintiff lost the custody of the pledged goods. The plaintiff then referred to the letter of the Circle Officer dated October 2, 1954, asking it to take delivery of the goods and stated that the Chairman of the Bank had gone to see the goods and found that the goods were greatly damaged. A Panchnama was made regarding the condition of the goods. As the Government was not prepared to accept the responsibility, the plaintiff refused to take delivery of the goods. The plaint then refers to the letter dated October 14, 1954, in which it was stated that the attachment of the goods was illegal and the State Government would be held responsible for the loss caused thereby. The plaintiff pointed out that the Government had no priority over the Bank in respect of the income-tax dues since the Bank was a secured creditor. The plaintiff, therefore, averred that attachment of the goods was illegal, unwarranted and unjustified. The plaintiff alleged that on account of these illegal actions of the Government of Bombay through its officers, the plaintiff was deprived of its custody of the said goods and has suffered a loss to the extent of the whole amount of the debt secured by the pledge. The plaintiff, therefore, sued for Rs. 3,181 as due at the foot of accounts on August 23, 1954, with interest at seven per cent. At para. (x) the plaintiff repeated that the attachment and the further acts of the Government were illegal, unwarranted and unjustified. It also averred that defendants Nos. 4 to 9 were liable as officers and individuals, if the Government should shirk its responsibility and liability on the ground that the acts of the officers were wrongful and tortious. It then stated that defendant No. 10 was liable, because "it was at the instance of the Union of India that the State of Bombay through the Collector of Nasik had taken the action complained of.

Defendants Nos. 3 to 10, who are the contesting defendants, put in their written statement (exh. 23) and raised the following contentions:

(1) The suit was bad for multifariousness. The claim against defendants Nos. 1 and 2 is on the basis of the original cause of action, whereas the claim against the Government and its servants and the Union Government is based on the wrongful character of attachment of the goods.

(2) The suit against defendants Nos. 4, 6 and 8 is not maintainable, since they acted in their official capacity and they could be only sued in their official designations.

(3) The State of Bombay is not responsible for the alleged illegal attachment or the consequent sale nor has the State of Bombay ratified the act of the officers attaching the tobacco.

(4) Defendants Nos. 5, 7 and 9 are public officers and they have undertaken the recovery proceeding in the discharge of their duties as Revenue Officers under the provisions of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. They have acted bona fide as Revenue Officers in pursuance of the provisions of the Income-tax Act and the Bombay Land Revenue Code and the suit is, therefore, barred under s. 6 of the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act as against defendants Nos. 5, 7 and 9.

(5) The tobacco was not removed from the place where it was deposited by the plaintiff. The plaintiff was requested by the Mamlatdar to take delivery of the tobacco which it refused. The plaintiff was at fault in not taking over the stock of the tobacco. The plaintiff is not entitled to claim any compensation.

(6) The defendants denied the averments that the goods were damaged during the custody of the Government officers as they remained uncared for. All possible care and precaution was taken by the officers while the tobacco was in their custody. On September 29, 1954, there were unexpected rains and the warehouse leaked. This an unforeseen incident.

It appears that defendants Nos. 1 and 2 remained ex parte. The trial Court held that the attachment of the goods was illegal and wrongful. It also held that the goods became badly damaged, because of the negligence of the Government and its officers. At the same time, the Court held that there was no causal connection between the attachment of the goods and the actual damage caused thereto. Consequently, it came to the conclusion that none of defendants Nos. 3 to 10 was liable for the plaintiff's claim except for a sum of Rs. 857 i.e., the sale proceeds. Consequently, it passed a decree against defendant No. 3 for a sum of Rs. 857. It also passed a decree for a sum of Rs. 3,455-1-0 with future interest on Rs. 3,181, at six per cent. per annum against defendants Nos. 1 and 2. Against that judgment, the plaintiff went in appeal to the District Court. The District Court, agreeing with the finding of the trial Court, held that the attachment was illegal and wrongful. The District Court also held that the plaintiff would be entitled to claim damages notwithstanding that negligence was not proved by it. On the question of negligence, the District Court held that the loss occurred not on account of negligence but on account of unavoidable circumstances viz., unforeseen and excessive rains. The District Court also held that the plaintiff should have been entitled to claim damages in the ordinary course. The State is not liable for the tortious acts of its servants, since the State had not ratified the act of its servants in attaching the goods. According to the District Court, the Circle Officer (defendant No. 9) alone would have become liable for wrongful attachment but for the protection given to him under s. 6 of the Bombay Revenue Jurisdiction Act. Consequently, the District Court dismissed the appeal and confirmed the decree passed by the trial Court. It is against that judgment that the plaintiff has come up in second appeal.

Mr. Abhyankar, Assistant Government pleader, for the State, contended that the Courts below were wrong in holding that attachment of the goods was illegal. It is not disputed that the goods were pledged with the plaintiff and were lying in its possession at the time of the so-called attachment. The determination of the question regarding the legality or otherwise of the attachment mainly depends upon the provisions of s. 46(2) of the Income-tax Act of 1922 and the provisions of ss. 150 and 154 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code. Section 46(2) of the Income-tax Act of 1922 runs thus:

"The Income-tax Officer may forward to the Collector a certificate under his signature specifying the amount of arrears due from an assessee, and the Collector, on receipt of such certificate shall proceed to recover from such assessee the amount specified therein as if it were an arrear of land revenue".

There is no provision in the Income-tax Act of 1922 under which the Government could claim priority over the secured debts. Section 222 of the Income-tax Act of 1961 corresponds to s. 46 of the Act of 1922. Section 222 of the Act of 1961 instead of referring to income-tax arrears as being recoverable as arrears of land revenue, lays down the procedure to be followed for making recovery of the dues. We are not concerned with the change effected in the procedure for making recoveries. Summarising the legal position prevailing under s. 46(2) of the Act of 1922 and also under s. 222 of the Act of 1961 Sundaram in his book "The Law of Income-tax in India" at page 1058 says:

"While Crown debts cannot have priority over secured debts, profits received by a Receiver in a simple mortgage suit have no priority over Crown debts, for such rents and profits are not part of the security or the debt".

The position of law, therefore, is well-settled and it is to the effect that the Government cannot claim any priority in respect of the income-tax dues vis-a-vis the secured debt. Mr. Abhyankar referred to the provisions of ss. 150 and 154 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code and argued that these two sections make no distinction between the goods being in possession of a debtor or being in possession of a third party. Section 150(c) of the Land Revenue Code provides:

"An arrear of land revenue may be recovered by the following processes:—...

(c) by distraint and sale of the defaulter's moveable property under section 154".

Section 154 of the said Code provides:

"The Collector may also cause the defaulter's moveable property to be distrained and sold".

The distraint of moveable property presupposes that the debtor is in actual possession of the same. It is clear that a secured creditor has a right under law to keep the property in his custody till the debts are paid. He has also the right of getting the property sold in case the debts are not paid. The claim of the debtors in that case would restrict itself to the balance after satisfaction of the dues of the secured creditor. Under the Code of Civil Procedure, different procedures have been laid down in respect of attachment of the goods according to the circumstances viz., whether they are in possession of the judgment-debtor or of a third person. Rule 43 of O. XXI, Civil Procedure Code, provides that where the goods are in possession of the judgment-debtor they are liable to be attached by actual seizure. Rule 46 of the same Order provides that in the case of the moveable property, which is not in possession of the judgment-debtor, attachment can be levied by issuing a prohibitive order calling upon that person not to give the property to the judgment-debtor. It is thus clear that the Circle Officer had no right to effect attachment of the goods by actual seizure. Mr. Abhyankar contended that the mere fact that the Circle Officer has followed the procedure of attaching the goods by actual seizure instead of issuing a prohibitive order would not make the attachment illegal. At best, the attachment would be irregular. I am unable to accept this line of reasoning. The distinction between rr. 43 and 46 of O. XXI, Civil Procedure Code, is of prime importance. When the goods are in the possession of a pledgee, the seizure of the goods amounts to wrongful deprivation of the goods which the pledgee is entitled to retain in his possession. In this connection, reference may be made to art. 31(1) of the Constitution of India, which runs thus:

"No person shall be deprived of his property save by authority of law".

It is not clear whether the Circle Officer was directed by the Mamlatdar to proceed to effect attachment of the goods after he was informed by the Circle Officer that the goods were pledged and the possession was with the pledgee. The documents, which would have thrown light upon this question, have been withheld from the Court. The Circle Officer throughout asserted that he was acting under the orders of his superiors. In the intimation which he gave to the plaintiff, he specifically stated that he was acting under the orders of his superiors in effecting the attachment. In the same way, in his report submitted by him on the date of the attachment i.e., August 23, 1954, the Circle Officer stated that it was in pursuance of the personal directions given by the Mamlatdar that the goods were attached and kept in the godown, the key of which was delivered to the police patil. Neither the Circle Officer nor the Mamlatdar has stepped into the witness-box. It is not, therefore, possible to hold that the Circle Officer acted on his own when he proceeded to effect the attachment. Apart from the question whether the Circle Officer was acting under the orders of his superiors, it is clear that in proceeding to seize the goods with a view to attach the same, the Circle Officer acted without any authority of law. It can at least be said that he acted in excess of the authority given to him by law. Indeed, it was conceded in the Courts below, on behalf of the Government, that the attachment of the goods was illegal. It is, therefore, too late in the day to contend that the act of seizure of goods from the possession of the plaintiff is merely irregular and not illegal.

Another point which strikes me is that, it was assumed in the District Court that the action for damages was in the nature of an action in tort on account of loss caused by the negligence of the officers of Government in whose custody the goods were kept. I have set out the averments in the pleadings in some detail, and there is nothing to indicate that the plaintiff was basing its action either upon negligence committed by the Government officers or the Government. The gravamen of the charge is that the attachment and seizure of goods from its possession is illegal. Mr. Abhyankar relied upon the words used in para. (vii) of the plaint and argued that the basis of the plaintiff's claim is that the goods were not taken proper care while in the custody of the Government and that they were damaged on account of negligence of the Government officers. As I have pointed out above, the plaintiff has claimed the amount due to it under the contract with defendants Nos. 1 and 2. It has not asked for damages for wrongful detention of the goods and for their conversion. Its contention is that since the goods, which were pledged with it, were taken away by the Government, the Government is liable for the debt due to it from defendants Nos. 1 and 2 to the extent of the value of the property taken away from its possession. The plaintiff seems to suggest that it would have been entitled to bring the goods to sale and recover the amount and since the goods were taken away from it and it has been deprived of its remedy, those who are responsible for this deprivation will have to pay the amount due to it under the original cause of action. It is stated in para. (x) of the plaint viz.,

"defendants Nos. 4 to 9 are liable to the plaintiff's claim as officers and individuals, if Government shirks its responsibility and liability on the ground that the acts of the officers were wrongful and tortious. Defendant No. 10 is liable to the plaintiff's claim because it is at their instance or for the recovery of their dues that the State of Bombay through the Collector of Nasik has taken the actions complained of".

It is necessary to note that the plaintiff does not aver as a fact that the action of the officers was wrongful or tortious. What it says is, in case the Government tries to shirk its responsibility on the ground that the acts of the officers were wrongful, then the Union Government would be responsible since it was for the recovery of their dues that the action complained of was taken.

In that view of the case, the question as to whether the officers were negligent in dealing with the goods while they were in their possession does not acquire much significance. The plaintiff's cause of action is not supplied by the damage caused to the goods on account of the decay, which took place after the heavy rains. The plaintiff's cause of action is based upon the illegal seizure of the goods from its possession. Even so, in my view, the learned District Judge erred in holding that the damage was inevitable and, therefore, the officers, in whose custody the goods were lying, would not be considered as negligent. The trial Court, after due consideration of the evidence, recorded a finding that the officers were guilty of remissness and negligence. The learned District Judge has reversed the finding on the basis of certain surmises. First of all, he says that it could not be said that there were no rains before August 23, 1954, that is to say, before the attachment of the goods. He then points out that the rainy season had commenced in June, 1954, and to borrow his own words "and it does not appear that the roof had leaked at any time before 23rd August 1954". Pausing here, there is no evidence, whatsoever, to show that the roof had not leaked before August 23, 1954. The learned District Judge then proceeds to say:

"The plaintiff Bank itself considered that the goods were quite safe in those very godowns where they were kept by it. Under the circumstances, I think that no leakage must have taken place when it was raining in the ordinary way, otherwise, the plaintiff Bank itself would have taken the steps of removing the goods to some other place especially so when it must have rained between the second week of June and 23rd August 1954. For all these reasons, I think that the leakage occurred because of the excessive rains and this is clear from the statement of the Chairman of the plaintiff Bank himself in the writing passed by him on 3rd October 1954 to the Circle Officer. He has himself stated therein that the damage has occurred because of the excessive rains which fell on the 29th and the 30th of September...It is true that the Chairman has also stated in his writing that some damage has been caused on account of the failure to air the goods by opening the godowns and the congested air in the godown. However, it cannot be said that the damage that was caused by reason of the rain water having leaked in the godown would have been less if the godown had been opened from time to time and the goods had been aired as seems to be necessary in the case of tobacco. I am not impressed by the reasoning of the learned Judge of the Court below in this behalf, and I have come to the conclusion that the damage that came to be caused to the goods was the result of the excessive rains which fell on the 29th and 30th September 1954 and that the damage is not due to any negligence on the part of the person in custody of these goods. Negligence cannot be presumed and the same must be satisfactorily proved..."

With respect, I must point out that the reasoning is vitiated by a number of assumptions and guesses made by the learned District Judge. Assuming, for a moment, that the heavy loss was largely due to heavy rains, it does not mean that there was no negligence on the part of officers in dealing with the goods of tobacco. The heavy rains do not amount to an act of God. It was the duty of the Government officers to take such care as every prudent manager takes of his own goods. The Government stood in the position of bailees and it is for them to prove that they had taken as much care as was possible for them and that the damage was due to reasons beyond their control. In my opinion, the findings reached by the learned District Judge cannot be sustained. But, as stated above, it has no bearing on the question of the claim made by the plaintiff inasmuch as the plaintiff's claim is based on the act of the defendants in wrongfully seizing the goods.

The learned District Judge refused to award the claim of the plaintiff in spite of his finding that the goods were wrongfully attached mainly on the ground that there was no evidence that the act of defendant No. 9 was ratified by the Government. The learned District Judge proceeds to say that the Union Government could not be responsible for wrongful seizure of the goods, because all that the Income-tax Officer did was to send a certificate under s. 46(2) of the Income-tax Act. In addition to the certificate, the Income-tax Officer wrote a letter to the Collector in which he stated that the firm had the stock of tobacco in the ware-house and a plot. He then proceeded to say that the plot was mortgaged to Lasalgaon Merchants Co-operative Bank and suggested that if the plot is likely to fetch more value it should preferably be sold in auction. It seems clear that the Income-tax Officer was under the wrong impression that the plot was mortgaged to the Co-operative Bank. Probably, he was misled by the circumstance that the goods were still lying in the godown belonging to defendants Nos. 1 and 2. By stating that the goods were lying in the godown of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 and omitting to mention that these goods were pledged, in a way, the Income-tax Officer has put the Collector and his subordinates off their guard.

That did not, of course, exonerate the Collector and the Mamlatdar from finding out as to whether the goods were in the possession of defendants Nos. 1 and 2 and whether they were liable to be attached and seized. The learned

District Judge has observed that the Collector has given no instructions to the Mamlatdar for attaching any specific goods, nor is there evidence to show that the Mamlatdar authorised the Circle Officer to attach the goods, although they were in possession of the plaintiff, who was the secured creditor. So far as the authorisation by the Collector and the Mamlatdar is concerned, there is no evidence led on behalf of the defendants, and so far as the authorisation by the Mamlatdar to the Circle Officer is concerned, I have already pointed out that the Circle Officer has claimed that he proceeded to attach the goods and seize them in accordance with the specific instructions given to him by the Mamlatdar. In my view, the question of special authorisation or of subsequent ratification would not possibly arise in the circumstances of this case. The Bombay Land Revenue Code provides that the Collector can delegate his duties to the Mamlatdar. Under s. 12 of the Code, the Mamlatdar has been authorised to carry out the duties which have been delegated to him by the Collector under the general or special orders of the State Government. It was conceded in the Courts below that powers were delegated to the Mamlatdar and the Circle Officer. In fact, Mr. Abhyankar also relied upon the circumstance that the powers, which the Circle Officer has exercised, were delegated powers. Once it is conceded that the Circle Officer was exercising the delegated powers of the Collector, then it is clear that no special authorisation was necessary. In the same way, the question of ratification by the Government cannot arise for consideration in view of the fact that the Circle Officer was exercising the powers delegated to him under the provisions of law. In this connection, I may refer to the provisions of ss. 150 and 154 of the Code again. Under s. 150(c) of the Code an arrear of land revenue may be recovered by distraint and sale of the defaulter's moveable property under s. 154. Section 154 empowers the Collector to distrain the moveable property of the defaulter and have it sold. I have already referred to the provisions of s. 46(2) of the Income-tax Act of 1922 which provided that the arrears of income-tax can be recovered as if they were an arrear of land revenue. That means that the Circle Officer was exercising the delegated powers when he proceeded to attach the goods. In seizing the goods he acted in excess of the power and, therefore, the seizure of the goods is illegal. But all the same, it is clear that the duty he was performing was enjoined on him by the delegation made by the Collector. That being the case neither the question of express authorisation for the commission of the act nor that of subsequent ratification can possibly arise in a case like this.

In this connection, I may refer to a decision of the Allahabad High Court in *Prem Lal v. U. P. Govt.*¹ The facts of that case were as follows: The plaintiff, Prem Lal Singhania, was the owner of a motor truck and a Chevrolet motor car. On January 12, 1948, the District Magistrate of Gorakhpur, purporting to act under the powers delegated to him by the State Government under s. 9 of the U.P. Requisition of Motor Vehicles Act of 1947, passed an order requisitioning both these vehicles. The order required the plaintiff Singhania to place them at the disposal of the Superintendent of Police within 24 hours of the service of this order. The plaintiff contended that the order was illegal and unjustified as the essential conditions for the exercise of the requisitioning power did not exist and it was passed with the object of causing wrongful loss to the plaintiff. The plaintiff alleged that the Chevrolet car was kept uncovered and in the open during the period of requisition with the result that its paint was damaged and some parts became rusty. He had to spend Rs. 760 on getting the car repainted and repaired. Both the vehicles were released on December 18, 1948, having remained in the custody of the Government for over three months. The plaintiff served a notice under s. 80, Civil Procedure Code, claiming damages and compensation but it had no effect. He thereupon filed two separate suits in respect of the truck and the car. He claimed compensation for the motor car at the rate of Rs. 10 and for the truck at the rate of Rs. 40 per day. He also claimed Rs. 760 as compensation for damage done to the car. The claim in respect of the truck totalled Rs. 3,300 and of the car Rs. 1,410.

The State contended that it was not liable for the damages claimed, firstly, because the act was done in the exercise of the sovereign powers of the State and secondly, the action taken by the District Magistrate was not action of the Government.

The learned Judge referred to the distinction between the acts of a servant or agent which he performs under his master's direction and guidance and for his benefit and acts in the performance of duties imposed upon him by law when the master has no control over him nor any right to give instruction. It was pointed out that in the first case, the master would ordinarily be liable, but in the second, he is not. In rejecting the arguments for the State, the learned Judge observed (p. 236):

"...The District Magistrate was not performing any duty imposed or exercising any power conferred by law, but exercising a power expressly delegated to him by Government under Sec. 9 of the U.P. Requisition of Motor Vehicles (Emergency Powers) Act 1947".

After citing the said section, the learned Judge proceeded to observe on the same page:

"Thus the power to requisition motor vehicles is conferred under the Act on the State Government but it is permitted to delegate its powers to any officer or authority subordinate to it. Neither the statute nor any rule made thereunder confers any powers on the District Magistrate who can exercise them only if he is authorised by the State Government. His power is not to be exercised independently of the Government but 'under such conditions, if any, as may be specified' in the authorisation. He is, therefore, all the time under the control of the Government whose power to impose conditions for its exercise is absolute. The District Magistrate is not persona designata under the Act or any rule for the Government can authorise any other Officer or authority subordinate to it to exercise the power of requisitioning vehicles on its behalf. Whoever requisitions any motor vehicle acts for the benefit of the Government which can control his functions. If however Government does not choose to impose any conditions and gives unlimited powers to any officer, it cannot escape liability for any tortious acts committed by him".

Referring again to s. 150 of the Land Revenue Code, it would be noticed that under that section several courses are open to the officer who is entrusted with the duty of making recoveries and the distraint and sale of the defaulter's moveable property under s. 154 is one of the many such courses open to him to adopt. In these circumstances, when the officer chooses one of these courses viz., to distrain the goods, he takes such a decision for and on behalf of the Government. The power of decision making has been entrusted to him. It is equally clear that the Circle Officer acted for the benefit of the Government, for if he had recovered the dues, the dues would have gone to the coffers of the Government. In my view, therefore, the question either of express authorisation or of subsequent ratification cannot possibly arise under the circumstances of this case.

Mr. Abhyankar relied upon the decision of the Madras High Court in *Ross v. Secretary of State*². The facts of that case were as follows: the plaintiff, who represented the Assam Labour Supply Association in Ganjam and other districts, filed a suit against the Secretary of State for India in Council for damages in respect of two orders of the District Magistrate of Ganjam suspending and dismissing one T.S., the local agent of the Association in Ganjam, and closing his depot to recruiting under the Assam Labour and Emigration Act. The plaintiff complained that he was prevented by these orders from earning from the members of the association his commission of seven rupees for each labourer sent to Assam; and for an alleged libel on the plaintiff in an order passed by the Governor-in-Council on appeals by the plaintiff and others against the aforesaid orders, in which it was stated that the plaintiff's own conduct was not altogether above suspicion.

It was held that the District Magistrate had power to dismiss the local agent but he did not have the power of suspending or of closing his depot to recruiting under the Act independently of the Notification. It was further held:

"It was not sufficient to render the company liable that an act of this nature had been done by its servant in the course of employment but without previous order or subsequent ratification. Ratification must have been by the Company (East India Co.) and must now be by the Secretary of State".

It was also held that "the defendant was not liable for the act of the District Magistrate on the further ground that it was done by him in the exercise of statutory authority". It is significant to note that the learned Judge of the Madras High Court came to the conclusion that the orders passed by the District Magistrate was an act done in the exercise of sovereign powers. The learned Judge, therefore, held that, if that is so, then the State could not be held responsible unless it was established that the orders had been ratified. (see the observation at p. 66). Another decision, on which reliance was placed by Mr. Abhyanker, was in Gurucharan Kaur v. Province of Madras.³ The facts of that case were as follows: The plaintiffs filed a suit for damages for false imprisonment against the Government of Madras and four of its police officers. The incident complained of happened on January 13, 1937, at Kodaikanal Road. The plaintiffs are mother and daughter. Kodaikanal falls within Madura District. Defendant No. 2 was the District Superintendent of Police with his headquarters at Madura. Defendant No. 3 was a Sub-Inspector belonging to the Madras Railway Police Service and defendants Nos. 4 and 5 were police constables of the same service. Plaintiff No. 1 was the wife of the ex-Maharaja of Nabha. By an order of the Government of India, the ex-Maharaja was required to stay at Kodaikanal and had been so staying since 1928. He was kept under close surveillance. Plaintiffs Nos. 1 and 2 were staying with the ex-Maharaja at Kodaikanal and wanted to go to Madras early in 1937. Necessary arrangements were made by her Secretary for reserving accommodation for them in 'Trivandrum Express' on January 13, 1937. That afternoon, the Station-house Officer at Kodaikanal, acting under the erroneous impression that the ex-Maharaja was arranging to proceed to Madras, sent a telegram to defendant No. 2 in the following terms:

'Ex-Nabha Raja departing to Madras Spencer Hotel with family in car M.D. 2037.' Defendant No. 2 decided to take steps to prevent the ex-Maharaja boarding the train at Kodaikanal Road railway station. Defendant No. 2 gave a call on the telephone to the railway police staff at the Madura station platform and as defendant No. 3 answered, defendant No. 2 attempted to instruct him to proceed by that train to Kodaikanal Road and there prevent the ex-Maharaja boarding the train. Defendant No. 3 understood the instructions vaguely and indistinctly, as the platform was noisy and his knowledge of English very poor and he had to catch the train in a hurry as it was about to leave. During the journey between Madura and Kodaikanal Road, he saw that one of the compartments in the train had been reserved for the Maharani of Nabha. Connecting this with the indistinct impressions that he had received from the telephone message from Madura, he seemed to have made up his mind that the instructions given to him by defendant No. 2 must have related to the Maharani.

When the train arrived at Kodaikanal Road, defendant No. 3 informed P. W. 6, who was waiting on the platform, that he had instructions to prevent the Maharani boarding the train. At that time, she was sitting in her car within the railway compound, expecting to be called to the train by her Secretary. Some discussion took place between defendant No. 3 and P. W. 6 and the train had to be delayed for that purpose. The train in the meantime left the station and defendant No. 3 sent a telegram to defendant No. 2 seeking further instructions.

It is on these facts that the plaintiffs filed a suit against the State for compensation for wrongful imprisonment. The High Court held that defendants Nos. 2 to 5 acted in exercise of their statutory power and that in such circumstances a person aggrieved by their acts could have no claim against the Government. It also held that the State could not be held liable for the improper conduct of public servants in the discharge of Governmental functions, unless those acts had been done under the orders of the Government or had been subsequently adopted and ratified by it. The Federal Court by majority judgment accepted the second ground and observed as follows (p. 44):

"...As we however agree with the learned Judges as to other ground of their decision in favour of defendant 1, it is unnecessary to discuss this aspect of their decision".

In my view, neither the decision of the Madras High Court nor of the Federal Court assists the Government in the plea about the need of ratification by the Government of the acts of the Government officers. In Ross's case it was held that the acts were done in the exercise of sovereign powers and, therefore, the State was immune from liability. So far as the decision of the Federal Court is concerned, what their Lordships held was that when the conduct of Government servants in the discharge of governmental functions was questionable, the Government could not be held liable unless it was established that those acts had been done under the orders of the Government or had been subsequently adopted and ratified by it. It is thus clear that the question of ratification arises only when Government is sought to be held liable for tort committed by its servants in the discharge of sovereign functions. If the act is ratified, the Government becomes liable notwithstanding that the act was in the discharge of sovereign functions.

As stated above, the powers of making recoveries were delegated to the Mamlatdar by the Collector and the Mamlatdar in his turn delegated those powers to the Circle Officer. It is true that the Circle Officer was exercising powers under general authorisation. The powers that he was exercising were powers conferred by statute upon the Collector. It is equally clear that the Circle Officer had exceeded the limit of the powers given to the Collector by the statute and delegated to him. The law does not empower recovery of arrears by attaching and seizing the goods, which are in the possession of third party. In this connection, it will be useful to refer to the provisions of art. 265 of the Constitution of India, which provides:

"No tax shall be levied or collected except by authority of law".

Basu, in his 'Commentary on the Constitution of India', 4th vol. 4th edn., 1963, has explained the meaning of the word 'levied' as follows (p. 229):

"The words 'levy and collection' are used in this Article (265) in a comprehensive sense and are intended to include the entire process of taxation commencing from the taxing statute to the taking away of the money from the pocket of the citizen. What the Article enjoins is that every stage in this entire process must be authorised by the law".

The action taken by the Circle Officer in seizing the goods was not empowered by law. It is on that ground also that the act was illegal. At the same time, in view of the fact that the Circle Officer was exercising delegated authority, he cannot be taken to be doing an act in the discharge of his statutory duties.

I may now refer to the rulings relied upon by Mr. Abhyankar in support of the proposition that the Government cannot be held liable in tort, when the wrongful act has been committed by subordinate officers in performance of their statutory duties. I will discuss those rulings only briefly with a view to show that the facts of his case do not attract the principles laid down therein.

The first decision in that connection is reported in Shivabhajan v. Secretary of State for India.⁴ In that case some sixty-two thousand and odd bundles of hay were attached by the Chief Constable of Mahim, while they were in the plaintiff's possession. The plaintiff gave a notice to the District Superintendent of Police, Thana, for delivery of possession of the said quantity of hay, but only 14700 bundles were delivered and the remaining 47800 were not given over to the plaintiff. The plaintiff sued to recover Rs. 293-12-10 from the defendants as damages. The Chief Constable had attached the hay in his capacity as a public servant. The seizure was occasioned on account of complaints lodged against the plaintiff of his having stolen the hay. The charge of theft was not sustained and that is why the plaintiff demanded the return of the hay. It was held that the Chief Constable seized the hay not in obedience to an order of the executive Government but in performance of a statutory power vested in him by the Legislature. It was also pointed out that the seizure of the hay was not in any sense productive of benefit to the Revenue of the Bombay Government, nor was it a transaction out of which profit could be derived. It was further held that there was no ratification or adoption of the act. In my opinion, the decision is distinguishable on the ground that the original seizure of the goods was not only not illegal but was authorised by law and the seizure was, in effect, in pursuance of the statutory powers conferred upon the Chief Constable. A number of bundles appeared to have been lost while they were in the custody of the police. But the State could not be held responsible for the loss occasioned due to negligence of its officers by reason of the fact that the goods had been seized in exercise of the statutory powers. In the present case, the seizure of goods itself is illegal. The question of subsequent damage caused to the goods while they were in the custody of the Mamlatdar has not much bearing on the issue in hand. Mr. Abhyankar also relied upon the two decisions of the Allahabad High Court reported in *Ram Gulam v. U.P. Government*⁵ and *Md. Murad v. U.P. Govt.*⁶ and another decision of the Madhya Pradesh High Court reported in State of M. P. v. Singhai Kapoorchand.⁷ The facts of these cases were similar to the facts in Shivabhajan's case and the view taken by this Court viz., that Government cannot be held liable for damages in respect of the action taken by the inferior officers in the discharge of statutory powers, was upheld. I may only add that the proposition so broadly stated in Shivabhajan's case may require reconsideration in view of the decision of the Supreme Court in Vidhyawati's case to which reference will be made presently.

In this Court, Mr. Abhyankar raised another point of law. He emphasized the well-known distinction between an action taken in exercise of the sovereign powers of the State and an action in respect of commercial transactions or welfare activities. In a recent decision of the Supreme Court in *State of Rajasthan v. Mst. Vidhyawati*⁸ the Supreme Court, after referring to the decisions of different High Courts and also referring to the provisions of art. 300 of the Constitution of India, held that in respect of the acts done by the subordinates or agents of the Government otherwise than in exercise of the sovereign powers, the State can be made vicariously liable for the tortious act like any other employer. According to the view taken by the Supreme Court, the Government is liable in respect of the acts done in commercial transactions and also acts done in respect of the multifarious activities undertaken by the Government in modern times. At the same time, it seems to have adhered to the view that the Government would not be liable for acts of negligence of its servants in the discharge of sovereign functions. Mr. Abhyankar argued that the levy of tax and the recovery of tax is undoubtedly a sovereign function. No one except the State can possibly levy a tax or proceed to recover the same. Since ancient times the power to levy a tax has been the specific hall-mark or attribute of the sovereign power of the State. I agree with Mr. Abhyankar that the acts of levying of a tax and its recovery are acts done in the exercise of sovereign functions. At the same time, we cannot ignore the provisions of art. 265 of the Constitution of India, which lays down that no tax shall be levied or collected except by authority of law nor the provisions of art. 31(1) which lays down that no person shall be deprived of his property save by the authority of law. The only power, which the State can exercise in the performance of sovereign functions is to recover the tax under the authority of law. But in the present case, the Circle Officer has proceeded to levy and recover the tax without any authority and, in fact, beyond the authority. The immunity of the State in respect of acts done by its subordinates in the exercise of sovereign powers cannot be considered as a dogma or a mantra and will have to be considered on the facts of each case. In this connection, I may refer to certain observations made by Basu in his "Commentary on the Constitution of India", 4th edn., Vol. IV, 1963, at page 404. After citing the passage from the judgment of the Supreme Court in Vidhyawati's case, to the following effect (p. 940):

"...As already pointed out, the law applicable to India in respect of torts committed by a servant of the Government was very much in advance of the Common law, before the enactment of the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, which has revolutionised the law in the United Kingdom, also....When the rule of immunity in favour of the Crown, based on Common Law in the United Kingdom, has disappeared from the land of its birth, there is no legal warrant for holding that it has any validity in this country, particularly after the Constitution", the learned author observes:

"In explaining the reason why the Courts should take a broader outlook, the Supreme Court appears to have endorsed the views expressed by the Rajasthan High Court in the judgment appealed from (Mt. Vidyawati v. Lokumal)".

'...the State is no longer a mere police state...Ours is now a welfare State and it is in the process of becoming a full-fledged socialistic State. Everyday, it is engaging itself in numerous activities in which any ordinary person or group of persons can engage himself or themselves. Under the circumstances, there is all the more reason that it should not be treated differently from other ordinary employers when it is engaging itself in activities in which any private person could engage himself'.

And so observed the Supreme Court—

'Now that we have, by our Constitution, established a Republican form of Government, and one of the objectives is to establish a Socialistic State with its varied industrial and other activities, employing a large army of servants, there is no justification, in principle or in public interest, that the State should not be held liable vicariously for the tortious act of its servant'.

An instance of the broader outlook is to be found in the decision of the Allahabad High Court in Prem Lal v. U. P. Govt. (cited above in another context). In this case, a motor vehicle had been requisitioned by an order under the U.P. Requisition of Motor Vehicles Act, 1947. The Court held that the order was mala fide and, hence, invalid and awarded damages for the injury caused to the vehicle during the period of requisition. Obviously, compulsory requisitioning of property under statutory powers is an act which a private person could never do and it is a patent instance of exercise of the sovereign powers of the State. According to the P. & O. dictum, ... the suit could not be decreed. Nevertheless, the Court (Dhavan J.) decreed the suit on the ground that—

'...Judicial authority and public policy demand that the State to-day cannot claim immunity from the tortious liability in respect of the tortious acts of its servants and agents'.

The task of the High Courts and the subordinate Courts would, of course, have been easier if the Supreme Court had in Vidhyawati's case [held] that it was *Secretary of State for India v. Hari Bhanji*⁹ and not the *P. & O. S. N. Co. v. Secy. of State for India*¹⁰ which laid down the correct law to be followed in India. So long as this is not done, the litigant, the Bench and Bar would be swinging in the balance between the exploded pillar of absolute immunity and the not-yet-certain post of absolute liability for all acts done under colour of the municipal law".

The facts in Secretary of State for India v. Hari Bhanji were somewhat similar to the facts of the present case. In that case, the plaintiff had purchased a quantity of salt at Bombay and paid excise on it at the rate of Rs. 1-13-0 per maund, the rate leviable under the law there in force, and despatched it by sea to certain ports. While the salt was in transit, Act XVIII of 1878 was passed and came into force. By that Act the import duty on salt was raised to Rs. 2-8-0 per maund. But in virtue of a notification issued by the Governor-General in Council under the authority of the Indian Tariff Act, 1875, importers were allowed a deduction of the excise already paid, and consequently they were chargeable only with the difference between the excise and the import duty. On the landing of the salt in the Madras Presidency, the Collector required the respondents to pay the difference, thirteen annas per maund, between the excise already paid and the import duty leviable under the Act of 1877, and the respondents, having complied with the Collector's requirements in order to obtain possession of the salt, instituted the suit to recover the sums they had been compelled to pay. One of the pleas raised by the defendant was that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. This plea was upheld and the suit was dismissed. On appeal, the learned Judges held (p. 273):

"Where an act complained of is professedly done under the sanction of Municipal law, and in the exercise of powers conferred by that law, the fact that it is done by the sovereign power and is not an act which could possibly be done by a private individual, does not oust the jurisdiction of the civil courts".

At page 283 it was pointed out:

"...In the case before us, the demand of which the respondents complained was levied by the Collector acting as he believed under the authority of municipal law". In my view, the dictum laid down by the Madras High Court is applicable to the facts of the present case. In the present case, the act is purported to be done under the authority of ss. 150 and 154 of the Land Revenue Code, but it is found that the act is not only illegal but unconstitutional.

The result is, the appeal succeeds and is allowed with costs throughout. The plaintiff's suit is decreed against all the defendants. Defendants Nos. 5, 7 and 9 are not liable in their individual capacities.

Appeal allowed.

Hindu Marriage Act (XXV of 1955), Sec. 10(1)(b)—Petition for judicial separation on ground of cruelty—Defence of insanity, availability of.

In a petition for judicial separation under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, on the ground of cruelty the defence of insanity is not available even if the offending spouse is not capable of knowing what he is doing if the conduct is held to be objectively cruel regardless of motive or intention.

The petitioner filed a petition under the Hindu Marriage Act, 1955, for judicial separation on the ground inter alia that the respondent, her husband, had treated her with such cruelty as to cause reasonable apprehension in her mind that it was harmful for her to live with the respondent. It was found at the trial that the respondent had to be sent on three different occasions to a mental hospital for treatment, the last of which was necessitated as he had attempted to strangle his minor son and his brother-in-law. It was also established that he was suffering from schizophrenia *Decided, April, 8, 1965. Second Appeal No. 1093 of 1964, against the decision of D. G. Tatke, Additional Judge, Poona, in Civil Appeal No. 389 of 1962, reversing the decree passed by K. C. Surana, Joint Civil Judge, Senior Division, Poona, in Marriage Petition No. 58 of 1955.

and that he was not aware of the acts he was committing. The respondent's defence was that whatever he did, he did under fits of insanity:—

Held, that the schizophrenia from which the respondent had a predilection to suffer periodically was no defence to the plea of cruelty put forward by the petitioner; that the question whether the respondent was capable of forming an intention to be cruel or actually intended to be cruel was a matter of no consequence in this case; and that as there was no knowing when the respondent would relapse into a fit of schizophrenia, the apprehensions entertained by the petitioner were well-founded and she was, therefore, entitled to a decree for judicial separation.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

V. N. Gadgil, for the appellant.

V. B. Rege, for the respondent.

NAIK J. This appeal arises out of proceedings started by the wife against her husband for judicial separation. The facts giving rise to this appeal may be briefly set out as follows: The appellant (who will hereinafter be referred to as the husband) was married to the respondent (who will hereinafter be referred to as the wife) on May 17, 1949. The wife as well as the husband come from respectable families. The wife was a graduate at the time of the marriage and the husband had passed the Diploma of Chartered Accountancy. At the time of the marriage, the husband was working in partnership with another person, which partnership had two offices, one at Hyderabad and the other at Bombay. The husband started working in the office at Hyderabad. In the month of August 1949 the wife went to stay with her husband at Hyderabad. Two issues were born to the wife from the husband, one on April 19, 1950, by name Ravindra and the other on August 9, 1951, by name Vikram. Both were sons. Disputes started between the partners of the firm and eventually the husband closed the office at Hyderabad and returned to Poona, where his father has a house. This was by about the end of 1952. The disputes were a prolonged affair and the husband had to stay in Bombay for the purpose of taking accounts. But, eventually, he got a paltry sum of Rs. 52 or so for his share. All the while the husband remained unemployed. He had taken a shock both as a result of the partnership not yielding him any profits and also as a result of prolonged unemployment. He became moody and went on brooding his own affairs. He was secretive and kept his sorrow to himself. He did not like his wife asking him questions in regard to financial affairs and would resent any intervention on her part. His eccentricity went on increasing and by about February, 1954, he lost balance of his mind. One day he went in a ricksha and wandered for a long time. The wife had to go in search and bring him back. On February 15, 1954, the husband was admitted in the mental hospital at Yeravada as his mind was completely unhinged. The husband used to quarrel with his wife and also beat the children without rhyme or reason. He was discharged from the hospital on July 6, 1954. He had not been completely cured. He used to sit brooding for hours together doing nothing. He did not like his wife to take up any employment and earn something for the family. The husband's father had retired from the Agricultural Department and was not in a position to maintain the family of the husband and wife. The husband continued to remain unemployed even in 1955. In the month of May, 1955, a marriage ceremony was held in the house of the parents of the wife at Thana. The husband attended the marriage. He was keen on giving some present to the bridegroom, but he had no money. That completely upset him and his mind became deranged. On May 22, 1955, he was again admitted to the mental hospital at Yeravada as a voluntary boarder. He was discharged on December 10, 1955. But he continued to be erratic, eccentric and moody. He then started conducting some coaching classes. An incident took place on January 8, 1958, while he was conducting the class. There were only three students in the class. One of them was Suresh, the brother of the wife. The husband was explaining some problem to the students, but he faltered and was unable to find a solution to the problem. He began to shout. People collected. Suresh, the brother of the wife, took him home. Suresh was asked to remain in the house for that night and sleep in the room of the husband. Accordingly, Suresh and the husband slept in one room. The wife slept in the adjoining room. The parents of the husband slept in a third room. At about 12-30 midnight the husband went near Suresh and started strangulating his neck by holding fast to his neck. Suresh raised cries. The wife went in. The father of the husband went there. Suresh was struggling to get himself extricated. The father hit the husband and separated Suresh from his clutches. Next morning i.e., January 9, 1958, as the husband was taking tea, Ravindra was sitting on the lap of his mother i.e., the wife. Suddenly, the husband pounced on him and started strangulating Ravindra by holding his neck. Suresh intervened and snatched Ravindra from the hands of the husband. The same day, the husband was sent to the mental hospital as a voluntary boarder on the third occasion. The wife's case is that as a result of the abnormal behaviour of the husband, she has entertained an apprehension that there is danger to her life. The wife could have left the house immediately after this incident. But, she did not do so firstly because the husband was sent to the mental hospital and the danger was at least temporarily averted and secondly because, she was studying for her B. T. examination and the examination was drawing near. The wife learnt that the husband was to be discharged on April 21, 1958. Sensing danger to herself and her children she left for Thana on April 18, 1958. The husband was discharged on April 21, 1958. After his discharge he wrote letters to the wife asking her to return to his house. The wife, however, did not return. On July 1, 1960, she lodged the present petition for judicial separation on two grounds: (1) That the husband has wilfully deserted her for over the statutory period and (2) that he has treated her with such cruelty as to cause reasonable apprehension in her mind that it is harmful for her to live with her husband.

The findings of the Courts below have gone against the wife on the point of desertion. Mr. Rege, for the respondent, also has not pressed that point in this appeal. Nor is that point now open for consideration in the second appeal.

The husband admitted that he was put in the mental hospital three times on the ground that his mind was deranged on those occasions. He, however, denied that he was brooding over his affairs or that he was moody or eccentric. In particular, he denied that his behaviour was in any way cruel.

The trial Court held that since the so-called cruel behaviour of the husband took place during the husband's insanity, that cannot afford a ground for asking for judicial separation under s. 10(1)(b) of the Hindu Marriage Act. Consequently, it dismissed the petition. The wife went in appeal. The appellate Court held that taking an overall view of the conduct of the husband and the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed, his behaviour amounted to legal cruelty, in the sense that it was sufficient to create a reasonable apprehension in the mind of the wife that it was not safe for her to remain under the roof of the husband. Consequently, it allowed the appeal and also the petition and granted judicial separation. It is against that judgment that the husband has come up in second appeal.

It is an admitted fact that the husband has not treated the wife with any physical cruelty. No act of beating nor even of expostulation towards the wife has been attributed to the husband. This is purely a case of mental cruelty. According to the wife, a number of circumstances transpired against the husband. In the first place, he was not happy; that his partner and eventually the partnership did not bring him any benefit and that the husband remained unemployed from 1952 right upto 1958. The husband was in very much straightened financial circumstances. He had his own peculiar notions as to how a wife should behave towards the husband. These circumstances heavily weighed upon the mind of the husband and the husband started behaving in an abnormal manner towards her and her children. Even so, the wife put up with all the sufferings till 1958. It is only after the incidents, which took place on January 8, 1958 and January 9, 1958, that the wife was convinced that it was no longer safe to her and her children to stay with her husband. The only answer that has been provided on behalf of the husband to the wife's plea of cruelty is that, whatever he did, he did under the fits of insanity.

In appreciating the case put forward on behalf of the wife, it is necessary to recall the general character and behaviour of the wife. The husband himself has paid a glowing tribute to the wife. Let me use his own language:

"She (the wife) has the quality to face calamities. She treated me with love. She did not insult any time my parents. She treated me with respect. She would not do any thoughtless thing by being influenced by mere appearance".

On the admissions made by the husband, it is clear that the wife would not have rushed to the Court unless she apprehended that there was danger to herself and her children.

Side by side with the certificate given to the wife, let us peep into the mind of the husband and try to see what his views are towards such a wife. The husband says:

"It was my nature that my wife should not talk to me about my financial affairs. I did not expect her to tell me to take a job. I never expected her to enquire about my health. I expect her to manage the family, educate children and keep good relations with the family. It was my responsibility to maintain family. I do not agree that it is equally wife's responsibility. If the wife earns, it would mean that the husband is subsidiary and I would not take this position. I would not like my wife to earn even if I was unable to work".

He has also stated that he got terribly shocked when he found his wife sending a registered letter to his mother from Thana. Admittedly the husband was unemployed and was not earning anything for a number of years. In spite of this, because of his peculiar notions about the position of women, he would not allow the wife to take up any job. One can imagine the sufferings which the wife must have undergone during the period from 1952 to 1958. The wife put up with all the difficulties heroically for full six years and the last straw that broke her patience were the incidents, which took place on January 8, 1958 and January 9, 1958.

As regards the incidents which took place on January 8 and 9, 1958, there is a slight divergence between the versions put forward on behalf of the wife and the husband. On the main outline there is no dispute. On January 8, 1958, as the husband was conducting a coaching class, he posed a problem and finding that he was unable to find a solution, he got upset and started shouting. He had to be removed from the class and was removed by Suresh. At about 12-30 midnight he went near Suresh and tried to strangle him. The wife says that she actually saw the husband trying to strangle her brother, Suresh. Suresh has fully supported this version. The husband's father has been examined. He has admitted that when he went there, a struggle was going on between the husband and the wife's brother, Suresh. Evidently, the husband's father went there at a late stage. That may account for his not having witnessed the actual throttling. The appellate Court has fully believed the version put forward by the wife and supported by Suresh. The finding recorded by the appellate Court cannot be called in question in this appeal.

As regards the incident, which took place on January 9, 1958, the main point made out by Mr. Gadgil, for the appellant was that there is no mention of this incident in the plaint, although the incident of January 8, 1958, has been referred to. There is not much substance in this contention. It is not necessary for the wife to relate the evidence on which she proposed to rely. It is true that the incident of January 8, 1958, was narrated. But, that is a superfluity. The appellate Court has believed the wife and, in my opinion, very rightly. Here is an obedient wife, a wife who put up with all possible hardships and privations for a long period of six years. It is unimaginable that such an obedient and submissive wife would trot out a false incident and try to foist it upon the husband. The evidence of the wife and Suresh clearly shows that the husband tried to strangle the young child, Ravindra, as it was sitting on the lap of his mother on that day. It is mainly because of this incident and the fear engendered in her mind on that account that the wife seems to have apprehended danger to her life and her children. It is difficult to say that the apprehension was without sufficient ground.

Mr. Gadgil contended that assuming that the two incidents took place as alleged, still, in the first place, they do not establish cruelty towards the wife, and, in the second place, they were committed during the fits of insanity. The first argument leaves me unimpressed. This is not a case of physical cruelty. This is a case of mental cruelty or torture, and if the husband behaved towards her brother, Suresh, and son, Ravindra, in the manner attributed to him, not only her feelings would be injured thereby, but a grave apprehension would be created in her mind regarding danger to the life of the children and herself. On the second question about derangement, the evidence of Dr. Mujawar discloses that the husband was suffering from, what is known in medical terminology, schizophrenia. It is in evidence that the husband used to say at times that he was Sumersing and at times that he was Mahatma Gandhi and at other times he used to say that he was C. D. Deshmukh etc. Dr. Mujawar has quoted Frederick W. Price from his book 'Text Book of the Practice of Medicine', at pages 1940 and 1941, about the symptoms of schizophrenia as follows:

"Schizophrenia may be regarded for clinical purposes as a form of maladaptation in which there are characteristic defects of inner harmony and consistency in behaviour, thought and emotion. These are rarely seen in childhood, but from puberty onwards they may appear in varied combinations (often in persons who for years have been introspective and unsociable). There is discrepancy between mood and utterance, disturbance of conduct (briefly summed up as catatonic or hebephrenic), self absorption and incapacity for sustained thinking along normal lines. A guarded or artificial demeanour may conceal these essential features, whereas they may be conspicuous in a florid or 'deteriorated' case. Hallucinations and delusions may fill out the picture; affective or other morbid types of reaction may complicate it".

It is not, however, clear from the evidence as to whether the two principal acts committed by the husband, one towards Suresh and the other towards Ravindra, were committed while the husband was actually suffering from a split personality. In the written statement, he denied the correctness of the first incident, which implies that he was aware of the same. In his deposition, however, he has explained that he did not remember anything about the incidents of January 8 and 9, 1958. I am, therefore, prepared to proceed on the footing that on both these occasions, the husband was not aware of the nature of the act that he was committing.

Proceeding on that footing, the first question is, would it be correct to say that insanity affords defence to the plea of cruelty. Mr. Gadgil relied upon a passage in "The Law and Practice of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes" by Tolstoy, 5th edn., at p. 62:

"Insanity is a defence to a charge of cruelty, and both limbs of M'Naghten Rules apply, that is to say, a spouse who does not know the nature and quality of his acts, i.e., does not know what he is doing, or who, while knowing what he is doing, does not know that what he is doing is wrong is not guilty of cruelty."

This statement is based on the decision in Palmer v. Palmer.¹ Mr. Gadgil relied upon a decision of the Court of Appeal in Swan v. Swan.² The facts of that case were as follows: For several periods during the married life the husband had been a voluntary patient in a mental hospital. During the intervals in which he had returned to the matrimonial home he had committed acts of cruelty towards his wife. On the hearing of the wife's petition for divorce on the ground of her husband's cruelty there was medical evidence which was accepted by the Court that at the material times the husband did not know the nature and quality of his acts. It was held: "in these circumstances the husband was not capable of being guilty of cruelty to the wife". Mr. Gadgil also cited the decision in Palmer v. Palmer. In that case, the facts were: A husband suffering from insane delusions seriously assaulted his wife on several occasions. The medical superintendent of a mental hospital at which the husband had been treated for several years gave evidence, that, when committing the assaults, the husband would not know that his acts were wrong, because he was suffering from delusions. On the evidence, however, it appeared that the husband struck his wife on several occasions because he thought she had been unfaithful to him, which was not the case, and because she wanted him to go back to the mental hospital and he did not wish to go, and the evidence showed that he recognised that he had ill-treated her. It was held:

"the wife was entitled to a decree nisi for divorce on the ground of cruelty, because both limbs of M'Maghten rules applied on the hearing of petitions for divorce on grounds involving insanity and assaults or the inflicting of personal injuries, and because, on the facts, the husband knew the nature and quality of his acts, that is to say, of his assaults, and knew that what he was doing was wrong; therefore, he was not excused from responsibility for his acts on the ground of insanity".

It is apparent that in the first case, only one part of the McNaghten rule viz., the husband did not know the nature of his act, was established and it was held that it afforded a complete defence to the charge of cruelty. On the footing that the husband did not know what he was doing, the second part viz. whether he knew that what he was doing was wrong, did not arise for consideration. In the second case, the husband knew the nature and quality of his acts (i.e. assaults) and also knew that what he was doing was wrong. That is why it was held that both parts of the rule were satisfied. It is noteworthy that a distinction has been made between the two parts of the McNaghten rule. No difficulty arises when the first part is established viz., that the husband did not know the nature of his acts i.e., what he was doing, and that affords a complete defence to the charge of cruelty. Difficulty, however, arises when it is only established that the husband while knowing what he was doing did not know that what he was doing was wrong.

The position has been explained in the two recent decisions of the House of Lords. In Gollins v. Gollins,³ the question arose as to whether the husband would be held guilty of cruelty when he was not deliberately treating the wife with cruelty and in fact was oblivious of the consequences of his actions upon his spouse. It was held (p. 966):

"An intention on the part of one spouse to injure the other is not a necessary element of cruelty as a matrimonial offence, though the presence of such an intention, if it exists, is material and may be crucial".

The House of Lords further held (p. 966):

"Whether cruelty, as a matrimonial offence, has been established is a question of fact and degree, which should be determined by taking into account the particular individuals concerned and the particular circumstances of the case, rather than by any objective standard; accordingly, in cases where the two spouses are of normal physical and mental health, and the conduct of the respondent spouse, so considered, is so bad that the other should not be called on to endure it, cruelty is established, and then it does not matter what was the respondent's state of mind, e.g., it is immaterial whether the respondent's conduct was 'aimed at' the other spouse or due to unwarranted indifference, attributable, perhaps, to selfishness or laziness".

These observations support the conclusion which I have already drawn viz., that the behaviour of the husband taken in its perspective was such that it was beyond the endurance of the wife. In Gollins's case the facts were more or less similar to the facts of the present case, except that there was no question of insanity so far as the husband was concerned. Only his behaviour was considered as abnormal. The decision in Gollins's case was pronounced on the same day as the decision in Williams v. Williams.⁴ In William's case the precise question that came up for consideration was how far insanity is a defence to the charge of cruelty in matrimonial proceedings. The entire case-law on this question was reviewed by the House of Lords including the two cases referred to above viz., Swan v. Swan and Palmer v. Palmer. On the facts of the case the question that arose for consideration was, whether insanity could afford a defence when it was established on evidence that the husband knew what he was doing but did not know that what he was doing was wrong. The House of Lords was not disposed to base its decision on the distinction between the two parts of the McNaghten rule and has gone into the general question viz., how far insanity is a good defence and if it is a good defence, under what circumstances and within what limitations. Some of the Law Lords have emphasized that the distinction made between two parts of the McNaghten rules is illogical and untenable. The facts in William's case were as follows: A husband by his conduct caused damage to his wife's health. His conduct took the form of deliberately accusing his wife of adulterous associations, but he thought that such accusations were justified because he believed that they were true, having been so induced to think by imaginary voices which informed him of them as fact. The wife petitioned for a divorce on the ground of cruelty. The trial Judge found that the husband knew what he was doing in making the accusations, but that he did not know that they were wrong; the trial Judge would have granted a decree, but felt constrained to dismiss the petition because of the husband's insanity. On appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal that the second limb of the McNaghten rules afforded the husband a defence, it was held (Lord Hodson dissenting): the fact that the husband did not know that his acts were wrong did not of itself constitute a defence to a suit for divorce on the ground of cruelty. It was further held:

"Insanity of a respondent spouse is not necessarily a defence to a suit for divorce on the ground that the respondent treated the petitioning spouse with cruelty; but insanity is a factor to be taken into account in applying the test whether in all the circumstances of the case the respondent's conduct is of such gravity that he has by his acts treated the petitioner with cruelty, e.g., if the conduct were such that it would amount to cruelty only if aggravated by intention to hurt, a spouse who could not form such an intention would not be held to have treated the other with cruelty".

It would at once be clear from this decision that it is not necessary to attribute a guilty mind or mens rea to the husband for the purpose of establishing cruelty. Lord Reid in regard to McNaghten rules has observed (p. 1002):

"I have come to be clearly of opinion that it would be wrong to take the McNaghten rules as a test. Not only have these rules been subject to persistent and powerful criticism for nearly a hundred years but their strict application would lead to capricious results. It appears to be the general opinion of medical men, who at least have a better understanding of insanity than lawyers, that there are types of insanity not within the rules which deprive the insane man of choice or responsibility just as much as those types which are covered by the rules. So if guilt, culpability, or blameworthiness in some degree is to be held a necessary element in cruelty, I can see no rational basis for holding that if two persons are in fact equally irresponsible one is to be divorced because his type of insanity does not come within the rules, but the other is to have a defence because his case is covered by the rules".

Again, at page 1003 Lord Reid has posed two alternatives and observed:

"So it remains for me to choose between the two clear-cut alternatives—either insanity is a defence or it is not. I think that ultimately the answer must depend on the meaning one gives to the word 'cruel', and on this there are obviously two opinions, even among judges".

Lord Reid thereafter referred to the decision in Gollins's case and pointed out that whether the behaviour is cruel or not must be considered from an objective standard. Lord Reid has also tried to assimilate the position of an insane person to that of an abnormal person and pointed out that it is illogical to make a distinction between the behaviour of an abnormal person and that of an insane person. From the point of view of the consequence on the spouse the impact of both is the same. At page 1004 Lord Reid has observed:

"In my judgment decree should be pronounced against such an abnormal person not because his conduct was aimed at his wife, nor because a reasonable man would have realised the position, nor because he must be deemed to have foreseen or intended the harm he did, but simply because the facts are such that, after making all allowances for his disabilities and for the temperaments of both parties, it must be held that the character and gravity of his acts was such as to amount to cruelty. And, if that is right for an abnormal person, I see no good reason why the same should not apply to an insane person".

Lord Evershed in his concurring judgment pointed out that it is not enough to say that the second part of McNaghten rule did not apply to the facts of that case, because the arguments inevitably raised the general and important question viz., to what extent is insanity an answer to a plea of cruelty in a petition for divorce? After posing the question in that general form, Lord Evershed conceded that it cannot be laid down that the test of judging cruelty in all cases is purely objective. Lord Evershed proceeded to observe that proof of insanity is not necessarily an answer to the charge. He then referred to the point of view of the sufferer and considered the necessity to give protection to the suffering spouse. Lord Pearce pointed out that the divorce Court has more similarity to the common law Courts than to the criminal Courts. He was not prepared to accept the argument that divorce was partly punitive and, therefore, we must look to the criminal law for guidance. He then emphasized that in considering the question as to whether insanity afforded a defence, one should look to the meaning of the word 'cruelty'. After referring to the cases in which the objective view of cruelty was emphasized, Lord Pearce emphasized the hardships to which one party is subjected by the distinction between the two parts of the McNaghten rules. Lord Pearce then observed (p. 1028):

"The argument for holding that a man should not be held to have treated his wife with cruelty if he did not know what he was doing has an attractive simplicity. But so to hold would create a dividing line which in practice is not easy to apply (even with medical help), which will at times make the courts powerless to help when help is most needed, and which will cause more hardship than it alleviates. It is not the dividing line which has been drawn in criminal cases, nor is it that which has been drawn in cases of contract. It is that which has, after much doubt, been drawn in cases of tort. For divorce cases it has little practical justification.

And inevitably it must be so if the court is to exercise its duty of protection between spouses who are otherwise under a duty to live with one another".

Lord Pearce then concluded with the following observations (p. 1029):

"In my opinion insanity should, like temperament, and other circumstances, be one of the factors that may be taken into account in deciding whether a wife is entitled to relief. Where therefore the conduct in question is such that it would not amount to cruelty in the absence of an actual intention to hurt, an insane man who could form no such intention would not be held to have treated his wife with cruelty. Where, however, the conduct would be held to be cruelty regardless of motive or intention to be cruel, insanity should not bar relief.

As stated above, the evidence in this case does not justify the conclusion that the husband was not aware of what he was doing. Assuming, however, that the husband was not capable of knowing the nature of his acts, still, that by itself would not afford a defence to an action of judicial separation. In view of the decision of the House of Lords in Williams v. Williams the distinction made in some judicial pronouncements between the two parts of the Mc-Naghten rule no longer remains valid. Defence of insanity is not available even on the first part viz., that the offending spouse is not capable of knowing what he is doing, if the conduct is held to be cruelty regardless of motive or intention to be cruel. The conduct of the husband in this case is such as to amount to cruelty, even in the absence of an intention to be cruel. Insanity, therefore, should not bar the relief claimed by the wife. On the facts of this case, the schizophrenia from which the husband has a predilection to suffer periodically is no good defence to the plea of cruelty put forward on behalf of the wife. The question whether the husband was capable of forming an intention to be cruel or actually intended to be cruel is a matter of no consequence in the present case. There is no knowing when the husband would relapse into a fit of schizophrenia, in which case anything may happen. The apprehensions entertained by the wife are, therefore, well-founded.

The result is, the appeal fails and is, therefore, dismissed. No order as to costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Central Provinces & Berar Municipalities Act (II of 1922), Secs. 20-A(2), 15(j)—Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act (Mah. V of 1962), Sec. 16(1)(f)—C. In s. 20-A(2) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act, 1922, the expression "especially empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf" qualifies only the words "a Civil Judge". Therefore, a District Judge or an Additional District Judge although he is not especially authorised in this behalf by the Provincial Government has the authority to entertain an election petition under s. 20-A of the Act and to dispose it of.

B. R. Mandlekar, for the petitioner.
C. S. Dharmadhikari, for opponent No. 1.
D. B. Padhye, amicus curiae.

WAGLE J. This is an application in revision under s. 20-A(5) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act, 1922. The facts which need a mention are the following:

On June 16, 1962, election for a seat in Ward No. 9 of the Achalpur Municipal Committee was held at which the present petitioner obtained 190 votes, opponent No. 1 obtained 153 votes and opponent No. 2 obtained 59 votes. The petitioner having obtained the largest number of votes was declared elected. Against this declaration of the result, the present opponent No. 1 Girdharsa filed an election petition No. 10 of 1963 before the District Judge, Amravati.

The ground urged for the contention that the petitioner was not-entitled to be elected was that he was an undischarged insolvent. Section 15(j) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act, 1922, mentions that no person who is, under the provisions of any law for the time being in force, ineligible to be a member of any local authority, shall be eligible for an election or nomination as a member of a committee. The contention of opponent No. 1 was that under the provisions of s. 16(1)(f) of the Maharashtra Zilla Parishads and Panchayat Samitis Act, 1961 (hereinafter called the Zilla Parishads Act), an undischarged insolvent is not eligible for being elected to the Zilla Parishad. Under the provisions of s. 15(j) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act, therefore, he is ineligible to be a member of the Municipal Committee. The said opponent also contended that the petitioner should be unseated and that he being the person who had obtained next largest number of votes should be declared as elected for the said seat. The learned District Judge having considered the contentions of the parties and the evidence led by them held that the petitioner was an undischarged insolvent. The learned District Judge also held that there is no reason why the present opponent No. 1 should not be declared to have been elected, and declared him elected after setting aside the election of the present petitioner. Against this order the present application in revision has been filed by the petitioner whose election was set aside.

Mr. Mandlekar, who appears for the petitioner, contends that, in the first instance, the entire order should be set aside for the reason that the District Judge had no authority to act as a Judge under the provisions of s. 20-A of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act. Mr. Mandlekar's contention was that the plain meaning of the authorisation under s. 20-A(2) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act was that a person, who was specially empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf had alone the authority to entertain and dispose of such election petitions. Mr. Mandlekar in this connection relied upon the provisions of s. 20-A, sub-s. (2), which reads as follows:

"(2) Such petition shall be presented to the District Judge or Additional District Judge or to a Civil Judge especially empowered by the State Government in this behalf within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the election or selection was held and no petition shall be admitted unless it is presented within fourteen days from the date on which the result of such election or selection was notified."

Mr. Mandlekar's contention in this respect was that in order to enable either the District Judge or the Additional District Judge, or a Civil Judge, it was necessary that he was to be empowered by the Provincial Government in this respect and that, unless this special empowerment was received by him from Provincial Government, neither the District Judge, nor the Additional District Judge, nor the Civil Judge had jurisdiction to entertain any election petition under s. 20-A. In this connection Mr. Mandlekar referred to a decision of a Single Judge of this Court, *Yeshwant v. Nandkishore*¹ which favoured the view that was propounded by Mr. Mandlekar.

Mr. Mandlekar, however, brought to our notice the fact that on this point there is a conflict of decisions of two Single Judges of this very Court. In *Trimbaksa Ramasa v. Habib Mohammad*² one of us (Kotval J.) had a similar point for disposal, and it was held in that case that the words "especially empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf" used in s. 20-A(2) of the C. P. and Berar Municipalities Act, only applied to the words "a Civil Judge" and did not apply to the words "the District Judge or Additional District Judge". Mr. Mandlekar, therefore, contended, when this matter was placed before a Single Judge of this Court on March 11, 1964, that this point be referred to a Division Bench as there was a conflict.

As the point was of some importance in regard to the interpretation of a section, we called upon Mr. D. B. Padhye, Assistant Government Pleader, to assist us, and we are thankful to Mr. Padhye for the assistance given by him in placing his view before us. Having considered the arguments advanced in this case and the two judgments expressing a conflict of views, we are of opinion that the view expressed in the earlier judgment of a Single Judge of this Court in Trimbaksa Ramasa v. Habib Mohammad is preferable to the view expressed in Yeshwant v. Nandkishore. We may also point out that in the case before Mr. Justice Abhyankar in Yeshwant v. Nandkishore this point did not really arise. It was not necessary for the disposal of this point to arrive at a decision in the case before the learned Judge. The point before the learned Judge was a little different from the point which is now before us. The facts of that case were that an election petition was filed before the District Judge and the District Judge, under the powers given to him under the Bombay Civil Courts Act, 1869, transferred the election petition for disposal to the Assistant Judge. The Assistant Judge in fact disposed of the election petition, and in a revision application filed under s. 20-A(5) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act, the jurisdiction of the Assistant Judge was challenged before Mr. Justice Abhyankar.

The short point before Mr. Justice Abhyankar was whether there was authority in the District Judge to transfer the matter to the Assistant Judge under the provisions of the Civil Courts Act. The learned Judge considered the various authorities and came to the conclusion that any authority mentioned in s. 20-A(2), whether specially empowered or not, was an authority acting as a persona designata. Having come to this conclusion, the learned Judge further held that the provisions of the Civil Courts Act did not apply to such proceedings except to the extent to which they were especially made applicable, either by the Act or by any of the rules framed thereunder. No provision was brought to the notice of the learned Judge wherein any authority entertaining an election petition under the provisions of s. 20-A of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act was given the power to transfer the election proceeding for disposal to another authority. In the absence of any such provision, the learned Judge came to the conclusion that the transfer to the Assistant Judge by the District Judge was bad and, therefore, the Assistant Judge had no authority to dispose of the election petition. The question whether the authority should have been specially empowered to exercise jurisdiction in respect of an election petition did not, in fact, arise before the learned Judge. This also seems to be the view taken by the learned Judge. In para. 11, at page 240, the learned Judge observes as follows:

"...Even assuming that a District Judge or an Additional District Judge need not be empowered as contended by Mr. Mandlekar, there is no room for an argument that an Assistant Judge could be an authority, though not enumerated or mentioned in sub-section (2) of section 20-A, which would still have the power to entertain or dispose of an election petition merely by reason of section 16 of the Bombay Civil Courts Act. In fact, in my opinion, the Bombay Civil Courts Act does not purport to create any power in the District Judge when he is acting as a persona designata to transfer any application entertained by him under any special Act to his Assistant Judge."

The question that arose in Trimbaksa Ramasa v. Habib Mohammad was, however, the exact question that now arises before us. The facts of that case were that an election petition was presented before the District Judge on June 10, 1959, during the period when the Courts of the Civil Judges were closed for summer vacation between May 3, 1959, and June 14, 1959. After the reopening of the Civil Courts the District Judge sent the election petition to the Civil Judge, Senior Division, for disposal. The contention taken up by the opponent in the election petition was that this presentation to the District Judge was not proper as he was not the authority empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf under s. 20-A of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act. There is no dispute about this fact, viz. that the notification issued by the Provincial Government in this connection empowers only the Civil Judges, Class I, to hear election petitions under s. 20-A(2) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act. No District Judge or Additional District Judge had till then been empowered by any notification issued by the Provincial Government under s. 20-A(2).

The contention taken up was, therefore, that the District Judge not being the person who is authorised by the Provincial Government had no authority to entertain a petition as it could not be presented to him and, therefore, he had no power to have seisin of it. All further proceeding that followed by an erroneous presentation did not properly dispose of any election petition. The result, as submitted, was that the election petition not having been properly presented, no valid orders could be passed thereon. In this case it was necessary for the learned Judge to consider the question whether the presentation of an election petition to a District Judge, who is not especially empowered in this respect under s. 20-A, was a proper presentation of the petition in order to make the petition a valid one. The learned Judge considered the clause and in particular, the wording of the clause, to hold that the presentation to the District Judge, although he was not specially empowered in this respect by the Provincial Government, was proper presentation within the meaning of s. 20-A(2) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act. The learned Judge considered the particular clause, in s. 20-A(2), viz. "Such petition shall be presented to the District Judge or Additional District Judge or to a Civil Judge especially empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf". The view taken by the learned Judge in Trimbaksa Ramasa v. Habib Mohammad appears to be preferable to the view taken by the learned Single Judge in Yeshwant v. Nandkishore.

The wording of the clause clearly indicates the intention of the Legislature. There are three alternative authorities which are mentioned in the section. The first one is the District Judge, the second one is Additional District Judge and the third one is a Civil Judge. If it was the intention that the words "especially empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf" were to apply to all the three authorities, then we are of opinion that the clause would definitely have been worded differently. The clause worded as follows, "the District Judge, the Additional District Judge, or a Civil Judge especially empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf" would have made the meaning of the clause quite clear if it was the intention of the Legislature to have the later clause of especial empowerment applicable to all the three authorities. Mr. Padhye, who argued amicus curiae in this matter, contended that the intention of the Legislature has got to be gathered by the words used. His argument was that the word 'or' between the words "District Judge" and the words "Additional District Judge" really made no difference to the phraseology so far as its meaning is concerned. Similar was his argument in respect of the use of the word "to" between the clause "the District Judge or Additional District Judge or," and the words "a Civil Judge". His view was that the words used by the Legislature were clear enough to indicate that the expression "especially empowered" was used in reference to all the three authorities and not with reference to the third authority only.

It, however, appears to us that if this meaning were to be given to that expression, the first word "or" between the words "the District Judge" and the words "Additional District Judge" would have no meaning at all. Similarly, the word "to" between the words "Additional District Judge or" and the words "a Civil Judge" would also have no meaning. In other words the Legislature should be presumed to have used two words without attaching any meaning to them. Those words would be superfluous. If, however, the meaning of the words is to be given as an intention expressed by the Legislature that the expression "especially empowered by the Provincial Government" was only to apply to "a Civil Judge" which is the last alternative used, then, in our opinion, the first word "or" and the second word "to" have a definite meaning. By the use of the word "to" between the words "Additional District Judge or" and "a Civil Judge", a categorical distinction is brought between the two classifications. The first classification is "the District Judge or Additional District Judge" and the second classification is "a Civil Judge". If this expression is understood in this manner, then the word "or" as well as the second word "to" have a meaning and the meaning is quite clear, viz. that there was an intention of the Legislature to distinguish between the first category of "the District Judge or Additional District Judge" and the second category of "a Civil Judge", and that the expression "especially empowered" could only be with respect to the second classification viz. "a Civil Judge".

It also appears to us that there is good reason for it. The reason is connected with the jurisdiction of these various authorities. The jurisdiction of the District Judge and the Additional District Judge was unlimited, whereas the jurisdiction of the Civil Judge was limited to Rs. 10,000 at that time. If this jurisdictional difference is taken into account, the intention of the Legislature appears perfectly clear viz. that in order to enable a Civil Judge to have a power on par with the District Judge or the Additional District Judge, a special notification was necessary from the Provincial Government empowering a Civil Judge under s. 20-A. In other words, a selection was to be made by the Provincial Government from the third authority, mentioned in s. 20-A(2), which would bring those persons on par jurisdictionally with the first category which includes the District and the Additional District Judge.

To our mind, the expression used by the Legislature is clear enough to indicate that a distinction between the classifications which include the District and the Additional District Judges and the classification of a Civil Judge was definitely made by the Legislature by the two words used—the first word "or" between the words "District Judge" and "Additional District Judge", and the word "to" between the words "Additional District Judge or" and the expression "a Civil Judge."

One of the earlier decisions of the Nagpur High Court which was also mentioned in Yeshwant v. Nandkishore, was a decision of a Single Judge reported in Purushottam v. G. V. Pandit.³ The view taken by the learned Single Judge in this case was that the words "especially empowered" referred to all the three authorities. This question, however, was subsequently reconsidered by the Madhya Pradesh High Court in *Bhojraj v. State*⁴ and the Division Bench presided over by Hidayatullah C. J. (as he then was) came to the conclusion that the view expressed in the earlier decision of Purushottam v. G. V. Pandit was not acceptable. The reasons given are the same as are now placed before us by Mr. Dharmadhikari, viz. that the proper meaning has to be given to the first word "or" and the second word "to". We agree with the opinion expressed in the case, Bhojraj v. State. This judgment of the Madhya Pradesh High Court was followed by a Single Judge (Badkas J.) of this Court in Kewalchand Kanhayalal v. Manoharabhai Babar-bhai.⁵

One of the grounds upon which the view to the contrary was expressed by Kaushalendra Rao J. in Purshottam v. G. V. Pandit and by Abhyankar J. in Yeshwant v. Nandkishore, was that if the meaning which we have given to it were to be given, then there was a likelihood of a conflict between the three authorities in regard to the same election petition. The argument advanced was that if an election petition were filed before each of the three authorities, then each of the three authorities might decide the matter differently and that there would thus be a conflict. The notification issued by Government in the instant case also raises a likelihood of a conflict. The notification issued by Government authorises all Civil Judges of Class I to hear such election petition under s. 20-A of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act. If at a particular place more than one Civil Judge, Class I, are posted, then a conflict is likely in respect of the present notification also. However, we do not think that that should be one of the matters which should determine the interpretation of sections. Whether a conflict arises or not and what would happen if a conflict arises, is not a matter which should persuade us to come to a different conclusion when the plain meaning of the section is different.

A further argument advanced by Mr. Dharmadhikari in this connection was that the view taken earlier that an authority which acts under the provisions of s. 20-A of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act is a persona designata cannot be supported on the plain reading of s. 20-A of that Act and the provisions of the C. P. & Berar Civil Courts Act I of 1917. Section 20-A(2) mentions the authorities who should entertain election petitions. Section 20-A(5)(b) gives the power to the High Court to entertain an application in revision where the Court has exercised jurisdiction not vested in it by law or has failed to exercise a jurisdiction vested in it by law. The clause is not that the revisional jurisdiction is against the decision of a Judge acting as persona designata, but the clause uses words to mean that the revision lies against an order of a Court which has exercised a particular jurisdiction. Mr. Dharmadhikari contended that the use of the word "Court" would make it abundantly clear that the authority whether empowered or not which was mentioned in s. 20-A(2) was exercising its authority as a Court and that, therefore, there was no scope for any argument that the authority was acting as a persona designata. The second point urged in this connection by Mr. Dharmadhikari was that the expression "within the local limits of whose jurisdiction the election was held" giving the localized jurisdiction to the authority under s. 20-A(2) also supported the view that the authority was acting as a Court, and not as a persona designata.

In this connection it was pointed out that the C. P. & Berar Courts Act, 1917, did not give jurisdiction officerwise, but the jurisdiction was only courtwise. There was no particular jurisdiction given to a Judge as such, but the jurisdiction was of the Court and it was to be exercised by the presiding officer. If, therefore, the Judge did not have any particular jurisdiction as unrelated to a Court, then Mr. Dharmadhikari contended that the expression "within the local limits of whose jurisdiction" must have reference to the Court which was presided over either by the District Judge or by the Additional District Judge or by the Civil Judge. Mr. Dharmadhikari's contention, therefore, was that if the authority, which had the jurisdiction to entertain election petitions under s. 20-A(2) was not a persona designata but a Court, all these questions, which arose by reason of the presentation and the exercise of jurisdiction, could not, in fact, arise. However, though we find good substance in this argument we think that it is not necessary to go into this discussion so far as the present case is concerned. This present case has to be disposed of upon the interpretation of the expression "to the District Judge or Additional District Judge or to a Civil Judge especially empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf". Having come to a conclusion that the last expression "especially empowered by the Provincial Government in this behalf" qualifies only the words "a Civil Judge", it is not necessary to enter into a further discussion upon a question whether the authorities mentioned in s. 20A(2) act as persona designata or as a Court.

493 of 1958, decided by Badkas J., on

In the result, we hold that the learned District Judge, although he was not especially authorised in this behalf by the Provincial Government, had the authority to entertain the election petition under s. 20-A and to dispose of it.

Mr. Mandlekar's further contention in this case was that the order passed by the learned District Judge in the election petition No. 10 of 1963 was partly erroneous. He did not seriously dispute the contention advanced that the undischarged insolvent was not eligible for being elected as a member of the Municipal Committee. It was also pointed out by Mr. Dharmadhikari that s. 73 of the Provincial Insolvency Act was clear enough to indicate that no undischarged insolvent was entitled to seek an election to any local authority. The Municipal Committee of Achalpur being a local authority s. 73 was clear enough to indicate that the petitioner was not entitled to be elected. However, the learned District Judge relied upon s. 16(1)(f) of the Zilla Parishads Act along with the provisions of s. 15(j) of the C. P. & Berar Municipalities Act.

Mr. Mandlekar's contention, however, was about the later portion of the Judge's order, viz. that the present opponent No. 1 be declared to have been elected. The submission was that the petitioner having been found ineligible for election, the number of votes which he had obtained, viz. 190, should have been considered by the learned District Judge as capable of being obtained by any one of the other candidates. Opponent No. 1 had obtained 153 votes and opponent No. 2 had obtained 59 votes. There is no evidence on record to suggest an inference that the votes which were obtained by the petitioner would all have been obtained by opponent No. 1 or that such number of votes would have been obtained by opponent No. 1 as would give him a majority over the votes obtained by opponent No. 2. In this state of events, it is not possible to come to any conclusion that, if the petitioner were not to stand for the election and the votes were to be redistributed between the other candidates, opponent No. 1 would have obtained a majority of votes. Mr. Mandlekar, therefore, contended that, in the present case, the only order that could have been passed by the learned District Judge was to set aside the election and direct a fresh election. We accept this contention of Mr. Mandlekar and hold that the order passed by the learned District Judge declaring opponent No. 1 as elected is bad and should be set aside.

In the result, this petition is partly allowed. The order of the District Judge holding that the present petitioner is not eligible for election is upheld, but the order declaring opponent No. 1 as elected is set aside. A fresh election will be necessitated for the vacant seat. In the events that had happened, we direct the parties to bear their own costs.

Petition partly allowed.

THE STATE OF BOMBAY v. GANPAT DHONDIBA SAWANT.*

Bombay Police Act (Bom. XXIII 1951), Secs. 4, 25, 26, 27—Rules made under s. 29, District Police Act (IV of 1890); Bombay Police Manual, 1950. Chapter XV. Ss. 535-537, 556-558—Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules. Appendix II—Police officer exonerated in departmental enquiry into alleged misconduct—Whether State Government barred from ordering fresh departmental enquiry in connection with same charge of misconduct—State Government whether can institute enquiry against defaulting police officers under procedure prescribed in Appendix II of Civil Services etc. Rules.

There is no bar under the Bombay Police Act, 1951, or the Rules made thereunder preventing the State Government from ordering a fresh departmental enquiry in connection with charges of misconduct against a police officer in respect whereof he has been exonerated in a prior departmental enquiry.

In matters of departmental action taken by officers authorised under s. 25(2) of the Act for punishment of members of the subordinate ranks, the State Government can at any stage intervene under the power of superintendence reserved to it under s. 4. In those very cases, if it finds it necessary, the State Government can directly for itself proceed to exercise punitive powers and after enquiry inflict necessary punishments. There is no direct provision in the Act providing for ordering of a further fresh enquiry for punishment of members of Police Force in respect of their misconduct. That, however, does not result into a position that there is no jurisdiction in the authorities mentioned in ss. 4 and 25 to order further fresh enquiry when the facts of a particular case warrant such directions.

Govind Pedroo v. Dy Commissioner of Police, Division South and Port, Bombay¹ and Arjunrao Baburao v. State of Bombay,² referred to.

There is no prescribed procedure binding on the State Government in connection with punitive powers exercised by the State Government under the first part of s. 25 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951.

Shantaram v. Chudasama,³ referred to.

One Ganpat Dhondiba Sawant (plaintiff) joined service in Police Force of the Province of Bombay on June 11, 1929. In September 1949, the plaintiff was attached to the Cantonment Police Station, Poona, as Sub-Inspector of Police. His salary then was Rs. 234-2-0 inclusive of allowances in the grade of Rs. 120-5-195. It appears that on September 6, 1949, at or about 8/8.20 p.m., one unknown stranger was found lying in the passage in the compound of Petit Hall at Bhavani Peth, Poona City. Information about this fact was conveyed to a Constable at a Chowki at Pool Gate within the limits of the Cantonment Police Station. The Constable went to the Police Station and reported the matter orally to Head Constable Kate. The Police thereafter saw the stranger in the compound of the Petit Hall and removed him to the Cantonment Police Station. On the next day, i.e. September 7, 1949, in the morning, the stranger was found near Empress Garden within the jurisdiction of another Police Station in unconscious condition. He was removed to that other Police Station and therefrom to the Sassoon Hospital, where he was admitted as an in-patient at 8.25 a.m. He died at about 8.40 a.m. On post mortem, it was found out that he had died as a result of cerebral haemorrhage due to fracture of skull. The plaintiff's duty hours on September 6, 1949, at the Cantonment Police Station as Sub-Inspector in charge thereof appear to have been from 9 p.m. onwards.

Under the above circumstances, by an order dated October 26, 1949, exh. 25, the District Superintendent of Police, suspended the plaintiff and others from service with effect from October 26, 1949, pending departmental enquiry into the conduct of the plaintiff and other personnel of the Police Station.

The plaintiff was prosecuted in the Court of the City Magistrate, First Class, Poona, for offences under ss. 202 and 217 of the Indian Penal Code. In other words, the charge against the plaintiff was that he intentionally omitted to give information and he as a public servant disobeyed directions of law with intent to save certain persons from punishment. By his judgment and order dated November 6, 1950, the learned Magistrate found the plaintiff not guilty and acquitted him under s. 258 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The result of the above acquittal was that by an order dated January 29, 1951, the D.S.P., Poona (Rural), ordered the plaintiff to be reinstated in service and gave directions as regards his posting. By the order, it was provided that the plaintiff's period of suspension be treated as duty on full pay and allowances.

The plaintiff joined service as from February 1, 1951. On or about September 25, 1951, a departmental enquiry was started against the plaintiff. The charges levelled against the plaintiff appear in exh. 28 dated September 25, 1951. The gravamen of the charges was that the plaintiff was guilty of gross negligence of duty and slack in supervision, inasmuch as on the night of September 6/7, 1949, he failed to take any legal action or to issue orders to his subordinates to take legal action in respect of the unknown person who was brought to the Police Station on the alleged charge of offence under s. 61-D of the District Police Act and further that he failed to arrange to obtain medical aid for the unknown person who was brought to the Police Station in a sick condition and became unconscious thereafter and further that the plaintiff allowed the unknown person to continue in the Police Station till midnight without any action being taken in respect of him. The second charge was that the plaintiff was guilty of reprehensible misconduct in that he caused the unknown sick and unconscious person to be removed from the Police Station precincts to a spot near Empress Garden and abandoned him there in order to cause disappearance of the evidence of his gross negligence of duty and evade responsibility and liability in the matter. The departmental enquiry in connection with the above charges was held by the Assistant Superintendent of Police Heble. By his report, copy whereof forms part of exh. 62, the Enquiry Officer held that the plaintiff was present at the Police Station on the above date and that he was not in a position however to exercise supervision over the happenings in the Police Station. His subordinates had not apprised him about the relevant facts regarding the unknown person who was brought to the Police Station. He further held that it was not proved that the plaintiff could have been aware of the facts relating to the above stranger brought to the Police Station through other sources. Having made the above findings, he held that the plaintiff had not failed to take lawful action in respect of the above stranger and he had not ordered and/or connived at the removal of the stranger from the Police Station to a spot near Empress Garden. The result of the above findings, obviously, was that the plaintiff was exonerated by the above report from the charges levelled against him. The District Superintendent of Police made an endorsement dated February 21, 1952, on the above report accepting the same. The Inspector General of Police also accepted the above report by endorsement dated May 1, 1952. It is necessary to record that pending the above enquiry, the plaintiff was not suspended from service and continued in service and continued to receive his salary.

The Government then decided that a general departmental enquiry should be held afresh against all the Police Officers and men concerned in respect of their conduct in the above case. The Government, therefore, directed the District Magistrate that the enquiry should be conducted by a senior Prant Officer of Poona District in the conduct of Police Officers and men concerned in respect of the happening of September 6/7, 1949. The District Magistrate was called upon to take steps accordingly. The other senior Police Officers were informed about the Government's decision. By his order dated January 10, 1953, the District Magistrate, Poona, appointed M. R. Caldeira, Prant Officer, Poona City Prant, as Enquiry Officer in the general departmental enquiry to be held against the Police Officer and men concerned in respect of their conduct in the culpable homicide in the office of the Cantonment Police Station, Poona Urban Area. By the order, Caldeira was requested to observe all instructions regarding the holdings of departmental enquiries printed in Appendix II to the Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules. In pursuance of that order, Caldeira commenced general departmental enquiry proceedings against the Police Officers concerned including the plaintiff. By a memo to show cause and charge-sheet dated January 24, 1953, Caldeira furnished the plaintiff with the copies of the joint charge and statement of allegations against the Police Officers and men concerned and gave him notice that enquiry would be held in his office from February 6, 1953. The plaintiff was called upon to remain present and to produce oral and documentary evidence as he required. He was informed of the list of witnesses who would be examined in support of the charge. The charges levelled were as follows:

- "(1) You failed to make any entry in the station diary regarding this person.
- (2) Failed to record any complaint either by the unknown person or against him.
- (3) Failed to take prompt and necessary measures to render medical aid to the unknown person.
- (4) Removed the unknown person against his will from the Police Station to the road near Empress Garden, apparently with a view to evade responsibility and cover negligence of duty.
- (5) Failed to give information when the photograph appeared in the papers."

In due course, after all opportunity was given to the plaintiff in connection therewith, the departmental enquiry was proceeded with. Caldeira by his report dated March 14, 1953, made findings against the plaintiff and found that the plaintiff was guilty of all the five charges. By his letter dated July 1, 1953, the Assistant Secretary to the Government of Bombay, Home Department, informed the plaintiff about the findings made by Caldeira by his above report. The plaintiff was furnished with the copy of the report and he was requested to show cause, if he so desired, against the proposed penalty of dismissal to be inflicted on him. The plaintiff's representations against the proposed punishment were received by the Government. Ultimately, by the challenged order dated January 11, 1954, the State Government ordered dismissal of the plaintiff and certain other Government servants from service with effect from January 11, 1954, and directed that formal orders of dismissal should be issued separately. Such order of dismissal dated January 11, 1954, was passed in connection with the dismissal of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff appealed against the above order of dismissal on March 8, 1954. In connection with his appeal, the plaintiff was heard on October 15, 1954. By the order dated October 18, 1954, the plaintiff was informed that the Government saw no reason to reconsider its earlier decision to dismiss the plaintiff from service. The plaintiff served usual statutory notice under s. 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure dated March 13, 1956, on the Government and ultimately filed the present suit on March 8, 1957. In his plaint, the grounds, on which the plaintiff challenged the above order, were as follows:—The enquiry by the Prant Officer was illegal, ultra vires and without jurisdiction and contravened the provisions of the Constitution regarding fundamental rights and other rights guaranteed to an individual under the Constitution. The Prant Officer had no jurisdiction to hold the enquiry "when he (the plaintiff) was acquitted in a Court of law and when in a departmental enquiry he was also exonerated". His second contention was that his conditions of service were governed by the Bombay Police Act and the Bombay Police Manual and the rules made thereunder and the Civil Services Classification, Control and Appeal Rules were not applicable to the plaintiff. The result of those facts was that the enquiry by the Prant Officer was without jurisdiction and was of the nature of a second trial and contravened the provisions and the spirit of the Constitution. The third contention was that the enquiry was improper because the Prant Officer had failed to supply to the plaintiff copies of the required papers on plea of confidential documents. In the plaint, the plaintiff further contended that he had not been paid the sum of Rs. 1,701-5-0 for the salary due to him during the period of suspension. That amount should be directed to be paid to him. The plaintiff further claimed the sum of Rs. 12,182-7-0 as arrears of salary from January 11, 1954, till the date of the suit and future salary at the rate of Rs. 305-2-0 per month.

The main contentions in defence raised by the written statement of the State Government were that the claim of Rs. 1,701-5-0 was barred under art. 102 in Schedule I to the Indian Limitation Act. The plaintiff's suggestion that no enquiry can be held on the same charges after an acquittal by the criminal Court was not correct. There was no legal bar to the institution of a departmental enquiry on the same facts which were also the subject matter of criminal trial. In the first departmental enquiry, the Government had found that the case against the plaintiff had not been properly considered. It was for that reason that the Government directed that fresh general departmental enquiry should be held. The main contention was that the Government had powers by virtue of s. 4 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951, under which superintendence of the Police Force throughout the State vested in Government, to order fresh general departmental enquiry. For this reason, it was contended that there was nothing illegal or unconstitutional in the Government's ordering the fresh enquiry. The further contention was that all the essential requirements of the rules of Police enquiry as laid down by the Bombay Police Manual came to be observed as appeared from the departmental proceedings carried out by the Prant Officer. A precise charge-sheet giving details and the statement of allegations were served on the plaintiff and the departmental enquiry was held in a manner whereby nothing that was prescribed by the rules made under the Bombay Police Act and contained in the Bombay Police Manual had been violated. The contention was that as the essential requirements of the Police Rules had been satisfied, mere reference to penalties specified in r. 49 of the Civil Services Rules did not affect the validity of the enquiry. In this connection, the further contention was that the plaintiff had not previously raised any of the objections raised in the plaint alleging that the proper rules were not observed. He had in his replies and written statement not raised any such contention. The plaintiff had in fact acquiesced in the procedure followed, because the plaintiff knew that the requirements of the rules of enquiry under the Police Rules had been satisfied. The plaintiff was accordingly not entitled to agitate this point about the enquiry in accordance with the rules contained in the Police Manual.

The trial Judge negatived the contention of the defendant that the notice under s. 80 of the Code of Civil Procedure was bad. He held that the enquiry by the Prant Officer was not illegal or ultra vires (i) because the plaintiff had been acquitted in the criminal trial and (ii) because the plaintiff had been exonerated in the previous departmental enquiry in respect of the same charges. He negatived the plaintiff's contention that the enquiry by the Prant Officer was without jurisdiction and in contravention of the Constitution. The learned Judge held that the findings in the earlier enquiry were not acceptable to the government and it was for that reason competent for the government to direct a fresh enquiry. He negatived the contention of the State Government that the plaintiff's claim regarding the sum of Rs. 1,701-5-0 was barred by the law of limitation. He, therefore, dismissed the plaintiff's suit as regards all the reliefs claimed except in respect of the sum of Rs. 1,701-5-0.

The plaintiff as well as the State Government appealed. These cross-appeals were heard together.

K. K. DESAI J. [His Lordship after stating the facts, proceeded]. The first contention which has been made before us on behalf of the plaintiff, is as follows:—

The State Government was not entitled to direct and/or hold the fresh departmental enquiry held by Caldeira, because the scheme of the rules framed under the relevant provisions of law negatived the right in the Government to hold further enquiries after a defaulting Government servant was exonerated from the charges levelled against him in prior duly held departmental enquiry. The contention was that under s. 4 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951, the State Government in its powers of superintendence was not entitled to direct a fresh enquiry as is contended for by the written statement. The contention was developed by arguing that there was no affirmative provision for revising in fresh enquiries findings made in prior enquiries that the defaulting Government servants were not guilty of charges levelled against them. The further argument was that powers of superintendence, if any, must be exercised by observing principles of fairplay. The order of fresh enquiry on the basis of the same facts and evidence was in breach of principles of fairplay. In ordering the fresh enquiry in this case, the Government had acted arbitrarily and in violation of the principles of fairplay and/or natural justice. The powers of superintendence did not entitle the Government to act arbitrarily in the above manner. In this connection, the alternative argument was that the provisions in s. 4 of the Act were not intended to deal with and apply to the provisions in altogether another Chapter, i.e. Chapter III relating to regulation, control and discipline of the Police Force. Section 4 appears in Chapter II which deals with matters specified in that Chapter and relates to superintendence, control and organisation of the Police Force. The contention was that in connection with matters dealt with under Chapter III of the Act, the provisions in s. 4 relating to powers of superintendence in the State Government were never intended to be applicable.

The substance of the reply of the State Government was that in all the relevant rules as well as the above Act which was admittedly applicable to the parties, there was no specific bar or even implied bar preventing the State Government from ordering a fresh departmental enquiry in connection with charges in respect whereof a prior departmental enquiry might have been held. In fact, under the provisions in s. 4 and sub-s. (1) of s. 25 of the above Act, express power was reserved so as to enable the Government to order departmental enquiries in connection with misconduct of defaulting Police Officers to decide whether penalties of various kinds should be imposed against such Police Officers. The power of the Government envisaged in the above sections was not controlled by any rules or otherwise. There were no rules which could be relied upon on behalf of the plaintiff to show that a fresh departmental enquiry cannot be ordered against Police Officers who may have been in prior enquiry exonerated of the charges levelled against them.

Now, in connection with these contentions, it is first necessary to refer to the relevant provisions in the Act and also the rules which were admittedly applicable to the plaintiff's case. The plaintiff belongs to the subordinate ranks as defined in sub-s. (16) of s. 2 of the Act. Chapter II of the Act relates to superintendence, control and organisation of the Police Force. Section 4 in that Chapter provides that

"The superintendence of the Police Force throughout the State of Maharashtra vests in and is exercisable by the State Government and any control, direction or supervision exercisable by any officer over any member of the Police Force shall be exercisable subject to such superintendence".

Chapter III relates to regulation, control and discipline of the Police Force. The important provisions in this Chapter relating to punishment of members of the Police Force and procedure to be observed in awarding punishment and also in appeals from orders of punishment are contained in ss. 25, 26 and 27. It is necessary to quote the relevant parts of the above sections here:

"25. (1) The State Government or any officer authorised by sub-section (2) in that behalf may suspend, reduce, dismiss or remove an Inspector or any member of the subordinate ranks of the Police Force...

(2) (a) The Inspector-General, the Commissioner and the Deputy Inspector-General shall have authority to punish an Inspector or any member of the subordinate ranks under sub-section (1). A District Superintendent shall have the like authority in respect of any Police officer subordinate to him below the grade of Inspector...

(b) ...

(ba) ...

(c) The exercise of any power conferred by this sub-section shall be subject always to such rules and orders as may be made by the State Government in that behalf.

(3) Nothing in sub-sections (1) and (2)—

(a) shall affect any Police Officer's liability to a criminal prosecution for any offence with which he may be charged; or

(b) ...

26. When any officer passes an order for fining, suspending, reducing, removing or dismissing a Police officer, he shall record such order or cause...together with the reasons therefor...

Provided that no order for reducing, removing or dismissing a Police officer shall be passed without giving him a reasonable opportunity of showing cause against the action proposed to be taken against him..."

Section 27 provides for an appeal against any order passed against a Police officer under s. 25 or the rules or orders thereunder to the State Government itself or to such officer as the State Government may by general or special order specify.

The rules applicable to the plaintiff's case were the rules enacted under the District Police Act and continuing in force at relevant times having regard to the relevant provisions in the above Bombay Police Act, 1951. Parties have found it difficult to furnish to us any clear and complete copy of the rules enacted under the District Police Act. Reference has accordingly been made to the Bombay Police Manual published in 1950 in connection with the rules made under the District Police Act. These are all to be found in Chapter XV beginning with s. 531. The relevant rules, on which reliance has been placed, are to be found by reading ss. 535, 536, 537, 556, 557, and 558 in the above Police Manual.

It requires to be stated that on a reading of the sections in the above Manual, it appears that they include explanations and instructions intended to be borne in mind and are not in the exact language of the rules made under the District Police Act. The relevant parts of the above rules, which need be referred to, are as follows:—

Section 535 mentions the punishments that can be awarded to Police officers including the punishments of reduction in rank, removal from service and dismissal from service. Section 536 confers right of appeal in respect of certain punishments imposed. Under cl. (4) of s. 537, it is provided that "No officer of the District Police below the grade of Inspector can be punished departmentally, except by a Superintendent, a Deputy Inspector-General of Police, the Inspector-General of Police or Government."

It further provides that

"If any District Magistrate considers that a Superintendent of Police has wrongly acquitted or otherwise dealt with such a Police officer in a departmental inquiry, he may, unless the Superintendent voluntarily revises his own order, report the case to the Inspector-General of Police for revision".

Section 556 provides for appeals against the Inspector-General's orders of punishment of Inspectors to the Government. This section also makes provision for appeals against the orders of punishment passed by the Deputy Inspector-General of Police and Superintendent of Police. Under cl. (4) of this section the phrase "subject to the control of the Inspector-General of Police" is explained as intended to mean that the Inspector-General of Police, in the exercise of his inherent power and duty as Head of the Department, possesses the right of revising the departmental proceedings of a Superintendent of Police. Section 557 relates to mode of preferring an appeal. Under cl. (10) of that section it is, inter alia, provided that

"...but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to debar Government from the exercise of any authority or control vested in them under the provisions of the Bombay District Police Act, or from issuing such special orders, as they may deem fit, restricting the exercise of the power of punishment in the case of a particular Police officer".

Section 558 provides for petitions in revision and confers a right on officers who feel aggrieved by the decisions passed by an appellate authority on their appeal. In connection with the petitions for revision and appeals, under cls. (4), (5) and (6) of s. 558, it is provided that "It is improper for a Superintendent of Police to revise his own proceedings after he has received an appeal.... If fresh facts necessitating the enhancement or reduction of punishment are brought to light while a case is under appeal, the Superintendent of Police should inform the appellate authority accordingly."

For enhancing punishment on fresh evidence, it is provided that "it will be necessary to hold fresh proceedings to give the defaulter the opportunity to defend himself."

It is also provided that the procedure to be adopted in connection with fresh proceedings should be decided by the Deputy Inspector-General on the merits of each case. Under cl. (6), it is provided that "it is, however, open to the punishing authority to revise his own or his predecessor's order of punishment when no appeal lies against that punishment, but not otherwise..."

The contention on behalf of the State Government is that it is clear on a reading of the provisions in s. 4 and sub-s. (1) of s. 25 that the State Government has been vested with powers to inflict, inter alia, punishments of dismissals of Police Officers from Government service. In connection with these powers, rules have not been framed at any time. The powers are not controlled except by and under the provisions of arts. 310 and 311 of the Constitution.

It is clear on a reading of cl. (c) of sub-s. (2) of s. 25 and the corresponding provision in s. 29 of the District Police Act that the rules relating to departmental enquiry and punishments all relate to the exercise of powers in that connection by Officers mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 25. Thus, these rules clearly relate to inquiries to be held by the Inspector-General, the Commissioner and the Deputy Inspector-General as also the District Superintendent and other Officers mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 25. These rules do not control in any manner the extremely wide and general power reserved to the State Government for making enquiry into misconduct of Police Officers and imposing punishments against them.

The language of s. 4 is clear and unambiguous. Obviously, under that section, the State Government is vested with power of superintendence over the Police Force throughout the State. Having regard to the clear language of the section, it would not be wrong to hold that as regards each and all the matters pertaining to the Police Force, the State Government has absolute powers to deal with them in the best interests of Police Force as it deems fit. Nothing has been pointed out from the contents of the Act to show that this general power of superintendence vested in the State Government was intended to be curtailed in any manner whatsoever. The contention that the power vested in the State Government under s. 4 appearing under Chapter II was not intended to overlap in connection with matters of discipline of the Police Force provided for under s. 25 appearing under Chap. III of the Act appears to be unwarranted. In fact, the heading of the Chap. II contains the phrase "... control.. of the Police Force". Similar is the position in the heading of Chap. III. Chapter III does not purport to deal with the matter of the power of superintendence that is dealt with under Chap. II. There is nothing in s. 25 to indicate that the power of superintendence conferred under s. 4 on the State Government is in any manner curtailed by reason of the provisions in s. 25 for punishments of members of the subordinate ranks of the Police Force departmentally for neglect of duty and other misconduct. It appears to us that in connection with powers given under sub-s. (2) of s. 25 to various Officers to award punishments against members of subordinate ranks of Police Force, the power of superintendence vested in the State Government under s. 4 of the Act would always be available. Further, by the first part of s. 25, direct power which is not merely of superintendence is conferred on the State Government to award punishment against members of the subordinate ranks of the Police Force departmentally for neglect of duty and other misconduct. Thus, under s. 25, direct authority and power is created in favour of (i) the State Government and also (ii) the Officers mentioned particularly in sub-s. (2) of s. 25. The result of the above contents of ss. 4 and 25 is that in matters of departmental action taken by Officers authorised under sub-s. (2) of s. 25 for punishment of the members of the subordinate ranks, the State Government can at any stage intervene under the power of superintendence reserved to it under s. 4. In those very cases, if it finds it necessary, the State Government can directly for itself proceed to exercise punitive powers and after enquiry inflict necessary punishments. There is, therefore, no substance in the contention that there is nothing in the Act to confer jurisdiction on the State Government to order a further departmental enquiry for punishment of the members of subordinate ranks guilty of misconduct. This power is to be found in ss. 4 and 25. It is true that there is no direct provision in the Act providing for ordering of a further fresh enquiry for punishment of members of Police Force in respect of their misconduct. That, however, does not result into a position that there is no jurisdiction in the authorities mentioned in ss. 4 and 25 to order further fresh enquiry when the facts of a particular case warrant such directions. The question that requires to be answered in this connection is as to whether there is any provision in the Act and/or rules made thereunder to warrant a conclusion that further fresh enquiry cannot be held after a defaulting Police Officer has been exonerated in one or more departmental enquiries from the charges levelled against him. On behalf of the appellant it is not contended that there is such direct provision in the Act. The contention has been that it is principle of fairplay that requires that such a limitation on the powers should be assumed to exist. It is not contended that there are provisions in the Act corresponding to and/or like the provisions in s. 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure (res judicata) or s. 403 of the Criminal Procedure Code (autrefois acquit) or art. 20 of the Constitution. It is, therefore, clear that the appellant is not able to rely upon any statutory contents of the Act and/or rules made thereunder in support of his contention that the State Government was not entitled to order fresh enquiry as it did in this case.

In connection with what we have observed above, support can be derived from the decision of two Division Benches of this Court respectively in *Gabrial Pedroo v. Dy. Commissioner of Police, Division South and Port, Bombay*¹ of 1959, decided by Chainani C. J. and V. S.

1 (1959) Special Civil Application No. 361 Desai J., on August 25, 1959 (Unrep.).

and the case of *Arjunrao Baburao v. State of Bombay*². In the first of these cases, it was contended on behalf of the defaulting Police Officer that under s. 25 the power to punish can be exercised either by the State Government or any Officer authorised by sub-s. (2). Once such power to punish is exercised by any Officer, it was not open to the State Government to exercise the power again or to revise the order made by the Officer concerned. The Court negatived this contention and observed:

"...This argument ignores clause (c) in sub-section (2), which states that the exercise of the power by any of the officers mentioned in clause (a) shall be subject to such orders as the State Government may make".

The Court further observed:

"...Section 4 of the Act also provides that the superintendence of the Police Force throughout the State of Bombay vests in and is exercisable by the State Government...". The ratio of that decision appears to us to be that even in cases where a departmental action is taken by Officers authorised to exercise punitive powers under sub-s. (2) of s. 25, it is permissible for the State Government once again to order further enquiry for the purpose of punishing the defaulting Officers. The reason, according to the Division Bench, was that such power was contemplated by the contents of the first part of s. 25 and also by reason of the powers of superintendence created in favour of the State Government under s. 4.

In the second case, the contention on behalf of the defaulting Police Officer was that since the District Superintendent of Police had acquitted the Police Officer, there was no power in the State Government under the first part of s. 25 to make a finding that the Officer was guilty of the offence and impose on him the punishment of dismissal. In that case, six charges were levelled against the Officer concerned. He was exonerated in the departmental enquiry of the two last charges, being charges Nos. 5 and 6. The State Government not having been satisfied with such exoneration from those charges, ordered further enquiry. The result of that enquiry was that even in respect of the last charge No. 6, the Officer concerned was ultimately found guilty. He was thereupon dismissed from service. The argument advanced was not accepted by the Division Bench. The Division Bench agreed with the ratio of the decision in the previous case and observed (p. 1042):

"...and hold that the mere fact that the District Superintendent of Police had acquitted the appellant would not deprive the State Government of its power under sub-s. (1) of s. 25 to hold him guilty of the offence of having demanded a bribe and impose on him the punishment of dismissal".

It is clear to us that there is no substance in the contention that the State Government was not entitled to make the order of further enquiry and direct that the proceedings be held for investigating into the misconduct of Police Officers concerned once again in respect of the incident that had taken place on September 6/7, 1949.

We have been shown certain reported decisions of different High Courts where in connection with further fresh enquiries in respect of charges whereof Police Officers were first exonerated the Courts came to the conclusion that on principles of justice, equity and good conscience, it was wrong in the absence of provision in the Service Rules in that connection to permit such further departmental enquiries. We find it unnecessary to go into details of those cases. The Courts came to that conclusion in spite of their noticing that there was no provision corresponding to s. 11 of the Code of Civil Procedure or s. 403 of the Code of Criminal Procedure or art. 20 of the Constitution in the relevant statutes. It is sufficient to state that having regard to the provisions in ss. 4 and 25 of the Act, we are unable to accept the ratios of the decisions in those cases as applicable to the facts of this case.

There is no substance in the contention that in the matter of the further enquiry ordered by the State Government, principles of fairplay have not been observed. The letter dated December 31, 1952, exh. 63, addressed by the Secretary to the Government, Home Department, to the District Magistrate Poona, in pursuance whereof the further fresh enquiry was held, has been referred to whilst reciting the facts leading to the institution of the suit. It is clear from the contents of that letter that the R.L.A. had given an opinion as regards the report of the Enquiry Officer in the first enquiry observing that proper results had not been arrived at. It is this opinion of the R.L.A. which had induced the Government to decide that a general departmental enquiry should be held afresh against all the Police Officers concerned. It is, in this connection, relevant to notice that the enquiry was ordered against all Police Officers concerned. The enquiry related to an extremely gross incident of a stranger having been brought in almost unconscious condition to the Cantonment Police Station in the night of September 6, 1949, and the same person having been found near Empress Garden in the jurisdiction of another Police Station in the morning of September 7, 1949. The person died as a result of cerebral haemorrhage consequent upon fracture of skull in the morning of September 7, 1949. Now, in a matter of such incident, obviously, it was permissible for the Government to decide that the offending Police Officers must be brought to book. The result of the previous enquiry proceedings was that no one was brought to book in connection with gross misconduct of which someone or the other was guilty in connection with the above incident. The Government directed that the enquiry should be entrusted to a senior Prant Officer of Poona District. But the decision of the Government to order further fresh enquiry having regard to the above facts cannot be held to be in violation of principles of fairplay. It appears to us that the contention that an Officer exonerated in a departmental enquiry cannot be once again charged with the same misconduct is entirely technical and not warranted by any of the statutory provisions in the Act and/or rules made thereunder.

The next contention made was that the present enquiry was held under procedure prescribed in Appendix II to the Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules. Such departmental enquiry is wholly inapplicable to the enquiries to be held for punishment of defaulting Police Officers under the Bombay Police Act, 1951. The only appropriate procedure for departmental enquiries was contained in the rules made under the District Police Act and continued under the Bombay Police Act, 1951. The contention was that as admittedly the present enquiry was held under the procedure prescribed in Appendix II to the Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules, it was contrary to the provisions of the Bombay Police Act, and was therefore illegal and vitiated. In the result, the punishment was liable to be quashed. In this connection, it requires to be stated that in the case of *Shantaram v. Chudasama*³, the question that arose was that the first preliminary enquiry in connection with misdemeanour of the Police Officer concerned had been held by an Inspector of Police, whilst under the rules made under the Bombay Police Act, 1951, such preliminary enquiry was liable to be held by a Superintendent of Police. The subsequent formal enquiry was held by the Officers prescribed by the rules. Even so, on the mere ground that the preliminary enquiry was held by the Officer who was not prescribed for that purpose by the rules, the Court held that the whole enquiry was vitiated and issued a writ of prohibition to prevent further proceedings in that enquiry. The Court observed (p. 353):

"Now, it is well established that a tribunal though duly constituted may be acting without or in excess of jurisdiction by reason of the absence of some essential preliminary or non-compliance with a condition precedent. The holding of a departmental inquiry by a superintendent of police is a condition precedent, a fact which must exist before the Commissioner of Police can assume jurisdiction or authority for the purpose of passing the final order of dismissal.... This is not, therefore, a case merely of any illegality or error in conducting the departmental inquiry, but a case of acting without or in excess of jurisdiction. It is also clear that in any view of the matter, here is a case in which there is substantial error apparent on the face of the record and this is regarded as an error of jurisdiction....".

On behalf of the appellant, reliance was placed on the above decision and provisions in ss. 545 and 558 in the Police Manual being rules for enquiry prescribed under the District Police Act. Under s. 545, where the defaulting officer is of the rank of Sub-Inspector, the Superintendent himself is the authority directed to hold enquiry as far as possible. Under s. 558, there is a right of petition in revision in favour of all Officers who feel aggrieved by decisions passed by appellate authority on their appeals to submit to the Inspector-General of Police a petition for revision. The contention was that the plaintiff who was sub-Inspector was entitled to have the enquiry proceeding held by the Superintendent himself. The Prant Officer was not the prescribed statutory authority to hold the enquiry. The enquiry held by Caldeira as Prant Officer was contrary to the statutory provisions and without jurisdiction. By reason of Caldeira having held the enquiry proceedings under the Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules, the plaintiff lost the benefit of the right of revision and other rights which might exist in his favour under the rules made under the District Police Act. It is contended that for this reason the plaintiff is entitled to succeed in this appeal and to a finding that the order of dismissal was illegal and void.

It is to be noticed in this connection that it is not contended by Mr. Abhyankar for the State Government that the enquiry has been held in this case under the provisions of the rules made under the District Police Act. Even so, it appears to us that there is no substance in this contention. The reason for this is that the rules made under the District Police Act have been made under the provisions in s. 29 of that Act which are in substance reproduced in and correspond with the provisions in sub-s. (2) of s. 25. It is clear on a reading of sub-s. (3) of s. 29 of the District Police Act and cl. (c) of sub-s. (2) of s. 25 of the Bombay Police Act, 1951, that the statutory rules which have been framed in connection with exercise of punitive powers for punishment of the defaulting members of the Police Force have all been made in connection with the exercise of such powers by Officers mentioned in sub-s. (2) of s. 25 of the 1951 Act and sub-s. (3) of s. 29 of the District Police Act. In other words, the rules which have been enacted relate to departmental enquiries held for exercising punitive powers by the Inspector-General, the Commissioner, the Deputy Inspector-General and other subordinate Officers prescribed by the above two sub-sections. That is the result in the case of the 1951 Act of the provisions in cl. (c) of sub-s. (2) of s. 25 and the last part of sub-s. (3) of s. 29 of the District Police Act. In this last sub-section, the provision is: "The exercise of any power conferred by this sub-section shall be subject always to such rules and orders as may be made by the State Government in that behalf". It is clear, therefore, that the rules relate to the enquiries by the Officers mentioned in sub-s. (3) of s. 29 of the District Police Act. Similar is the effect of the provisions in cl. (c) of sub-s. (2) of s. 25 of the 1951 Act. It appears to us that as regards the exercise of punitive powers by the State Government as the authority mentioned in the first part of sub-s. (1) of s. 25, rules, statutory or otherwise, have not been enacted. Even so, to make the whole enquiry fair, the State Government directed that the instructions regarding the holding of departmental enquiries printed in Appendix II to the Bombay Civil Services Conduct, Discipline and Appeal Rules should be observed. In this very connection the lower Court has made a finding that in fact every protection that the plaintiff was entitled to under the rules framed under the District Police Act has been made available to the plaintiff because of observance of the above rules in the enquiry proceedings. The plaintiff has been afforded clear opportunity to show cause.

The plaintiff was furnished with charge-sheet, statement of allegations against him, concise statements of the evidence of witnesses who were going to be produced in the enquiry and a list of such witnesses. The plaintiff was given opportunity to cross-examine all witnesses. He was further allowed to put forward in defence whatever evidence he desired. Suffice it to state that having regard to the facts as exist, it was not possible for the plaintiff to contend that he had not been afforded a fair opportunity to show cause in the matter of the enquiry held against him. The plaintiff's contention was only technical. As there is no prescribed procedure binding on the State Government in connection with punitive powers exercised by the State Government under the first part of s. 25 of the Act, we are unable to accept the contention made as above on behalf of the appellant.

The next contention made on behalf of the appellant was that in spite of notice to produce that was tendered on it, the State Government failed to produce at the hearing of the suit in the lower Court the whole file of papers relating to the first departmental enquiry. For this default, an adverse inference should be drawn against the State Government to the effect that the first enquiry was properly held and that there was no reason to hold further enquiry.

We have not been able to appreciate this contention. The plaintiff was aware of all that had happened in the first enquiry. If in connection with any of the issues raised before the lower Court, the plaintiff and/or his advocates needed any particular document, the same could have been at appropriate time called for and tendered in evidence. In default of the defendant (State Government) producing such a document, the plaintiff could have made appropriate complaint by written application to the trial Court. We have no doubt that the trial Court would have in that connection passed appropriate orders. We do not also appreciate the contention that the production of such document would have supported the plaintiff's case that there was no necessity in this case to hold further enquiry. In that connection, what we have already observed above can usefully be read over. It is not necessary to reproduce all that once again here. It is sufficient to state that the incident of September 6/7, 1949, was such that the Government was entitled to take the view that all defaulting Officers should be brought to book.

We have dealt with all the contentions made on behalf of the appellant. On behalf of the State Government, it is contended that the decree for Rs. 1,701-5-0 and interest thereon passed by the learned Judge below relates to the plaintiff's claim which was barred by law of limitation. The lower Court was, therefore, in error in granting that decree. The relevant facts in that connection are as follows:—

Admittedly, the sum of Rs. 1,701-5-0 relates to a part of arrears of salary which became due to the plaintiff whilst he was under suspension between October 26, 1949, and January 29, 1951. The plaintiff was reinstated in service on the last date and continued to receive salary until he was dismissed by the order dated January 11, 1954. Thus, the above amount became due to the plaintiff in any event prior to January 29, 1951. The plaintiff demanded the above amount by his letter dated May 2, 1954, exh. 37, i.e. a little before 4 months expired from the date of the order of dismissal. The plaintiff's demand was rejected by the reply dated May 15, 1954, exh. 39. This suit was filed on January 9, 1957. The contention of the State Government is that to the above claim of the plaintiff the provisions in art. 102 in Schedule I to the Indian Limitation Act were applicable. Article 102 provides:—

Description of suit.	Period of Limitation	Time from which Period begins to run.
102 For wages not otherwise expressly provided for by this Schedule.	Three Years.	When the wages accrue due.

The suit for the above arrears according to the State Government was liable to be filed in any event within 3 years from January 29, 1951, i.e. on or before January 29, 1954. The suit was filed about 3 years after the period of limitation expired.

The learned Judge below made a finding that to this claim of the plaintiff, art. 120 in Schedule I to the Indian Limitation Act applied. He, therefore, granted decree in favour of the plaintiff. Now, the learned Judge's finding is contrary to the view taken by the Supreme Court in the case of M. L. Vaikunthe v. The State of Mysore.⁴ The Supreme Court has clearly made a finding in that case that to a claim by an Officer for arrears of salary, allowances, etc., art. 102 of the Limitation Act applies. Following that decision, we are bound to make a finding in this case that the plaintiff's claim for the above sum of Rs. 1,701-5-0 was barred by the law of limitation at the date of the institution of the suit. That claim was liable to be rejected in toto.

The result is that the appeal of the plaintiff, being First Appeal No. 244 of 1959, is dismissed with costs. The State Government's appeal, being First Appeal No. 229 of 1959, is allowed without any order as to costs. The decree of the lower Court dismissing the plaintiff's suit is accordingly confirmed. The decree of the lower Court in favour of the plaintiff in the sum of Rs. 1,701-5-0 and interest thereon is reversed and set aside. The suit of the plaintiff is wholly dismissed.

Orders accordingly.

Before Mr. Justice K. K. Desai and Mr. Justice Palekar.

ANKUSH NARAYAN SHINGATE v. JANABAI RAMA SAWAT.*

Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act (LXXVIII of 1956), Secs. 11 (vi), 12, 14 (1) (2) (3), 5, 6, 7—Widow adopting a son—Whether adoptee adopted son of deceased husband.

Under ss. 11 (vi) and 12 of the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956, the necessary consequence of a widow adopting a son would be that the adoptee would be the adopted son of the deceased husband.

The true effect of these provisions of the Act is that, when either of the spouses adopts a child, all the ties of the child in the family of his or her birth become completely severed, and these are all replaced by those created by the adoption in the adoptive family. This would be so for each and all different purposes. Therefore, the result of adoption by either spouses is that the adoptive child becomes child of both spouses.

ONE Narayan died intestate at village Mardhe in or about the year 1917, living him surviving as his only heirs and next of kin his two widows respectively senior Laxmibai and junior Tanubai (defendant No. 1) and one Janabai (defendant No. 2), daughter of the senior widow Laxmibai. He left certain properties at village Mardhe. The senior widow Laxmibai died intestate in 1948. The plaintiff Ankush's case was that, on or about December 2, 1957, the junior widow Tanubai adopted him who was then a minor of the age of nine years. In connection with the adoption, a deed dated December 2, 1957, was executed and registered. On the same date, a deed of consent was executed by the natural mother of the plaintiff in connection with his adoption by Tanubai. The plaintiff's case was that Tanubai was residing with his natural father. Taking advantage of the absence of the plaintiff's natural father, defendant 2, Janabai, removed Tanubai from the house of the plaintiff's natural father to village Limb by making false representations. Thereafter, Tanubai (the adoptive mother) served the plaintiff with a notice dated December 9, 1957. Plaintiff gave reply dated December 16, 1957, denying the contentions made by Tanubai in the notice dated December 9, 1957, and contended that plaintiff had been duly adopted by Tanubai. Thereafter on December 31, 1957, the plaintiff filed the present suit for relief of possession of all the properties left by Narayan and for mesne profits amounting to Rs. 1,000 per year from the date of the suit till possession, and for costs. The main contention for relief of possession that was made was that, defendant No. 1 Tanubai had taken the plaintiff in adoption on December 2, 1957, after performance of necessary rites of "giving and taking" and performing the necessary homa in the presence of her Bhaubands, relations and other people. The plaintiff's natural father Vithoba had, with the consent of plaintiff's natural mother, given the plaintiff in adoption. A deed of adoption was executed on December 2, 1957, and the same was registered. It was stated by the plaintiff that the adoption was in accordance with and under the old Hindu law and it was also stated :

4 [1962] 1 S.C.J. 134.

*Decided, April 23, 1965. First Appeal No. 194 of 1959, against the decision of M. H.

Shaikh, Civil Judge, Senior Division, at Satara, in Special Civil Suit No. 10 of 1957.

"In this manner, even under the Hindu Law of 1956, the plaintiff is the validly adopted son of deceased Narayan and defendant No. 1 and as such he has become the heir to the entire estate of deceased Narayan."

Defendant No. 1 contended that the allegation of plaintiff that defendant No. 1 had adopted him was false and dishonest. Defendant No. 1 had not adopted the plaintiff with full comprehension and that the adoption had been brought about fraudulently. In that connection, defendant No. 1 Tanubai made certain allegations of facts, namely, that she was aware that she had executed a document and that she did not know properly whether the documents that were prepared were in connection with adoption or something else. She denied that by reason of adoption, the plaintiff became entitled to right of ownership in the properties in suit. She pointed out that the ownership of the suit properties had vested in herself and her co-widow Laxmibai; that even before the plaintiff's adoption, the properties continued to vest in them; and that the plaintiff could not deprive them of the properties on the strength of his adoption. She, therefore, denied that the possession of the suit properties by the defendants was illegal.

The learned Judge raised a number of issues. Issue No. 2 was, whether the plaintiff proves that he is validly adopted son of deceased Narayan and defendant No. 1 under the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956, and therefore succeeds to the estate of deceased Narayan. The trial Judge held that the plaintiff had not been validly adopted son of deceased Narayan and defendant No. 1 Tanubai under the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956, and had, therefore, not succeeded to the estate of deceased Narayan and dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

Sharad Manohar, for U. R. Lalit, for the appellant.

K. B. Sukthankar, for respondents Nos. 1 and 2.

P. S. Joshi, for respondent No. 2.

M. B. Kadam, for respondents Nos. 3 and 4.

K. K. DESAI J. [His Lordship after setting out the facts, proceeded]. The main contention on behalf of the appellant-plaintiff in this appeal is that the learned Judge's approach to the question of the plaintiff having been validly adopted is entirely wrong. The learned Judge has wrongly construed the provisions in the Hindu Adoptions and Maintenance Act, 1956, hereinafter referred to as the Act and based the whole of his judgment on such wrong construction. The learned Judge has, in that connection, placed wrong emphasis on the first part of the statement of facts in para. 4 of the plaint, where, it is stated that, defendant No. 1 took the plaintiff in adoption under the old Hindu law. The learned Judge has proceeded to decide the main issue about the validity of the adoption of the plaintiff in entirely unjustified manner.

The substance of the reasons why the learned Judge held that the plaintiff had not been validly adopted in accordance with the provisions in the Act, may be summarised as follows : Under s. 5 of the Act, adoption (to be made) by a Hindu must be in consonance with the provisions of the Act. Adoption in contravention of the provisions would be void. The result of the general scheme of the Act, and, particularly, the provisions in ss. 5, 6, 7 and 8 is that, from the date the Act came into force a Hindu female can adopt a son or a daughter to herself only; and a widow is not entitled to adopt a son to her deceased husband. The plaintiff's case was that Tanubai had adopted the plaintiff in accordance with the old Hindu law, that is, Tanubai had purported to adopt the plaintiff to her deceased husband Narayan, but the Act did not permit such adoption. The result was that the adoption, if any, by Tanubai of the plaintiff as a son to her deceased husband Narayan, was entirely invalid and void. In that connection, the learned Judge emphasized that, under the Act, the adopted child does not divest any person of any estate vested in him (or her) before the adoption.

It is with some emphasis contended on behalf of the appellant that the above reasoning is contrary to the provisions in the Act. It is necessary in this connection to notice the relevant provisions in the Act. The appellant has, in support of his argument, relied upon the provisions in ss. 11(vi), 12, 14(1) (2) and (3) of the Act. The respondents have relied upon the provisions in ss. 5, 6 and 7 of the Act. Both sides have relied upon the general scheme of the Act. Section 11 relates to "other conditions for a valid adoption". Sub-section (vi) of s. 11 provides—

"the child to be adopted must be actually given and taken in adoption by the parents or guardian concerned or under their authority with intent to transfer the child from the family of its birth to the family of its adoption."

Section 12 provides—

"An adopted child shall be deemed to be the child of his or her adoptive father or mother for all purposes with effect from the date of the adoption and from such date all the ties of the child in the family of his or her birth shall be deemed to be severed and replaced by those created by the adoption in the adoptive family :

Provided that

(a) ...

(b) ...

(c) the adopted child shall not divest any person of any estate which vested in him or her before the adoption."

Section 14, sub-ss. (1), (2), (3) and (4) provide :

14. (1) "Where a Hindu who has a wife living adopts a child, she shall be deemed to be the adoptive mother.

(2) Where an adoption has been made with the consent of more than one wife, the senior-most in marriage among them shall be deemed to be the adoptive mother and the others to be step-mothers.

(3) Where a widower or a bachelor adopts a child, any wife whom he subsequently marries shall be deemed to be the step-mother of the adopted child.

(4) Where a widow or an unmarried woman adopts a child, any husband whom she marries subsequently shall be deemed to be the step-father of the adopted child."

It has appeared to us that the provisions in the above parts of ss. 11, 12 and 14 are of extreme importance for ascertainment of the true intent and purpose of adoption under the Act. Now, it is clear on a reading of the main part of s. 12 and sub-s. (vi) of s. 11 that the effect of adoption under the Act is that it brings about severance of all ties of the child given in adoption in the family of his or her birth. The child altogether ceases to have any ties with family of his birth. Correspondingly, these very ties automatically get replaced by those created by the adoption in the adoptive family. The intention in giving the child in adoption must be to transfer the child from the family of its birth to the family of its adoption. The result is as mentioned in s. 14(1), viz., where a wife is living, adoption by the husband results in the adoption of the child by both these spouses; the child is not only the child of the adoptive father but also of the adoptive mother. In case of there being two wives, the child becomes the adoptive child of the senior-most wife in marriage, the junior wife becoming the step-mother of the adopted child. Even when a widower or a bachelor adopts a child, and he gets married subsequent to the adoption, his wife becomes the step-mother of the adopted child. When a widow or an unmarried woman adopts a child, any husband she marries subsequent to adoption becomes the step-father of the adopted child. The true effect of these sections can be arrived at by emphasizing the phrases "family of its adoption" and/or "adoptive family." We have no doubt that the true construction of the provisions in the above sections is that the adopted child is for all purposes absorbed in the adoptive family with the ties natural to his or her situation as adoptive son or daughter. The obvious result of this position in connection with the adoption by a widow would be that the adopted child will become absorbed in the adoptive family to which the widow belongs. This family would obviously be the family of her deceased husband. When a widow adopts a son, the obvious result of the provisions in ss. 11 and 12 would be that the child adopted is tied with the relationship of sonship with the deceased husband of the widow. The other collateral relations of the husband would be connected with the child through that deceased husband of the widow. In other words, the husband's brother would necessarily be the uncle of the adopted child. The daughter of the adoptive mother (and father) would necessarily be the sister of the adopted son, and, in this way, the adopted son would become a member of the widow's family, with the ties of relationship which all spring from his new relationship with the deceased husband of the widow as his adoptive father. It appears to us that non-inclusion of the provision mentioning the above effect in s. 14 of the Act does not have the effect of avoiding the true consequence of the adoption by a widow in the manner mentioned above. Such non-inclusion cannot have the effect of not making the son adopted by a widow as having no adoptive father at all. We have no doubt that on a widow adopting a son the necessary consequence that arises under the provisions of the Act is that the child would be the adoptive son of the deceased husband. It is for this reason that we find in sub-s. (4) of s. 14 a provision that, where a widow adopts a child and subsequently marries a husband, the husband becomes the "step-father" of the adopted child. It appears to us that, if the learned Judge below had borne this main scheme of the Act in mind, the conclusions that he arrived at would have been different and he would not have found that, under the Act, when a widow adopts a son, the adopted child does not get any relationship with her deceased husband as adoptive father. He would not have held that the adopted son does not become the son of the deceased husband of the widow.

We will now notice the provisions in the other sections of the Act to find out if the learned Judge's finding could be justified. Section 5 provides :

"(1) No adoption shall be made after the commencement of this Act by or to a Hindu except in accordance with the provisions contained in this Chapter (Chap. II), ...".

Section 6 deals with "requisites of a valid adoption", and provides:

"No adoption shall be valid unless—

- (i) the person adopting has the capacity, and also the right, to take in adoption;
- (ii) the person giving in adoption has the capacity to do so;
- (iii) the person adopted is capable of being taken in adoption; and
- (iv) the adoption is made in compliance with the other conditions mentioned in this Chapter."

Sections 7 and 8 relate to the capacity of a male Hindu and a female Hindu to take in adoption. Under s. 7, any male Hindu who is of sound mind and is not a minor has the capacity to take a son or a daughter in adoption. If he is married, he requires consent of his wife in connection with the adoption. A person having more than one wife is required to have consent of all his wives. Under s. 8, any female Hindu, who is of sound mind and not minor is stated to have capacity to take a son or a daughter in adoption. The contents of this section show that all females except a wife have capacity to adopt a son or a daughter. Thus, an unmarried female or a divorcee or a widow is stated to have capacity to take a son or a daughter in adoption. On examining the reasoning contained in the learned Judge's judgment, it appears to us that he has based his findings on the contents of these sections. He has held that s. 8 relating to capacity of a female Hindu to take in adoption shows that the female takes a child in adoption to herself alone. In that connection, he has emphasized that even an unmarried female has been authorized under the Act to take a child in adoption. He has emphasized the phrase "No adoption shall be made... by or to a Hindu" in s. 5(1) of the Act and has come to the conclusion that the language of ss. 5 and 8 indicates that from and after the commencement of the Act, it was not permissible for any widow to take any child in adoption to her husband. The customary Hindu law in that connection, according to the learned

Judge's reasoning, has been entirely abrogated. Under the customary Hindu law, when a widow adopted a son, she adopted the son to her deceased husband who became the adoptive father of the adopted child. This was, according to the learned Judge, not the position under the provisions of the Act. It has appeared to us that the learned Judge has laid wrong emphasis on the phrase "by or to" as contained in sub-s. (1) of s. 5. In our opinion, the true effect of the provisions in sub-s. (vi) of s. 11 and s. 12 of the Act is that, when either of the spouses adopts a child, all the ties of the child in the family of his or her birth become completely severed, and these are all replaced by those created by the adoption in the adoptive family. This would be so for each and all different purposes. Obviously, the result of adoption by either spouses is that the adoptive child becomes child of both the spouses. This is the only possible view which can be taken of the scheme and intent of adoption under the Act in view of the provisions in ss. 11, 12 and 14.

If the contentions made by the respondents are accepted, absurd results must follow. The result of accepting their contention would be that a son adopted by a widow would not be the son of her deceased husband. Even so, it is not contended that he will not become collaterally related, with the husband's collateral relations, such as husband's father, mother, brother, etc. Mr. Sukthankar is not prepared to state that these relations would not become, as a result of the adoption by the widow, grand-mother or grand-father or uncle (as the case may be) of the adopted son. It is not possible for the respondents to contend that the son adopted by the widow will not become coparcener with the other coparceners surviving after the death of her deceased husband. It appears to us that there is nothing in the Act to indicate that the provisions in the Act were intended to abrogate the position which arose under the customary Hindu law as regards the new ties of the adoptive son in the adoptive family in consequence of adoption by a widow. On the contrary, as we have already observed, upon an adoption by a widow, the adopted son's all ties in the family of his birth become completely severed and are replaced by those created by his adoption in the adoptive family (of the widow and her deceased husband). The learned Judge's finding that, under the Act a son adopted by a widow does not become the son of deceased adoptive father is contrary to the provisions of the Act, and is set aside.

[The rest of the judgment is not material to this report]

Appeal allowed.

FULL BENCH.

Before the Hon'ble Mr. H. K. Chainani, Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Tambe and Mr. Justice Abhyankar.

RAJE VYANKATRAO JAGJIWANRAO DESHMUKH v. SITALPRASAD SIVNATH*.

Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act (XXIV of 1951), Secs. 2 (j), 16, 16-A, 16-B—Berar Land Revenue Code, 1928—Absence of notification under s. 2 (j) appointing Revenue Officer to discharge functions under s. 16—Whether Civil Court in absence of such appointment can decide question under s. 16(1).

As no notification is issued by the State Government under s. 2 (j) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, appointing any officer to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under s. 16 of the Act, the Civil Court has jurisdiction to decide the question referred to in s. 16 (1) of the Act.

If a Civil Court is deprived of its jurisdiction, because the Legislature has provided for trial of the matter by a special tribunal, then if the tribunal is not constituted, the provisions made for referring the matter to the tribunal having become ineffective, the aggrieved person has the right to proceed in an ordinary Civil Court and the Civil Court will be competent to decide the matter.

*Decided, June 28, 1965. Letters Patent Appeals Nos. 10 and 11 of 1961.

Paika v. Rajeshwar,¹ Bhima Balu v. Basangouda Nemgouda,² Bharat Chandra v. Gour Chandra,³ Krishna Chandra v. Panchu Ghosh,⁴ Lachmi Chand Suchanti v. Ram Pratap Choudhry,⁵ *Sat Narain v. Hanuman Parshad*⁶ and Balakrishna v. Madras Corporation,⁷ referred to.

ONE Raje Vyankatrao Jagjiwanrao Deshmukh (plaintiff) filed suits against two persons: (1) Ratan Soba in regard to survey No. 17/1 and (2) Sitalprasad Sivnath in respect of Survey No. 23/7, both of mouza Darati. The suits were filed for possession of the fields and eviction on the basis of the plaintiff's title to them. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants in the two suits were trespassers and had taken possession forcibly. The defence in both the suits was that each one of the defendants was a tenant and had acquired protected status by virtue of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951. Both the defendants had also put forward an oral agreement to lease alleged to have been entered into with the plaintiff in the year 1952-53. As an inevitable corollary to this plea of the defendants, they also raised the plea that the Civil Court had no jurisdiction to decide the suit until the question whether they were lessees was decided by the Revenue Officer.

In both the suits, the Courts below concurrently found upon the facts that the defendants in each of the two suits were complete trespassers and that they had forcibly taken possession of the two fields as stated by the plaintiff and that it was in the circumstances not necessary to refer the question to the Revenue Officer under s. 16 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act.

The defendants appealed to the High Court. The appeals were heard by Naik J. who reversed the decision of the lower Courts.†

The plaintiff appealed under the Letters Patent. The appeals came on for hearing before Kotval and Wagle JJ., who referred a question arising out of the appeals to a full bench. Kotval J. delivered the following referring judgment on February 5, 1965.

KOTVAL J. [His Lordship after stating the facts, proceeded.]

Naik J. has reversed the decision of the Courts below relying upon the decision of a Full Bench of this Court in *Paika v. Rajeshwar*¹ and in *Devaji Limbaji v. Ganpatlal*². So far as the latter decision is concerned, we were informed that it has subsequently been reversed on a different point in Letters Patent Appeal No. 12 of 1961, decided on August 9, 1962. So far as that decision is concerned, therefore, we will not refer to it in this order, though the point upon which it proceeded was not reversed.

The decision in Paika v. Rajeshwar undoubtedly takes the view that having regard to the provisions of s. 16(1) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, the moment a defendant to a suit for possession of a field alleges that he is a protected lessee under the Act, that question "arises" and, therefore, the question must be referred to a Revenue Officer, and relying upon that view Naik J. has held that the two Courts below should have referred the question because the two defendants before them had stated that they were protected lessees. It is not on that point however that we propose to make this reference. There was another point raised of considerable importance, which, in our opinion, requires to be dealt with by a larger Bench.

The point arises in this way. The Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, was brought into force by virtue of sub-s. (3) of s. 1 on November 15, 1951. In that Act, as originally enacted, s. 16 provided that "No Civil Court shall entertain any suit instituted to obtain a decision on any matter which a Revenue Officer is by or under this Act, empowered to determine, decide or dispose of."

To that extent no doubt, there was an ouster of the jurisdiction of Civil Courts; but that ouster obviously related to matters expressly mentioned in the Act, such as, for instance, in ss. 8 and 9 thereof, but the question whether a particular person is a lessee or not a lessee, was not a question which under that Act, a Revenue Officer was empowered to determine, decide or dispose of. Therefore, that question continued to be determined by Civil Courts. It was only in 1953 that s. 16, as it now stands, came to be inserted by s. 10 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases (Amendment) Act, 1953 (Act No. XXII of 1953), which came into force on December 28, 1953. The original s. 16 appears to have been re-enacted as s. 16-B but s. 16(1) contains new provisions. It ran as follows :

"Whenever any question arises whether any transaction between a landholder and a person claiming to be his lessee is a lease within the meaning of this Act, such question shall be decided by the Revenue Officer."

Now, this was a completely new provision. For the first time the law barred the jurisdiction of the Civil Court to decide the question whether a party was or was not a lessee. Indeed, sub-s. (1) of s. 16, as amended, says that the question whether any transaction between a landholder and a person claiming to be his lessee is a lease, shall be decided by "the Revenue Officer". We have already noticed the view of the Full Bench on this provision that if the question is merely raised by a defendant in the suit, the Civil Court must refer the matter to "the Revenue Officer". But who is "the Revenue Officer" ?

In order to answer this question, it is necessary to refer to the definition of "Revenue Officer" in s. 2 (j) which runs as follows :

" 'Revenue Officer' in any provision of this Act means such Revenue Officer appointed under the Berar Land Revenue Code, 1928, as the State Government may, by notification, direct to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under that provision."

This definition was always there in the Act since the inception and has not been changed. The "Revenue Officer" in any provision of the Act means in terms, the "Revenue Officer" in the Berar Land Revenue Code, 1928, designated by the State Government to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer "under that provision". Pursuant to this provision, the then State Government also issued on January 29, 1952, a notification No. 364-7273-XII empowering particular Revenue Officers to discharge all functions under the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951. That notification was as follows :

"REVENUE DEPARTMENT"

Nagpur, the 29th January 1952.

No. 364-7273-XII.—In exercise of the powers conferred by clause (j) of section 2 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951 (XXIV of 1951), the State Government are pleased to direct that the Revenue Officers specified in column (1) of the table below shall discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under the provisions of sections specified in the corresponding entries in column (2) thereof :—

By order of the Governor, Madhya Pradesh,
B. L. PANDEY, Secy."

It will be noticed that there is no mention in this notification of the functions under s. 16. The notification issued under the original Act continued and is still continuing inspite of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases (Amendment) Act, 1953, by virtue of which the new s. 16 came to be enacted and the old s. 16 came to be re-enacted as s. 16-B.

Now, the point taken is that in view of the definition of "Revenue Officer" in s. 2(j), there must be an express empowering by the State Government by notification or, at least, a designation of a Revenue Officer to discharge the functions of the Revenue Officer under this particular provision of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, namely, s. 16, and since that has not been done, there is no Tribunal which can try the question directed by sub-s. (1) of s. 16 to be decided by the Revenue Officer. The jurisdiction of the Civil Court, therefore, is not ousted and continues as before.

It is indisputable that the Civil Courts would have jurisdiction to try the issue when raised in a suit before them unless their jurisdiction is expressly or impliedly barred. It has also been the view held that if a provision is made whereby the jurisdiction of the Civil Court is ousted and the matter is to be referred to an Authority or Tribunal and if it be found that there is no such Authority or Tribunal appointed or in existence, the jurisdiction of the Civil Court will continue. That view was taken by a Single Judge of the Calcutta High Court in *Krishna Chandra v. Panchu Ghosh*³ and is supported by the decision of this Court in *Ganesh Mahadev v. The Secretary of State for India*⁴ and Sat Narain v. Hanuman Parshad.⁵ The first and third cases referred to above were cited before the learned Single Judge, but in the view which he took he felt that it was unnecessary for him to consider those authorities. It seems to us reasonable to hold that if a provision of law is made whereby the jurisdiction which always vests in a Civil Court to decide any issue before it is expressly taken away and it is provided that the jurisdiction shall be exercisable only by a particular Officer or Authority to be appointed, in this case the "Revenue Officer", and subsequently no steps are taken to appoint or designate such Officer or Authority, then the provision cannot take effect and the normal jurisdiction of the Civil Court continues. In all suits of a civil nature the Civil Courts have the primary jurisdiction conferred in very general terms by s. 9 of the Code of Civil Procedure, unless that jurisdiction is expressly or impliedly barred by any law. The Civil Courts, therefore, cannot say to a party asking for relief in a suit, that they have no jurisdiction because a special law has indicated some remedy which in fact is wholly ineffective. It seems to us that it is that remedy alone which can bar the jurisdiction of the Civil Court, which is available and effective but that is not the case here for want of designation of a Revenue Officer to try the matter. In the present case by virtue of s. 2 (j) it is clear that a Revenue Officer under the Berar Land Revenue Code must be appointed by notification to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under the particular provision of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act with which it is decided to entrust him and in fact pursuant to s. 2 (j) the then State Government did issue a notification on January 29, 1952, empowering particular Revenue Officers to try matters arising under particular sections of the Act, but not s. 16. It appears that originally it was considered unnecessary to refer the matter arising under s. 16, as it then stood, but that when the amendment was made by s. 10 of the Amending Act No. XXII of 1953 on December 28, 1953, the definition was somehow lost sight of and no notification was issued empowering any Revenue Officer to discharge the functions under s. 16, as amended.

An argument was advanced before us, as it was advanced before the learned Single Judge, that s. 2 (j) does not require any such notification empowering a Revenue Officer to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under any particular provision of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. Mr. Kherdekar emphasised the concluding words of the definition "under that provision" and he pointed out that the word used is "that" to qualify "provision" and not "this". If the latter had been used, he says, it would have applied to the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. But since the word used is "that" it does not imply the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, but the Berar Land Revenue Code, which is also referred to in the definition. In the first place, if by the use of the word "that" before the word "provision" it was intended to refer to the Berar Land Revenue Code, we do not see why the whole provision should have been incorporated at all in the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, for, upon that construction, the meaning of the whole clause would be that a Revenue Officer is one appointed under the Berar Land Revenue Code, 1928, who may be appointed as the State Government may, by notification, direct to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under the Berar Land Revenue Code. Such a provision would make no sense. It would be completely out of place in the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. If that were the intention, it was only necessary to say in the definition that "the Revenue Officer" means a Revenue Officer appointed under the Berar Land Revenue Code, and the subsequent words become completely redundant.

The clue to the interpretation of this clause, in our opinion, is to be found in the opening words thereof, "Revenue Officer in any provision of this Act means". There are several provisions of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act referred to and it was in the contemplation of the Legislature that the functions under different provisions of the Act may be discharged by different officers, high or low, and therefore, in the concluding words the legislative draftsmen used the words "that provision" meaning thereby that particular provision of this Act. It is only on such a construction being placed upon s. 2 (j) that its correct meaning can be brought out.

Thirdly, we cannot help noticing an important fact viz. how the particular State Government which was functioning when the legislation was originally enacted itself construed it. It construed it as we have construed it in the paragraph above and actually issued a notification empowering different Revenue Officers under different sections of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. That is the notification No. 364-7273-XII, dated January 29, 1952, which is expressly a notification issued under cl. (j) of s. 2. The learned Single Judge did not decide this point, but confessed to a feeling of diffidence in interpreting the provisions of s. 2 (j). In our opinion, the provisions of s. 2 (j) are plenary and vitally affect the point raised and so far as its interpretation is concerned, the view we have taken appears to be the only view possible.

We also think that the view which the learned Single Judge took that the point could be decided on general principles under the provisions of the Berar Land Revenue Code cannot be sustained by us, for the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, expressly gives a definition of the word "Revenue Officer" and, in doing so, provides an exclusive dictionary for the interpretation of these words in the rest of the Act. We cannot, therefore, look to any other enactment to interpret those words, nor rely upon general principles. We do not think, therefore, that we can accept the interpretation put upon the words "Revenue Officer" by the learned Single Judge. The view we have taken moreover was also taken by another learned Single Judge of this Court, Mr. Justice Chitale in Pralhad Ganpatrao v. Jayendra Sadashiv.⁶ Mr. Justice Naik distinguished this ruling. We are unable to accept the view of Mr. Justice Naik that "the point was not strenuously urged before him" (Mr. Justice Chitale). It has been actually dealt with by Mr. Justice Chitale.

Thus, upon the interpretation of s. 2 (j) which commends itself to us a rather important question arises which may affect a very large number of cases already decided either by Civil Courts or by Revenue Officers. It may also affect the decision, of this Court in some measure in Paika v. Rajeshwar. In fact, it was, in terms argued before Mr. Justice Naik that if the point taken in these appeals were at all substantial, it would have been raised when the full Bench case was argued and the learned Judge accepted that submission by observing :

"If the argument was really based on sound considerations, I have no doubt in my mind that would have been urged before or at any rate before the Full Bench."

For these reasons, we have decided to refer this question to a larger Bench. We think that the following question will sufficiently bring out the point to be determined:

Whether in view of the fact that no notification under section 2 (j) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, appointing any Revenue Officer to discharge the functions of "the Revenue Officer" under section 16 of that Act has been issued, the Civil Court's jurisdiction in the two suits was ousted?

⁶ (1961) Civil Revision Application No. 161 1961 (Unrep.)
of 1961, decided by Chitale J. on April 19,

The papers be placed before my Lord the Chief Justice for constitution of a Full Bench.

THE question was considered by a full bench comprised of Chainani C. J. and Tambe and Abhyanker JJ.

K. C. Chendke, Mrs. Vasanti Chendke and M. D. Bazi, for the appellant.
S. N. Kherdekar, for the respondent.

CHAINANI C. J. The question referred to the Full Bench as slightly reformulated by us is as under :

Whether in view of the fact that no notification under s. 2 (j) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951 (No. XXIV of 1951) appointing any Revenue Officer to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under s. 16 of that Act has been issued, the Civil Court's jurisdiction to decide the question referred to in sub-s. (1) of this section is ousted ?

The facts of the two suits, which have given rise to this reference, are briefly these : The plaintiff had filed the two suits for obtaining possession of the lands from the defendants and for eviction of the defendants. In each suit, he alleged that the defendant was a trespasser and that he had forcibly taken possession of the land. The defence was that the plaintiff had entered into an oral agreement with each defendant, by which the land had been leased to the defendant, that the defendants had acquired the rights of protected lessees under the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951 (hereinafter referred to as the Act), and that, consequently, the plaintiff had no right to evict them from the lands. It was also contended that the question whether they were protected lessees could only be decided by a Revenue Officer under the Act and that the Civil Court had, therefore, no jurisdiction to decide the suits. Both the trial Court and the First Appellate Court have found that the defendants were trespassers and that they had forcibly entered upon the lands. These Courts also took the view that in the circumstances it was not necessary to refer any question for decision to a Revenue Officer under the Act. Against these decisions, second appeals were filed in this Court. These came up for hearing before a Single Judge of this Court†. It was urged before him that as no Revenue Officer had been appointed to decide questions of the kind referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 16, the Civil Court was competent to decide the two suits. This argument was not accepted, as in the opinion of the learned Judge, even though no notification had been issued by the State Government under s. 2 (j) of the Act, the Deputy Commissioners and Sub-Divisional Officers were competent to decide such questions. He, therefore, reversed the decisions of the lower Courts and directed that, in each suit, the question whether the defendant was a protected lessee should be referred to a Revenue Officer for decision. Against the decisions in these two second appeals, Letters Patent Appeals were filed. The Division Bench, before which these appeals came up for hearing, has referred the question mentioned above for consideration by a Full Bench.

In order to appreciate the arguments, which have been advanced before us, it is necessary to refer to the relevant provisions of the Act. Clause (j) in s. 2 defines the expression "Revenue Officer" in these terms :

"'Revenue Officer' in any provision of this Act means such Revenue Officer appointed under the Berar Land Revenue Code, 1928, as the State Government may, by notification direct to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under that provision;"

In order to be a Revenue Officer within the meaning of any provision of the Act, the officer must, therefore, be a Revenue Officer appointed under the Berar Land Revenue Code. The second thing, which is necessary, is that the State Government should by a notification direct that such officer should discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer "under that provision". A notification has been issued by the State Government under this clause empowering Deputy Commissioners to discharge the functions of Revenue Officers under s. 15 and Deputy Commissioners and Sub-Divisional Officers to discharge the functions of Revenue Officers under ss. 4, 8, and certain other provisions of the Act. This notification was issued in 1952. The present ss. 16 and 16-A were inserted in the Act in 1953. Thereafter the definition seems to have been lost sight of and no notification has so far been issued empowering any officer to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under s. 16 of the Act.

There has been some argument before us as to what the words "that provision" mean. It has been urged by Mr. Kherdekar that these words refer to the Berar Land Revenue Code and that they have no reference to the words "any provision of this Act" in the opening part of the definition. In this connection, our attention has been invited to certain provisions of the Code. Section 3 of the Code states that there shall be the following classes of Revenue Officers :

Deputy Commissioners.

Assistant Commissioners of the first and second grade.

Tahsildars.

Naib-Tahsildars.

The section further provides that the term "Assistant Commissioner" includes "Extra Assistant Commissioner". Section 7 provides that the State Government shall appoint in each district a Deputy Commissioner who shall exercise therein the powers and discharge the duties conferred and imposed on a Deputy Commissioner or a Collector by this law or by any enactment for the time being in force. This section, therefore, provides for the appointment of a Deputy Commissioner in each district. He can, however, exercise only such powers and discharge such duties as are conferred and imposed on him by the Code or by any enactment for the time being in force. Section 7-A provides for the appointment of an Additional Deputy Commissioner. Sub-section (3) of this section states that an Additional Deputy Commissioner shall exercise such powers and discharge such duties conferred and imposed on a Deputy Commissioner or a Collector by this law or by any enactment for the time being in force, as the Deputy Commissioner of the district may direct. Section 8 states that an Assistant Commissioner shall exercise such powers as the State Government may, by notification, direct. Sub-section (2) of s. 9 states that the Tahsildars and the Naib-Tahsildars shall exercise the powers and discharge the duties conferred and imposed upon them by or under this law or any enactment for the time being in force. Section 10 states that the State Government may appoint such other officers and invest them with such powers as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of this law. Section 11 states that an Assistant Commissioner, who is placed in charge of one or more sub-divisions of a district, shall be called a Sub-Divisional Officer and shall exercise such powers of a Deputy Commissioner as the State Government may, by notification, direct. In exercise of the powers conferred on the State Government by ss. 8 and 11, notifications have been issued by the State Government. No notification of the State Government is, however, required in regard to the powers to be exercised and the duties to be discharged by a Deputy Commissioner, Tahsildar or Naib-Tahsildar. Under ss. 7 and 9 these officers can exercise such powers and discharge such duties as are conferred and imposed upon them by the Code or by any law for the time being in force.

If the argument of Mr. Kherdekar that the words "under that provision" in the definition of "Revenue Officer" mean "under the Berar Land Revenue Code" be correct the notification contemplated by this section would be a notification directing a Revenue Officer appointed under the Code to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under the Code. Such a provision would, as rightly pointed out by the Division Bench, convey no sense. The Code provides for the appointment of different classes of Revenue Officers, each of whom exercises certain kinds of powers, but there is no provision in the Code specifying the powers of a Revenue Officer as a Revenue Officer. The Code does not contemplate the investment of any Revenue Officer with the powers of a Revenue Officer as such. The Notifications issued by the State Government under ss. 8 and 11 specify the powers which the Assistant Commissioners and Sub-Divisional Officers may exercise. They have not been directed to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer as such. In our opinion, therefore, the argument of Mr. Kherdekar that the words "that the provision" mean the Land Revenue Code is devoid of any merit.

The definition contained in s. 2 (j) is also clear and unambiguous. A plain reading of it leaves no doubt that the words "that provision" refer to the opening words in the definition "in any provision of this Act." In other words, reference to a Revenue Officer in any provision of the Act is reference to that officer who is directed by the State Government to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under that particular provision. It follows that before a Revenue Officer appointed under the Code can discharge functions under any provisions of the Act, it is necessary that he must be empowered by the State Government to discharge those functions.

Sub-section (1) of s. 16 of the Act states that whenever any question arises whether any transaction between a landholder and a person claiming to be his lessee is a lease within the meaning of this Act, such question shall be decided by the Revenue Officer. In *Paika v. Rajeshwar*¹, a Full Bench of this Court has held that if an issue arises between the parties whether there was a transaction, which resulted in one of the parties becoming a lessee, and the lease is a lease which falls within the Act, then that issue could only be tried by the Revenue Officer and not by the Civil Court. The argument that no officer had been empowered to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under sub-s. (1) of s. 16 was not advanced before the Full Bench. Consequently, the Full Bench did not consider the question, which has now arisen for our consideration. The judgment of the Full Bench proceeds on the assumption that there was a competent Revenue Officer for deciding the question referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 16. According to the decision of the Full Bench, the Civil Court's jurisdiction would, therefore, be ousted, if there is a Revenue Officer within the meaning of s. 2 (j), who can determine the question as is referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 16.

Sections 16-A and 16-B are in the following terms :

"16-A. (1) Whenever any question as is referred to in section 16 arises before a Civil Court in any suit or proceeding, the Court shall, unless such question has already been determined by a Revenue Officer, refer the question to the Revenue Officer for decision and shall stay the suit or proceeding so far as it relates to the decision of such question.

(2) The Civil Court shall accept the decision of the Revenue Officer on the question and decide the suit or proceeding before it accordingly.

16-B. Except as otherwise provided in this Act, no Civil Court shall entertain any suit instituted, or application made, to obtain a decision or order on any matter which a Revenue Officer is by or under this Act, empowered to determine, decide or dispose of."

The effect of these provisions is that the question whether a person is a lessee is to be decided by a Revenue Officer. Before, however, any officer can discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under s. 16, it is necessary that the State Government should issue a notification empowering him to discharge those functions. If such a notification has been issued, and if there is a Revenue Officer competent to decide the question of the kind referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 16, then the jurisdiction of the Civil Court to decide such question will be barred, and under sub-s. (1) of s. 16-A, the Civil Court will have to stay the suit, so far as it relates to the decision of such a question, until that question has been decided. It will be noticed that sub-s. (1) of s. 16-A does not bar the Civil Court from entertaining a suit. What the Civil Court is required to do is to stay the proceeding until the question, as is referred to in s. 16, has been decided by the Revenue Officer.

In the present case, however, no officer has been empowered to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under s. 16. There is, therefore, no Revenue Officer who can decide any question as is referred to in s. 16. In the absence of such an officer, there is no one to whom the Civil Court can refer the question for decision under sub-s. (1) of s. 16-A. The Legislature has, no doubt, provided for a special tribunal to decide the questions as are referred to in s. 16. Having made provision for a special tribunal, the Legislature has deprived the Civil Court of its jurisdiction to decide such questions. But where no such tribunal has been constituted, the special remedy provided is not available and cannot be resorted to. There being no Revenue Officer to whom the Civil Court can refer the question, sub-s. (1) of s. 16-A cannot be given effect to. The Legislature could not possibly have intended that a person should be left without any means of obtaining relief to which he may be lawfully entitled. In such a case, therefore, the Civil Court, before which the suit is proceeding, being unable to obtain a decision from a competent Revenue Officer, is not required to stay the suit. It must proceed to decide the issue itself and give relief and redress to the person aggrieved. This is on the principle that if a Civil Court is deprived of its jurisdiction, because the Legislature has provided for trial of the matter by a special tribunal, then if the tribunal is not constituted, the provisions made for referring the matter to the tribunal having become ineffective, the aggrieved person has the right to proceed in an ordinary Civil Court and the Civil Court will be competent to decide the matter.

The view, which we are taking, is in accordance with the Full Bench decision of this Court in *Bhima Balu v. Basangouda Nemgouda*². That was a case under s. 64 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948. Sub-section (1) of s. 64 of this Act provides that where a landlord intends to sell any land, he shall apply to the Agricultural Lands Tribunal for determining the reasonable price thereof, and that the Tribunal shall thereupon determine the reasonable price of the land in accordance with the provisions of s. 63-A. Sub-section (8) of this section provides that any sale made in contravention of this section shall be invalid. In the case before the Full Bench, a deed of sale was executed on January 6, 1949, after the Act had come into force on December 28, 1948. The notification under s. 67(3) of the Act appointing the Mamlatdar to exercise the powers of the Agricultural Lands Tribunal was issued by the Government on January 18, 1949. It was held that s. 64 of the Act only became effective on January 18, 1949, when the authority to perform the functions of the Tribunal was set up, and that as the sale was effected prior to that date, it did not come within the ambit of s. 64(3) of the Act and that, therefore, the sale was valid. On the same reasoning, sub-s. (1) of s. 16 cannot become effective, until there is a Revenue Officer competent to decide the question as is referred to in this section. If there is no such officer, the question of staying the suit under sub-s. (1) of s. 16-A will not arise.

The same principle has been expressed in *Bharat Chandra v. Gour Chandra*³. In that case, s. 7 of the West Bengal Bargadare Act, 1950, provided for disputes of the kind referred to in sub-s. (1) of s. 7 being decided by a Board established under s. 6 of the Act. Sub-section (2) of s. 9 stated that no Court shall entertain any suit or any proceeding whatsoever in respect of a matter required under sub-s. (1) of s. 7 to be decided by a Board referred to in that sub-section. It was observed that if there was no Board established under the Act, the dispute, even if it came within s. 7(1), could not be said to be one which was required to be decided by a Board: see also *Krishna Chandra v. Panchu Ghosh*⁴.

A similar view has been taken in *Lachmi Chand Suchanti v. Ram Pratap Choudhry*⁵ and *Sat Narain v. Hanuman Parshad*⁶.

Mr. Kherdekar has relied upon the decision of the Madras High Court in *Bala-krishna v. Madras Corporation*⁷. The principle laid down in that case is that where a liability not existing at common law is created by a statute which at the same time gives a special and particular remedy for enforcing it, the remedy provided by the statute must be followed, and it is not competent to the party to pursue his remedy at common law. That principle has no application to the facts of the present case. The right of a landlord to obtain possession from his tenant is a right exercisable by him at common law. The Act imposes restrictions on the exercise of this right and provides for the question whether a person is a tenant being determined by a Revenue Officer. This provision cannot, however, be given effect to because the State Government has not empowered any officer to decide questions of this kind.

We are, accordingly, of the opinion that as no notification has been issued by the State Government under cl. (j) of s. 2 of the Act, appointing any officer to discharge the functions of a Revenue Officer under s. 16 of the Act, the Civil Court has jurisdiction to decide the question whether the defendants were the tenants of the plaintiff.

The reply to the question referred to the Full Bench will, therefore, be in the negative. Both the appeals may be placed before a Division Bench for further orders.

RAMBHAU JAIRAM DHAMANGE v. THE PRESIDENT, VINKAR CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY LTD.*

Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act (Mah. XXIV of 1961), Secs. 91, 92, 93, 95, 163 (1) (b), 146 (m), 2 (4), 65 (2), 71, 75 (3), 165 (2) (xxxi) (xl)—Bombay Co-operative Societies Act (Bom. VII of 1925), Sec. 54—Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), Secs. 2 (j) (s) (k), 18(3), 10—C. P. & Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act (XXIII of 1947), Secs. 22, 23, 54—Dispute between Co-operative society and its employee in regard to change in terms of employment or for reinstatement of employee—Whether such dispute could be decided by Registrar of Co-operative Societies—“Any dispute”, meaning of words in s. 91(1)—Non obstante clause in s. 91 (1), effect of—Section 91 (2) whether enlarges jurisdiction conferred on Registrar by s. 91 (1).

Section 91 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, does not operate as a bar to a dispute between a co-operative society and its employee in regard to a demand for a change in the terms of employment or for reinstatement of the employee, being decided under the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, 1947, or the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947.

The words “any dispute” in s. 91 (1) of the Act must be given a limited meaning and mean any dispute which the Registrar is competent to try and decide.

The non obstante clause in s. 91 (1) of the Act excludes the operation of other laws, which confer jurisdiction on some other Court, authority, or Tribunal to try the disputes mentioned therein. If there is any other law which lays down that a matter, which under s. 91 the Registrar has jurisdiction to decide, may be tried by some other Court, authority or Tribunal, then the application of that law is excluded by the non obstante clause. But this clause does not alter or modify the substantive rights of the parties, nor does it confer any additional powers on the Registrar.

Section 91 (2) only empowers the Registrar to determine a jurisdictional issue; it does not enlarge the jurisdiction conferred on the Registrar by s. 91 (1).

ONE Rambhau Jairam Dhamange (petitioner) was working as a “dye” with the Vinkar Co-operative Society, Limited, Chand, (respondent No. 1), under an agreement of service entered into on November 11, 1961. On March 12, 1962, he was removed from service, but after some litigation he was reinstated under a compromise entered into before the Assistant Commissioner of Labour. Soon after his reinstatement, his services were again terminated by a notice dated November 14, 1962, which was to have effect from December 15, 1962. The petitioner, therefore, applied to the Assistant Commissioner of Labour on April 4, 1963, under s. 16 of the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, 1947, claiming that an inquiry should be made into the termination of his service and his reinstatement and payment of back wages should be ordered.

In answer to that application, the respondent co-operative society raised a preliminary objection that the jurisdiction to decide the dispute did not lie with the Assistant Commissioner of Labour but that the dispute could only be decided by the Registrar of Co-operative Societies who had exclusive jurisdiction in the matter.

The State Industrial Court functioning under the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, 1947, held that the dispute could not go on before the Assistant Commissioner of Labour but that only the Registrar under the Co-operative Societies Act had jurisdiction.

The petitioner applied to the High Court under art. 227 of the Constitution of India for quashing the orders passed by the State Industrial Court and the Assistant Commissioner of Labour.

The application came on for hearing before Kotval and Wagle JJ. who referred the question involved in it to a full bench. Kotval J. delivered the following referring judgment on February 22, 1965.

KOTVAL J. [His Lordship after stating the facts as above, proceeded]. Having heard counsel for both the parties, we find that in this petition not merely a very substantial and important question of law arises affecting the jurisdiction of the two tribunals under the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act and the newly enacted Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, but that it is a question which will affect a vast number of industrial matters and also in turn the functioning of co-operative societies. Therefore, we have decided to refer this question to a larger Bench. We may only set forth the respective contentions and the authorities which were relied upon and state what is prima facie our view in the matter.

On behalf of the society, the contention is founded upon the provisions of the new s. 91 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act. That section makes a radical departure from the analogous provisions of s. 54 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act, 1925, which the new Act repealed. Section 54(1)(a) of the old Act ran as follows :

"54. (1) (a) If any dispute touching the constitution or business of society arises between members or past members of the society or persons claiming through a member or past member or between members or past members or persons so claiming and any officer, agent or servant of the society past or present or between the society or its committee, and any officer, agent, member or servant of the society past or present, it shall be referred to the Registrar for decision by himself or his nominee.

A dispute shall include claims by a society for debts or demand due to it from a member or past member or the heirs or assets of a past member as well as claims by a member or past member or the heirs of a past member for any debts or demands due to him from the society, whether such debts or demands be admitted or not.

Provided that if the question at issue between a society and a claimant, or between different claimants, is one involving complicated questions of law and fact, the Registrar may, if he thinks fit, suspend proceedings in the matter until the question has been tried by a regular suit instituted by one of the parties or by the society. If no such suit is instituted within six months of the Registrar's order suspending proceedings the Registrar shall take action as laid down in paragraph 1 of this section."

Considering the provisions of this section and particularly the expression used therein, "any dispute touching the business of society", this Court interpreted those words in a very wide sense. In a Full Bench decision reported in *Farkhundali v. Poldar*¹ this Court held (p. 986) :

"In regard to the first point, the argument advanced is that the payment of wages or any sum due to an employee cannot be said to relate to the business of a co-operative society. Dealing with the matter apart from authority, it seems to us that there is no substance in this argument.

The nature of business which a society does, is to be ascertained from the objects of the society. But whatever the society does or is necessarily required to do for the purpose of carrying out its objects can be said to be part of its business. The word 'touching' is also very wide and would include any matter which relates to, concerns or affects the business of the society. Every society must necessarily employ some servants for the purpose of carrying on its business. The payment of wages or any sum due to them under law, is, therefore, part of the business of the society. In any case, there can be no doubt that such payment would touch the business of the society."

The Full Bench also referred to the decision of a single Judge of this Court in *G. I. P. Railway Employees Co-operative Bank Ltd. v. Bhikhaji Karanjia*² where Chagla J. (as he then was) observed that in the expression "touching the business of a society" in s. 54, the word "business" was a very wide term and was not synonymous with the objects of a society and that the expression means affecting or relating to the business of a society. It may be noticed that in the Full Bench case, the conflict was between the provisions of the Payment of Wages Act and s. 54 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act. The question was whether the non-payment or the delay in the payment of wages of a person working in a co-operative society was a question which fell to be determined only by the authority under the Payment of Wages Act or by the Registrar under the Co-operative Societies Act. In G.I.P. Railways Employees Co-operative Bank, Ltd. v. Bhikhaji Karanjia the conflict was between the exclusive jurisdiction conferred by the Arbitration Act in the event of an arbitration clause being agreed upon and the jurisdiction of the Registrar under the Co-operative Societies Act. In other words, if there is a term in an agreement between an employee and a co-operative society to refer to arbitration any dispute, who would have the jurisdiction to determine it.

Two other cases were referred to and both of them are of the Kerala High Court : *Malabar Co-operative Central Bank v. State of Kerala*³ and Kerala State Handloom Weavers' Co-operative Society v. State of Kerala.⁴ In those cases we come nearer to the point which falls for determination here. In those cases the competition was between the Industrial Disputes Act and the Madras Co-operative Societies Act in one case and the between the Industrial Disputes Act and the Travancore-Cochin Co-operative Societies Act in the other, and in both the cases the same Judges held that questions falling under industrial disputes, even though they may concern employees of a co-operative society, would not fall within the ambit of the Co-operative Societies Act. In the first-mentioned case the question was touching wage-rates, allowances and fitment, promotion, gratuity and pension, medical aid, recruitment and probation, and retirement. In the second case, the question was touching pay-scales and dearness allowance, bonus, promotion according to seniority, abolition of commission system and restoration of dearness allowance instead and house-rent allowance. All these subjects were held to fall outside the jurisdiction of the Registrar of Co-operative Societies and although they arose between a Co-operative Society and its workmen they were held to be industrial disputes falling exclusively within the jurisdiction of Industrial Courts or tribunals.

In the latter case, the expression "touching the business of a registered society" was commented upon by the Division Bench of the Kerala High Court and the decision of Chagla C. J. in *Majoor Sahakari Bank. v. Majumdar*⁵ was referred to with approval. The view taken in those cases depends not so much upon the provisions of any of the two competing enactments but the view taken is, as mentioned in Majoor Sahakari Bank's case, that the whole purpose and object of these enactments are different and, therefore, the rights and remedies under the one should not be allowed to be affected by the rights and remedies conferred by the other. The argument which found favour with the Kerala High Court was thus put by Chagla C. J. in Majoor Sahakari Bank' case in a passage which was cited with approval by the Kerala High Court.

"...Now, Mr. Rane has very rightly pointed out that the disputes contemplated by s. 54 are disputes of a civil nature which could have been decided by civil Courts but for the provisions with regard to compulsory arbitration provided in s. 54. Mr. Rane has also rightly pointed out that the present dispute between respondent No. 2 and the petitioners could not have been the subject-matter of a reference to arbitration under s. 54. Respondent No. 2 is not claiming to assert any civil rights against the petitioners. What he is claiming is certain rights which are now conferred upon workmen and employees as a result of principles of social justice which are now almost universally acknowledged all the world over. There is no right of re-instatement under civil law which can be enforced by an employee against his employer. No contract of personal service can be specifically enforced by a civil Court, nor does a civil Court determine whether the wages paid to an employee are proper wages or not. Civil Courts are bound down by the law of contract and it is under the law of contract that the civil Courts decide disputes between a master and his servant. Industrial Courts decide the disputes between a master and his servant on principles of social justice and whereas the civil Courts consider what are the actual terms of the contract regulating the rights of master and servant the industrial Courts consider not the terms of the contract but what is just and fair and what is proper for the master to pay to his servant" (p. 1099).

Now, if we had been left with these decisions, perhaps no question of doubt or difficulty would have arisen. But with these decisions there, the Legislature in 1960 completely altered the provisions in this respect when it repealed the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act, 1925, and re-enacted many of its provisions in the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960 (No. XXIV of 1961). It is clear that s. 91 of the new Act is a substantial reproduction of s. 54 of the old Act as it then stood, under which all the previous decisions to which we have referred to were given. It must be assumed that when the Legislature enacted s. 91 of the new Act, it had before it the interpretation given to s. 54 of the old Act; and the important reason behind those interpretations was that the objects and purpose of the two enactments must be considered and, if they are different, then matters like payment of wages and arbitration would not fall within the ambit of s. 54. It is in the light of this position as it subsisted on the date of the new enactment that we must consider the provisions of s. 91. The most important change that has been brought about in s. 91 is the introduction of the vital non-obstante clause at the commencement of the section "Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force." The intention clearly was to exclude all other laws for the time being in force. This is a most powerful argument in favour of the view taken by the Industrial Court and so far as we can see there is no answer to it.

Now, there is no question here of any conflict of legislations or legislative jurisdictions. There is no question also raised in the petition regarding repugnancy such as for instance fell to be determined in the Full Bench case of this Court referred to above. In that case, the conflict was between a Central Act like the Payment of Wages Act, s. 15 and a State legislation (s. 54 of the Bombay Co-operative Societies Act) and the Full Bench resolved it in favour of the Central legislation on the principle of repugnancy. In the present case, however, that conflict is not there, nor, as we have said, upon the face of the petition is any question of repugnancy or conflict of laws raised. Therefore, one has to consider the effect of the non-obstante clause in the light of these circumstances, and so far as we can see there is no escape from the plenary words of that clause.

In order to avoid the impact of the non-obstante clause in sub-s. (1) of s. 91, the first contention raised on behalf of the petitioner was to rely upon two decisions: *Vasant Rao v. Election Commission*⁶ and *Nawab Bahadur v. Rameshchandra*⁷ to urge that the non-obstante clause is not always as wide in its amplitude as its language would indicate and that it should be construed in the light of the object and purpose of the Act and the purposes of the laws which it excludes. No doubt, in the last mentioned case the Court declined to apply the non-obstante clause in the Bengal Money-lenders Act (ss. 30 and 36) in order to exclude the Murshidabad Estate Administration Act; but the Calcutta High Court explained why it was so done. There were very special circumstances there, and the clearest indications to the contrary in the Murshidabad Act. The Murshidabad Estate Administration Act was passed by the Legislature in order to assist one particular individual, namely, the 7 [1949] A.I.R. Cal. 323, at p. 333, paras. 56 to 58.

6 [1953] A.I.R. Nag. 237.

Nawab Bahadur of Murshidabad for certain reasons which do not appear clear upon the judgment, and the very purpose of that Act was to protect the Murshidabad Estate which perhaps was in a very difficult financial state. If under those circumstances the Bengal Money-lenders Act had been applied to the Murshidabad Estate, the effect would virtually have been to undo the provisions of the Murshidabad Estate Administration Act. The very object and purpose of the latter Act would have been defeated. Therefore, the Calcutta High Court held that the non-obstante clause in the Bengal Money-lenders Act would not apply to the Murshidabad Estate at all. Here the principle which seems to have been applied was that if by the application of a non-obstante clause the very purpose and object of another enactment, the provisions of which were to be excluded by the non-obstante clause, would be rendered completely nugatory and of no effect, then the Court in its duty to interpret the law before it would try to so interpret it that another Act was not rendered completely nugatory. These considerations cannot possibly prevail in the present case. The C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act would continue to apply even though its operation to co-operative societies were excluded. So far as the Nagpur case is concerned, all that was pointed out in that case was that it can only apply where there is, in the first instance, a repugnancy or a clash between two pieces of legislation and in that case the Division Bench held that there was in fact no repugnancy or clash between the two provisions and, therefore, the non-obstante clause would continue to apply. That does not advance the argument here urged any further.

As to the effect of a non-obstante clause such as this, the following decisions were relied upon and are useful: Manohar v. Konkan Co-op. Housing Socy.,⁸ *Aswini Kumar v. Arabinda Bose*⁹ and Dominion of India v. Shrinbai.¹⁰ There is nothing in s. 91 or any other provision of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act to suggest that the non-obstante clause deliberately introduced into s. 91 when the law was amended and consolidated in 1961, should be given any limited meaning, nor does there appear anything in the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act suggesting that the provisions of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act are in any way excluded. It is of some significance here to notice that as between the two jurisdictions, the one created by the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act and the other created by the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, the C.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act does not exclude the operation of other laws but the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act in express terms excludes all other laws. This difference, in our opinion, is crucial, particularly when both are State laws.

Then it was urged upon the authority of the decision of the Division Bench in Majoor Sahakari Bank v. Majumdar the relevant passage from which we have already cited above, that since the essential purpose of the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act was radically different from the purpose and object of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, and the Division Bench has, prior to the incorporation of the non-obstante clause, held that the provisions of the law for co-operative societies cannot affect the law relating to industrial disputes, we must upon the same basis construe the present s. 91 and limit the non-obstante clause, and so limiting it, hold that it does not apply to the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act. Now, the decision of the Division Bench in the Majoor Sahakari Bank's case was given as far back as 1955, and we must assume that when the Legislature completely repealed s. 54 of the old Act and replaced it by s. 91 of the new Act, they had in mind the decision of the Division Bench of this Court and took into account the principle which it had laid down. Notwithstanding that principle, the Legislature deliberately introduced into s. 91 the words "Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force." It cannot be, as was urged on behalf of the petitioner, that the Legislature, knowing full well that the principle had already been laid down in the Majoor Sahakari Bank's case that the provisions of the Co-operative Societies Act would not apply to industrial disputes, incorporated this non-obstante clause, thinking that the same principle would continue to apply. On the other hand, it may equally well be that by incorporating this non-obstante clause, the Legislature deliberately wanted to exclude industrial disputes and the provisions relating to the settlement of industrial disputes from the operation of the Co-operative Societies Act. We think that prima facie the latter is the correct inference to be drawn, for we cannot understand a Legislature adding these words and not, at least by way of abundant caution, making a provision that s. 91 will not apply to the settlement of industrial disputes. The wide amplitude of the non-obstante clause and the want of any exception made by the Legislature when already upon the authorities an exception was there before amendment are all indications that perhaps the Legislature intended to exclude industrial law from operating in the co-operation field.

8 [1961] 63 Bom. L.R. 1001.

10 [1954] A.I.R. S.C. 596, para. 10.

9 [1952] A.I.R. S.C. 369.

A consideration of the other provisions of s. 91 reinforces the above conclusion. Sub-section (2) of s. 91 reads as follows :

"When any question arises whether for the purposes of the foregoing sub-section, a matter referred to for decision is a dispute or not, the question shall be considered by the Registrar, whose decision shall be final."

Therefore, it is clear that sub-s. (2) has provided that every question as to whether there exists a dispute or not must be decided by the Registrar and his decision is final. Now, a dispute may not necessarily be a dispute which from its inception falls within the categories of disputes mentioned in sub-s. (1). In fact, anybody may go before the Registrar and raise a question as to any subject and the Registrar would be called upon to decide whether the dispute before him is a dispute to which sub-s. (1) applies. It is quite clear from this provision therefore that initially disputes which may not fall within the ambit of sub-s. (1) would as well come up for decision before the Registrar as disputes which do fall within the ambit of sub-s. (1). If that be so, then it clearly conflicts with the principle of the Majoor Sahakari Bank's case that no industrial dispute would fall within the ambit of the provisions of the Co-operative Societies Act. Here there is a clear provision that even a dispute which may ultimately be found to be purely an industrial dispute must for the purposes of his jurisdiction be decided by the Registrar. How therefore such a provision can be reconciled with the principle of the Majoor Sahakari Bank's case remains to be determined. It seems to us that it can only be resolved by saying that all the provisions of the law relating to the settlement of industrial disputes were excluded.

Next, the provisions of sub-s. (3) of s. 91 also point to the same conclusion. Sub-section (3) says :

"Save as otherwise provided under sub-section (3) of section 93, no Court shall have jurisdiction to entertain any suit or other proceedings in respect of any dispute referred to in sub-section (1)."

Here there is an express ouster of the jurisdiction of Courts in respect of any dispute referred to in sub-s. (1). It is clear that the jurisdiction of Courts is ousted but not of all tribunals, and at any rate the Legislature was alive to the necessity of circumscribing the jurisdiction given to the Registrar and other Courts. Even here, no exception is made in the case of industrial Courts and that again militates against the principle of the Majoor Sahakari Bank's case that matters in the exclusive jurisdiction of industrial tribunals and Courts would not be affected by the laws relating to co-operative societies.

We have just said in one of the paragraphs above that the non-obstante clause in sub-s (1) of s. 91 was added deliberately by the Legislature in spite of the decision in the Majoor Sahakari Bank's case. We may also add here that that very clause was, due to a grammatical error, subsequently amended by the Bombay Act No. XXXIII of 1963. Originally the wording was "Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force", which obviously was bad grammar, and therefore the amending Act had to be passed to make the clause read "Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force". Even at the time of this amendment—and that was in 1963—by which time questions of the comparative jurisdictions of industrial tribunals and Courts vis-a-vis the Co-operative Societies Act must have arisen and must have been actually debated the Legislature did not see it fit to limit the ambit of the non-obstante clause.

We may also refer to the provisions of s. 92 (1). That section lays down periods of limitation and certain rules for the application of periods of limitation, and in doing so, refers to a number of categories of disputes or subjects which are likely to come up before the Registrar for decision. Some of them are mentioned in cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 92 which runs as follows :

“92. (1) Notwithstanding anything contained in the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, but subject to the specific provisions made in this Act, the period of limitation in the case of a dispute referred to the Registrar under the last preceding section shall—

(a)

(b) When the disputes between a society or its committee, and any past committee, any past or present officer, or past or present agent, or past or present servant or the nominee, heir or legal representative of a deceased officer, deceased agent or a deceased servant of the society,.....and when the dispute relates to any act or omission on the part of either party to the dispute, be six years from the date on which the act or omission with reference to which the dispute arose, took place.”
(The italics are ours.)

Therefore, given the pre-requisite condition that a dispute relates to any act or omission on the part of either party to the dispute, a dispute between a past or present servant of a society can be adjudicated upon by the Registrar, and obviously when the words used are “past or present servant of the Society”, no exclusion is made of a dispute which may arise between a co-operative society which would be an industrial establishment and its employee which may be in the nature of an industrial dispute within the meaning of sub-s. (12) of s. 2 of the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act. These are some of the indications which are to be found in the provisions of the new Co-operative Societies Act, which, in our opinion, strongly militate against the principle of the Majoor Sahakari Bank's case and suggest that it was the intention of the Legislature not to allow considerations of industrial law to prevail in the co-operative field or in the implementation of the law for co-operative societies.

Various contentions were advanced as to possible object of the Legislature in making these provisions. It was urged on behalf of the petitioner that having regard to the principles of social justice and the extreme care which Legislatures have taken in the post-Constitution period to protect the interests of industrial workers, the intention of the Legislature could not be to exclude the operation of industrial laws from the co-operative field. But it was urged on behalf of the respondents and it may be equally true that the Legislature considered the co-operative field of every special importance. In view of the necessity to introduce the principle of co-operation even in industrial and agricultural matters and in order to encourage larger production, both industrial and agricultural, from co-operative societies, it may have been that the Legislature intended deliberately to exclude the principles governing the settlement of industrial disputes from the co-operative field and not to allow unions to interfere in co-operative societies—at least for a few years. It seems to us prima facie that considerations like these are equally strong on either side and that under these circumstances the plenary words of the non-obstante clause ought to be allowed to prevail. They were deliberately put in, in spite of the clear previous view of this Court that the provisions of the Co-operative Societies Act cannot be allowed to interfere in industrial matters. If the Legislature had intended to exclude industrial matters from the operation of the Co-operative Societies Act, they would have certainly said so in the Act. On the other hand, if one thing is remarkable about this Act, it is that it is silent in the matter of excluding industrial matter from the purview of the Registrar of Co-operative Societies after providing that the operation of all other laws is excluded in the cooperative field.

It may also be—and that was a view which we merely express here—that all this conflict could well be avoided by adequate notifications made by the State Government under the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act itself and that if industrial disputes arising in co-operative societies come up before the Registrar, the State Government can by an appropriate notification under the provisions of the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act provide that the Registrar shall refer them to a stated class of nominees who may be experts in industrial law or appoint those nominees themselves. The notifications issued at present under the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act are to be found at page 106 of the Madhya Pradesh Labour Manual, volume 1, 1957 edn. and those notifications show that generally all disputes arising in industries were referred to the Labour Commissioner for decision. The entire difficulty could be avoided if the Registrar under the Co-operative Societies Act were directed to refer disputes which could clearly fall under the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act to a nominee who was of the status of a Labour Commissioner or the Labour Court and thereby removing the major difficulties pointed out above in the implementation of the two laws. It was also suggested in the arguments before us that the Registrar himself could decide industrial disputes. While we see the practical difficulty of such a suggestion, prima facie of course there does not appear to be any bar to his doing so.

We think we have said enough to show that the question which we propose to refer to a Full Bench is a question of importance to co-operative societies and of grave import to industrial workers. It is better that in a matter like this, the law should be made certain once and for all and that all doubt as to the implementation of the two Acts should be removed. We, therefore, refer the following question for decision by a Full Bench:

Whether having regard to the circumstances of this case the petitioner's application could have been decided by the Labour Commissioner and by the State Industrial Court in appeal?

The question was considered by a full bench composed of Chainani C.J. and Tambe and Abhyankar JJ.

CHAINANI C. J. The question which has been referred to us for our consideration, as re-drafted by us in consultation with the learned counsel for the parties, is as under :—

Whether s. 91 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, operates as a bar to a dispute between a co-operative society and its employee or employees in regard to a demand for a change in the terms of employment or for reinstatement of the employee, whose services had been terminated, being decided under the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, 1947, or the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947?

The facts in Special Civil Application No. 765 of 1964, which has given rise to this reference, briefly are that the petitioner was employed by respondent No. 1, which is a co-operative society originally registered under the Co-operative Societies Act, 1912. On November 14, 1962, his services were terminated with effect from December 15, 1962. On June 4, 1963, he made an application to the Assistant Commissioner of Labour under sub-s. (2) of s. 16 of the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, 1947, in which he prayed that an order should be made for his reinstatement and for payment to him of back wages. This application was dismissed. The petitioner filed a revision application before the State Industrial Court under sub-s. (5) of s. 16 of the Act. Before the State Industrial Court, an objection was raised that neither the Assistant Commissioner of Labour nor the State Industrial Court had jurisdiction to entertain the application made by the petitioner, as under s. 91 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, only the Registrar of Co-operative Societies or his nominee was competent to decide the dispute between the petitioner and respondent No. 1. This objection was upheld by the State Industrial Court, which held that only the Registrar had jurisdiction in the matter. The State Industrial Court, therefore, dismissed the application made by the petitioner. Thereafter the petitioner filed the special civil application in this Court, which has given rise to this reference.

The parties in two other special civil applications—Special Civil Application No. 161 of 1965 and Special Civil Application No. 443 of 1964 filed in Bombay have been allowed to intervene. The facts of Special Civil Application No. 161 of 1965 are similar to those of Special Civil Application No. 765 of 1964. The petitioner in that application was an employee of respondent No. 3, which is a co-operative society. The petitioner had resigned from his service. Subsequently, he made an application under sub-s. (2) of s. 16 of the O. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act, alleging that he had been forced to resign from service. He prayed that he should be reinstated in service. That application was rejected. A revision application to the State Industrial Court also failed on the same ground that the Court had no jurisdiction in the matter.

The third Special Civil Application No. 443 of 1964 arises out of a reference made by the State Government under s. 10 (2) of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, to the Industrial Tribunal, by which a dispute between the petitioner, which is a co-operative society registered under the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, and its workmen represented by respondent No. 1, was referred for adjudication to the Industrial Tribunal. The dispute related to the demands made by the workers, for higher pay scales, for additional leave benefit, for contributory provident fund, for bonus etc.

In order to determine the question, which arises for our consideration, it is necessary to first consider what an "industrial dispute" means and the nature of reliefs, which the authority adjudicating such dispute can grant. The term "industry" is defined in cl. (j) of s. 2 of the Industrial Disputes Act as meaning any business, trade, undertaking, manufacture or calling of employers and includes any calling, service, employment, handicraft, or industrial occupation or a vocation of workmen. "Workman" is defined in cl. (s) as meaning any person employed in any industry. The remaining part of the definition is not material for our purpose. "Industrial dispute" is defined in cl. (k) as meaning any dispute or difference between employers and employees, or between employers and workmen, or between workmen and workmen, which is connected with the employment or non-employment or the terms of employment or with conditions of labour, of any person. Any dispute raised by employees to alter or better the terms of their employment, is, therefore, an industrial dispute. In order to be an industrial dispute, it is not necessary that the demand must be made or the relief claimed under a contract of employment. An industrial dispute also arises when employees seek higher scales of pay, reduction in hours of work or workload, share in the profits of the concern by way of bonus, or other changes in the terms of their employment or conditions of service, and these demands are not agreed to by the employer. The definition of "industrial dispute" in the O.P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act is wider, but the essential feature of an "industrial dispute" is that it is not restricted to a claim under the contract or agreement of employment.

It is well-settled that an Industrial Tribunal or authority adjudicating an industrial dispute, who may conveniently be referred to as an industrial arbitrator, is, unlike a Civil Court, not fettered by the agreement between the parties. He is required to decide the matter not according to the agreement or contract between the parties but according to what, having regard to all circumstances, he considers to be just and fair. In order that the workers get a proper wage, that they are not victimised or unfairly treated and that their terms of employment generally are such as will secure industrial peace, an industrial arbitrator has the power and the authority to radically modify or alter the agreed terms of employment and to impose new obligations. In a sense, he may make a new contract for the parties. No authority is necessary in support of these propositions, but I will refer to one of them, the decision of the Supreme Court in *Rohitas Industries Ltd. v. Brijnandan Pandey*¹.

At pages 809 and 810, it was observed :

"...There is undoubtedly a distinction between commercial and industrial arbitration. As has been pointed out by Ludwig Teller (Labour Disputes and Collective Bargaining) Vol. 1, page 535 :

'Industrial arbitration may involve the extension of an existing agreement, or the making of a new one, or in general the creation of new obligations or modifications of old ones, while commercial arbitration generally concerns itself with interpretation of existing obligations and disputes relating to existing agreements.'

A Court of law proceeds on the footing that no power exists in the courts to make contracts for people; and the parties must make their own contracts. The Courts reach their limit of power when they enforce contracts which the parties have made. An Industrial Tribunal is not so fettered and may create new obligations or modify contracts in the interests of industrial peace, to protect legitimate trade union activities and to prevent unfair practice or victimisation." An Industrial Tribunal has also jurisdiction to order reinstatement of a dismissed or discharged employee, see *W. I. Assn. v. Industrial Tribunal, Bombay*². In view of s. 21 (b) of the Specific Relief Act, no such relief can be granted by a Civil Court or a private arbitrator, see *Dr. S. B. Dutt v. University of Delhi*³.

I will now refer to the relevant provisions of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960. This Act repealed the earlier Bombay Co-operative Societies Act, 1925, which was previously in force. Sub-section (1) of s. 54 of that Act, in so far as it is material, was in the following terms :—

"54. (1) (a) If any dispute touching the constitution or business of society arises between members or past members of the society or persons claiming through a member or past member or between members or past members or persons so claiming and any officer, agent or servant of the society past or present or between the society or its committee, and any officer, agent, member or servant of the society past or present, it shall be referred to the Registrar for decision by himself or his nominee...

Provided that if the question at issue between a society and a claimant, or between different claimants, is one involving complicated questions of law and fact, the Registrar may, if he thinks fit, suspend proceedings in the matter until the question has been tried by a regular suit instituted by one of the parties or by the society. If no such suit is instituted within six months of the Registrar's order suspending proceedings the Registrar shall take action as laid down in paragraph 1 of this section."

Sub-section (1) of s. 91 of the Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act, 1960, in so far as it is relevant provides that notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force, any dispute touching the...management or business of a society shall be referred by any of the parties to the dispute...to the Registrar, if both the parties thereto are of one or other of the categories of persons specified in cls. (a) to (e) of this sub-section. The material change from s. 54, which has been made in this sub-section, is the addition of the non obstante clause "Notwithstanding anything contained in any other law for the time being in force." Sub-section (2) of s. 91 states that when any question arises whether for the purpose of sub-s. (1), any matter referred to for decision is a dispute or not, the question shall be considered by the Registrar, whose decision shall be final. The Registrar is, therefore, required to decide as a preliminary issue the question whether the dispute is of the kind and between the parties mentioned in sub-s. (1). Unless he finds that the dispute falls within sub-s. (1) of s. 91, he will have no jurisdiction to decide it. This sub-section also gives finality to the decision of the Registrar on this preliminary issue. Sub-section (3) of s. 91 states that save as otherwise provided under sub-s. (3) of s. 93, no Court shall have jurisdiction to entertain any suit or other proceeding in respect of any dispute referred to in sub-s. (1). Clause (b) in sub-s. (1) of s. 163 provides that save as expressly provided in this Act, no Civil or Revenue Court shall have any jurisdiction in respect of any dispute required to be referred to the Registrar, or his nominee, or board of nominees, for decision. This provision bars the jurisdiction of any Civil or Revenue Court, whereas sub-s. (3) of s. 91 ousts the jurisdiction of any Court.

Sub-section (1) of s. 92 prescribes periods of limitation for matters of the kind mentioned in cls. (a) to (d) which are referred to the Registrar. Sub-section. (2) of this section states that the period of limitation in the case of any other disputes except those mentioned in sub-s. (1), which is required to be referred to the Registrar, shall be regulated by the provisions of the Indian Limitation Act, as if the dispute were a suit and the Registrar a Civil Court. This sub-section, therefore, makes the Registrar a Civil Court for the purpose of determining the period of limitation. Sub-section (1) of s. 93 provides that if the Registrar is satisfied that any matter referred to him or brought to his notice, is a dispute within the meaning of s. 91, the Registrar shall, subject to the rules, decide the dispute himself, or refer it for disposal to a nominee, or a board of nominees, appointed by the Registrar. Sub-section (3) of s. 93 provides that notwithstanding anything contained in s. 91, the Registrar may, if he thinks fit, suspend proceedings in regard to any dispute, if the question at issue between a society and a claimant, or between different claimants, is one involving complicated questions of law and fact, until the question has been tried by a regular suit instituted by one of the parties or by the society, and that if any such suit is not instituted within two months from the Registrar's order suspending proceedings, the Registrar shall take action as is provided in sub-s. (1). This sub-section is substantially in the same terms as the proviso to sub-s. (1) of s. 54 of the Act of 1920. If the Registrar finds that the matter referred to him raises complicated questions of law and fact, he may ask the parties to get the dispute resolved in a Civil Court. Section 95 states that when a dispute is referred to arbitration, the Registrar or his nominee, or board of nominees, may, after giving a reasonable opportunity to the parties to be heard, make an award on the dispute.

The words "touching the business of a society" are very wide and include any matter which relates to, concerns or affects the business of the society, see Farkhundali v. Poldar.⁴ A dispute in which the employees of a co-operative society demand a change in their conditions of service or ask for reinstatement of the employees, whose services have been terminated, therefore, touches the business of the society. It would, therefore, in the absence of anything more, fall within sub-s. (1) of s. 91. It has been contended on behalf of the workers that the Registrar or his nominee functions like a Civil Court, that like a Civil Court he is bound by the contract between the parties, that he cannot travel outside the contract and that an industrial dispute is, therefore, not within his jurisdiction. In support of this argument, the decision of this Court in *Majoor Sahakari Bank v. Majumdar*⁵ has been cited. In that case, a workman, who was employed as a watchman by a co-operative society registered under the Co-operative Societies Act, 1925, and doing banking business, had been discharged from service. He then made an application to the Labour Court seeking reinstatement and compensation. A preliminary objection was raised that the provisions of the Bombay Industrial Relations Act, 1947, did not apply and that the dispute could only be decided by the Registrar under s. 54 of the Co-operative Societies Act, 1925. This contention was negatived. Chagla C. J. observed (p. 1099):

"...It is further pointed out that... s. 54 provides for compulsory arbitration when there is a dispute between a society and its employee, ... Mr. Rane has very rightly pointed out that the disputes contemplated by s. 54 are disputes of a civil nature which could have been decided by civil Courts but for the provisions with regard to compulsory arbitration provided in s. 54. Mr. Rane has also rightly pointed out that the present dispute between respondent No. 2 and the petitioners could not have been the subject-matter of a reference to arbitration under s. 54. Respondent No. 2 is not claiming to assert any civil rights against the petitioners. What he is claiming is certain rights which are now conferred upon workmen and employees as a result of principles of social justice which are now almost universally acknowledged all the world over. There is no right of re-instatement under civil law which can be enforced by an employee against his employer. No contract of personal service can be specifically enforced by a civil Court nor does a civil Court determine whether the wages paid to an employee are proper wages or not. Civil Courts are bound down by the law of contract and it is under the law of contract that the Civil Courts decide disputes between a master and his servant."

⁶ (1960) O. C. J. Misc. Application No. 344

of 1959, decided by Tarkunde and Patwardhan JJ., on September 13, 1960 (Unrep.).

another Division Bench of this Court has held that a claim for bonus made by employees of a co-operative society did not come within the ambit of s. 54. Tarkunde J. in his judgment observed :

"The question is whether an industrial dispute which arises from a demand made by employees outside the terms of the contract of their employment, and not based upon any existing statutory obligation or legal liability of the employer, could be regarded as a dispute touching the business of the Society as mentioned in sec. 54. We are of the view that sec. 54 does not comprise such disputes. Normally, the Registrar or his nominee, when a dispute is referred to him under sec. 54, decides that dispute according to the civil rights of the parties. The claim for bonus made by the employees of the society is not a claim arising out of any contract between themselves and the Society, nor is there any statute by which an obligation has been imposed on an employer to pay a particular bonus. Under the ordinary law, a claim like the one made by the Union, being contrary to the terms of the contract between the parties, and not being founded on any statute, would have to be rejected by any Court or Arbitrator dealing with civil disputes. Tribunals set up under the Industrial Disputes Act, however, are entitled, and often required, to go beyond the contractual and statutory rights of the parties for the purpose of the settlement of industrial disputes and the maintenance of industrial peace."

Counsel for the co-operative societies have contended that this position has been substantially altered by the non obstante clause in s. 91. It has been argued that this change was made deliberately, that it was intended to get round the decision in Majoor Sahakari Bank v. Majumdar, and other similar decisions, that the application of the Industrial Disputes Act is, therefore, excluded, that there is no justification for limiting the words "any dispute" in sub-s. (1) of s. 91 and that the Registrar is also competent to adjudicate upon industrial disputes.

There has been some argument in regard to the meaning of the word "law" in the non obstante clause. It has been urged that the word "law" would include every other law including laws affecting substantive rights of parties. There is no force in this argument. The non obstante clause must be read in its context. Sub-section (1) of s. 91 in effect provides that the disputes mentioned therein shall be tried by the Registrar. It, therefore, provides for the forum of trial. The non obstante clause excludes the operation of other laws, which confer jurisdiction on some other Court, authority, or Tribunal to try such disputes. If there is any other law, which lays down that a matter, which under s. 91 the Registrar has jurisdiction to decide, may be tried by some other Court, authority or Tribunal, then the application of that law is excluded by the non obstante clause. But this clause does not alter or modify the substantive rights of the parties, nor does it confer any additional powers on the Registrar.

It has been held in several cases that the jurisdiction conferred by s. 54 of the Act of 1925 was exclusive and that the civil Court could not deal with any matter which under s. 54 had to be referred to the Registrar. What was, therefore, implicit in s. 54 has now been expressly stated in the non obstante clause. It may also be pointed out that the decision in the Majoor Sahakari Bank's case was not based on the ground that s. 54 did not confer exclusive jurisdiction on the Registrar in the matters referred to therein. The ratio of this and other similar decisions is that the Registrar cannot determine an industrial dispute, because like a Civil Court, he is bound by the contract of employment and cannot grant any relief outside the contract. These decisions, therefore, are not affected or got rid of by the addition of the non obstante clause, which only excludes the application of other laws in regard to the forum of trial.

The learned Government Pleader has referred to three propositions laid down by Willes J. in *The Wolverhampton New Water Works Co. v. Hawkesford*⁷, which has been approved by the Supreme Court in *N. P. Ponnuswami v. Returning Officer, Namakka Constituency*⁸ :

"There are three classes of cases in which a liability may be established founded upon statute. One is, where there is a liability existing at common law, and that liability is affirmed by a statute which gives a special and peculiar form of remedy different from the remedy which existed at common law; there, unless the statute contains words which expressly or by necessary implication exclude the common law remedy, the party suing has his election to pursue either that or the statutory remedy. The second class of cases is, where the statute gives the right to sue merely, but provides no particular form of remedy: there, the party can only proceed by action at common law. But there is a third class, viz., where a liability not existing at common law is created by a statute which at the same time gives a special and particular remedy for enforcing it... The remedy provided by the statute must be followed, and it is not competent to the party to pursue the course applicable to cases of the second class. The form given by the statute must be adopted and adhered to."

The learned Government Pleader has contended that the present case falls under the third category of cases mentioned by Willes J. in which a liability not existing at common law is created by a statute, which at the same time gives a special and particular remedy for enforcing it. He has urged that the Industrial Disputes Acts have created new rights in favour of workers and also provided machinery for the adjudication of those rights. Only the Tribunals constituted under these Acts can, therefore, decide the disputes in regard to those rights. If we had come to the conclusion that the Registrar can try industrial disputes and grant appropriate relief, we would have found it difficult to accept this argument, in view of the non obstante clause, the word "law" in which would also include the Industrial Disputes Acts.

It has been argued that as a dispute between a cooperative society and its employees touches the business of the society and, therefore, falls under s. 91 (1), every such dispute must first be referred to the Registrar and his decision obtained under sub-s. (2) of s. 91 and that it is only if the Registrar decides that it is not a dispute within s. 91, that any other Tribunal will have jurisdiction to decide it. Sub-section (2) of s. 91, however, only empowers the Registrar to determine a jurisdictional issue. It does not enlarge the jurisdiction conferred on the Registrar by sub-s. (1). If, therefore, the other provisions of the Act indicate that some industrial disputes do not come within the ambit of sub-s. (1) of s. 91, such matters need not be referred to the Registrar, either under sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2). In any case, this provision does not furnish any assistance in deciding the question whether an industrial dispute arising out of a demand made by employees outside the terms of their employment can be tried by the Registrar.

An indication of the nature of disputes which the Registrar can determine is furnished by sub-s. (3) of s. 93 of the Act. This sub-section empowers the Registrar to stay the proceedings before him and to ask the parties to approach a civil Court by a regular suit for deciding the dispute between them. A party can be asked to go to a civil Court only if the dispute is one which can be decided by a civil Court. The matter referred to the Registrar must, therefore, be necessarily such in which a civil suit can lie, but for the special provision contained in s. 91. It is, therefore, clear that the dispute covered by s. 91 must be one which is capable of being tried by a civil Court. This conclusion also finds support in cl. (b) of sub-s. (1) of s. 163 which ousts the jurisdiction of the civil Court in respect of any dispute which is required to be referred to the Registrar. A civil Court cannot try an industrial dispute, in which a relief is claimed outside the terms of employment. It follows, therefore, that the Registrar cannot also try such a dispute.

The matter may be looked at from another point of view, that is, by considering the nature of relief which the Registrar can grant in a matter referred to him. There is no provision in the Co-operative Societies Act investing the Registrar with the power to decide the matter otherwise than in accordance with the ordinary civil rights of the parties. Under sub-s. (1) of s. 93, the Registrar is given the power to decide a dispute himself or refer it to a nominee or a board of nominees, if he finds that the matter referred to him is a dispute within the meaning of s. 91. Section 96 empowers the Registrar to make an award. Clause (m) in s. 146 states that it shall be an offence if any officer or a member of a society wilfully fails to comply with any decision, award or order passed under s. 93. It has, therefore, been contended that the power conferred on the Registrar to decide the dispute and to make an award necessarily includes the power to grant such relief as the circumstances of the case may require. In the absence of any provision in the Act conferring any such power on the Registrar, the Registrar cannot, however, decide the matter referred to him except according to the ordinary law applicable to that matter. To any dispute between a society and its workmen, the Registrar must, therefore, apply the ordinary law of master and servant, which does not recognise a right in an employee to continue in service if his employer does not want him. Similarly, the Registrar cannot go outside the terms of employment and change or alter the conditions of service. He can enforce the contract between the parties but he cannot impose any new obligations. As he cannot grant such a relief, it follows that he cannot try an industrial dispute to which demands, not covered by the contract of employment, are made.

Our attention has been invited to some other provisions of the Co-operative Societies Act to which I will now refer. Clause (4) in s. 2 contains a definition of the word "bonus". Sub-section (2) of s. 65 states that a society may appropriate its profits to the payment of bonus on the basis of support received from members and persons who are not members to its business. Section 71 authorises a society to establish for its employees a provident fund. Sub-section (3) of s. 75 states that there shall be attached to every balance sheet laid before the society in the general meeting a report by its committee with respect to the amounts, if any, which it recommends, shall be paid by way of bonus. Clause (xxxi) in sub-s. (2) of s. 165 states that the State Government may make rules prescribing the conditions under which profits may be distributed as bonus among the members and non-members of the society. Clause (xl) authorises the making of the rules prescribing the qualifications for employees of the society and the conditions of service subject to which persons may be employed by societies. These provisions only show that a society may establish a provident fund or pay bonus to its employees and that rules may be made in regard to their conditions of service. They have no bearing on the question whether an industrial dispute can be decided by the Registrar. The preamble of the Act to which a reference was made during the course of the argument is also not of any assistance in deciding this question.

In Farkhundali v. Potdar, this Court was inclined to take the view that a claim for retrenchment compensation can be entertained by the Registrar. A contract between an employer and his employees can be modified by law. The Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, imposes a liability on an employer to pay retrenchment compensation to his employees. This is, therefore, one of the terms inserted by law in the contract of employment. A claim for retrenchment compensation can, therefore, also be said to be a claim under the contract of employment, and can consequently be tried by the Registrar. This authority cannot, therefore, be relied upon in support of the argument that the Registrar can decide every industrial dispute.

Sub-section (3) of s. 19 of the Industrial Disputes Act prescribes that the award of a Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, which has become enforceable, shall be binding on—

- (a) all parties to the industrial dispute;
- (b) all other parties summoned to appear in the proceedings as parties to the dispute, unless the Board, arbitrator, Labour Court, Tribunal or National Tribunal, as the case may be, records the opinion, that they were so summoned without proper cause;
- (c) where a party referred to in clause (a) or clause (b) is an employer, his heirs, successors or assigns in respect of the establishment to which the dispute relates;
- (d) where a party referred to in clause (a) or clause (b) is composed of workmen, all persons who were employed in the establishment or part of the establishment, as the case may be, to which the dispute relates on the date of the dispute and all persons who subsequently become employed in that establishment or part.

Under cl. (d) an award made under this Act, therefore, binds not only the parties to the dispute but all workmen employed in the establishment. Similar provisions are contained in ss. 22, 23 and 54 of the C. P. and Berar Industrial Disputes Settlement Act. Other Industrial Disputes Act also contain similar provisions. There is no similar provision in the Co-operative Societies Act. These provisions have been made evidently in order to prevent frequent industrial disputes, to encourage collective bargaining and to secure industrial peace. As there is no similar provision in the Co-operative Societies Act, it is unlikely that the Legislature intended that the industrial disputes should be tried by the Registrar.

Under s. 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act, Government may refer an industrial dispute to an Industrial Tribunal for adjudication. Such a reference may be made in order to secure industrial peace, even when the contesting parties are unwilling to apply for such a reference. Under s. 91 of the Co-operative Societies Act, the Registrar, however, gets jurisdiction if he is approached by a party to the dispute. A difficulty may, therefore, arise if after Government have made a reference, one of the parties applies to the Registrar under s. 91. This difficulty will be eliminated in the view which we are inclined to take.

The Punjab and Kerala High Courts have taken the same view. In *Jullundur T. C. Society v. Punjab State*⁹, it was held that an industrial dispute between a co-operative society registered under the Punjab Co-operative Societies Act, and its workmen can be referred to an Industrial Tribunal set up under the Industrial Disputes Act. Section 50 (1) of the Punjab Co-operative Societies Act was substantially in the same terms as s. 54 (1) of the Bombay Act of 1925. It contained a proviso almost in the same terms as sub-s. (3) of s. 93 of the present Maharashtra Co-operative Societies Act. At page 35, the learned Judges observed that the dispute contemplated by s. 50 were not intended by the Legislature to cover all kinds of disputes and this provision was not meant to be all embracing as was contended by the learned counsel. It was further observed that a reading of sub-s. (1) of s. 50 clearly showed that though the words "touching the constitution or business of the society" were unqualified and extremely wide and comprehensive, still the Legislature did not intend to include in this expression "industrial disputes" for the adjudication of which the Parliament had enacted the Industrial Disputes Act. The learned Judges then referred to the proviso and observed (p. 36) :

"...Indeed this proviso supplies a key to the intention of the Legislature and it almost conclusively suggests that it is only such disputes as are capable of being tried by a regular suit which are covered by the provisions of S. 50.

It has not been suggested by the learned counsel for the petitioner (and it could not be suggested) that an industrial dispute as defined in the Industrial Disputes Act is capable of being tried by a regular suit."

In *Kerala State Handloom Weavers' Co-operative Society v. State of Kerala*¹⁰, the Kerala High Court has held that the provisions of s. 60 (1) of the Travancore-Cochin Co-operative Societies Act, 1951, did not preclude a reference to adjudication under s. 10 of the Industrial Disputes Act of the industrial disputes between a co-operative society and its workmen. At page 561 was observed :

"The question in cases like this is not whether the dispute referred for adjudication touches the business of a co-operative society; the question really is whether that dispute comes within the category of disputes covered by section 50 (1) of the Travancore-Cochin Co-operative Societies Act, 1951. The purpose of Chapter XIII of the Travancore-Cochin Co-operative Societies Act, 1951—the chapter in which section 60 (1) occurs—is not to resolve all controversies touching the business of co-operative societies under the provisions of that chapter; but resolve only such controversies as can be resolved in an ordinary Court of law. In other words, the arbitration provided by Chapter XIII is an alternative to the normal processes of the ordinary Courts and not to the extraordinary process of adjudication under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, which has been designed to deal with controversies which by their very nature are outside the purview of ordinary litigation."

The position, therefore, is that the dispute referred to the Registrar under sub-s. (1) of s. 91 must be such as a civil Court can take cognizance of and try. Like a civil Court, the Registrar cannot grant any relief outside the contract of employment. He cannot, therefore, try any matter in which a demand is made for a change in the conditions of service or for reinstatement of an employee whose services had been terminated. By and large, the Co-operative Societies Act and the Industrial Disputes Act provide for the settlement of different classes of disputes. Even though, therefore, the words "any dispute" in sub-s. (1) of s. 91 are very wide, they will have to be given a limited meaning, for the reasons which I have given above. These words mean any dispute which the Registrar is competent to try and decide.

Our reply to the question referred to the Full Bench will, therefore, be in the negative. The matters may now be placed before a Division Bench for further orders.

Answer accordingly.

KAZI FAIZUDDIN v. KASHINATH DADA DHANGAR.*

Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act (Hyd. VIII of 1955), Sec. 1(2)—Land granted as inam for performance of Kazat—Whether such inam excluded under s. 1(2).

Land granted as inam for the performance of services of Kazat i.e. the functions or office of a Kazi, is not a grant to any institution or for the benefit of any institution and is, therefore, not excluded from the application of s. 1(2) of the Hyderabad Abolition of Inams and Cash Grants Act, 1954.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

A. V. Savant for R. W. Adik, for opponent No. 1.

V. S. Deshpande, Assistant Government Pleader, for opponent No. 2.

CHHAINANI C. J. The petitioner was the holder of an inam land, which had been granted as inam for the performance of services of Kazat. An inquiry was held by the Deputy Collector as to whether this inam was abolished by the Hyderabad Abolition of Inam and Cash Grants Act, 1954. It was urged on behalf of the petitioner that the land was held in inam for the benefit of a religious institution, viz., Kazat, and that the Act did not apply to it, as sub-s. (2) of s. 1 of the Act excludes from its application inams held by or for the benefit of charitable and religious institutions. This contention was not accepted by the Deputy Collector. He was of the opinion that the Kazat is not religious institution but that it is a community service. He, therefore, held that the inam had been abolished and that the inam land vested in the State with effect from July 1, 1960. This order was confirmed in appeal by the State Government.

The Muntakhab shows that the inam had been granted for performing the services of "Kazat". According to Blatt's Urdu English Dictionary, "Kazat" means "the functions or office of a Kazi". Some of the functions of a Kazi are officiating at marriages, keeping marriage records, attesting divorce deeds, etc. It is not in dispute that these services were not required to be performed in any particular place or in any mosque, dargha or other institution. They could be performed at any place where they were required. The grant was not, therefore, to any institution or for the benefit of any institution. It was made to an individual as remuneration for certain services to be rendered to the community. The fact that the services to be performed were of a religious nature would not make it a grant for the benefit of a religious institution. The inam was, therefore, a community service inam, as held by the Deputy Collector.

This view is in accordance with that taken by us in Shaikh Omar v. Mohammadji¹.

The orders passed by the Deputy Collector and by the State Government are consequently correct.

MAHARASHTRA SUGAR MILLS LTD. v. ASHRU JAIWANT TRIBHUVAN.*

Workmen's Compensation Act (VIII of 1923), Secs. 2(m), 4, 5—Industrial Disputes Act (XIV of 1947), Sec. 2(rr)—Bonus whether included in "wages" in s. 2(m) of Act VIII of 1923.

Bonus forms part of "wages" as defined in s. 2(m) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923.

Godavari Sugar Mills Ltd. v. Shakuntala,¹ explained.

Meenakshi Mills Ltd. v. Their Workmen,² Skailes v. Blue Anchor Line Limited,³ *Jivan Lal v. Ramtaji Bhaiji*⁴ and *Ohitru Tanti v. Tata Iron and Steel Co.*⁵, referred to.

THE facts in the First Appeal No. 297 of 1964 were that one Ashru (respondent) was employed by the Maharashtra Sugar Mills Ltd. (appellant) as a labourer. An accident occurred on September 25, 1962, in the course of the respondent's employment. As a result of this accident, the respondent suffered a simple fracture of the right and left calcaneum bones of the feet. This injury, even after recovery, made him practically unfit to do the work which he was accustomed to do. He, therefore, made an application for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act in respect of this injury. The Civil Surgeon who examined him on May 8, 1963, issued a certificate where he described the injuries as simple fractures of the right and left calcaneum, and the doctor gave evidence to suggest that the disability was a permanent partial disability only to the extent of 10 per cent. The Commissioner held that the disability was 90 per cent. and awarded compensation on that basis.

The facts in First Appeal No. 298 of 1964 were that one Sonawane (respondent) was employed by the appellant also as a labourer. The accident occurred on November 5, 1962. He suffered injuries in the course of the employment, as a result of which both the middle and index fingers of his left hand were rendered useless even though some stubs were left. The percentage of disablement was 18. The Commissioner ordered compensation accordingly.

In both these cases, in calculating the quantum of compensation, the Commissioner included in the wages of the workmen the bonus which was earned in the prior year and calculated the compensation in accordance with the figures arrived at by inclusion of the same. In the first case, on this basis, the Commissioner awarded a sum of Rs. 2,585 and in the second case he awarded a sum of Rs. 641.

The appellant appealed

B. A. Pandya, for the appellant.

D. S. Nargolkar, for the respondents.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after setting out the facts, proceeded.] The first contention that is raised by Mr. Pandya is that the learned Commissioner was in error when he included bonus in the wages while calculating the amount of compensation to be paid to the workmen. He relies upon *Seodutt Singh v. Ali Mahammad*¹ in support of his contention. In this case the learned Judge held that as bonus is not deferred wages and is a cash payment in addition to wages as ruled by our Supreme Court, it is not a part of the wage at all. He referred to the observations of the Supreme Court in *Muir Mills Co. v. Suti Mills Mazdoor Union*² and *Meenakshi Mills Ltd. v. Their Workmen*³, to which we will presently refer. It is sufficient at this stage to say that in these two cases the claim for bonus was made under the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947, which by its very definition in s. 2 excludes bonus from the definition of wages.

The question as to whether bonus should be included in the wages for this purpose depends essentially upon the definitions given in the Workmen's Compensation Act itself. Section 4 provides the manner of determining compensation payable to workmen in the stated cases. Clause (a) deals with compensation payable in case of death and is fixed on the basis of monthly wages earned by a workman. Clause (b) relates to permanent total disablement by reason of the injury, and this also is based on the monthly wages and is to be determined in accordance with the Schedule given in the Act. Clause (c) deals with permanent partial disablement and prescribes a certain percentage in cases of certain specified injuries mentioned in the Schedule, as being the percentage of the loss of earning capacity caused by the disablement. The second part of that clause relates to injuries not specified in Schedule I and again refers to the loss of earning capacity permanently caused by the injury. It is no doubt true that monthly wages have been referred to in cls. (a) and (b), but there is no doubt that what was intended to be laid down was the fixing of compensation on the basis of the earning or the loss of the earning capacity of the workman. It seems that this was the reason why the word "wages" has been defined in the manner in which it has been done by s. 2, cl. (m). It says :

"wages" includes any privilege or benefit which is capable of being estimated in money, other than a travelling allowance or the value of any travelling concession or a contribution paid by the employer of a workmen towards any pension or provident fund or a sum paid to a workman to cover any special expenses entailed on him by the nature of his employment."

The first thing that must be noticed in connection with this definition is that it does not actually purport to limit the meaning of the word "wages". It merely seeks to include what ordinarily may not be included in the concept of wages and leaves the meaning at large. What is included, however, gives a clue to what was actually intended to be conveyed by the word "wages". It is true that, in its ordinary significance, the word "bonus" would merely mean a gratuitous payment made by the employer to his employee as a matter of pleasure. And, if that were so, it is possible to argue that the bonus that is paid to an employee by his employer ought not to be included in wages.

In industrial employment, however, bonus can no longer be regarded as merely a gratuitous payment by the employer. In this connection, we may refer to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Meenakshi Mills Ltd. v. Their Workmen, where the nature of bonus is considered by the Supreme Court. Mr. Justice Gajendragadkar speaking for the Court says (p. 156) :

"The true nature and character of the workmen's claim for bonus against their employers is now well settled. Bonus is not, as its etymological meaning would suggest, a mere matter of bounty gratuitously made by the employer to his employees; nor is it a matter of deferred wages.... the term 'bonus' is applied to a cash payment made in addition to wages. It generally represents the cash incentive given conditionally on certain standards of attendance and efficiency being attained."

The Court then lays down certain formulae for calculation of bonus payable by the employers. The observations in this case would suggest that the claim for bonus is a matter of right of the workman, and it is not dependent upon the willingness or otherwise of the employer to pay the same. If it is a matter of right, then we do not see why it is not a "benefit" within cl. (m) of s. 2 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. While construing these words, we must bear the purpose for enacting this provision in mind. Evidently, it was intended as a provision for workmen who suffered employment injuries and who would be rendered without any means of sustenance if they could not make the same earnings as before or fell completely out of employment. Even if it was a matter of some doubt, we would have been bound to construe the words liberally in order to advance the purpose of the Act. The word "benefit" must be construed to mean all such benefits as a workman is entitled to have as of right.

That "bonus" can be included in wages is clearly demonstrated by the definition of "wages" in cl. (rr) of s. 2 of the Industrial Disputes Act, 1947. It defines "wages" to mean all remuneration capable of being expressed in terms of money... and includes... but does not include (a) any bonus, (b) any contribution paid or payable by the employer to any pension or provident fund... (c) any gratuity payable on the termination of his service. In the scheme of that Act, the last three could not be included within the meaning of "wages". It only illustrates that the word "wages" can have a very wide significance and can include bonus.

Mr. Pandya relied particularly on the observations in Meenakshi Mill's case to the effect that "bonus" represents the cash incentive conditional on certain standards of attendance and efficiency being attained. Mr. Pandya argued that after all it is a contingent payment and, therefore, never a certainty and cannot, therefore, be regarded as a benefit available to the employee. He also contended that the payment of bonus must depend upon the profits made by the employer, and it is possible that when in a given year no profit is made there would be no bonus. It is said, therefore, that even if it can be regarded as "benefit" it yet cannot be said that it is capable of being estimated in money.

In this connection, we must observe that bonus is paid in most cases to-day on the collective efficiency of the employees as a whole, and it is not dependent upon the efficiency of any individual employee. Even apart from this, merely because, to some extent, it may depend upon the efficiency of a particular employee and may also depend upon the employer making some profit, it is impossible to sustain the contention that it is not a benefit which is capable of being estimated in money. Even the future earnings of an individual are difficult of being estimated exactly, because his being able to work continuously would be a matter of assumption. Section 5 of the Act has provided a method for the calculation of wages, and the principle would apply to the earning of bonus. It is well-known that in trades and industries over and above the fixed wages an employee or agent is paid commission on sales and the employer cannot suggest that the commission is not part of the earning of the employee or agent.

In this connection, Mr. Nargolkar referred us to a decision in *Skales v. Blue Anchor Line, Limited*⁴, where the word "remuneration" used in s. 13 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, came to be construed. While answering the contention similar to the present on behalf of the employee in that case, Cozens-Hardy, M. R., said (p. 364) :

"...I am unable to follow this. Nothing is more common than that remuneration should vary according as the gross takings or the net profits of a business do or do not exceed a certain figure."

Lord Justice Farwell observed (p. 375) :

"...Agreed additional remuneration contingent on a quick passage, or on a dividend exceed ing 5 per cent., would clearly fall within the word 'remuneration' in the Act, although the quickness or the increased dividend depended on luck and were independent of the employee's own conduct."

Mr. Pandya relied on a decision of this Court in *Godavari Sugar Mills, Ltd. v. Shakuntala*⁵, where he says the Court held that bonus would not be included within "wages". The question that fell for consideration in that case was whether dearness allowance formed part of wages for the purpose of computing compensation. The Court observed (p. 792) :

"...But, in our opinion, the dearness allowance must clearly be included. It is in no sense a bonus, but it is something which attaches continuously to the wages in order to enhance it, so as to be on a more comparative basis with the cost of living."

The case was decided in 1947, and it is hardly likely that the word 'bonus' has been used by the learned Judges in the technical sense which it has now acquired. In any event, that question was not before the learned Judges, and, therefore, it cannot be treated as a decision on the point. On the other hand, in the decisions in *Jivan Lal v. Ramtaji Bhairji*⁶ and *Chitru Tanti v. Tata Iron and Steel Co.*⁷, the learned Judges have taken the view that bonus paid to an employee must be regarded as wages. It is true that in both these cases, there was an agreement to pay bonus, but inasmuch as the bonus is payable whether or not there is an agreement, its existence would not make any difference in principle.

It was also argued that when the Act of 1923 was framed, it is hardly likely—having regard to the nature of the then concept of bonus—to include bonus within the word "wages", and the Court should not now construe the word in such a way

4 [1911] 1 K.B. 360.

5 (1947) 49 Bom. L.R. 791.

6 [1945] A.I.R. Bom. 119, s.c. 46 Bom.

as to include bonus. In the first place, even assuming that the concept of bonus was what Mr. Pandya contends it was under the old civil law, we are bound to give a reasonable meaning to the words used in the statute and include within wages every benefit which is available to the workman, to which he is entitled as a matter of right, by reason of his employment. Having regard to the decision of the Supreme Court, we cannot but say that bonus must form part of the wages as defined by the Act. We are also not impressed by the argument that if we include bonus in the wages payable to the workman, it may be that some workmen may fall outside the category of workmen entitled to compensation in the case of accidents and deaths, because the remuneration would be more than the defined limits. Some inconvenience that may be caused in a rare set of circumstances cannot deter us from giving the section its proper meaning, and the only meaning which is capable of being attached to it. In our view, therefore, the learned Commissioner was right in including bonus while computing the compensation payable to the workmen.

The second point arises only in First Appeal No. 297 of 1964. Mr. Pandya contended that the Civil Surgeon had certified the disability as 10 per cent., and in his evidence in Court he explained to mean 10 per cent., for each limb, which means the disability was 20 per cent., while the learned Commissioner held that the disability was 90 per cent. It is argued that he was not justified in taking this view. It is not necessary to consider this contention in details. In the case of *Ahmed Abdul v. H. K. Sehgal*⁸, sitting singly, I had occasion to deal with a similar question. In that case authorities were considered and the following propositions were formulated by me (p. 450) :

"The words 'incapacitates a workman for all work' in s.2(1) of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1923, do not mean any and every work which he may do but means such work as is reasonably capable of being sold in the market. The words do not mean 'incapacitate to work' and have no reference to physical disability.

...The certificate of a medical expert can only say what the injury is, its effect temporary or total on the limb and to an extent the physical incapacity of the man. It is, however, for the Court to find having regard to the evidence before it whether the workman has suffered partial or total disablement. The Court must take into account the nature of the injury, the nature of the work which the workman was capable of undertaking and its availability to him."

Having regard to the principles involved in the determination of the relevant questions under the Act, we have no doubt that the learned Commissioner was justified in taking into account the nature of the injury suffered by the workman, the nature of the work which he was doing before his injury and the work which he was capable of doing after the injury, and then in determining his disablement at 90 per cent.

In the result, both the appeals fail and are dismissed with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF ROBES

AN Australian professor of jurisprudence has recently suggested that judges should discard what he calls their 'eighteenth century fancy dress', suggesting that 'if they must wear a uniform' it should be one (here come the inevitable ritual phrase) 'appropriate to this day and age'. One would have thought that a writer who dresses up his opinions in the uniform of poor, tired, worn-out, clichés or catch-phrases would have appreciated the advantages of not eliminating from the legal world the settled symbols of legal continuity. The judges' robes are not in fact eighteenth century, but a harmonious hybrid produced by many periods. The wig dates from the age of Lord Mansfield and Lord Hardwicke (which is no particular disgrace), but a study of judicial portraits from Tudor days to our own times reveals a steady process of adaptation and modification. In his quaint non-eighteenth century phraseology the professor says 'that the psychological impact of the change would propel us to divest ourselves of the eighteenth century mentality'. Actually, precious little of anything that Dr. Johnson would recognise as an eighteenth century mentality has survived, in our law, the tidal wave of the Judicature Acts and of twentieth century legislation, but the English law has preserved a sense of continuity which is an essential quality of the development of all living things. It is of that timeless continuity that the robes of the judges speak, for human beings express themselves not only in words, written or spoken, and a man can represent an idea or a philosophy just as much in his hat as in his handwriting. If his clothes, if his house, if his furniture, do not express his basic attitudes to ultimate reality, they are in the essential sense insignificant; they signify nothing.

Even a person obsessed with the idea of obliterating our entire law and starting afresh would be obliged to admit the practical convenience of robes, if only as marks of identification. In a railway station it is important for the traveller to be able to tell at a glance a porter from a ticket collector or a guard or a station master and he will do so the more readily if the dress of each somehow signifies his function. So in a court of justice it is (to put the thing at its lowest) convenient to be able to tell the judges and barristers and ushers from the milling mass of witnesses, clerks, parties, stenographers and accused persons, and since part of the function of judges and barristers is to assert themselves in an atmosphere of conflict and controversy, it is practical that what they wear should symbolise and enhance their authority. Robes, and in particular the wig and gown, fulfil the very practical function of asserting the basic professional equality of barristers inter se so that the impecunious beginner is not put out of countenance by a Savile Row suit flaunted by some fashionable leader.

Those who would strip the judges of their robes also ignore the universal human instinct for dressing up, for making declarations of independence, for communicating ideas in terms of personal adornment. The congenital practicability of women leads them to do it the whole time; but men feel the same need, even when they do not admit it. Freemasonry appeals to the ritualist latent even in the most prosaic looking people. Teenage fashions are a roar of revolt against the dreary monotony of office and factory life. The melodramatic secrecy of the Ku Klux Klan clothes itself in a tradition of hooded terror. The kilt of the highlander, the white robes at a Welsh Eisteddfod, just as much as the vestments of the priests, are statements in a universal language, and life would be more expressive and more significant and more interesting if the members of more trades or callings used it fluently and naturally, so that the butcher, the baker and the candlestick-maker proudly proclaimed themselves at a glance for what they were, instead of accepting the anonymity of an age of mass-production. The Bench and Bar set an excellent example to their contemporaries.

WHAT PRICE THE JUDGE?

OUR policemen may be wonderful, but our judges are valuable. At least, one has recently achieved a price tag of £300,000. It has been reported that

Mr. Justice Scarman has been insured for this sum lest he fail to give his reserved judgment in In re Fuld, deceased. It is a sobering reflection that no one else involved in a case holds such a vital position that, should they be unable to continue, the trial would have to be abandoned. Certainly the lawyers do not, and probably not the litigants either. With so much at stake perhaps one should be able to influence which judge should conduct a case. An addition to the summons for directions could allow the parties to argue that the case was a long one, justifying a judge who was a good insurance risk. The younger the judge, the cheaper to insure. Indeed, it is now relevant that women are less expensive to insure than men, having a longer expectation of life. Not that that is all that would be involved in choosing a judge. Given the choice, the experienced litigator would hesitate before selecting a runner without much of an entry in the form book. Perhaps the present system is better. It is questionable whether the litigants have an insurable interest in the judge's life. The person taking out an insurance policy must be so circumstanced as to have a benefit from the existence of the person concerned, a mere hope of profit is not insurable: Lucena v. Craufurd (1806), 3 Bos. & P. 75. If the insuring party were sure of the result, why insure? On the other hand, should the insurance have been void ab initio perhaps the premium is repayable on demand.—S. J.

HEARING IN CAMERA

AN unusual position was created by an application for a hearing in camera of a case in which a mother sought declarations of legitimacy in regard to her two children: B. v. Attorney-General (The Times, 16th June). Indeed, the mother took the view that public discussion of the evidence which would be given in support of the petition would be so harmful to the interests of the children that she did not think it right to persevere unless the hearing was held in private. The court was informed that the mother might be prepared to revise that view if the court invited the public to leave, and the press to abstain from publishing any details which might identify the parties. Wrangham J. took the view that the litigants would be deterred from proceeding if the hearing were not in private and proceeded to deal with the question whether that was in law a sufficient ground for granting the application.

His lordship recalled that in Scott v. Scott (109 L. T. 1; (1913) A.C. 417) Lord Loreburn appeared to be of the opinion that, where there was a real danger of supposing that a litigant would be deterred from pursuing his claim, that would be just cause for holding the trial in private. Lord Shaw, on the other hand, had clearly taken the view that that would not be a sufficient ground for making an order for a trial in camera, and the other three members of the House, Lord Haldane L.C. and Lords Halsbury and Atkinson, had expressed no clear opinion on this point. Those speeches had been considered in In re C. D.'s Petition (1927, 138 L. T. 208) by Lord Merrivale, who had decided that there was no power to make an order for trial in camera. That decision had stood unaltered for many years and Wrangham J. followed it. The fact that courts which dealt in an administrative or parental capacity with infants usually conducted their proceedings in private did not give infant litigants in other cases the right to have their suits tried in private, and the mother's application was refused.—L.T.

Direct Tax Laws. Volume I. By S. E. DASTUR, B.COM. (HONS.), B.A., LL.B., Advocate, H. M. DAMANIA, M.COM., F.C.A. and J. E. DASTUR, B.COM., B.A., LL.B., A.S.A.A., F.C.A. BOMBAY: N. M. Tripathi Private Ltd., Princess Street. Second Edition (1965-66). Roy. 8vo. Pages 530. Rs. 30 (for both volumes).

SINCE the enactment of the Income-tax Act, 1961, the Act has been amended ten times and the authors of the present work have with commendable zeal kept pace with the various statutory changes except the last one which was on the legislative anvil when this book was in press. This edition which consists of two volumes deals with some three hundred changes effected in the direct taxation law since the last edition was published. This volume contains the up-to-date text of the Income-tax Act, 1961, with detailed commentaries on the changes made in the Act by the Direct Taxes (Amendment) Act, 1964, the Income-tax (Amendment) Act, 1965 and the Finance Act, 1965. A section of the book deals with s. 2 and Schedules 1 and 2 of the Finance Act, 1965, which provide for the rules of income-tax, the rates of deduction of tax at source for the assessment year 1965-66 and the rates of annuity deposits. Though this volume is self-contained, with the publication of the second volume which will deal with the remaining direct tax Acts, both these will give an exhaustive survey of the direct tax laws in force in the assessment year 1965-66. The process of patch-work legislation which made it necessary to overhaul the Act of 1922 has started once again with the new Act and as a result the law of income-tax has, as before, become a bugbear to the layman and a source of endless hair-splitting to the income-tax practitioner. The authors in their commentary have laid bare with brevity and clarity the implications of the new amendments to the Act and, what is of more importance to the tax payer, they have given actual tax calculations involved in arriving at the rates of tax and annuity deposit.

Digest of Reported and Unreported Decisions on Revenue Laws, 1960-64. Compiled by H. B. VAISHNAV. AHMEDABAD: Gujarat Law House, Bhadra. Demi 8vo. Pages 237. Price Rs. 11.

THIS digest contains the points decided in some thousand reported and unreported decisions of the Gujarat High Court and the Gujarat Revenue Tribunal on laws administered by the Tribunal. The digest which is prepared by a member of the Gujarat Revenue Tribunal bears the mark of an experienced hand. Decisions under the main Acts are digested in chronological order of the sections, succinctly and lucidly. An index of cases is a sine qua non of a good digest and the compiler would have done well to include one. Some important decisions of the Rajkot Bench of the High Court of the quondam Bombay State dealing with the Saurashtra Acts could have found place to make the digest more useful to the profession. However, this digest will come in very handy to practitioners and especially to officers of the Revenue Department.

A Dealer's book on Central and Maharashtra Sales Tax Laws. By P. L. CHOUDHARY, B.COM., LL.B., F.C.A. BOMBAY-2: Taxation Information Bureau, 187, Dadyseth Agiary Lane. Roy. 8vo. Pages 245. Price Rs. 8.

THIS book as its title indicates is a popular exposition of the provisions of the Bombay Sales Tax Act, 1959 and the Central Sales Tax Act, 1956. It covers the entire ground in a rapid survey under such heads as incidence and levy of tax, registration, returns and assessments and offences and penalties. It contains some useful appendices which contain notifications issued under s. 41 of the State Act brought down to July 1, 1965; important public notices, press notes, circulars and orders issued by the Sales Tax authorities and important notifications issued under the Central Act. Included at the end are "a few golden advice for the dealers," one of which runs: "Love thy tax officer but don't grease his palms"—which might well prove irksome!

Law and the Insurance Contract. By M. N. SRINIVASA, B.SC. (HONS.), LL.B. Advocate. CALCUTTA: Eastern Law House Private Ltd., 54 Ganesh Chander Avenue. First edition, 1965. Demi 8vo. Pages 213. Price Rs. 7.50.

THIS is an interesting study of life insurance business in India considered in all its ramifications. In his exposition the author has referred to a number of Indian, English and American decisions bearing on the subject. He has stressed the need for the enactment of a comprehensive statute governing the entire field of life insurance contract and he has indicated the lines on which this could be effected by referring to the law and practice prevailing in England and America. This is a lucid and concise presentation of a subject of ever growing importance to the community and could hardly be bettered as an overall view of the different aspects of the life insurance contract.

Law relating to Women in India. By MISS JYOTSNA TRIBHUVAN, B.A., LL.B., Advocate. Published by the Author at Dr. Ambedkar Road, AHMEDNAGAR. Pages 112. Price Rs. 6.

THIS appears to be the first publication of its kind which in a nut-shell deals with legislation affecting women in India. The subject is considered under different heads, such as, law of marriage, economic rights of women, immoral traffic in women and girls, dowry and labour legislation affecting women. In the course of the discussion the author has given relevant extracts from Indian and English decisions and has referred to statutory law bearing on the subject. The exposition is lucid and precise and may be recommended as an intelligent woman's guide to her legal rights.

THIS latest issue of the Journal contains some interesting articles including one on "Outline of Modern Soviet Criminal Law" by Professor Tomaso Napolitano of the Eastern University Institute at Naples and another on "Recent retrospective legislation in Ceylon" by C. F. Amerasinghe, a Lecturer in Law at the University of Ceylon, in which the writer has examined legislation which is predominantly violative of the essential principle of the Rule of Law against retrospective legislation, in that it purports to impose burdens on individuals retrospectively or grants benefit to individuals at the expense of other individuals retrospectively. This Journal which maintains a high standard of scholarship continues to eminently fulfil the object of the Commission which is "to foster understanding of and respect for the Rule of Law."

Section 78 of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act, 1909, must be read as enabling the Official Assignee to administer oath for the purpose of (1) affidavits for the proof of debts, (2) affidavits for petitions and (3) affidavits for legal proceedings.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

F. S. Nariman, for the insolvent.

H. M. Seervai, Advocate-General, with Atul Setalvad, for the Punjab National Bank Ltd.

PATEL J. The matter has been referred to a Division Bench as it involves an important question of the practice and procedure followed in the Insolvency Court.

The facts are few and may shortly be stated. On the petition by B. R. Herman and Mohatta (India) Private Ltd., the applicant before us, Khushalchand B. Daga, was adjudicated insolvent on July 6, 1960. On September 2, 1960, the insolvent took out a notice of motion for annulment of the adjudication. Apparently, the notice of motion is yet not disposed of but, the insolvency proceedings were stayed by the Court. The Punjab National Bank Ltd., who is the opponent before us, made a claim against the insolvent in the sum of Rs. 58,56,000 on the basis of guarantee furnished by him against a loan to Model Mills. The bank also accepted that it held security of debentures of the Model Mills of the face value of Rs. 22,25,000. Before the applicant was adjudicated insolvent, on October 4, 1958, a petition for winding up of the Model Mills was filed. On July 7, 1959, the Government appointed the Authorised Controller by a notification and on July 28, 1962, the Company Court sanctioned a Scheme framed by him. This Scheme was supported by the Bank. The Bank it seems agreed to accept the debt due to it after deducting the value of the debentures which it held, that is Rs. 38,31,000, to be paid by 25 per cent. in cash and the balance of 75 per cent. in five yearly instalments secured by fresh debentures. On March 27, 1962, the bank filed proof of the present claim and desired that the same should be admitted by the Official Assignee, so that its claim against the insolvent may not be barred by time. The Insolvency Court permitted the same, and an appeal against its judgment has failed. Consequent upon this order, the Official Assignee started investigation of the claim. For this purpose, he examined Kidar Nath Suri, Manager of the Bank, after issuing a notice to the insolvent. After the proceedings had gone on for some time, a preliminary objection was raised on behalf of the insolvent that the Official Assignee had no jurisdiction to investigate the claim as tribunal by recording evidence of witnesses, by relying on the decision in Sooniram Ramniranjandass v. Alagu Nachiyar Koil.¹ The Official Assignee ruled otherwise and proposed to proceed with the investigation.

The insolvent took out a notice of motion questioning the decision of the Official Assignee which came up for hearing before our brother Tarkunde J. on March 16, 1965, and he directed that as the matter involved an important question it should be heard by a Division Bench. It has now accordingly been placed before us.

The answer to the question in issue depends upon the relevant provisions of the Presidency-towns Insolvency Act, 1909. In the Act, there is a clear distinction between the Insolvency Court and the Official Assignee, the Court, being this High Court. Section 6 enables the Chief Justice to delegate some of the functions which the Court is entitled to perform to a subordinate officer of the Court, and the decision or order of such officer is deemed to be that of the Court. Section 8 deals with review and appeals. Sub-section (2) provides for an appeal against the order of a subordinate officer who is delegated the functions of the Court, to the Insolvency Judge and a further appeal, by his leave, to a Bench; and cl. (b) provides for an appeal against the decision of the Insolvency Judge without his leave. Section 7 vests in the Court the fullest power to determine all questions, whether of priority or otherwise, whether of law or facts, for the purpose of doing full justice or making complete distribution of property in any case. With the limitation, we are not concerned. Consistently with the purpose of the Insolvency Act, immediately on the order of adjudication, it vests the property of the insolvent in the Official Assignee by s. 17—but it vests in him for the sole purpose of its becoming divisible amongst his creditors.

The Official Assignee is appointed by the State Government under s. 77, and is a corporation sole and has perpetual succession by reason of s. 77-A. He has well defined duties to perform under the Act. He has to realise all property of the insolvent capable of manual delivery and of documents and books of account, etc., belonging to the insolvent, and manage the same until distributed. Section 69 requires him to declare and distribute dividends amongst creditors who have proved their debts with all convenient speed. Section 48 provides that the method of proving debts would be as laid down in the Second Schedule. The Second Schedule consists of 27 Rules. The usual mode of proof of debt is by lodging with the Official Assignee an affidavit verifying the debt. Rule 4 enables the Official Assignee at any time to call for production of vouchers, and Rule 25 requires him to examine every proof and grounds of the debt and in writing admit or reject in whole or in part or require further evidence in support of it. If he rejects a proof, he is required to state in writing the grounds for his rejection. Section 78 of the Act provides that the Official Assignee may, for the purpose of affidavits, verifying proofs, petition or other proceedings under this Act, administer oaths. Presumably, the practice of investigating the claims of creditors, by even requiring them in some cases to take oath and subject themselves to cross-examination and produce witnesses is based on the wording of Rule 25 of the Second Schedule and s. 78.

In *Van Laun In re. Chatterton, Ex parte*³, the Court of appeal while considering the rejection by the trustee in bankruptcy of the proof of debt of a solicitor who refused to produce certain documents called for by the trustee, Cozens-Hardy, M.R. says: (p. 30).

"All that we now decide is, that the trustee is entitled to say, 'I will not admit your proof until you have given me reasonable means of satisfying myself whether the debt in respect of which you are proving is to any and what extent justifiable and reasonable.'"

He then observes that no estoppel available against the insolvent operated against the assignee, and says (p. 30):

"No judgment recovered against the bankrupt, no covenant given by or account stated with him, can deprive the trustee of this right."

Buckley L. J. puts it this way (p. 31):

"... [He] is entitled to say 'It is my business to see that' those who seek to rank against this estate are persons who are really creditors of that estate."

In the case of a judgment, he observed (p. 31):

"... It is not necessary to show fraud or collusion. It is sufficient, ... to show miscarriage of justice—that is to say, that for some good reason there ought not to have been a judgment... and that that was also true of an account stated or of a covenant."

This seems to be settled law in England. There are decisions in India which have followed the same principles, and for sound reasons. The Official Assignee should have the right of scrutinizing the claims, so that collusive claims or untenable claims may be avoided in the interest of fair distribution of the assets among the creditors. It is clear, therefore, that the Official Assignee, in order to decide whether or not the proof of debt affirmed before him as owing to the creditor should be accepted or rejected, should, from the nature of things, be in a position to investigate the matter properly, and unless there is anything in the Act itself preventing him from taking evidence on oath in case of necessity, the right cannot be denied.

The first ground of attack on this practice is that the Official Assignee is not a judicial officer exercising judicial functions and, therefore, not entitled to embark upon such an enquiry. True that he is a Court neither by the definition section which defines "court" nor by delegation of the powers of the Court under s. 6. But merely because he performs, in some measure, administrative functions, it would not be proper to say that he is not entitled to hold an inquiry. It is true that when the Insolvency Act speaks of proving and proof of debts under s. 48, the words are not used as they are understood in the law of evidence. They have a technical meaning, as held in Govind Prasad v. Pawankumar,³ which was a case under the Provincial Insolvency Act. The creditor is said to have proved his debt when he lodges a proof as prescribed by the Act. Whether to accept the same or not is for the Official Assignee to consider, and for that purpose he must make a proper inquiry.

Another ground urged is that under Rule 25 of the Second Schedule, the Official Assignee is not required to give reasons if he accepts the proof of the debt but has to do so only if he rejects it. This can hardly be regarded as an indication of the fact that he is not entitled to make a proper inquiry into the debt, if necessary even by examining witnesses. His position is peculiar. He represents the estate of the insolvent who is expected to assist him in the realisation of the property. Where he accepts the proof the creditor proving it cannot be aggrieved, and any other creditor who may think that the debt has been improperly admitted is entitled under r. 27 to apply to the Court to expunge or reduce the proof. Even the insolvent would not probably be able to challenge the acceptance of the debt except under special circumstances, in view of the fact that he is given the limited power of applying to have the same expunged or reduced if there is a composition or scheme under the Act. See *A debtor v. Dodwell*⁴ and Re. A Debtor.⁵ See also Williams on Bankruptcy, 17th edn., p. 574. It may be that for these reasons he is not required to give reasons, if he accepts proof of the debt.

It is argued that the scope of an appeal against his decision under s. 86 is much different from the scope of an appeal under s. 8 from the decision of an officer with delegated powers of the Court and, therefore, we should deny him the power to take evidence. That seems hardly to be a ground for so doing, even assuming that there is a difference in the nature of the two appeals. Indeed, there is this difference that the decision of the Insolvency Judge on an appeal against the decision of the officer exercising delegated powers of the Court is subject to appeal only if he grants leave, while in the case of a judgment rendered by the Insolvency Judge in an appeal against the decision of the Official Assignee, an appeal would lie under cl. (b) of s. 8 (2). An argument was made that an appeal under s. 86 would be almost an original proceeding where everything will have to be gone into over again and there would be duplication of the process of the Court. It is said that there may be large number of creditors who would want to take part in the proceedings and the matter would assume undue proportions resulting in waste of time, and the same process may have to be gone through before the Court. This contention overlooks the fact that the creditors are represented by the Official Assignee, and that the matter is between himself and the proving creditors. They are not entitled to cross-examine the proving creditors or their witnesses, though they may instruct the Official Assignee. Interests of other creditors are safeguarded by r. 27 which enables any creditor disputing the debt to apply to the Court to expunge the same. Similarly, the debtor may help the Official Assignee by placing relevant matters before him to enable him to ask relevant questions to the proving creditor and decide whether he should accept or reject the proof. In the appeal, the Court would consider all the circumstances of the case and may or may not permit evidence to be taken before it. It must be remembered that, by the Act itself, no specific procedure has been laid down for determining an appeal under s. 86 of the Act, and the Judge will have, therefore, fullest jurisdiction to consider whether or not the party in default before the Official Assignee should be allowed to produce further evidence before him.

Another ground urged is that r. 116 framed under s. 112 of the Act prescribes a form of proof of debts. Under r. 119, the Official Assignee is required, within seventy days after receiving a proof in writing of the debt, either to admit or reject it wholly or in part or require further evidence in support thereof. No doubt, the whole procedure prescribed by the Insolvency Act and the Rules has the laudable purpose of administering the estate as quickly and effectively as possible. But this object has seldom been achieved. Merely because it is intended that the administration should be completed early, the power in the Official Assignee, if he has any, to take evidence, cannot be denied.

Mr. Advocate-General pressed into service s. 78 of the Act. He says that the section should be read as enabling the Official Assignee to administer oath for the purpose of (1) affidavits for proof of debts, (2) petitions or (3) legal proceedings, and he says the rule of ejusdem generis should be applied. Mr. Nariman asks us to construe it grammatically and read it as enabling him to administer oath for the purpose of (1) affidavits for the proof of debts, (2) affidavits for petitions, (3) affidavits for legal proceedings. We think it is more reasonable to construe the section in the latter way, as the first construction must involve the assumption that there are petitions or legal proceedings before the Official Assignee which he can try or hear, for which there is no justification.

Strong reliance has been placed on the decision of the Privy Council in Sooniram Ramniranjandass v. Alagu Nachiyar Koil. The facts in that case are that a firm of bankers and money-lenders was adjudicated insolvent. In the Schedule of creditors, they showed a Hindu temple as unsecured creditor. The debt was entered in the books of the firm as credit to the temple by way of charity held as deposit. Interest on that sum was computed as in the case of an ordinary customer. On behalf of the temple, a claim was made under s. 52 to recover the full deposit of the amount from the Official Assignee on the ground that the amount was held by the firm as a custodian of an endowment or a trustee. Evidence before the Official Assignee consisted of the books of the insolvent and some oral evidence. The Official Assignee upheld the claim of the temple. Against the order of the Official Assignee an appeal was made under s. 86, which was heard by Braund J. as Insolvency Judge who rejected the claim of the temple. In further appeal, which was heard by the Chief Justice and Dunkley J., there was a difference of opinion, and it was heard by another Judge who agreed with the Chief Justice. The appeal was allowed and the decision of the Official Assignee was restored. The Privy Council considered the matter from two points of view (1) as if the matter were under s. 52 of the Act and (2) as if it were one of proof of debts under r. 25 of the Schedule. We are not concerned with the first aspect of the matter. Referring to the second aspect, Sir George Rankin says (p. 1238) :

"...Even if the matter could be regarded as a mere question of admitting or rejecting a proof, when the Official Assignee acts under r. 25 of the second schedule, it seems more reasonable and more in accordance with a sound interpretation of s. 86 and with English practice under statutory provisions couched in the same terms that the 'appeal' from the 'act or decision' of the Official Assignee to the Judge should be by motion and that the oral evidence necessary should be taken before the Insolvency Judge himself."

Strong reliance has been placed by Mr. Nariman on this passage in support of his contention. It is wrong, however, to read the passage as laying down that the Official Assignee is not entitled to make such inquiry which he deems necessary for discharging his duty and that for that purpose he is not entitled to take evidence. The objection is to his determining the matter as if he were a tribunal. If their Lordships had intended to lay down anything like this, they would have straightway proceeded to overrule all the evidence received by the Official Assignee and have the matter re-heard by the Insolvency Judge in the first instance. It is clear, however, as pointed out by their Lordships in the later portion of the same paragraph, that the case cannot be concluded by regarding the Official Assignee as a trial Judge whose estimate of the witnesses' evidence must, prima facie, be accepted. Subject to this caution, there can be no reason to deny the power claimed by the Official Assignee to take evidence.

Reliance is also placed on some observations in Yokohama Specie Bank Ltd. v. Curlender & Co.,⁶ on the question of proof. The judgment is of Rankin J., as he then was. The case arose out of an application for commission by the appellant-Company, the proving creditor, for examining witnesses in Japan. We have carefully read the observations of the learned Judge but we do not find anything in it to suggest that the Official Assignee is not entitled, if he deems it necessary, to take evidence.

If, as is contended on behalf of the insolvent, that the Official Assignee is merely entitled to call for documents and vouchers, r. 4 of the Schedule would as well have served the purpose. Having regard to r. 25 and the duty imposed upon him to decide whether the debt is genuine and owing to the creditor, we hold that he is entitled to hold an inquiry and for that purpose receive evidence on oath. We, however, agree, with respect, with the observations of Rankin J. in Yokohama Specie Bank Ltd. v. Curlender & Co., that he ought not to allow the creditor, or the debtor—the latter except under special circumstances—to cross-examine the witnesses of the proving creditor and convert the process into a long drawn out proceeding. He must act as a "man of business" and consider the matter from a practical point of view. The object of the special procedure for proof of debts in the Insolvency Acts is to ensure that such matters are quickly disposed of and no needless harassment is caused to the proving creditors. We do not see why, in the present case, there should have been such a long hearing before the Official Assignee. The Secretary or Manager of the Bank should have been required to make relevant statement in his affidavit of proof and produce verified documents and statement of accounts. The Official Assignee could then have questioned the insolvent in respect of the same and if he thought clarification was necessary on any matter from the Bank he could have called for such additional material as he deemed necessary or called the manager of the Bank and examined him in the light of the insolvent's statements, and then made up his mind whether to accept or reject the proof. The long meetings and pointless examinations and cross-examinations were hardly necessary.

The Official Assignee will act in accordance with our judgment.

Subject to the above, the notice will stand discharged with costs. Costs to be tacked on to the security. We quantify the cost before us and Mr. Justice Tarkunde at Rs. 500.

THE GOVERNMENT PLEADER, HIGH COURT, BOMBAY v. S. L. JAIN*.

Bombay Court-fees Act (Bom. XXXVI of 1959), Sch. II; Arts. 1 (iii), 34—Insurance Act (IV of 1938), Sec. 53(1)—Companies Act (I of 1956), Sec. 439—Petition filed under s. 53 (1) of Insurance Act—Applicability of art. 1 (iii) or 34 of Bombay Court-fees Act.

The provisions in art. 1 (iii) in Sch. II to the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959, apply to a petition for winding up filed under s. 53(1) of the Insurance Act, 1938.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

K. J. Abhyankar, Assistant Government Pleader, for the Government Pleader (Petitioner).

⁶ [1926] A.I.R. Cal. 898.

*Decided, July 22, 1965. Civil Revision Application No. 751 of 1961.

K. K. DESAI J. This Civil Revision Application arises out of the order dated February 20, 1961, passed by the Taxing Master of this Court on a reference made to him under s. 5 of the Bombay Court-fees Act, 1959. The Taxing Master was called upon to determine the Court-fees payable by opponent No. 1 on the petition for winding up that he had filed for winding up of opponent No. 2 company, i.e. Warden Insurance Co. Ltd. Doubts arose as to the Court-fees payable, because there is clear provision in art. 34 in Sch. II to the Bombay Court-fees Act that on a petition to the Court under s. 439 of the Companies Act for winding of a company the Court-fee is fifty rupees. The case of opponent No. 1 was that the petition in question had not been filed under the provisions of s. 439 of the Indian Companies Act. His petition for winding up was filed under s. 53(1) of the Insurance Act, 1938. His contention was that to his petition the provisions in art. 1(iii) in Sch. II of the Act were applicable. Article 1 (iii) in Sch. II runs as follows :

Number 1	 2	Proper fee 3
1. Application or petition	 (iii) in any other case not other- wise provided for by this Act.

It is sufficient to state that Article 1 in its prior parts refers to several kinds of applications and petitions which are not petitions for winding up.

The learned Taxing Master held that to the petition of opponent No. 1 the provisions in art. 34 were not applicable.

Mr. Abhayankar for the Government Pleader has contended that on a true construction of the provisions in s. 53 of the Insurance Act it should be held that all petitions for winding up which can be instituted by reason of the provisions in s. 53 are petitions for winding up under the Indian Companies Act. To such petitions, the provisions in art. 34 referred to above are applicable. Section 53 of the Insurance Act inter alia, provides :

"53. (1) The Court may order the winding up in accordance with the Indian Companies Act 1913, of any insurance company and the provisions of that Act shall, subject to the provisions of this Act apply accordingly.

(2) In addition to the grounds on which such an order may be based, the Court may order the winding up of an insurance company—..."

The subsequent provisions give grounds for winding up of an insurance company under the Insurance Act. These grounds are not any of the grounds contained in s. 439 of the Companies Act. In connection with the above contention, it is sufficient to state that on a true construction of sub-s. (1) of s. 53 it is clear that the orders for winding up of insurance companies on petitions filed under s. 53 are made because the provisions of the Insurance Act apply to such winding up petitions. The winding up is to be carried out under the sub-section in accordance with the Indian Companies Act. It would not be possible to hold in respect of petitions made under s. 53 of the Insurance Act that the petitions are made "under" the Indian Companies Act. In other words, though the winding up is to be carried out "in accordance with" the provisions in "the Indian Companies Act", the petitions must be held to be made under s. 53 of the Insurance Act. The same is the finding of the learned Taxing Master. It is not possible to interfere with that finding, as I agree with the conclusions arrived at by him.

MRS. KHAIRUNNISSA A. K. SIDDIKI v. THE MUNICIPAL CORPORATION OF THE CITY OF BOMBAY*.

Bombay Municipal Corporation Act (Bom. III of 1888), Secs. 527, 517, 501—Motor Vehicles Act (IV of 1939), Sec. 110—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), Sec. 26—"Suit," meaning of word in s. 527, Bom. Act III of 1888—Whether application under s. 110, Motor Vehicles Act a suit within s. 527—Tribunal under Motor Vehicles Act whether a Court.

The word "suit" in s. 527 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, 1888, means a proceeding which is commenced by the presentation of a plaint and, therefore, an application under s. 110 of the Motor Vehicles Act, 1939, does not come within the ambit of s. 527 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act.

PATEL J. This is an appeal by the widow and two children of one Siddiki who died as a result of a collision between a municipal car BMU 1274 in which he was riding and a bus No. 9481 belonging to the Bombay Electric Supply and Transport Undertaking of the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

The deceased was an employee of the Corporation in the Fire Brigade Department. The car BMU 1274 belonging to the Corporation was maintained for the transport of the Fire Brigade Chief Officer. On the day of the accident, i.e. February 10, 1960, the deceased Siddiki, appellant No. 1 and her two children were travelling in the car which was being driven by respondent No. 5. Near the Mahalaxmi Bridge, the bus collided against the car, as a result of which Siddiki and his two children died, while appellant No. 1 sustained serious injuries. On March 4, 1960, appellant No. 1 addressed two notices, one to the General Manager, B.E.S.T. Transport House, and the other to the Municipal Commissioner, Bombay Municipal Corporation, Municipal Head Office, Bombay, in connection with this accident, conveying in clear terms that the bus belonged to the Corporation, that the accident occurred by reason of the negligence of the bus-driver, that appellant No. 1 suffered monetary loss by the death of her husband, that the children were young and had to be brought up and that the two of her children were dead. In all, she claimed damages to the tune of Rs. 2,95,376. In the notice to the General Manager, B.E.S.T. Undertaking, it is made perfectly clear that they would be liable in law to pay to the appellant the said damages. The total claim made in both the notices was Rs. 2,96,376. Thereafter, she filed an application for compensation before the Motor Accidents Claims Tribunal under s. 110 of the Motor Vehicles Act in April of 1960.

Defendant No. 1 is the Bombay Municipal Corporation, No. 2, is the General Manager, Bombay Electric Supply and Transport Undertaking, No. 3 is the Municipal Commissioner, No. 4 is the driver of the bus and No. 5 is the driver of the motor car in which the deceased was being driven.

The first contention raised on behalf of the defendants was that, inasmuch as a notice as required by s. 527 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act of 1888 was not given, the application was incompetent. The Tribunal was invited to hear this issue as a preliminary issue, which it did, and it held in favour of the defendants and dismissed the application. The appeal challenges the decision of the learned Tribunal.

It raises the question of interpretation of s. 527 of the said Act. The section, so far as relevant, is as follows :

"No suit shall be instituted against the corporation or against the Commissioner, the General Manager... in respect of any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of this Act or in respect of any alleged neglect or default in the execution of this Act—

(a) until the expiration of one month next after notice in writing has been, in the case of the corporation, left at the chief municipal office and, in the case of the Commissioner, the General Manager... delivered to him or left at his office or place of abode, stating with reasonable particularity the cause of action and the name and place of abode of the intending plaintiff and of his attorney or agent, if any, for the purpose of such suit ; nor

(b) unless it is commenced within six months next after the accrual of the cause of action."

Before the Tribunal, it was contended for the appellants that an application under s. 110 of the Motor Vehicles Act was not a suit. Secondly, it was contended that, in any event, it was not obligatory on the part of the Corporation to enter into the venture of Transport Undertaking, and it could not, therefore, be said that the suit related to an act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of the Act. The Tribunal rejected both these contentions of the appellant. A reference to s. 527 clearly shows that it restricts the right of a citizen to take resort to a Court of law in the usual way and, therefore, it must ordinarily be construed strictly. It is often suggested that the Municipal Acts are for public good, and, therefore, their provisions should be construed liberally. But the rule cannot be applied to all cases and in all matters. Much depends upon the nature of the provision, the object to be achieved and its scope.

On the one hand, it is argued on behalf of the Corporation that the word "suit" has unrestricted meaning and it means any legal proceeding in respect of a civil right wherever taken. On the other hand, it is contended on behalf of the appellant that by the word "suit" is meant a proceeding which is commenced by a plaint in a civil Court. The question is, which of the interpretations is correct.

The law of civil procedure is contained in the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, which replaces its earlier counterpart. Section 26 says :

"Every suit shall be instituted by the presentation of a plaint or in such other manner as may be prescribed."

The word "prescribed" has been defined in the same Code to mean "prescribed by the rules framed under the Code of Civil Procedure." It is obvious, therefore, that, so far as the Code of Civil Procedure is concerned, the word "suit" means a suit instituted in a civil Court by the presentation of a plaint, and it would not be possible to call any other proceeding a suit even if it is a proceeding instituted in a civil Court, if it is not done by a plaint. In *Hansraj Gupta v. Official Liquidators, Dehra Dun-Mussoorie Electric Tramway Co.*¹, the Privy Council had to deal with the meaning of the word "suit" as used in s. 3 of the Indian Limitation Act, while considering the question as to whether or not the claim was barred by time. Their Lordships said that the word "suit" ordinarily means, and apart from some context must be taken to mean, a civil proceeding instituted by the presentation of a plaint. In the Indian Limitation Act, the word "suit" as in the present case under the present Act is not defined. Section 2 of the Limitation Act says, unless there is anything repugnant to the context, a suit does not include an appeal or an application. Their Lordships held that an application made by the Liquidator in respect of a claim was not a suit for the purposes of s. 3 of the Indian Limitation Act, and the application of the Liquidator could not, therefore, be dismissed as a suit instituted under s. 3 of the Act. In *Venkata Chandrappa Nayanivaru v. Venkatarama Reddi*², in relation to a proceeding in execution, the Court held that merely because it is capable of terminating in a decree or an order having the force of a decree, it could not on that ground alone be deemed to be a suit within the meaning of the Code, as a suit must, according to s. 48 (Civil Procedure Code of 1822), commence with a plaint. That the word "suit" can have a restricted meaning is illustrated by the decision in *Indrajitsinghi v. Rajendrasinghi*³, and *The Secretary of State v. Kundan Singh*⁴. In the first case, it was held that s. 86, Civil Procedure Code, is not attracted to an application for letters of administration in spite of s. 141, Civil Procedure Code. In the second case, it was held that a proceeding under para. 17 of the Second Schedule to the Civil Procedure Code was not a suit for the purpose of s. 80 of the Code. It was held that a notice was not required to be given to the Secretary of State for India in Council in respect of a contemplated proceeding of this nature. Shadi Lal, C. J., incidentally observed (p. 673) :

"...It may, therefore, be stated as a general proposition, that, unless there is any special provision to the contrary, a proceeding that does not commence with a plaint cannot be held to be a suit."

To the same effect is the decision in *Hafiz Qamar Din v. Nur Din*⁵, where it was held that an application under para. 20 of Schedule 2 of the Civil Procedure Code was not a suit. Section 86 of the Civil Procedure Code which protects the rulers and ruling princes of the former States from suits, came to be considered by the Supreme Court in *Bhagwat Singh v. The State of Rajasthan*⁶. Speaking for the Court, Shah J. said (p. 446) :

"...A proceeding which does not commence with a plaint or petition in the nature of plaint, or where the claim is not in respect of dispute ordinarily triable in a Civil Court, would prima facie not be regarded as falling within S. 86 Code of Civil Procedure."

It was held that a proceeding for adjudication under the Industrial Disputes Act does not fall within the word "suit" under s. 86.

In *Manjunath Badrabhat v. Venkatesh Govind Shanbhog*⁷, the question that fell for consideration was whether a decision in execution proceedings would be res judicata under s. 13 of the Procedure Code, Act X of 1877. While considering this question, the Court, in view of the fact that the decision under s. 47 corresponding to s. 244 of the old Code was deemed to be a decree, held that the execution application must be regarded as a suit and the decision thereon as in a suit. Holding so, the Court held that the principles of res judicata under s. 13 of the Code applied. In this connection, another decision also on the question as to whether a decision in execution proceedings was res judicata was referred to before us, where it was held that an execution proceeding was a suit within the meaning of that section. In view of the subsequent decision of the Privy Council in the case of *Ram Kirpal Shukul v. Mussumat Rup Kuari*⁸, it is difficult to hold that the reasoning given in these cases still holds good. The Privy Council has pointed out that the principle of res judicata enunciated in s. 11 of the Civil Procedure Code which corresponded to the earlier section are not exhaustive, and apart from that section on general principle a decision in the execution proceedings was res judicata in a subsequent proceeding between the same parties. In *Vajeram v. Purshotumidas*⁹, while considering the question under s. 43 of the old Code of 1882 which is similar to O. II, r. 2, of the present Code, Tyabji J. construed the words "to sue". Relying on the ordinary dictionary meaning of the words "to sue" which is to make a legal claim or to take legal proceeding against any person, he held that the claim made before him in the execution proceedings was barred by that section. While considering the question of limitation in *Assan v. Pathumma*¹⁰, the Court held that the term "plaint" did not mean a plaint duly stamped and it refused to give a limited meaning to the word "plaint" being duly stamped. It was said (p. 495) :

"...A 'plaint' in law means merely a private memorial tendered to a Court, in which the person sets forth his cause of action; the exhibition of an action in writing."

Naturally, on behalf of the Corporation, much reliance has been placed on these observations. Then we have got the decision in *Bhoopendro Narain Dutt v. Baroda Prosad Roy Chowdhry*¹¹, where the case arose under the Court of Wards Act, and the Court held that the word "suit" included execution proceedings. The last case cited on behalf of the Corporation is that of *Abdul Gani v. The Reception Committee, Indian National Congress*¹². In this case, Wadia J. said (p. 645) :

"A suit is an original proceeding between a plaintiff and a defendant. The term 'plaintiff' includes every person asking any relief against any other person by any form or proceeding, whether the same be taken by cause, action, suit, petition, motion, summons or otherwise...."

The provisions of Order I, rule 8, of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, are applicable to a petition filed under section 14 of the Indian Arbitration Act, 1899, to set aside an award on the ground of the misconduct of the arbitrator."

It is no doubt true that these cases illustrate that the word "suit" is capable of having a very wide connotation and may include, depending upon the context, any legal proceeding commenced by one person against another in order to enforce a civil right. From this, it cannot necessarily be held that the word "suit" must be given such a wide meaning wherever it occurs. In order to determine the ambit of the word used, the Court must consider the object which the provision was intended to achieve.

Under s. 527 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, two things are contemplated, namely, that a notice of the intended suit must be given and that the suit must be filed within six months after the accrual of the cause of action. The two objects underlying the enactment are that the Corporation should have notice of the claims so that it may make amends and be saved from unnecessary costs and that fraudulent and stale claims should be prevented. The first object is achieved by the requirement of a notice and the second by reducing the period of limitation. It is clear that the intention is to apply the section to such proceedings as have a period of limitation of much more than six months and are suits—in other words to such proceedings as are regarded as suits under the Indian Limitation Act. It is proper, therefore, that the word "suit" should have the same meaning that it has in the Limitation Act. As decided in Hansraj Gupta, the ordinary meaning of the word "suit" as commonly understood is a proceeding which is commenced by the presentation of a plaint. There is nothing in the Act to suggest that the word "suit" should have a wider meaning. On the contrary, s. 517 indicates otherwise. Clause (g) of sub-s. (1) in terms refers to a suit or other legal proceeding brought against the corporation or against the commissioner or other officers. Similarly, cl. (h) also refers to a suit or legal proceeding brought against the corporation or against any of the named officers. When the Act itself makes this distinction between a suit and a legal proceeding, there could be no justification for us to construe the word "suit" in its wider sense conveyed by its dictionary meaning. We must, therefore, having regard to the fact that it is a section which restricts the ordinary and normal right of a citizen, give it the ordinary meaning in preference to the wider dictionary meaning of the word "suit".

Mr. Madan very emphatically argued that s. 2, cl. (10) in the original Limitation Act and s. 2, cl. (1) of the new Limitation Act, 1963, would suggest that a suit can include an appeal or an application. He says, if that is so, we should give to the word "suit" such a meaning as would include an application. To give such a wide meaning to the word "suit" is, in our view, not justified. If such a meaning is given, it may well mean that even when a person wants to file an appeal against the Corporation he must again give a notice, because even an appeal would amount to a suit. In any event, it may as well apply to execution proceedings since such proceedings are suits as was held in *Emperor v. Ezekiel*¹³, and Vajeram v. Purshotumdas. Again it may apply even to writ petitions which cannot be countenanced.

We are also not satisfied that the Tribunal under the Motor Vehicles Act, acts as a Court. It is undoubtedly true that, till 1960, in respect of such a cause of action, a suit could be filed. It is only in about 1960 that the said Tribunal was constituted for deciding claims of this nature. It is said that if those suits are replaced by applications before the Tribunal, we could still consider these applications as suits and the Tribunal as Court. We cannot accept this contention. The Legislature was entitled to take away certain matters out of the purview of s. 527 of the Act, and it has done so. The Tribunal is not a Court, and its constitution is not governed by any legislation applicable to civil Courts. The proceeding itself has to be commenced by an application in the prescribed form, and the resultant order is not even called a decree. Section 110C of the Motor Vehicles Act provides for the procedure and it shows that the Tribunal is entitled to follow such summary procedure as it may think fit, subject to the rules that may have been made. It also provides by s. 110E that the amount due under the Award shall be recovered through the Collector as arrears of revenue. Section 110F expressly bars the jurisdiction of civil Courts in places where Claims Tribunals have been constituted. The State, by reason of the powers conferred upon it by s. 111 of the Act, framed rules of procedure for the Tribunals, and it is only where no specific rules exist that the Tribunals are enabled to follow the provisions of the Civil Procedure Code. It is, therefore, impossible to hold that the Tribunal is a Court.

We, accordingly, hold that the present application is not a suit under s. 527 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, and, therefore, there is no impediment in the applicants' way in proceeding with the same.

In view of what we have said above, it is not really necessary to consider the other contentions raised on behalf of the appellants. Incidentally, we may observe that two notices have been served by the appellants, one on the General Manager of the Bombay Electric Supply and Transport Undertaking and the other on the Municipal Commissioner. Both the notices are addressed to them in their official capacities and not to them as individuals. As to whether or not such notice is sufficient is a matter of construction of the notice itself. It is true that in *Nathubhai v. Municipal Corp., B'bay*¹⁴, a Bench of this Court held that a notice to be valid under s. 527, must be addressed to the Municipal Corporation, and, therefore, the Corporation could contend that the notices were bad. In *Pandurang v. Ramchandra*¹⁵, the notice which was addressed to the President of the District Local Board was held to be sufficient to satisfy the requirements of s. 136 of the Local Boards Act. In *G.-G. in Council v. G. S. Mills*¹⁶, a notice addressed to the "Chief Commercial Manager or Subordinate Officer" who is entitled to deal with the claims was held to be valid notice. In this connection we may refer to the decision in *Lady Dinbai Petit v. Dominion of India*¹⁷. While considering the question as to whether a notice under s. 80 was necessary for amendment of the cause of action in a suit against the Government, Chagla, C. J., after referring to the observations of the Judicial Committee in *Bhagchand Dagadusa v. Secretary of State for India*¹⁸, said (p. 243):

"...But even so, as pointed out by Sir John Beaumont in Chandulal Vadilal v. Government of Bombay,¹⁹ the section should be construed with some regard to commonsense and to the object with which it appears to have been passed."

We think the same principles apply in construing the notice. Moreover, under s. 501 of the Bombay Municipal Corporation Act, the Municipal Commissioner and the General Manager have to make payment of any compensation claimed by a person with the sanction of the respective Standing Committees. Therefore, the notices which have apparently reached the Corporation would appear to be proper notices.

In Nathubhai's case the observations of the Judicial Committee in Bhagchand Dagadusa v. Secretary of State for India, to the effect that that section (s. 80) is explicit and mandatory and admits of no implications or exceptions, were followed. In that case, however, there was no notice at all. Similarly, in *Vellayan Chettiar v. Province of Madras*²⁰, and in *Government of Bombay v. Wadia*²¹, where similar observation was made, only one plaintiff had given notice under s. 80 but he and another filed the suit and the suit was held to be bad. These cases are distinguishable. The Municipal Commissioner being the chief executive head of the Corporation received the notice and there can be no reason to hold that it is not a proper notice and thus provide a handle of oppression to the Municipality. With respect, it would appear that Nathubhai's case may require reconsideration. In this case, as we hold in favour of the plaintiff on the other point, nothing more need be said on the matter.

In the result, we set aside the order made by the Tribunal and direct the Tribunal to proceed with the application on its merits. The application will be heard and disposed of as early as possible.

The appellants will get costs from respondents Nos. 1 to 4. Respondent No. 5 to bear his own costs.

Bombay Paragana and Kulkarni Watans (Abolition) Act (Bom. LX of 1950), Secs. 4(2), 4(1)—Bombay Land Revenue Code (Bom. V. of 1879), Sec. 70—Occupancy of land regranted under s. 4(1) of Act whether could be sold or partitioned by order of Court—Whether decree-holder can apply to Collector to obtain sanction for sale of such land.

The combined effect of s. 4(2) of the Bombay Paragana and Kulkarni Watans (Abolition) Act, 1950, and s. 70 of the Bombay Land Revenue Code, 1879, is that the occupancy of land regranted under s. 4(1) of the Act is not liable to be sold or partitioned by execution of an order of a Court. A decree-holder during execution proceedings can, however, on behalf of the Court obtain sanction for sale of the land from the Collector under s. 4(2) of the Act.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

G. N. Vaidya, for the petitioner.

K. J. Abhyankar, for opponent No. 1.

V. H. Gumaste, Additional Government Pleader, for opponents Nos. 2 and 3.

PATEL J. This petition arises out of an execution proceeding commenced by the petitioner against his judgment-debtor respondent No. 1.

Respondent No. 1 was the owner of two lands survey numbers 204 and 221, measuring 6 acres 15 gunthas and 6 acres 4 gunthas, in the village of Bhadgaon in Jalgaon District. He held these lands as Class V Inam. In 1950, the Bombay Paragana and Kulkarni Watans (Abolition) Act was passed, as a result of which the lands became resumed by the Government. They were retransferred to respondent No. 1, on his paying occupancy price equal to twelve times the amount of the full assessment. The petitioner obtained his decree in Regular Suit No. 57 of 1950 and sought to proceed in execution against these two survey numbers by attachment and sale of the properties in Darkhast No. 218 of 1958. Respondent No. 1 contended that these lands could not be sold as they were re-granted to him on limited tenure and were inalienable under the provisions of s. 4, sub-s. (2) of the Act without the permission of the Collector for the transfer of the same. The learned Civil Judge, Junior Division, by his judgment and order dated April 1, 1960, directed the sale of the properties to proceed, deferring the matter of obtaining the permission of the Collector to a later date. Respondent No. 1 went in appeal to the District Court, being Appeal No. 185 of 1960. The learned District Judge by his judgment dated June 15, 1961, set aside the order of the Civil Judge, Junior Division, and held that the properties could not be sold as no sanction of the Collector was obtained. The petitioner filed a second appeal, being Second Appeal No. 1463 of 1961 which was heard by V. S. Desai J. on February 1, 1963. The learned Judge set aside the judgment of the District Judge and restored that of the Civil Judge, Junior Division, holding that the question of sanction could arise only after the sale was effected and before it was confirmed. He directed the learned Civil Judge, Junior Division, to proceed with the execution of the decree from the stage at which it was left.

After this judgment, the petitioner made an application to the Collector for sanction of the sale. The Collector after giving a hearing to the petitioner rejected his application on the ground that only a holder of the land could make an application for permission to transfer the land under s. 4(2) of the said Act, on paying Nazarana for the same, and that respondent No. 1 did not want permission to transfer the land. He also observed that he had rejected similar application previously and that he had no right under the Land Revenue Code to review his order. The petitioner went in appeal to the Commissioner who confirmed the judgment, rejecting it on almost the same ground. The petitioner seeks to challenge this order.

Section 4, sub-s. (2), of the said Act is as follows :

"The occupancy of the land regranted under sub-section (1) shall not be transferable or partible by metes and bounds without the previous sanction of the Collector and except on payment of such amount as the State Government may by general or special order determine." Section 70 of the Land Revenue Code which has got a bearing on this question is as follows :

"In any case where an occupancy is not transferable without the previous sanction of the Collector, and such sanction has not been granted to a transfer which has been made or ordered by Civil Court or on which the Court's decree or order is founded,

(a) such occupancy shall not be liable to the process of any Court, and such transfer shall be null and void, and

(b) the Court, on receipt of a certificate under the hand and seal of the Collector, to the effect that any such occupancy is not transferable without his previous sanction and that such sanction has not been granted, shall remove any attachment or other process placed on or set aside any sale of, or affecting, such occupancy."

It is true that in sub-s. (2) of s. 4, there is no reference to transfer or partition by execution process. But then, the combined effect of this sub-section and s. 70 of the Land Revenue Code is that, as the occupancy is made by statute non-transferable and non-partible, it is not liable to be sold or partitioned by execution of an order of a Court. This, however, does not mean that an application should be made only by the holder of the land.

It must at once be apparent that the provision as to non-transferability was not made in the interests of dishonest judgment-debtors. Paragana Vatandars were required to pay only twelve times the assessment as occupancy price, and in view of the fact that the price charged was low, it is possible that the Government intended to regrant the land on what is known as new tenure, which means non-partible and non-alienable tenure. But then it does not mean that, under no circumstances, the land was intended to be unalienable. The land could be alienated with the sanction of the Collector. Inasmuch as, by s. 70 of the Land Revenue Code, this provision was applicable also to sales and transfers by orders of Court, advisedly apparently no provision is made in s. 4 of the said Act that an application for transfer shall necessarily be made by the holder of the land.

As regards the question as to who should be able to make an application for this purpose, one has to consider the nature of execution process. Whenever a decree is being executed, it means that the judgment-debtor is not prepared to carry out the terms of the decree, and it is the coercive process of the Court which enforces the execution of its decree. When property is sold by the Court in execution of a decree against the owner or holder of the land, it is against the will of the owner. The owner would never be willing to apply for sanction to transfer the land. In view of the fact that the Court is selling the property against the will of the owner who does not and will not co-operate, it is the Court who must obtain the sanction of the relevant authority. It is true that the Court, being in a peculiar position, cannot be required to file an application before the Collector but it can authorise someone or even the decree-holder to obtain the required sanction on its behalf. Since the Court has stayed the execution proceedings to enable the decree-holder to make this application, it must necessarily follow that, impliedly it permitted the decree-holder to obtain sanction for sale of the property from the Collector, and accordingly the petitioner filed the present application.

Having regard to the scheme of these provisions, and there being nothing in s. 4(2) of the Act which prevents any one on behalf of the Court from making an application, in our view, both the Collector and the Commissioner were in error in holding that the application must fail only on that ground.

Mr. Vaidya relies in support of his contention on two decisions of the Supreme Court in *Mrs. Chandnee Widya Vati v. Dr. C. L. Katial*¹ and *Dy. Director of Consolidation v. Deen Bandhu*². The first case arose out of a contract entered into by the appellant before their Lordships with the respondent to sell to the respondent a house which stood on a plot granted by the Government. According to the terms of the contract, the vendor had to obtain the necessary permission from the Government for the sale within certain time. She made an application for the necessary permission, but for some reason of her own she withdrew that application. Eventually, the respondent filed a suit for specific performance of the contract. The trial Court dismissed the suit but the High Court decreed the same. Their Lordships observed (p. 979) :

"...the Court has got to enforce the terms of the contract and to enjoin upon the defendant-appellant to make the necessary application to the Chief Commissioner. It will be for the Chief Commissioner to decide whether or not to grant the necessary sanction."

They confirmed on this ground the decree of the High Court. In the second case, a question arose under the United Provinces Consolidation of Holdings Act of 1954. An application for transfer of certain land was made by the owner for the purpose of an exchange. Section 13(a), (b) and (c) laid down the principles for granting or refusing the permission. The Settlement Officer, for reasons alien to that section, rejected the application. The Supreme Court held that the rejection was improper and directed that the application should be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of s. 13 of the Act.

In the first case, the rights between the parties arose out of a contract, and naturally, therefore, the Court insisted on the defendant being forced to make an application for permission for the transfer. The second case illustrates the point that the Revenue authority cannot refuse to make an order on arbitrary grounds but must act on the basis of the principle laid down by the relevant section and that if it acts on grounds other than those on which it is entitled to act, the order must necessarily be regarded as bad.

In the affidavit, the only ground in support of the orders under review that is mentioned is that the decree holder was not competent to make an application. No other reasons are suggested for rejecting the same and none is apparent from any of the orders of the authorities. It is clear, therefore, that the order cannot be allowed to stand.

Mr. Gumaste contends that the petitioner had made an application on September 29, 1961, and it was disposed of on February 5, 1962, and, therefore, the second application is not competent. Except for the reference to the order, none has been produced before us from the record. When we called upon Mr. Gumaste to produce the relevant record he only showed us the record which contains a copy of an intimation in Marathi to the petitioner, without there being an order as such by the Collector. The real position is that the petitioner had filed an appeal against the decision of the Collector dated February 5, 1962, before the Commissioner. The Commissioner directed the Collector to give a hearing and thereafter decide the matter. If that is so, the Collector was bound to obey the order of the Commissioner and could not avoid deciding the matter as he did, saying that he had no power to review his prior order. It also appears from the order of the Collector now made that he refused to make the necessary order because respondent No. 1 who is the holder of the land did not want permission for transfer. This is not a case of voluntary transfer. The Court is selling the property against his will, and his volition in the matter has no place.

We have been read the affidavit of the Commissioner in answer to the rule. He has not referred to any principle or any rational reason on the basis of which the said prayer could possibly be rejected. If the law itself does not prescribe any principle on the basis of which the Collector has to make a decision or order, then the section itself may be of doubtful validity. If the principles are prescribed, then it is not the contention of Mr. Gumaste that any would be violated by the making of the order.

We, therefore, set aside the orders made by the authorities below and direct the Collector to issue the necessary sanction to transfer the property in order to enable the Civil Court to sell the same in execution of the decree on the petitioner paying the requisite amount. The petitioner will get his costs from respondent No. 2.

Orders set aside.

Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Rules, 1955. Rules 23, 22, 18, 20, 34-D, 65, 49, 67, 87—Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act (XLIV of 1954) Secs. 8, 20, 40—Applicability of r. 23—Whether it applies to agricultural land—Amendment of heading of Chap. VIII of Rules whether retrospective.

Rule 23 of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Rules, 1955, applies only to such classes of properties as were dealt with by rule 22 of the Rules but which could not be allotted under that rule, namely, urban houses, shops etc.

Bishan Singh v. Central Govt.,¹ agreed with.

The amendment made in the heading of Chapter VIII of the Rules is not retrospective.

Quaere : Whether Government can by notification amend rule 18 of the Rules so as to exclude agricultural land in rural areas only, retrospectively.

Whether Rule 65 is ultra vires in that it is in contravention of s. 8 of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act, 1954.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

PATEL J. This petition under arts. 226 and 227 of the Constitution raises a question of construction of the provisions of the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act, 1954, which hereafter will be called "the 1954 Act" and the rules framed under it. The facts leading to the petition are few and are as follows :

The two petitioners are father and son who are joint with five other sons of petitioner No. 1. When they came to India in the wake of the partition, they left agricultural land and some houses in West Pakistan. They made claims under the Displaced Persons Claims Act, 1950. The claims were assessed and verified at Rs. 20,000 for houses etc. and two and a half standard acres and five and a half gunthas of agricultural land. The claim for houses became reduced to Rs. 17,111. It may be stated that all the properties were situated in rural area.

*Decided, July 20, 1965. Special Civil 1 [1961] A.I.R. Punj. 461.
Application No. 575 of 1961.

After migration here the petitioners carried on business in Bhir in the name of Awatrai Radhakishan. In January 1953 they applied in the name of Awatrai Radhakishan that they be allotted on lease two survey numbers being 75 and 77 being the land of an evacuee one Sardarkhan. In one of the survey numbers in a distinct portion there was a bungalow which was given to the State Government for the Civil Hospital. The application related to the rest of the agricultural land. It seems there were fruit trees in the land. The Deputy Custodian sent a memo to the Tehsildar with his recommendation that the request should be favourably considered. Accordingly the lands were granted to them on lease by the Tehsildar and this "allotment" was confirmed by the Assistant Custodian, Bhir, on April 28, 1953, as can be seen from the file produced.

On May 13, 1957, the Additional Settlement Commissioner, Delhi, Bombay Camp, on the basis of r. 65 under the Displaced Persons (Compensation and Rehabilitation) Act, 1954, rejected their claim for rural houses on the ground that they had been allotted agricultural lands S. Nos. 75 and 77 at Bhir. In the meantime the petitioners were asking that the land be permanently allotted to them and had also challenged the above order before the Chief Settlement Commissioner. In the meantime the State Government had started negotiating for the purchase of these pieces of land for the purpose of the Hospital which it was running in the bungalow. The Settlement Commissioner made an order agreeing to do so, and sought the approval of the Chief Settlement Commissioner who approved of the same. The price fixed was Rs. 1,13,000. It appears that on September 21, 1959, the petitioners came to know of the same. Petitioner No. 1, therefore, made representations against the proposal and when he did not get a satisfactory reply he filed Special Civil Application No. 591 of 1960 challenging the orders dated May 13, 1957, made by the Additional Settlement Officer rejecting the claim regarding rural houses and dated May 14, 1960, by the Chief Settlement Commissioner confirming the same and their decision to sell the land to the State Government. This petition was later withdrawn on April 20, 1961. They however continued in possession of the land. Respondent No. 3 then ordered the Tehsildar to evict the petitioners.

The petitioners filed the present petition under art. 227 of the Constitution on the ground that respondents Nos. 1, 3, 4 and 5 could not validly sell the land to respondent No. 2 under the rules and the Act and that they had learnt that the land was no longer required for the hospital. They pray that the said orders be quashed. During the pendency of this petition the State Government by its letter dated April 1, 1963, informed the petitioners that it had decided to release the land and acquire another land for constructing the hospital and this was again confirmed by another letter dated August 14, 1963. The matter had come up for hearing often but was adjourned from time to time for settlement. It seems the State Government was willing to transfer the land to the petitioners but as the Central Government and the Settlement Commissioner insisted on the full price settled for the bungalow and the land being paid by the State Government, the negotiations failed.

The question is whether under the Act and the rules the Settlement Commissioner had the power to sell the property. It is admitted by Mr. Advani that the petitioners' claims were with respect to rural properties—both agricultural land and house and shops. The property now involved is urban and consists of two Survey numbers 75 and 77 in one of which there seems to be a large bungalow. But it is admitted that the bungalow and its compound was let to the Government as separate entity and the agricultural land was leased to petitioners at Rs. 81 per year.

On behalf of the respondents the sale is sought to be justified under r. 23 of the Rules framed under the 1954 Act. On behalf of the petitioners it is contended that that rule has no application. Rule 23 reads thus :

"All acquired evacuee properties which are not allotable under rule 22 shall ordinarily be sold."

In interpreting a statute the Court tries to find out the intention of the Legislature. Normal rule of interpretation is that the intention of the Legislature is to be gathered from the words used which must normally be given their natural grammatical meaning. But it may be that the words may take colour from the context in which they are used and acquire a larger or a smaller meaning than they ordinarily convey. It is for this reason that the rules of construction require that the Court should interpret the statute as a whole and also have regard to the objects of enacting the statute. See *Aurini Kumar Ghosh v. Arabinda Bose*¹ where it was said p. (40) °

"It is one of the settled rules of construction that to ascertain the legislative intent, all the constituent parts of a statute are to be taken together and each word, phrase or sentence is to be considered in the light of the general purpose and object of the Act itself." The same principles apply to the interpretation of statutory rules.

Under the Administration of Evacuee Property Act, 1950, properties of persons who were declared evacuees were taken over. The Act gave powers of management to Custodians of such properties. Under s. 10 (1) all powers were vested in the Custodian as were necessary or expedient for the purpose of "securing, administering, preserving and managing" any evacuee property. By sub-s. (2) he was given specific powers including one under cl. (c) of transferring property but not by sale except with the permission of the Government which would include power to either allot or lease the property. By s. 12 he was given power to cancel leases or allotments. It is not claimed that the power of sale is exercised under this Act. It would also appear that the property ceased to be such property once it became part of the compensation pool and the later Act of 1954 would govern its management.

The 1954 Act provided for the payment of compensation to displaced persons and rehabilitate them. The net amount of compensation was to be determined under s. 7. Section 8 is mandatory in language in that it provides that compensation shall be paid out of the compensation pool. The modes for the payment of the same are :

- (a) in cash;
- (b) in Government bonds;
- (c) by sale to the displaced person of any property from the compensation pool and setting off the purchase money against the compensation payable to him;
- (d) by any other mode of transfer to the displaced person of any property from the compensation pool and setting off the valuation of the property against the compensation payable to him;
- (e) by transfer of shares or debentures in any company or corporation;
- (f) in such other form as may be prescribed.

By sub-s. (2) power is given to the Central Government to frame rules for this purpose. By s. 14 a compensation pool is created. By s. 16 the Central Government is enabled to take measures for the management and disposal of the compensation pool in order that the same may be effectively utilized in accordance with the provisions of the Act. Section 17 relates to the functions of the managers of the properties in the compensation pool. Section 19 gives power to the manager to cancel or vary any allotment or lease granted either before or after the Act in respect of any evacuee property but subject to the rules framed under the Act and after giving a reasonable opportunity of being heard. Section 20 gives the managing officer or managing corporation a power to deal with the property subject to rules. Rules are framed under s. 40.

We now turn to the scheme of the rules. They are divided into several chapters. Chapter I defines various terms used therein. Chapter II deals with applications for compensation and their processing and Chapter III deals with enquires and verification of claims. Chapter IV deals with the question of determination of compensation, its scale and mode of payment. Rule 18 deals with computation of compensation. As it originally stood, it provided that it shall be determined by adding assessed value of all claims in respect of all kinds of the property of the claimant other than agricultural land. On February 20, 1960, it was amended so as to exclude agricultural land in rural areas only, retrospectively. How far Government can retrospectively in this manner apply a rule is a question which may arise. Chapter V relates to payment of compensation by transfer of property, the modes of valuation, its transfer to a displaced person who is in occupation of the same and its consequences. Chapter V-A is new and is added on November 26, 1960, and relates to allotment of agricultural land in urban areas. Chapter VI deals with transfer of Government built property. Chapter VII deals with payment of compensation for rural houses and shops left in Pakistan. Chapter VIII deals with payment of compensation for agricultural lands in rural area and provides that it shall as far as possible be by allotting agricultural land. Chapter IX deals with allotment of groves and gardens and so on.

This analysis clearly indicates that the Central Government framed the rules subject-wise, devoting a Chapter to each kind of property. It dealt with the subject of rural houses left in Pakistan in Chap. VII and provided for allotment of similar houses in rural areas to displaced persons in the manner specified in the Chapter and in Chap. VIII it made provision for agricultural lands left in West Pakistan and provided that as far as possible payment for the same should be made by allotment of agricultural land. The heading of the Chapter was, until its amendment "Compensation in respect of verified claim for agricultural land". Rule 49 as it was originally framed applied to all agricultural land whether rural or urban. The other rules lay down the principles of allotment. If this is so, clearly r. 23 could not apply to agricultural land. Similarly the rule could not also apply to groves and gardens specially provided for in Chap. IX. Having regard to the scheme of the rules we have no hesitation in holding that r. 23 though widely worded applies only to such classes of properties as were dealt with by r. 22 but which could not be allotted under that rule, namely, urban houses, shops etc.

Mr. Vaidya has drawn our attention to the fact that the heading of Chap. VIII has been subsequently amended to read "Compensation in respect of verified claims for agricultural lands situated in a rural area." He, therefore, contends that urban agricultural land could not be said to be covered by this Chapter and, therefore, there was a power to sell such land under r. 22. This amendment has been made by notification dated February 11, 1960, Gazette of India Part II S on February 20, 1960. But then this can be of prospective operation and cannot change the meaning of rr. 22 and 23. It may be noticed that in r. 18 by the same notification addition of the words "in rural areas" was made retrospectively. Apart from the question whether Government can by rules retrospectively reopen claims already verified, the amendment to Chap. VIII in our view is not retrospective, as there is no clear indication that it was to be retrospective.

Mr. Vaidya then referred us to rr. 67 and 87 in support of his contention. Rule 67 gives power of sale to the Settlement Commissioner only if the agricultural land is "not required for allotment". The contention cannot apply in the present case since it was never alleged so far that it was not required for allotment. Rule 87 also does not help as it merely prescribes how sale of property was to be effected. The property must be saleable in order that r. 87 must apply.

Similar view was taken by a Bench of the Punjab High Court in *Bishan Singh v. Central Govt.*², where the scope of rr. 22 and 23 was confined as above. We agree with respect with the decision and hold that that is the true scope and effect of the two rules.

Mr. Vaidya then referred to s. 20 of the Act and argued that apart from the rules, this section gives power of sale to the manager. The section is made "subject to any rules that may be framed by the Central Government." It was not intended to give uncontrolled power to the officer to sell any property that he liked. Rules have to be framed under s. 8 which relates to payment of compensation and under s. 40 regarding the powers of respective officers and other matters. It is possible that if no rules at all were framed it would have been a different matter. But elaborate rules have been framed and yet no such power of sale has been given. The power of sale cannot, therefore, be exercised. In any event such an exercise of power would be conflicting with the rules framed under ss. 8 and 40 and therefore it could not be exercised. We, therefore, hold that the Settlement Officer had no power to sell the property under the rules and the Act.

Mr. Advani's second contention is that by notification dated November 17, 1960, Chap. VA has been added to the rules and makes provision for allotment of urban agricultural lands acquired under s. 12 of the Act. He says that even if the agreement to sell were valid, as no document has been executed and the property has not passed and since he is entitled to be allotted the land under the provisions of this chapter the proposed sale must fall through. Mr. Vaidya and Mr. Rane resist this contention on the ground that the State Government had deposited the price of the land and the bungalow before the rules came into force and the State Government is, therefore, entitled to performance of the agreement. In our view, mere agreement creates no title and it cannot be enforced against a third party who acquires independent right. Rule 34-D may in this connection be referred to. It is as follows :

"(1) Where any land to which this Chapter applies has been leased to a displaced person and such land consists of more than one Khasra, the aggregate value of which exceeds Rs. 10,000 such portion of the land, the value of which does not exceed Rs. 10,000, as the Regional Settlement Commissioner may select, shall be allotted to such person :

Provided that where any such land or any part thereof has been sub-leased to a displaced person and the sub-lessee has been in occupation of that land or part thereof continuously from the 1st January, 1956, such land or part thereof, as the case may be, the value of which does not exceed Rs. 10,000, as the Regional Settlement Commissioner may select, shall be allotted to such sub-lessee.

(2) In selecting the area for allotment under sub-rule (1), the Regional Settlement Commissioner shall have regard to the compactness of the area and other relevant matters.

(3) For the purpose of allotment of land under this rule, no Khasra shall be sub-divided."

It is admitted and borne out by the lease which is read to us, that petitioner No. 1 is a lessee. But it is said the value of the land is much more than Rs. 10,000 and therefore the petitioner is not entitled to be allotted the land. The answer to that is that the valuation is not made as required by the Act but is merely stated for the purposes of the petition. The bungalow which consists of about forty-four rooms and has a compound together with the agricultural land is purported to be sold to the State Government for Rs. 1,13,800. What is to be ascertained is the value of the agricultural land and that too honest and fair value. The petitioner would be entitled to that portion of the land the value of which does not exceed Rs. 10,000. It is wrong, therefore, to say that they are not entitled to any of the leased land.

It is next contended that as petitioner No. 1 had filed a similar application under art. 227 of the Constitution challenging these very orders, second petition is barred by the doctrine of res judicata. In any case it is urged that, as the said application was withdrawn as the claim in respect of rural houses was revived, they ought not to be allowed to urge the present claim. We are not impressed by either of the arguments. In *Daryao v. State of U. P.*³, the question was whether a petition under art. 32 to the Supreme Court is barred if a petition under art. 226 is dismissed by the High Court. It was held that a second petition would be barred if there is a prior decision on merits because that decision would continue to be binding on the party unless it is modified by a subsequent appropriate proceeding. If it is dismissed for want of prosecution or on the ground of laches or on the ground that the party has another remedy then the petition to the Supreme Court would not be barred. Where it is dismissed in limine, whether or not it is barred would depend upon the circumstances of each case; these principles apply to a second petition under art. 226 of the Constitution to the High Court. In para. 18 of the affidavit in reply it is not suggested that the application was heard on merits. In para. 11 of the petition the petitioners state that petitioner No. 1 withdrew the said petition in view of the fact that the original verified claim in respect of rural buildings was revived and on account of the main consideration that the lands were required for the Civil Hospital and that "the petitioners were advised that in the event of the said lands were not required for a Civil Hospital the same will be permanently allotted to them at a reasonable price and that in any event they would be given suitable compensation for costly improvements effected by them."

In the counter affidavit it is denied that any such promise was made. Be that as it may, the said petition was not heard on merits nor had the Court expressed any opinion as a result of which the same was withdrawn. Apart from this as para. 13 of the petition shows, circumstances have changed as the State Government probably decided by the time the petition came to be filed to take another land for the hospital. Principles of res judicata will not, therefore, apply.

As to estoppel, the doctrine can only apply if some particular advantage had been obtained by the petitioners by the revival of their claim for rural buildings. The order is at exh. C in these proceedings. The claim for compensation regarding buildings was disallowed on the ground that the claimants had been allotted more than four acres of agricultural land. This was done under r. 65 of the rules. Exhibit E shows that on September 21, 1959, the Regional Settlement Commissioner recommended to the Chief Settlement Commissioner that the said claim be revived as the petitioner would lose the land as it was proposed to be sold to the State Government. Then came letter from Regional Settlement Commissioner to him on May 14, 1960 (exh. E-2) that the claim could not be revived as he would get the benefit of r. 54 (2) which we may state has no application. Finally on January 18, 1961, the Settlement Commissioner with delegated powers revived his claim in respect of rural buildings (exh. III). Therefore solicitor to the Government wrote (Exh. F) to the petitioner to let him know if under the circumstances he would withdraw his petition. This shows that revival of his claim was not conditional upon his withdrawal of the petition. Nor is it alleged in the counter affidavit that the understanding was that, if the claim was revived he would withdraw the petition. There can be no question, therefore, of estoppel. Apart from this, the order was inherently bad. Rule 65 has been interpreted by this Court to mean that the right to compensation is not lost under that rule merely because agricultural land is allotted. See *Totaram v. Regional Settlement Commr.*⁴ It also prima facie appears that the said r. 65 may even be ultra vires in that, it is in contravention of s. 8 of the Act, which provides that compensation shall be paid to the claimant in respect of his verified claims. Even before withdrawal of the previous petition in his reply to the Government Solicitor the claimant wrote to him that he should be granted the very land by way of compensation (see exh. F). The revival, therefore, of the rural claim does not come in his way.

Mr. Rane contended that under r. 22 allotment of land is not compulsory the words being "shall ordinarily be allotted". We are not concerned with r. 22. The petitioner claims the land under other rules which are applicable. Even if a discretion is vested in the Settlement Commissioner, the discretion has to be reasonably exercised. His claim, therefore, cannot be rejected. We are also not impressed by his argument that the petitioner has been shifting his ground. His contention is that the proposed sale is contrary to the rules and the scheme of the Act and, therefore, cannot be sustained.

Lastly, it is urged that the transaction is bona fide and we should not interfere. The circumstances have now changed. The State Government has clearly indicated that it has taken the decision of releasing the land and to acquire another land for the proposed hospital. It also appears that the petitioner would not have insisted on the land if it were wanted for the hospital. It would also appear that at least since 1953 he has been on the land and tended the fruit trees and in every probability has further improved the land. Under the circumstances we cannot refuse to interfere.

We, accordingly, set aside the orders dated April 12, 1960, and May 14, 1960, and direct the respondents not to dispossess the petitioners in pursuance of the said sale. We further direct that respondent No. 1 process his claim in accordance with the rules.

Having regard to the circumstances there will be no order as to costs.

Orders set aside.

RAJMAL DAGADURAM SHETH v. KISAN VINAYAK GUJAR. *

Indian Limitation Act (IX of 1908), Art. 182 (5)—Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O. XXI, rr. 6, 7—Application for rectification of name of one of judgment-debtors in decree sent to executing Court—Whether such application covered by art. 182 (5) of Indian Limitation Act.

An application made by a decree-holder to the Court which passed the decree that the copy of the decree sent to the Court to which the decree was transferred for execution should be rectified so as to give the correct name of one of the judgment-debtors, is an application "to take some step in aid of execution of the decree" and is covered by art. 182 (5) of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908.

In deciding whether an application was "to take some step in aid of execution," the relevant question is whether the Court was requested by that application to take some step in aid of execution, and not whether the decree-holder in filing the application had acted in furtherance of execution.

*Rajaram v. Banaji Mairai*¹ and Ratanchand v. Chandulal,² explained.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

S. G. Seth, for the appellant.

M. A. Rane, for the respondents.

TARKUNDE J. This second appeal has been filed by a decree-holder whose Darkhast for the execution of his decree was dismissed by the Courts below on the ground of limitation. The decree was passed by the Court of the Civil Judge of Nasik and was transferred for execution to the Court of the Civil Judge of Sinnar. Three previous Darkhasts were filed by the decree-holder for the execution of the decree and the last of these Darkhasts was disposed of on April 15, 1958. Then on July 16, 1958, the decree-holder filed an application to the Nasik Court in which he stated that a mistake in the name of the third judgment-debtor had occurred in the copy of the decree which the Nasik Court had sent to the Sinnar Court along with its transfer certificate, and prayed that the record should be called for from the Sinnar Court and be sent back after correcting the name of the third judgment-debtor in the certified copy. This application was allowed by the Nasik Court on September 14, 1959. The present Darkhast was filed on March 19, 1962, that is, more than three years after the disposal of the third Darkhast but less than three years of the order passed by the Nasik Court on the aforesaid application of the decree-holder. It was the case of the decree-holder that his application to the Nasik Court was for taking a step in aid of execution of the decree and that his Darkhast was within time under art. 182 (5) of the Indian Limitation Act of 1908. This plea was not accepted by the Courts below in dismissing the Darkhast as barred by limitation.

Apart from authority, I have no difficulty in holding that the decree-holder's application to the Nasik Court fell within the scope of art. 182 (5) of the Indian Limitation Act of 1908. Article 182 (5) provides a period of three years from an application for execution of a decree from the date of the "final order passed on an application made in accordance with law to the proper Court for execution, or to take some step-in-aid of execution of the decree or order".

The decree-holder's application was in accordance with law and was made to the proper Court. The only disputed question is whether the application was for taking some step in aid of execution of the decree. A reference may be made in this connection to O. XXI, r. 6, of the Civil Procedure Code which lays down that a Court which sends its decree for execution to another Court shall send a copy of the decree and certain certificates as specified in that rule. The provisions of rr. 6 and 7 of O. XXI show that in the normal course the transferee Court proceeds to execute the decree "without any further proof of the decree." A proper execution of the decree by the transferee Court is likely to be difficult if the copy of the decree sent by the Court which passed it contains material errors, such as errors in the name of the judgment-debtor, the amount to be recovered under the decree or the description of any property affected by the decree. When the decree-holder in the present case applied to the Nasik Court and prayed that the copy of the decree sent by the Nasik Court to the Sinnar Court should be rectified so as to give the correct name of the third judgment-debtor, he was asking the Nasik Court to take a step which was clearly in furtherance of the execution of the decree. His application, therefore, was "to take some step in aid of execution of the decree" and was covered by art. 182 (5) of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908.

In coming to the contrary conclusion, the Courts below raised an irrelevant question, namely, whether the decree-holder's application to the Nasik Court was itself a step in aid of execution, and proceeded to answer that question by the test whether it was necessary for the decree-holder to make such an application. In this connection, the learned Appellate Judge observed that there was no reason to suppose that execution of the decree could not have proceeded unless the mistake in the certified copy of the decree was rectified, and that in any case the decree-holder could have executed the decree against two of the judgment-debtors even if it could not be executed against the third judgment-debtor on account of the mistake which had occurred in his name in the copy of the decree. The learned Appellate Judge, therefore, held that the decree-holder's application to the Nasik Court was "unnecessary and redundant", and that the application "could not serve as a step in aid of execution".

Now, the correct question which arose for the decision of the Courts below on the wording of art. 182(5) was, not whether the decree-holder's application was itself a step in aid of execution, but whether the step which the decree-holder had requested the Nasik Court to take was a step in aid of execution. In other words, the question was whether the rectification of the copy of the decree as prayed for by the decree-holder amounted to a step in aid of execution. If that question had been raised by the Courts below, they could hardly have answered it by holding that the applicant did not request the Court to take a step in aid of execution of the decree. The wording of art. 182(5) makes it clear that it covers two types of applications—applications for execution of a decree or order, and applications to take some step in aid of execution of a decree or order. Both the types of applications are connected with the execution of a decree or order. In the former, the Court is approached for adopting any one or more of the modes of execution specified in the Civil Procedure Code, such as delivery of property, attachment and sale, arrest and detention, etc. In the latter, the Court is approached to take some step which is ancillary to execution and in furtherance thereof.

On behalf of the judgment-debtors Mr. Rane defended the conclusion of the Court below by relying on two cases decided by this Court. In Rajaram v. Banaji Mairal,¹ a Division Bench held that an application to the Court by a decree-holder asking for the return of the copy of a decree filed with a former darkhast is not a step in aid of execution of the decree. It will be noticed that what the decree-holder had asked the Court in that case to do was merely to return the copy of a decree which had been filed with the former darkhast. It was noted by the learned Judges who decided that case that, according to the rules of the Court, it was necessary for the decree-holder to file a certified copy of the decree along with his darkhast. Hence the step which the decree-holder had taken in applying to the Court to return the copy of the decree which he had filed with the former darkhast might have been a step taken for the purpose of further execution of his decree. What the Court, however, was concerned with was not whether in making the application the decree-holder took a step in aid of the execution of the decree, but whether the decree-holder had asked the Court to take some step in aid of execution of the decree. After referring to the terms of the corresponding art. 179(4) of the Limitation Act of 1877 which governed that case, Parsons J. observed in the course of his judgment (p. 312) :

"...The words of the enactment seem clear. They require an application to be made to the Court for it to take some step in aid of execution of the decree. The return by it of a copy of a document cannot, in my opinion, be held to be a step in execution taken by the Court." Thus what was held by the Court in that case was that the mere return of a copy of a decree to the decree-holder was not so connected with the execution of the decree that it could be regarded as a step in aid of execution.

The other case on which reliance was placed by Mr. Rane was Ratanchand v. Chandulal,² where a single Judge of this Court held that an application to re-construct a decree which had been destroyed was not a step in aid of execution of the decree within the meaning of art. 182(5) of the Indian Limitation Act, 1908. In support of his decision the learned Judge observed that it was not necessary to have the decree or a copy of the decree in order to apply in execution, that in any case the decree-holders in that case had not stated that they did not have a copy of the decree with them, and further that it did not follow from the fact that the decree-holders had applied for a copy of the decree that they would necessarily have taken proceedings in execution. It will be noticed that here also the mere re-construction of the decree which had been prayed for by the decree-holders was not so connected with the execution of the decree as to constitute a step in aid of execution.

As observed above, the prayer which the decree-holder in the present case had made to the Nasik Court for rectifying the copy of the decree sent to the Sinnar Court amounted to a prayer that a step in aid of execution of the decree should be taken by the Nasik Court. The decree-holder's application to the Nasik Court was, therefore, covered by art. 182(5) of the Limitation Act, 1908. It must follow that the Courts below were wrong in holding that the decree-holder's darkhast was barred by limitation.

This second appeal is, therefore, allowed, the orders of the trial Court and the Appellate Court dismissing the darkhast are set aside, the darkhast is restored and the trial Court is directed to proceed with it in accordance with law. The judgment-debtors will pay the costs of the decree-holder throughout.

Appeal allowed.

THE MAHARASHTRA STATE ELECTRICITY BOARD

v.

M/S. MADHUSUDAN DASS AND BROTHERS.*

Electricity (Supply) Act (LIV of 1948), Secs. 26, 46, 79, 70, 49—Indian Electricity Act (IX of 1910), Sec. 24(1)—Whether s. 24(1) of Act IX of 1910 applies to a Board.

The effect of s. 26 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948, is that if the Board has laid supply mains and has commenced to supply the energy then it becomes a licensee to that extent and acquires all the powers and obligations under the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, and all the provisions of the latter Act apply except such as are excluded. Section 24 is not excluded and, therefore, s. 24(1) applies to the case of a supply of electrical energy by the Board to a consumer and the Board can discontinue the supply only if the conditions of s. 24(1) are satisfied, i.e. there must be neglect on the part of the consumer to pay the electrical charges.

The State Electricity Board (plaintiff) constituted under the Electricity (Supply) Act of 1948, supplied electrical energy to licensees and consumers under certain circumstances. M/s. Madhusudan Dass & Bros. (defendant) was a firm owning manganese mines at Mandri, in Ramtek Tahsil. Under an agreement between the Board and the defendant dated March 9, 1956, the defendant agreed to take electrical energy on terms stated therein. The contract was to be operative for a period of five years from the date on which the supply was started i.e. upto May 6, 1962. At the time when the contract was entered into between the parties, slab tariff system was in force and the rates fixed in the contract for the supply of the energy were in accordance with Part II of the High Tension Tariff. Under the tariff as then existing, for the first 5000 units of energy consumed the consumer had to pay 1.75 annas per unit, for the next 20,000 units he had to pay 1.65 annas per unit, for the next 75,000 units of energy he had to pay 1.50 annas per unit and in excess of the above consumption he had to pay 1.25 annas per unit. There was a minimum tariff prescribed in the sense that the consumer had to pay for 600 units per KW of highest recorded maximum demand over the year or for 30,000 units per year whichever was greater. In the contract, by clause 20, the rates were as stated in the schedule and by clause 22(a), the defendant guaranteed a minimum consumption which yielded an annual revenue of Rs. 3,281-4-0, and further agreed to pay this amount even if it did not consume that much electrical energy. By clause 30 certain powers were reserved to the Board to increase or reduce the tariff charges. Clause 34 provided that the Board had the right in case the consumer failed to comply with the terms of the agreement in addition to the rights possessed by it under the Acts, Rules and Regulations, to discontinue the supply after giving seven days' notice in writing to the defendant. The clause further provided that under certain circumstances the Board had the right to reconnect the supply, and also to recover charges inspite of the discontinuance of the supply.

*Decided, April 21, 1965. First Appeal No. 139 of 1963, against the decision of Hifzul

By about the end of December 1958, the Board revised the tariff of the supply. In the revised tariff the whole system was changed to "two-part-tariff". It fixed what is known as a 'demand charge' per KVA in addition to the actual charges for the consumption of electrical energy. The demand charge was fixed at Rs. 10 per month per KVA for the first 200 KVA of the billing demand and thereafter on a sliding basis. The energy charge was reduced to 5 nP per unit for the first 100 units per month per KVA of the billing demand or 10,000 units whichever was greater. For consumption above that unitage, there were further sliding charges per unit. It defined the billing demand to mean the highest of the four alternatives mentioned therein. In the present case, there was no dispute that so far as Vidarbha Area was concerned, the minimum billing demand was 50 KVA. The plaintiff introduced the revised tariffs from January 1, 1959, and called upon the defendant to pay subsequent bills on the footing of the new tariffs. As the bills in the present case show, in the earlier period the maximum consumption of the defendant was never more than about 25,000 units of energy per year, with the result that the defendant paid the minimum guaranteed amount of Rs. 3,281-4-0 annually. Under the new tariff the "demand charges" came to Rs. 500 per month and the consumption charges were at 5 nP per unit of the energy consumed. The minimum, therefore, that the defendant was required to pay was something much more than Rs. 6,000 annually.

The defendant delayed the payments of the new charges on the ground that the charges were excessive and contrary to the terms of the contract. The Board gave notice for disconnecting the supply and actually disconnected the supply on April 13, 1960. The defendant, however, paid the arrears and the supply was reconnected on April 17, 1960. Then the defendant again did not pay and on September 29, 1960, the supply was again disconnected. Then it made a part payment on October 27, 1960, and the supply was, therefore, recommenced on November 2, 1960. It then paid the past arrears on December 30, 1960. It was again in arrears and, therefore, the supply was disconnected on January 18, 1961. Before disconnecting the supply, the Board gave notice to the defendant on January 4, 1961, which purported to be one under s. 24(I) of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910. As the notice was not complied with, the supply came to be disconnected as stated above. Thereafter the Board filed the present suit for recovering the arrears of the past supply and also the minimum guaranteed demand, according to the new tariff. The statement of the claim was as follows:

- (a) Arrears in respect of the energy consumed upto the date of disconnection at the new rates ...Rs. 5944.26 nP
 - (b) Minimum guarantee payment for the unexpired period from 1.2.61 to 6.5.62 including hire charges at the new rates ...Rs. 9841.45 nP.
 - (c) Surcharge for delayed payments calculated up to 15.8.61 ... Rs. 793.41 nP.
- Total Claim ... Rs. 16579.12 nP.

It gave deduction of Rs. 76.29 nP and the net claim made was Rs. 16,502.83 nP.

The defendant contended inter alia that it did not agree to the revised tariffs, which were applied from January 1, 1959, and that the plaintiff had no right to revise the tariffs under the contract between the parties and it was not, therefore, liable to pay the bills according to the revised tariffs. The defendant denied that there were any arrears in respect of the energy consumed by the defendant at any time or until the month of January 1961. It denied its liability to pay the surcharge of Rs. 793.41 nP. on account of the alleged delayed payment as there was no delay in the payment of the charges. The defendant relied upon the rights conferred upon it under the agreement between the parties. In para. 11 of the written statement it contended that

"The revision of the tariff and the application of the revised tariff to the contract in question was ultra vires of the powers of the Board under the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948. It was in direct contravention of section 46 of the said Act as also of the rules made by the State Government under section 78 of the Act and regulations made by the Board under section 79 relating to principles governing the fixing of grid tariff as also to principles governing the supply of electricity by the Board to the persons other than licensees under section 48 of the Act."

By clause (b) of the same paragraph, it contended that clause 30(a) which gave unilateral power to the Board to vary the charges was void and the exercise of such power would amount to recession of the contract. It further contended that the billing demand charge had no relation to the minimum fixed under the agreement and, therefore, was not enforceable, that the disconnection of the supply on January 18, 1961, was wrongful and when the plaintiff claims the minimum guaranteed amount, it, in effect, claims compensation for wrongful disconnection effected by the plaintiff. The defendant also made a counter-claim that it had overpaid the plaintiff a sum of Rs. 4,289.94 nP.

The trial Judge held that the defendant had power of fixing the tariff under the Act, but that it was incompetent to apply the revised rates of tariff to the contract in suit. As one of the side considerations to this question, he held that clause 30(a) of the contract was void and unenforceable. It was on this footing that the Judge held that the revised tariff could not be enforced by the Board. In consonance with this finding, he held that the Board was not entitled to enforce the payment of Rs. 9,841.45 nP. as minimum guaranteed payment nor was it entitled to charge the surcharge of Rs. 793.41 nP. and he allowed the defendant's counter-claim of Rs. 4,289.94 P. on the basis of old contractual rates as over payment.

The defendant appealed to the High Court Bench at Nagpur.

M. N. Phadke, M. W. Puranik and V. M. Golwalkar, for the appellant.
J. M. Thakar and C. J. Thakar, for the respondent.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after setting out the facts, proceeded.] The question is whether the revision of the tariff for the supply of the energy on a different principle is ultra vires the Act and/or the rules under the Act. The contention is to be found in para. 11(a) of the written statement where these words are used. Mr. Thakar was not able to show how the revised tariffs were in contravention of the provisions of the Act. When pressed to clarify his contention he said that the tariffs were not fixed in accordance with the regulations which is entirely a different matter. This clearly cannot mean that the Board has acted ultra vires the Act since we speak of an act being ultra vires when the maker of the act has no power or jurisdiction to do the thing. If the maker has got jurisdiction of doing the thing, but if it is done in contravention of the rules, one speaks of the act being only illegal. It is remarkable that though an allegation was made in para. 11 of the written statement in this connection, it was vague and no particular regulation was alleged to have been violated. Mr. Thakar has not been able to show in what manner any provision of any of the regulations has been violated. Plaintiff Board examined an engineer on its behalf but no questions have been put to him in support of the allegation that any provision of the regulations was violated while fixing the tariff. There is no substance, therefore, in this contention of Mr. Thakar.

Mr. Thakar contends that even if the Board has rightly revised the tariffs, the same could not be applied to the defendant because of the contract, that the unilateral power given to the Board by clause 30 to increase or decrease the charges for the supply was vague and indefinite and was therefore void, that such power which gave one of the parties to the contract to do something arbitrary was unenforceable and therefore the Board was not entitled to charge according to the new tariffs for the supply of the energy. In any case it is argued that it cannot claim the minimum demand charge under clause 34 of the contract as it has claimed for the unexpired period from February 1, 1961, to May 6, 1962, the Board having unjustifiably cut off the supply. He further contends that even if the Board were entitled to claim the minimum charges, under clause 22-A of the contract the defendant is liable to pay Rs. 3,281-4-0 only annually.

Mr. Thakar laid emphasis on cl. 30 of the contract as was done in the trial Court. He also referred to some other clauses which give the Board large powers and relied upon *Bennett v. Bennett*¹ and *Goodinson v. Goodinson*² in support of his contention that the clauses are void. We are only concerned with cl. 30 and not with others since the Board is not trying to enforce other clauses.

Much reliance was placed on cl. 30 in the trial Court and by Mr. Thakar even here. Clause 30(a) runs as follows:

"The rates and other charges set out in the schedule referred to in clause 20 hereof and the miscellaneous charges in the conditions of supply are those in force at the time of executing the agreement in the Southern Grid area. The consumer shall be eligible for whatever reduction in or rebate from these rates and/or in charges is granted by the Board and will be liable for whatever surcharge or increase upon them as may from time to time be charged by the Board or be liable to pay any new rate or tariff or amount which the board may in its discretion deem fit to charge in lieu of the payments fixed under this agreement."

Surprisingly enough, the words of clause 20 have been overlooked. Clause 20 runs as follows:

"The consumer shall pay to the Board every month, charges for the electrical energy supplied to the consumer during the preceding month at the Board's tariff applicable for the Southern Grid area, to the class of service and in force from time to time. A copy of the current H. T. tariff No. II Slab Tariff of Notification No. 5-921 4-2 dated 1.12.52 applicable to the consumer is set out in the Schedule attached to this agreement."

This clause provides in essence that the consumer would be liable to pay to the Board every month according to the tariff in force from time to time, that is, the prescribed rates for the supply in accordance with the tariff then in force. It is clear that cl. 30(a) is nothing but a corollary to the liability created between the parties under cl. 20. It only prescribes the consequences of what can happen if the tariff rates are changed. The consumer would be entitled to reduction in the charge if the tariff rates were reduced. On the other hand, the consumer had to pay a higher charge if the tariff were increased. The real liability to pay according to the tariffs in force from time to time is created under cl. 20 itself which prescribes the charges.

The first question is whether the power given to the Board to change the tariffs is so arbitrary that it should be held to be unenforceable. Clause 30 has to be read with cl. 20, the effect being that the consumer must pay for the energy supplied at the prevalent tariff rates. The Act and the rules prescribe the principles and the manner of fixing the same. Tariff is not to be fixed for a particular individual but for all to whom the energy is supplied. It is, therefore, impossible to hold that cl. 30 read with cl. 20 gives arbitrary powers to the Board to vary the contract unilaterally and, therefore, is rendered void. It is not necessary to consider the matter in greater details, as in *Amalgamated Electricity Co. v. N. S. Bathena*³ a similar provision in a contract between a licensee and a consumer was upheld by the Supreme Court. In that case the judgment of J.C. Shah J. in this Court in *Babulal v. Chopda Electricity Supply Co.*⁴ where it was held that a term, such as this, which gave rights to a licensee to vary the charges for the supply unilaterally could not be enforced, was considered and was disapproved by the Supreme Court. The conditions prescribed for the exercise of the power of fixing the tariff or for revising it obtaining in that case are applicable in the present case as well. The Board has not got unbridled discretion in fixing the tariff. Under s. 46 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948, the tariff has to be fixed or revised, in accordance with the regulations framed under s. 79 of the Act and it is to be done on the basis of certain principles. Having regard to the provisions of the Act, it cannot be said that the agreement of the consumer to pay according to the tariff which may be in force from time to time is illegal or void, and if that is so, it is impossible to hold that cl. 30 (a), which is merely a corollary to cl. 20, can be void and unenforceable. In view of this, it is not necessary to consider the other cases cited on behalf of the defendant by Mr. Thakar. He referred us to the decision of the Supreme Court in *Keshavlal v. Lalbhai T. Mills Ltd.*⁵ the relevant observation being in para. 8. The principle of this case has no application to the present case. In the present case the plaintiff is a statutory body which has no unbridled power to fix the tariffs according to its arbitrary choice. It has to be fixed according to the well defined principles contained in the Act as well as the regulations framed and the observations, therefore, made in that case have no possible application to the present case.

Mr. Thakar then contended that under cls. 20 and 30 of the contract he is not liable to pay the demand charges. He argues that even if the charges for the supply could be varied by the Board, the principle of the charges must remain the same and the Board would have no power to change the principle. In other words, he contends that the system of charging cannot be changed. There might have been some substance in the contention if the minimum billing demand charge were not a part of the tariff. In order to see whether the "demand charge" is a part of the tariff, we must go to s. 46 which enables the Board to fix the Grid tariff from time to time. Sub-section (3) of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948 says:

"The Grid Tariff shall be so framed as to include as part of the charge, and show separately a fixed kilowatt charges component and a running charges component:

Provided that if in respect of any area the electricity to be sold by the Board is wholly or substantially derived from hydro-electric sources, the running charges component may be omitted."

3 [1964] A.I.R. S.C. 1598.

4 [1955] A.I.R. Bom. 182, s.c. 56 Bom.

5 [1958] A.I.R. S.C. 512.

Sub-section (4) says:

"The fixed kilowatt charges component in the Grid Tariff may be framed so as to vary with the magnitude of maximum demand."

Sub-section (6) says:

"The Grid Tariff may contain provisions for—

(a) adjustment of price having regard to the power factor of supply taken or the cost of fuel or both;

(b) a minimum charge related to a past or prospective demand of a licensee on the Board."

Having regard to the terms of s. 46, it must be held that the demand charge is a part of the tariff, and if that is so, by cl. 20, the defendant is bound to pay this charge as well as the charge for the actual energy consumed.

It is then contended by Mr. Thakar that, in any event, after discontinuation of the supply, defendant was not liable to pay either the minimum charges fixed by the contract or any amount as the discontinuance of supply was not justified. He contends that as there was a bona fide dispute between them in that the defendant was contending on the one hand that it should be charged at the contractual rate, while the Board was insisting on applying the new tariff rate, the non-payment of the bill did not justify the Board in disconnecting the supply under s. 24(1) of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, and that the disconnection of the supply being wrongful it could not claim the minimum charge. Mr. Phadke disputes this contention of Mr. Thakar. He contends in the first place that such a contention has not been raised in the written statement and as the question as to whether there was a bona fide dispute between the parties or not, is a question of fact the same ought not to be allowed to be raised now. Secondly, he contends that s. 24(1) of the Indian Electricity Act is not applicable in the case of the Board and, if that is so, it acted only under cl. 34 of the contract under which, the defendant having failed to pay the charges for the supply, the Board was entitled to discontinue the same and to demand the minimum charges which was the "minimum demand charge" fixed under the new tariff.

It is difficult to appreciate the contention that the question as to whether or not the supply was properly discontinued has not been raised in the pleadings. The defendant's contention was all along that he was prepared to pay the charges according to the contractual rate, the contract was for a period of five years and the Board had no right to apply the new tariff rates and that the charges under the new tariffs were excessive. In para. 1 of the written statement the defendant alleges that the disconnection of the supply on all these occasions was wrongful. As to the minimum charges in para. 2(b) of the written statement it says that the plaintiff wrongfully cut off the supply and hence it was not entitled to claim the minimum charges. True that it is not contended that the Board was not entitled to discontinue the supply under s. 24 of the Electricity Act as there was a dispute between the parties. But then law need not be pleaded. It is our duty to apply the law to facts proved and found. Though, therefore, the point was not argued in the Court below, we would not be justified in not allowing the defendant to argue the point.

The question is whether there was a bona fide dispute between the parties when the defendant failed to pay for the supply of energy and the supply was unjustifiably cut off. It is undoubtedly true that on two prior occasions, when the supply was discontinued, the defendant made full payment of the arrears and obtained reconnection of the supply. Even so, it cannot be denied in the present case that there was a genuine dispute between the parties. The defendant had entered into an agreement to take the supply and the plaintiff had agreed to supply the electrical energy for a period of five years. No doubt, cl. 20 which prescribes the rates shows that the rates were flexible in the sense that they were payable according to the tariff fixed by the Board from time to time. Even so, having regard to the terms of the contract and having regard to the fact that the system of charging was changed by the new tariff, it could not be said that the defendant could not honestly believe that the Board would not be entitled to charge according to the new tariffs. Mr. Phadke contended that the defendant did not raise this dispute until after the last notice exh. 48 was given on January 4, 1960. But then, even prior to that the defendant had by exh. 47 challenged the right of the Board to levy the new tariff. Similarly, thereafter by exh. P-52 the defendant had already challenged the rights of the Board to revise the rates. Moreover, the decision of this Court in Babulal's case supported this stand. In view of the bona fide dispute between the parties it cannot be said that the Board was justified in cutting off the electric supply.

In *Corporation of Nagpur v. Nagpur E.L. & P.Co.*⁶ it was held that if there was a bona fide dispute between the parties as to what is payable, the failure to pay the dues does not amount to a neglect to pay within the meaning of s. 24(1) and action under s. 24(1) could not be taken by an electrical undertaking in such a case. If the Board, therefore, is obliged to act under s. 24(1), then in view of the dispute between the parties, it could be said that the Board was not justified in cutting off the supply. The question is whether s. 24(1) is applicable to the Board.

Section 26 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948, applies some of the provisions of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, to the Board and is as follows:

"26. Subject to the provisions of this Act, the Board shall, in respect of the whole State, have all the power and obligations of a licensee under the Indian Electricity Act, 1910 (9 of 1910), and this Act shall be deemed to be the licence of the Board for the purposes of that Act."

The first proviso excludes the application of certain sections and some clauses in the schedule to the Electricity Act, 1910, the sections being 3 to 11, subss. (2) and (3) of s. 21 and ss. 22, 23 and 27 of that Act and clauses I to V, VII and IX to XII of the Schedule to that Act. The second proviso applies clause VI of the Schedule in the Electricity Act to the Board in respect of an area where distribution mains have been laid by the Board and the supply of energy through any of them has commenced. The effect of s. 26 is that if the Board has laid supply mains and has commenced to supply the energy, then it becomes a licensee to that extent and acquires all the powers and obligations under that Act (Electricity Act of 1910) and all the provisions of that Act must apply except such as are excluded. As s. 24 is not excluded by the provisions it must apply to the Board and it has to act strictly in accordance with the same.

Mr. Phadke contends that the Board cannot be tied down to the limited power of cutting off the supply contained in s. 24 because it is not obligatory on it to supply electrical energy. Mr. Phadke relies on s. 70 of the Electricity (Supply) Act which, he says, exempts the application of the Electricity Act, 1910. It only says that no provision of the Indian Electricity Act, 1910, or of any rules made thereunder or of any instrument having effect by virtue of such law or rule shall, so far as it is inconsistent with any of the provisions of the Act, have any effect.

In order that the sections which are expressly applied by s. 26 should be excluded by s. 70 of this Act, the provisions thereof must be shown to be inconsistent with the provisions of the Electricity (Supply) Act. It is said that s. 49 of the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1948, vests a discretion in the Board to supply electrical energy to a consumer and is, therefore, in conflict with s. 24 of the Electricity Act and, therefore, s. 24 ought not to be applied. It is not possible to accept this contention. Section 49 itself provides that the Board may supply electricity to any person subject to the provisions of the Act and of the regulations made in this behalf and one of the provisions of the Act is s. 26 under which it has got the same powers and the obligations as a licensee. We cannot disregard the word "obligations" in s.

26. Once it has laid the mains and started the supply it is obliged to continue to do so as a licensee. Section 24(1), therefore, applies to the case of a supply of electrical energy by the Board to a consumer and, if that is so, it can discontinue the supply only if the conditions of s. 24(1) are satisfied, i.e. there must be neglect on the part of the consumer to pay the electrical charges. If cl. 34 gave wider power to the Board, to that extent, that power would be ineffective.

It is not also correct to say that the Board acted only under cl. 34 of the contract. When the defendant called upon the Board to refer the dispute to arbitration in accordance with the contract by exh. 47, the Board gave notice by exh. 48 under s. 24(1) of the Electricity Act threatening to disconnect the supply if the bills were not cleared. This shows that the Board itself acted in exercise of the powers vested in it under s. 24 of the Electricity Act.

Civil Procedure Code (Act V of 1908), O.XLI r. 33—Trial Court refusing to pass decree in favour of plaintiff for non-production of succession certificate—Succession certificate produced before appellate Court—Whether appellate Court can reverse decree of trial Court.

If a plaintiff fails to produce a succession certificate in the trial Court and on that ground the trial Court refuses to pass a decree in his favour to which he is otherwise entitled, the appellate Court can reverse the decree of the trial Court if the succession certificate is produced before the appellate Court.

ONE Sarjubai (plaintiff) was the widow of one Madangopal Raghunathdas, who died on May 19, 1953. Madangopal formed a joint family with Ramgopal and Ramchandra and they were running a joint family shop, but they were messing separately since about 1933. The plaintiff was the third wife of Madangopal who married her in the year 1943. At the time of his third marriage Madangopal was about 47 or 48 years old and the plaintiff was a young girl of about 14 or 15 years old. She alleged that because of this disparity in their ages and because it was the third marriage of Madangopal, when the proposal for the marriage was mooted her father insisted on Madangopal making a provision for her for the future and insisted that he paid a sum of one lakh rupees. Ultimately, it was agreed that he would pay a sum of Rs. 75,000 before the marriage. She said that accordingly before the marriage was celebrated, a sum of Rs. 75,000 was handed over by Madangopal to her father. After the marriage for about three years the money remained with her father, but later on in about 1947 when her father was ill and he came for treatment at the house of Madangopal the same was handed over to her. Out of that amount Madangopal deposited a sum of Rs. 50,000 on her behalf in the firm of Pukhraj (defendant) who was very well-known to her husband and who was keeping such deposits. The sum was kept with him on September 1, 1948, and the amount was to carry interest. On or about August 29, 1951, an account was made up between her husband and the defendant and it was ascertained that Rs. 42,000 were in balance with the defendant. For this amount the defendant passed a writing. She alleged that she had asked her husband to deposit the amount in her name but when she enquired about it she came to know that her husband did not follow the instructions but deposited the amounts in his own name, that her husband had no interest in the said amount and that it belonged exclusively to her. In the alternative she claimed that if the amount were held to belong to Madangopal, then after his death she being the sole heir of Madangopal she was entitled to the amount as heir and legal representative of Madangopal. She claimed Rs. 42,000 as being due on August, 29, 1951 and Rs. 7,560 on account of interest at six per cent. per annum. She claimed in all a sum of Rs. 49,000 and odd.

The defendant denied the plaintiff's allegations and raised various contentions. The trial Judge raised a number of issues including the following :

"8. Whether a succession certificate is necessary to draw up the decree?"

The trial Judge negatived the plaintiff's case that Madangopal had deposited Rs. 50,000 belonging to her in his own name and he further held that Madangopal had opened Khatas with the defendant and had deposited amounts in his own name, with the defendant but it had nothing to do with the plaintiff's claim. He, however, did not find what was due to Madangopal as he negatived the plaintiff's right to a decree on the alternative ground for the reason that she had not produced succession certificate. He, therefore, dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court Bench at Nagpur.

D. B. Padhye and G. R. Bhangde, for the appellant.

P. P. Deo and G. B. Shidhaye, for the respondents.

PATEL J. [His Lordship after stating the facts and dealing with points not material to this report, proceeded.] Mr. Padhye then contended that in any event the plaintiff is entitled to a decree as the heir of Madangopal as she has now obtained the necessary succession certificate. In this connection, it must be noted that in the trial Court the plaintiff had not produced succession certificate, nor had she made any application whatsoever for the same. It seems that during the pendency of the suit on February 22, 1955, the learned Judge had drawn the attention of the plaintiff's advocate to the fact that as regards her alternative claim she would have to produce a succession certificate. As at the date of the judgment she had not obtained succession certificate, he dismissed her suit without considering the alternative claim.

It is argued by Mr. Deo, that it is not within the power of the appellate Court to reverse the decree of the trial Court on the ground that she has now obtained a succession certificate. Mr. Deo relies on *Fateh Chand v. Muhammad Bakhsh*¹ and *Mt. Habib Fatma v. Mt. Arjumand Khatun*², where it is held that if the plaintiff failed to produce succession certificate in the trial Court, the appellate Court could not reverse the decree even if a succession certificate were produced before the appellate Court.

We fail to see why on first principles the appellate Court is not entitled to make a decree in favour of the plaintiff if she is otherwise entitled to have it and when she has produced the succession certificate. In England, an appeal is always regarded as rehearing of the suit and the appellate Court moulds its decree according to the circumstances. See: *Quilley v. Mapleson*³. This was accepted in *Attorney-General Birmingham, Tame and Rea District Drainage Board*⁴, where it was said (p. 788) :

"An appeal to the Court of Appeal is by way of rehearing, and the Court may make such order as the judge of first instance could have made if the case had been heard by him at the date on which the appeal was heard."

³ (1882) 9 Q.B.D. 372.

⁴ [1912] A.C. 788.

As early as 1902 Bhashyam Ayyangar J. in *Kristnama Chariar v. Mangammal*⁵ under the older procedural Code held that hearing of the appeal was in the nature of rehearing of suit and this was reaffirmed under the present Code in *Kanakayya v. Janardhana Padhi*⁶ after full discussion. Order XLI, r. 33, of the present Code is similar to O. LVIII, r. 5, of the Rules of the Supreme Court. The reasoning, therefore, in Quilter v. Mapleson and Attorney-General v. Birmingham, Tame and Rea District Drainage Board for holding that appeal is in the nature of a rehearing of the suit applies.

In *Lachmeshwar v. Keshwar Lal*⁷ a question arose as to whether the Bihar Money Lenders Act which was enacted after the decision of the High Court but during the pendency of appeal in the Federal Court could be applied. Varadachariar J. (with whom Gwyer C. J. agreed) considered the question and affirmed the principles laid down in the Madras cases referred to above observing that (p. 18) :

"...There is no reason to suppose that the powers of this Court when acting as a Court of appeal are less extensive than those of the High Courts when hearing an appeal." In *Rustomji v. Sheth Purshottam Das*⁸ and *Sakharam Mahadev Dange v. Hari Krishna Dange*⁹ the Court took notice of subsequent events and moulded the decree necessitated by the change of circumstances.

The decision in Fateh Chand v. Muhammad Bakhsh was rendered under the old Code and there is no discussion about the powers of the Appellate Court under the procedural Code. It is said "no subsequent production of the certificate could show that the decree of the Subordinate Judge was contrary to law". The later case follows the earlier and the Madras decisions are not even noticed. We cannot, therefore, with respect, agree with the ratio of the decisions in those two cases. The production of the certificate therefore is a circumstance which must now be taken into account. The obstruction in her way now disappears and she be entitled to the decree if she succeeds on merits.

Cantonments Electoral Rules, 1945. Rules 44, 45, 42—Election petition presented without depositing security deposit—Maintainability of petition.

Rule 44 of the Cantonments Electoral Rules, 1945, is mandatory and, therefore, an election petition presented without depositing the security deposit as required by the rule is not competent and cannot be heard.

*K. Kamaraja Nadar v. Kunju Thevar*¹ and *Chandrika Prasad v. Shiv Prasad*², explained.

THE facts appear in the judgment.

C. R. Dalvi, for the petitioners.

PATEL J. These two petitions arise out of elections to the Cantonment Board, Kirkee, held on February 9, 1964. Results of the elections were declared on February 10, 1964, at which the petitioners in both the cases were declared elected in respect of their respective Wards. The opponent in each case, who was a candidate in his respective Ward, filed on February 17, 1964, an election petition challenging the election of the respective petitioner. At the time of presenting the election petition, the deposit which is required to be made under r. 44 of the Election Rules framed under the Act, was not made. Ultimately, on September 4, 1964, the learned Judge framed the issues in the presence of both the sides, and at that time it was brought to the notice of the learned Judge by the respective petitioners that deposits as required by r. 44 were not made. The respective advocates of opponent No. 1 in each case then made an application that they should be allowed to make the deposit, and they were allowed to do so, even though the petitioners opposed. After the deposit was made, the petitioners insisted that the learned Judge should decide the preliminary issue as to whether the election petitions were competent, inasmuch as the opponents had not complied with r. 44. The learned Judge returned the finding in opponents' favour. These petitions seek to challenge this finding. The question now before us is whether or not the election petition can be heard as there is a breach of r. 44 in view of the opponent not having deposited the security deposit as required by it.

We may refer to the relevant rules viz. rr. 42, 43, 44 and 45, in this connection. They are as follows :

42. No election shall be called in question except by an election petition presented in accordance with these rules.

43. A petition calling in question the validity of an election or the return of a particular candidate may be presented in writing to the District Judge of the District within which the election has been held (or where there is no District Judge, to such Judicial Officer as the State Government may appoint in that behalf), within seven days after the date on which the result of the election was declared either by a person who was a candidate at the election or by not less than five persons entitled to vote at the said election :

Provided that no such petition shall be presented on the ground either that the name of any person qualified to vote has been omitted from the electoral roll or that the name of any person not so qualified has been inserted in the roll.

44. Every petition shall be accompanied by a deposit of one hundred and fifty rupees in cash or in Government promissory notes of equal value at the market rate of the day as security for the costs likely to be incurred.

Provided that where such petition relates to the election of a candidate belonging to the Scheduled Castes or the Scheduled Tribes, the amount of such deposit shall be seventy-five rupees only.

At the conclusion of the inquiry, the deposit or, if the petitioner has been directed under Rule 46 to pay costs, the balance, if any of the deposit after deduction of those costs, shall be refunded to the petitioner.

45. Where a petition has been presented under rule 43 and the security deposited as required by rule 44, the District Judge (or the officer appointed in accordance with rule 43), or any Judicial Officer subordinate to him and not below such rank as the State Government may by notification prescribe in this behalf to whom the District Judge may transfer the petition, shall after notice to all candidates for the ward concerned at the election (other than such of them as may be petitioners) hold such inquiry as he deems necessary.

It is to be noticed that under r. 42, the election petition is to be presented in accordance with the Rules. The Rules prescribe the manner in which it is to be presented and the condition which has to be complied with, the condition being that there shall be a deposit as required by r. 44. The language of r. 44 is mandatory, and unless there is any indication in the body of the Rules read as a whole or in the rule itself that the word "shall" was not intended to have the mandatory meaning, the Court would not be justified in construing the word "shall" as "may". If at all, the provisions of r. 45 indicate that the direction is mandatory inasmuch as it provides that the District Judge shall enter into the inquiry "where a petition has been presented and the security deposited as required by Rule 44." If the word "shall" in r. 44 was not intended to be mandatory, the wording would have been "after a petition has been presented under Rule 43 and the security deposited as required by Rule 44." This is the only rule which has a bearing on the construction of r. 44, and the only construction to which it can lead is the one indicated by us.

In this connection, it must also be remembered that elections are not to be set aside as a matter of course. To be a candidate at the election, to be elected as a Member of the Board and to have the election of a particular candidate set aside are matters of right created by the statute, and in order that any one should be enabled to take advantage of the statute to have the same set aside, its terms must be strictly complied with; and this is more so when one has to remember that elections ought not to be set aside very readily. That this was the intention of the framers of the Act and the Rules is shown by the provisions of the Rules which require several matters to be proved before an election could be set aside.

The learned trial Judge, however, relied on two decisions of the Supreme Court which, according to him, favour the construction of the Rule adopted by him. These decisions are in *K. Kamaraja Nadar v. Kunju Thevar*¹ and *Chandrika Prasad v. Shiv Prasad*². Both these cases arose under the Representation of the People Act, 1951. Under this Act, deposit had to be made under s. 117 which is as follows:

"The petitioner shall enclose with the petition a Government treasury receipt showing that a deposit of Rs. 1,000 has been made by him either in the Government Treasury or in the Reserve Bank of India in favour of the Secretary to the Election Commission as security of the cost of the petition."

In the first case, it is not that the Supreme Court construed the word "shall" to mean "may". It only observed (p. 697) :

"...the words 'in favour of the Secretary to the Election Commission' used in s. 117 are directory and not mandatory in their character."

And holding so, it held that as the deposit was, in fact, made but only in the name of the Election Commission, there was substantial compliance with the section, and, therefore, the petition was not liable to be dismissed, the deposit having been made at the time of the election petition and the relevant chalan having accompanied the same. While dealing with this point, the learned Judge observed (p. 697) :

"...What is of the essence of the provision contained in S. 117 is that the petitioner should furnish security for the costs of the petition, and should enclose along with the petition a Government Treasury receipt showing that a deposit of one thousand rupees has been made by him...."

It is no authority for the proposition that the word "shall" may be read as "may". In the second case, again, the deposit was made and the relevant chalan was presented along with the election petition as required by the Act. It was, however, stated in column two

"security deposits for Election Petition of Bargi Assembly Constituency No. 97, District Jabalpur, Madhya Pradesh, refundable by order of the Election Commission of India, New Delhi."

An objection was taken to the latter words, and it was contended that it should not be regarded as deposit under s. 117. The Supreme Court rejected this contention on the ground that the deposit was made, that it clearly indicated the purpose for which it was made, and the words which were subsequently added did not render the deposit any the less one under s. 117. This again is no authority for saying that the word "shall" can be construed as "may".

In our view, the learned Judge was in error in holding that the deposit could be made at any time before he took up the hearing of the case. In this view of the matter, the petitions succeed. We set aside the order made by the learned Judge below and dismiss the election petitions of the petitioners in both the cases.

In each case, opponent No. 1 will pay the costs of the petitioner.

Election petitions dismissed.

SHAMJI DEOJI v. NAMDEO BAPUJI DHANDE.*

Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Vidarbha Region and Kutch area) Act (Bom. XCIX of 1958), Secs. 52,† 10††—Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act (XXIV of 1951), Sec. 9‡—Berar Agricultural Leases Rules, 1952. Rule 9‡‡—Landlord terminating tenancy under s. 9(1) of Act XXIV of 1951 and obtaining possession of land—Landlord selling land two years after obtaining possession—Application by tenant under s. 52 of Bom. Act XCIX of 1958—Whether tenant entitled to claim restoration of possession from transferee—Applicability of s. 52.

The word "landlord" in s. 52 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Vidarbha Region and Kutch area) Act, 1958, is restricted to those landlords who had terminated the tenancy under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, and who were in possession of land on the date of the coming into force of the aforesaid Tenancy Act and on the date on which the cause of action for the ex-tenant to claim restoration of possession accrued.

Section 52 of the Tenancy Act postulates a case of the landlord who entered into possession after terminating the tenancy under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act but also continued to hold the ownership of the property as a tenure-holder after the Tenancy Act came into force and was in a position to comply with the provisions thereto; s. 52 cannot apply to a person who lawfully came on land prior to the coming into force of the Tenancy Act.

THE facts are stated in the judgment.

Decided, February 25, 1965.* Special Civil Application No. 21 of 1964.

†Sec. "52. (2) After the tenant has recovered possession under sub-section (1) he shall, subject to the provisions of this Act, hold such land on the same terms and conditions on which he held it at the time his tenancy was terminated.

(3) If the landlord has failed to restore possession of the land to the tenant as provided in sub-section (1), he shall be liable to pay such compensation to the tenant as may be determined by the Tahsildar for the loss suffered by the tenant on account of eviction.

(4) If at any time the tenant makes an application to the Tahsildar and satisfies him that the landlord has failed to comply within a reasonable time with the provisions of sub-section (1), the tenant shall be entitled on a direction by the Tahsildar to obtain immediate possession of the land and to such compensation as may be awarded by the Tahsildar for any loss caused to the tenant by eviction and by failure on the part of the landlord to restore or give possession of the land to him as required by sub-section (1)."

††Sec. "10. (1) A person who or whose predecessor-in-title held land as tenant or protected lessee on the first day of January 1953 or thereafter and who has subsequently been dispossessed by a surrender of tenancy before the date of the commencement of this Act may within a period of one year from the date of the commencement of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Vidarbha Region and Kutch Area) (Amendment) Act, 1960, apply to the Tahsildar for the restoration of his tenancy on the same terms and conditions on which he held the land before such surrender unless the land has been put to a non-agricultural use on or before the appointed day.

(2) On receipt of such application the Tahsildar shall enquire into the circumstances in which and the procedure under which such dispossession took place and if he is satisfied that such dispossession took place as a result of surrender and the consent of the tenant was procured by fraud, deceit, false representation or undue influence or pressure of any kind whatsoever or was otherwise in contravention of the provisions of the law applicable for the time being, he shall order the restoration of the possession of the land and the tenancy thereof to the tenant.

(3) Sub-sections (1) and (2) shall have effect notwithstanding that another person may be in possession of the land as a protected lessee or a tenant or otherwise, and where such other person is so in possession he shall be liable to be evicted."

‡Sec. "9. (6) If on re-entering upon any land after termination of the lease of a protected lessee in accordance with this section, a landholder fails at any time during such period as may be prescribed to utilise the land for the purpose for which the lease was terminated, the dispossessed lessee may apply to the Revenue Officer to put him in possession of the land from the commencement of the agricultural year next following; and the Revenue Officer shall, after hearing the landholder and making such enquiry as he deems fit, put the lessee in possession of the land if he is satisfied of the failure and also award him such sum by way of compensation as the Revenue Officer may consider sufficient."

‡‡"Rule 9. The period for the purpose of sub-section (6) of section 9 shall be two years from the date of re-entry by the landholder."

V. R. Mamohar, for the petitioner.

C. S. Dharmadhikari, for respondent No. 1.

ABHYANKAR J. The petitioners Shamji and Kisan purchased S. N. 110, having an area of 23 acres and 20 gunthas situate at village Bechkheda, from respondent No. 2 Udhao on foot of a registered sale deed dated February 23, 1957. They were in possession of this property when respondent No. 1 Namdeo filed an application purporting to be made under s. 32 of the new Tenancy Act on May 15, 1959. That application is at page 23 of the Paper Book. In that application Namdeo alleged that he was cultivating the field in dispute as a protected lessee for the year 1951-52 to 1954-55. The field was let out to him by Udhao, respondent No. 2, in his capacity as manager of the joint Hindu family of which his sons Vasant, Shyam and Jayant, respondents Nos. 3 to 5, were also members. Actual lease was given by Vasant who was the eldest son because Udhao was then in service in December 1954, which is obviously a mistake; actual date being November 24, 1954. Vasant sent a notice under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act terminating the tenancy of Namdeo on the ground that he needed the land for personal cultivation. In consequence of this notice, possession was given. As a matter of fact, Vasant started proceedings for possession by an application dated April 2, 1955, before the Sub-Divisional Officer and during the pendency of this application, on June 13, 1955, a petition jointly signed by Vasant on behalf of all the land-holders, and Namdeo, the tenant, came to be filed stating that the parties had settled the dispute amicably. The land-holders gave up the right to lease money for the agricultural year 1954-55 and the non-applicant had given up the right of cultivation and had placed the field in possession of the landholders. There is no date mentioned in this application when the landholders were placed in possession of the property.

The land-holders cultivated the land at home for the years 1955-56 and 1956-57 and sold it, as already stated, to the two petitioners under a sale-deed dated February 23, 1957. There is an averment in the written statement filed by the petitioners in para. 7 that their vendor, viz. previous land-holder, cultivated the land in question personally for two years after it was taken from Namdeo and then it was sold to the petitioners in 1957. On the other hand, the averment of Namdeo in para. 4 of his application under s. 52 was to the effect that the land-holder sold the said field to opponent No. 5, i.e. petitioner No. 1, in the year 1956, which he alleged was within two years from dispossession of Namdeo. There is no dispute that this averment, besides being vague as to the date of delivery of possession, was also wrong with regard to the date of sale. Neither counsel has been able to show from record whether there is any statement or evidence showing the date on which possession was delivered by Namdeo to the previous landlord.

In para. 8, Namdeo also averred that after termination of the tenancy of Namdeo, the original land-holder re-entered upon the land and cultivated it personally for sometime but before the expiry of two years from the date of re-entry, sold it and put the transferee, i.e. the petitioner, in possession of the land. Originally, only petitioner No. 1 was impleaded as non-applicant to this application, but subsequently, petitioner No. 2, who was a co-purchaser seems to have been allowed to be impleaded. Namdeo thus founded his claim to restoration of possession on the basis of the provisions of s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act on the allegation that his land-holder had obtained possession after termination of his tenancy for personal cultivation, that he had not cultivated for the requisite period of two years, that he had sold the land to the petitioners and, therefore, he was entitled to restoration of possession.

Out of the original land-holders, non-applicants Nos. 1 and 2 Udhao and Vasant, resisted the application on the ground that possession was taken as a result of the compromise between the parties after termination of the tenancy and by a notice under s. 9(I) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act and that they had cultivated the field for two years 1955-56 and 1956-57. In para. 5 they averred that it was not necessary for the then land-holders to obtain any refusal from the ex-tenant prior to the sale to the petitioners because there was no such law in existence when the sale of the field was effected, that the sale was legal and valid and its validity could not be challenged in the present proceedings. They reiterated that respondents Nos. 1 and 2 had used the land for the purposes stated in the notice for the requisite period from the date possession was given. They raised an alternative contention that the tenancy was terminated not by notice under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act but as a result of the compromise between the parties after which they cultivated the land for two years before the sale in 1957 to the petitioners.

The petitioners who came on land after termination of the proceedings and compromise denied the allegations regarding the notice proceeding before the revenue officer probably because they were not parties to it, but they reiterated that they purchased the land after the previous land-holder had cultivated it personally for two years and it was not necessary to offer tenancy to Namdeo because there was no such provision in any law requiring the land-holder to do so when sale was effected. As an alternative contention, they pointed out that on proper construction of s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act, if reference to the land-holder included successor-in-interest of the previous land-holder then the land was in personal cultivation of the 'land-holder', namely the petitioner, and it could not be said that the land-holder had ceased to cultivate it personally.

The Naib-Tahsildar held that Namdeo delivered possession of the field to Vasant for personal cultivation on termination of the tenancy and as a result of the compromise. In para. 8 of his order, the Naib-Tahsildar has discussed the question whether the previous landlord sold the land within two years of obtaining of possession. The discussion is much too brief and the Naib-Tahsildar observed that Udhao admitted that he sold the field on February 23, 1957, which is also the date of the sale-deed and from this statement of Udhao he inferred that the field was sold within two years from dispossession of the applicant Namdeo. I have already pointed out that there is no material or averment on record to indicate on what date actual possession was obtained by Udhao and Vasant. The recital in the compromise petition to which reference has been made only states that the non-applicant, i.e. Namdeo, had given up his rights of cultivation over the field and had placed the said field in possession of the applicant, i.e. the landlord, but makes no mention as to when possession was actually delivered. This date was required to be established specifically by Namdeo if he wanted to make out a case of non-compliance with the provisions of s. 9(6) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. Under r. 9 of the Rules framed under that Act, the period for the purpose of sub-s. (6) of s. 9 was put to be two years from the date of re-entry by the land-holder. If it was the contention of Namdeo that the sale was effected within the period of less than two years from the date of re-entry of the landlord, it was incumbent on Namdeo to establish this date of re-entry. The learned counsel for respondent Namdeo has not been able to show from the record any material or evidence to indicate what this date of re-entry is. On the other hand, the petitioners as well as the ex-landlords have claimed that the ex-landlords cultivated the field for two years. In the absence of any such evidence as to the date of re-entry, the Naib-Tahsildar could not have found that the sale was effected within the period of two years from the date of re-entry. The Naib-Tahsildar then goes on to observe in para. 9 of his order that the landlord did not obtain from Namdeo any refusal in writing to accept the tenancy on the same terms and conditions nor offered him a writing to give possession of the field to him. But these observations seem to have been made without bearing in mind that at the date on which the sale was effected the new Tenancy Act was not even conceived.

The sale is of February 25, 1957, and there was no law in force which required a landlord, who had obtained possession on terminating the tenancy on the ground of personal cultivation, and who had cultivated the land for two years, to offer it to the tenant before selling it to someone else. The right of sale which is inherent in every owner of a property, unless there is any breach of law, was untrammelled by any such legislation on the date of sale in favour of the petitioners. The Naib-Tahsildar, however, ordered restoration of possession to Namdeo under s. 52(1) of the new Tenancy Act.

The petitioners challenged this order by an appeal before the Sub-Divisional Officer. The Sub-Divisional Officer has observed in para. 4 of his order that the possession of the field was delivered by Namdeo on June 13, 1955, according to the compromise petition, a certified copy of which was on the record. This statement is obviously incorrect because the compromise petition does not state that possession was delivered on the date of the petition. In fact, it recites the fact of delivery of possession having been already given. The Sub-Divisional Officer held that the notice under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act could only be given by a recorded occupant. As Vasant was not a recorded occupant, he could not give notice under s. 9. He also observed that possession was given to Vasant and the field having been sold on February 23, 1957, Namdeo could have applied for restoration if the landlord had failed to cultivate the land personally for two years. But Namdeo did not so apply within the prescribed time under the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act; instead he moved the Naib Tahsildar under s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act by an application on May 16, 1959, and such application was held tenable. The Sub-Divisional Officer held that the application was not tenable at the instance of Namdeo because Vasant was not competent to serve a notice terminating the tenancy on Namdeo. Therefore, the notice had to be completely ignored. As there was no valid notice terminating the tenancy, the possession could not be said to have been obtained by the landlord as a result of the termination of tenancy under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act and, as this condition was not satisfied, Namdeo could not invoke the provisions of s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act for being restored to possession. He, therefore, allowed the appeal and dismissed the application of Namdeo.

Namdeo moved the Maharashtra Revenue Tribunal in revision against the order of the Sub-Divisional Officer rejecting his application. The Tribunal has allowed the revision application and granted relief to the ex-tenant Namdeo and it is this order which is impugned in this petition.

In para. 2 of its order, the Tribunal has observed that as a result of the alleged surrender the non-applicant tenure-holder Udhao took possession of the suit land on the same day i.e. June 13, 1955. This observation is obviously incorrect, firstly because, the field was not obtained as a result of surrender but on account of the termination of the tenancy after notice under s. 9(1) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act was given and also because there is no proof that possession was obtained by the previous landholder on June 13, 1955. All the revenue authorities seem to have fallen into the same error as to the date when re-entry was effected by the landholder after termination of the lease. After adverting to the conflicting decisions of the subordinate revenue authorities the Tribunal has referred to the points in controversy between the parties in para. 4 of its order. The Tribunal held that the notice given by Vasant was on behalf of the joint family, that it was acted upon and the tenancy was terminated as a result of that notice. It also held that the tenancy was terminated because the landholder desired the land for personal cultivation. An argument seems to have been advanced before the Tribunal that as a result of compromise Namdeo surrendered his rights in favour of the landholder and possession was taken privately and not in pursuance of the notice under s. 9(1) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act for termination of the tenancy. With regard to this submission the Tribunal observed as follows:

"The antecedents of the case are so glaring that it cannot but be observed that non-applicant tenure-holder Udhavrao wanted the suit land for personal cultivation and the proceedings before the Court were cut short under the device of surrender. So it makes no difference whether he got the possession due to surrender or under an order of the Court. The fact remains that the suit land was needed for his personal cultivation. But for the notice and the possession proceedings, the so-called surrender would not have seen the light of the day. In other words, the so-called surrender was a part and parcel of the proceedings under section 19 read with section 9 of the Berar Leases Act."

It is difficult to reconcile this finding with the issues which have been raised for decision in para. 4 or with the averments of the parties before the Court. The Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act did make a provision in s. 6 for surrender of a holding by a protected lessee. It was nobody's case that Namdeo had surrendered the leasehold rights under s. 6; on the other hand, it was specifically averred by Namdeo that notice under s. 9 was given terminating the tenancy. Thereafter, an application for possession was filed by the land-holder and during the pendency of enquiry on the basis of such application the parties arrived at a settlement. It is, therefore, difficult to see how possession could be said to have been obtained by the landlord as a result of surrender if that expression is to have any legal consequence in the light of the provision of the Tenancy Act. What seems to have taken place is that after possession proceedings were commenced by the landlord after terminating the tenancy under s. 9(1), the parties settled the dispute and possession was surrendered. Surrender of possession cannot be equated to surrender of tenancy. What was surrendered was possession and not surrender of tenancy rights which were already terminated by issue of a valid notice by the landlord under s. 9(1) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. Obviously, some confusion has been caused as a result of the argument addressed before the Tribunal when no case of surrender of tenancy was pleaded or proved by either party up to that stage. The operative finding however which has been given by the Tribunal on point No. 3 that possession of the suit land was taken by the tenure-holder Udhao on the ground of personal cultivation must be affirmed on the material on record.

The Tribunal then proceeded to consider whether the tenure-holder was guilty of contravention of s. 9(6) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. The Tribunal observed that applicant Namdeo parted with possession on June 13, 1955. I have already pointed out that there was no legal basis for this finding because nobody has averred to that effect nor is there any evidence as to the actual date of re-entry of the land-holder. Obviously, all the authorities seem to have been misled into thinking that possession was delivered by Namdeo on the date on which the compromise petition was presented because the compromise petition bears that date. But the compromise petition itself recites that possession had been delivered without disclosing the date of delivery of possession. It was for Namdeo to establish that there had been contravention of s. 9(6) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act and the rules made thereunder. Namdeo failed to lead evidence proving the date of re-entry of the landlord and this failure must result in a finding on that count being against him. On the assumption that possession was delivered or parted with by Namdeo on June 13, 1955, the Tribunal held that the field was transferred by sale before completion of two years from the date of delivery of possession. If that basic fact has not been proved by Namdeo, the finding that the sale was in contravention of the provisions of s. 9(6) cannot be sustained as Namdeo has failed to prove the date of re-entry.

The Tribunal then quoted the provisions of s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act and observed that the contesting opponents, viz. ex-landlords or petitioners, did not contend that Namdeo had refused in writing to accept the tenancy on the same terms and conditions, and therefore, the Tribunal refused to consider that point. Thus, the Tribunal restored the order of the Naib-Tahsildar on the short ground that Namdeo whose tenancy was terminated under s. 9(1) delivered possession on June 13, 1955, and the landlord who had obtained possession had parted with the property within two years thereof and, therefore, Namdeo was entitled to be restored to possession of the property under the first part of s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act.

The learned Member of the Tribunal then proceeded to consider whether any other provision of the new Tenancy Act was attracted by the facts as disclosed in the case. It is not clear whether either party invited the Tribunal to travel beyond the pleadings and give a finding on an issue which was not raised till then. The Tribunal then referred to s. 10 of the new Tenancy Act and observed that Namdeo who was a protected lessee having lost his remedy under s. 19(2) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act for restoration of possession of the land of which he was dispossessed except in accordance with the provisions of the Leases Act, was not without a remedy. It was held that he was entitled to file an application for restoration under s. 10 of the new Tenancy Act on the footing that he had surrendered his tenancy otherwise than in accordance with the provision of the Berar Leases Act. It is admitted by counsel appearing for respondent Namdeo that it was not his case before the Naib-Tahsildar or the Sub-Divisional Officer nor any facts were pleaded to show that Namdeo had surrendered his tenancy or possession otherwise than in accordance with the provisions of law, or that he was dispossessed as a result of such illegal surrender and, therefore, was entitled to restoration of possession under s. 10 of the new Tenancy Act. It is difficult to see how the Tribunal could have considered this question for the first time sitting as a Court of revision without any pleadings to that effect, any evidence or any finding being recorded by any of the subordinate authorities. The Tribunal has clearly acted in excess of its jurisdiction as a revisional Court in entertaining the plea for the first time before it, the plea which does not raise a pure question of law at all and which depended on various facts being proved as required by s. 10 of the new Tenancy Act. The learned counsel for the appellant has not attempted to support the order of the Tribunal on the basis of this finding of the Tribunal applying the provisions of s. 10 of the new Tenancy Act. It is, therefore, enough to say that the Tribunal could not have for the first time allowed the application of Namdeo on the basis that Namdeo was dispossessed and that he could claim restoration of possession under s. 10 of the new Tenancy Act.

The question that falls for consideration therefore is whether on the material on record Namdeo was entitled to claim restoration of possession invoking the provisions of s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act. That section is as follows:

"52. (1) Where after terminating the tenancy of any land under section 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act, 1951, or under section 38, 39 or 39A of this Act, the landlord has taken possession of such land and he fails to use the land for the purpose specified in the notice given under the said section 9 or as the case may be, section 38, 39 or 39A within one year from the date on which he took possession or ceases to use it at any time for any of the aforesaid purposes within twelve years from the date on which he took such possession, the landlord shall forthwith restore possession of the land to the tenant whose tenancy was terminated by him, unless he has obtained from the tenant his refusal in writing to accept the tenancy on the same terms and conditions or has offered in writing to give possession of the land to the tenant on the same terms and conditions and the tenant has failed to accept the offer within three months of the receipt thereof:

Provided that no refusal of the tenant shall be valid unless it has been verified before the Tahsildar in the prescribed manner."

I have already shown that there is no warrant for the conclusion of any of the authorities below in the absence of evidence or plea to that effect, that the previous landlord had effected an entry on land after termination of the tenancy under s. 9(1) of the Berar Leases Act within two years of February 23, 1957. In fact, Namdeo has failed to establish the date of re-entry. On the other hand, it has been averred by the ex-landlord as well as the petitioners that after termination of the tenancy by notice the landlord was in possession of the property for two years and cultivated it for the years 1955-56 and 1956-57. It is however contended that after the coming into force of the new Tenancy Act, which puts s. 52 on the statute book, it was necessary for the landlord not to cease to make the same use of the land for a period of 12 years from the date of re-entry on the land. In other words, if a landlord like Udhao had obtained possession after terminating the lease under s. 9(1) of the Berar Leases Act, parted with possession after two years by sale or other valid mode of transfer then permissible, the moment s. 52(1) came into force the ex-tenant could claim restoration of possession from whosoever is found on land if the land was not to be found in personal cultivation of the ex-landlord. It is difficult to accept this interpretation of s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act. It has not been shown that there was any legal impediment under the provision of any statute or any other principle which in any manner curtailed the right of Udhao as owner of the property to dispose it of by sale or by other legal mode of transfer. The petitioners purchased the property in 1957 and there was no legal impediment to their acquiring property from Udhao merely because the property was previously under the tenancy of Namdeo but whose tenancy rights were terminated by a valid notice under s. 9(1) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. It cannot, therefore, be said that the petitioners came on the land or acquired the rights in the property otherwise than by legal method. On the date the new Tenancy Act came into force, the property was owned by the petitioners and was in their personal cultivation. Only argument that was open to the contesting respondents in this case was to put an interpretation on s. 52 and in particular on the word "landlord" as meaning successors-in-title of original landlord. In other words, what is contended is that the word "landlord" in s. 52(1) means not only the landlord who had terminated his tenancy of the land under s. 9 and taken possession of the land from his tenant but also his successors-in-title and because the ex-landlord or the land-holder who had terminated the tenancy was not personally cultivating the land either on the date the Act came into force or had made himself incapable of cultivating the land personally for a period of 12 years from the date he effected re-entry, ex-tenant like Namdeo had been granted the right to be restored to possession by evicting whosoever was introduced on land even though by a valid transfer effected prior to the coming into force of the new Tenancy Act. There are several difficulties in accepting this interpretation.

The section, in the first place, begins by referring to termination of the tenancy of any land under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. Such termination could be made by the landlord by issuing a notice under s. 9. Then the section speaks of the failure to use the land for the purpose specified in the notice. One of purposes which could be specified in the notice under s. 9 is the purpose of personal cultivation. So the failure to use the land for the purpose specified in the notice means failure personally to cultivate the land. But this failure must be within one year which words could only be appropriately read in conjunction with other contingency viz. notice of termination under s. 38 or 39 of the new Tenancy Act. So the failure referred to in the first part of the section must be failure to cultivate personally according to the notice under s. 9(1) and according to the provisions of s. 9(6) of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. Further requirement of the section is not only that there must be user of the land according to the notice for which the tenancy has been terminated but such user must not cease for 12 years next following the date on which possession was taken. This requirement could be satisfied only by that category of landlords who had obtained possession and would be continuing on land as landlord. The section creates a right in the ex-tenant of such land to claim restoration at any point of time within a period of 12 years from the date he was dispossessed. The section also creates an obligation on such landlord that the moment such landlord ceases to cultivate the land personally, forthwith to restore possession of the land to the tenant from whom he obtained possession and whose tenancy he terminated. Now, this requirement is possible only by a landlord who is in possession and who is in a position physically to restore possession to the tenant whose tenancy such landlord had terminated under s. 9 of the Berar Regulation of Agricultural Leases Act. It is difficult to see how the landlord who had already transferred ownership of the property for a consideration in favour of another person could at all forthwith transfer possession of property when he had no dominion or control over such possession or property. There is a further requirement in the section which permits a landlord to retain possession if he has obtained from the tenant refusal in writing to accept the tenancy on the same terms and conditions. Even this condition is impossible of fulfilment because the person who can give the tenancy rights is now the transferee of land who has come on land prior to the coming into force of the Act and not the ex-landlord. All these difficulties are created because the interpretation that is sought to be put on s. 52 postulates that the Legislature anyhow wanted the ex-tenant to be restored to land the moment the ex-landlord transferred the land and was not in personal cultivation. I do not think that such effect is intended by the provisions of s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act.

In this connection it is worth while to compare the provision made by the Legislature in a somewhat similar contingency. Under s. 10 of the new Tenancy Act provision is made for restoration of possession to tenants who are dispossessed after January 1, 1953, in certain circumstances. That provision lays down that a person either himself or whose predecessor-in-title held land as tenant or protected lessee on the first day of January 1953 and thereafter and who has subsequently been dispossessed by a surrender of tenancy before the date of the commencement of this Act may apply within a period of one year from the date of the commencement of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands (Amendment) Act, 1960, to the Tahsildar for the restoration of his tenancy on the ground that dispossession took place as a result of surrender procured by fraud, deceit, false representation or undue influence or pressure of any kind or was otherwise in contravention of the provisions of the law applicable. Sub-section (3) of s. 10 specifically provides that relief shall be given to such ex-tenant notwithstanding that another person may be in possession of the land as a protected lessee or a tenant or otherwise, and where such other person is so in possession he shall be liable to be evicted. Thus, where the Legislature intended to create an overriding right in favour of the ex-tenant who could successfully challenge his dispossession because it was not in accordance with law, that right could be enforced not only against the ex-landlord but against any one who was introduced on land by the landlord either as tenant or as successor-in-title, in other words, a transferee. A comparison of these two provisions will, therefore, clearly show that s. 52 could not be interpreted to affect the rights of persons like the petitioners who had already acquired ownership of property long before the new Tenancy Act came into force. The word 'landlord' in s. 52, therefore, must be construed as restricted to those landlords who had terminated the tenancy under s. 9 and who were in possession of land on the date of the coming into force of the new Tenancy Act and on the date on which the cause of action for the ex-tenant to claim restoration of possession accrued. The requirement that such landlord shall forthwith restore tenant to possession postulates the landlord's physical possession of the property as well as any legal dominion over it. If by legal process of transfer, the landlord's title becomes vested in some other person it is not possible to hold that such person will be liable to restore possession and the ex-tenant to enforcement of s. 52 of the new Tenancy Act.

apply to a person who lawfully came on land prior to the coming into force of the Act. It will be difficult to suggest that the transfer effected which was lawful prior to the coming into force of the new Tenancy Act would become onerous and impose duties on transferees by this legislation being put on the statute book and after a valid transfer in the manner effected in this case.

Thus, the result is that the petition is allowed and the orders of the Naib-Tahsildar as well as the Tribunal are set aside. Namdeo is not entitled to restitution of possession. His petition is liable to be dismissed. In the circumstances, however, there will be no order as to costs.

ABHYANKAR J. This is a tenant's petition under art. 227 of the Constitution. One Narayan was the landlord of two fields Survey No. 16/2, area 14 acres and 29 gunthas at village Akkalkot, and Survey No. 105/1, area 7 acres and 12 gunthas, of village Akola. Both the fields were being cultivated by the petitioner under a lease granted by Narayan.

On May 4, 1961, Narayan gave a notice to the petitioner that he had failed to pay the lease money for the year 1960-61. The lease money was not paid for both the fields. By the notice the petitioner was called upon to pay the amount of lease money within a period of three months. In spite of the notice the petitioner did not pay the amounts of rent in arrears.

Narayan, therefore, filed an application on September 27, 1961, for possession under s. 36 read with s. 19 of the new Tenancy Act. In those proceedings the petitioner admitted that Rs. 159 were due from him to the land-

*Decided, April 7, 1965. Special Civil Application No. 454 of 1963.

"30(1) Where any tenancy of any land held by any tenant is terminated for non-payment of rent and the landlord files any proceeding to eject the tenant, the Tahsildar shall call upon the tenant to tender to the landlord the rent in arrears together with the costs of the proceeding, within three months from the date of the order, and if the tenant complies with such order, the Tahsildar shall, in lieu of making an order for ejectment, pass an order directing that the tenancy had not been terminated and thereupon the tenant shall hold the land as if the tenancy had not been terminated :

Provided that if the Tahsildar is satisfied that in consequence of total or partial failure of crops or similar calamity the tenant has been unable to pay the rent due, the Tahsildar may, for reasons to be recorded in writing, direct that the arrears of rent together with the costs of the proceedings if awarded, shall be paid within one year from the date of the order and that if before the expiry of the said period, the tenant fails to pay the said arrears of rent and costs, the tenancy shall be deemed to be terminated and the tenant shall be liable to be evicted."

The learned counsel for the petitioner referred to a Division Bench decision of this Court reported in Sonajee Krishnajeo Mujumdar v. Nathu Yadav Patil.¹ That decision pertains to interpretation of ss. 29 and 25 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948. The learned counsel for the respondents referred to the decision of the Supreme Court in *R. M. Paranjyee v. A. M. Mali*² which has interpreted the effect of sub-s. (2) of s. 25 of the Bombay Tenancy and Agricultural Lands Act, 1948. In view of the principle on which that case is decided, it must be held that the statute itself having given a right to the defaulting tenant to a further grant of time within which to pay the amount of rent, there was hardly any further power in the Tahsildar to extend that time over again in the guise of exercising powers, as it were, afresh under the proviso. The proviso and the main sub-s. (1) of s. 30 had to be read together and are a part and parcel of the same scheme under which the statute permits the defaulting tenant to get an extended period for payment of arrears of rent, ordinarily as a matter of course for three months, but in case of failure to make payment due to failure of crops or similar calamity, up to a period of one year. This proviso cannot possibly be interpreted as creating a further locum penitentiae without payment of rent merely because an order passed by the Tahsildar under s. 30(1) may come to be made in a year in which there may be failure of crops. Once this argument is accepted, it would lead to somewhat startling results. It would mean that the tenant would be entitled to claim relief by way of further extension of time by a year from the date fixed for payment of arrears of rent under sub-s. (1) of s. 30, on account of failure of crops in the year in which the Tahsildar comes to pass the orders. I do not think that the Legislature intended any such result to follow from the proviso to sub-s. (1) of s. 30 of the new Tenancy Act.

The result is that the petition fails and is dismissed, but there will be no order as to costs.

THE UNION OF INDIA v. INDIA FISHERIES PRIVATE LTD., BOMBAY*.

Indian Income-tax Act (XI of 1922), Sec. 49E—Indian Companies Act (VII of 1913), Secs. 228, 229—Applicability of s. 49E vis-a-vis insolvency rules—Whether Department gets priority over other unsecured creditors where its claim proved in liquidation.

Section 49E of the Indian Income-tax Act, 1922, applies when insolvency rules do not apply. Therefore, once the claim of the Department is proved in liquidation proceedings, the Department cannot by exercising the right under s. 49E of the Act get priority over the other unsecured creditors.

SIKRI J. This appeal pursuant to a certificate of fitness granted by the High Court of Maharashtra at Bombay under art. 133 (1) (c) of the Constitution is directed against the judgment of the said High Court in a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution filed by the respondent.

The Indian Fisheries (P) Ltd.—hereinafter called the respondent—was a private limited company and was directed to be wound up by an order of the Bombay High Court, dated October 11, 1950, and a Court Liquidator was appointed as the Official Liquidator thereof with all powers under s. 179 of the Indian Companies Act, 1913 (VII of 1913) to be exercised by him under s. 180 without sanction or intervention of the Court save and except in case of sales of immovable property belonging to the respondent. For the assessment year 1948-49, the respondent was assessed on December 8, 1950, the tax being assessed at Rs. 8,737-15-0. On or about March 15, 1951, the Income Tax Officer lodged a claim in respect of this tax with the Official Liquidator. That claim was adjudged and allowed as an ordinary claim and certified as such on April 2, 1952. In August, 1954, the Official Liquidator declared a dividend of 9½ annas in a rupee and paid to the Income Tax Department a sum of Rs. 5,188-3-0 against the claim made by the Income Tax Officer as an ordinary creditor. Thus a balance of Rs. 3,549-12-0 still remained payable to the Income Tax Department from the assets of the respondent.

For the year 1955-56, the Department made a demand from the respondent on June 22, 1954, for a sum of Rs. 2,565-6-0 as advance tax. This was paid by the Official Liquidator. On a regular assessment being made for the said year, only Rs. 1,126-12-0 was assessed as payable by the respondent. After adjusting this sum against the advance payment of Rs. 2,565-6-0, Rs. 1,460-1-0 became refundable to the respondent, inclusive of interest. Instead of refunding the said balance to the respondent, the Income Tax Officer set off the said amount against the balance of Rs. 3,549-12-0 which was still outstanding in respect of the income-tax demand for the year 1948-49. The respondent filed a revision petition to the Commissioner of Income-tax, but the said petition was rejected by the Commissioner on September 21, 1959, holding that the action of the Income Tax Officer was perfectly justified under the provision of s. 49E of the Income-tax Act.

On November 25, 1959, the respondent filed a petition under art. 226 of the Constitution and prayed for a writ, direction or order for setting aside the orders of the Income Tax Officer and the Income Tax Commissioner. He further prayed for any
